different observance; but the poor bishop, remembering that he had lost his vast diocese of Wessex through his imperfect knowledge of Anglo-Saxon,³⁹ begged that his disciple Wilfrid might be allowed to speak in his place. "We think precisely alike," said Agilbert, "but he can better express our thoughts in English, than I could through an interpreter."⁴⁰ Then Wilfrid began, "We keep Easter as we have seen it kept by all Christians at Rome, where the blessed apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul, lived, taught, suffered, and are buried. He had seen the same rule observed in Italy and in Gaul, where we have studied; we know that it is so in Africa, in Asia, in Egypt, in Greece, and throughout Christendom, in spite of all difference of language and of country. It is only the Picts and Britons who, occupying the two most remote islands of the ocean, nay, but a part even of those islands, foolishly persist in contradicting all the rest of the world."⁴¹

Colman replied, "It is strange that you speak of our traditions as absurd, when we only follow the example of the great apostle who was thought worthy to lay his head upon the breast of our Saviour, and whom the whole world has judged to be so wise." The dialogue then continued in a less excited manner. In this discussion the bishop displayed the natural haughtiness of his race, and the abbot that persuasive eloquence already so dear to the Anglo-Saxons, who were charmed to hear their own barbarous language spoken perfectly by a man cultivated and formed by the learning of Italy and Gaul. As for the question itself, both had recourse to extremely poor arguments. Wilfred quoted Scripture, where there is not a single word as to the Pascal cycle, and the decretals of the universal Church, of which only one relates to the matter, that of the Council of Nice, which contents itself with the decision that Easter should always be celebrated on Sunday, a particular which the Irish observed equally with the Romans. Instead of limiting himself to the statement that the rules established at Rome had been and ought to be adopted everywhere, he also affirmed that St.

³⁹ See above, page 286.

⁴⁰ "Loquatur, obsecro, vice mea discipulus meus Wilfridus presbyter; ille melius ipsa lingua Anglorum quam ego per interpretem."—BEDE, iii. 25.

⁴¹ "Præter hos tantum et obstinationis eorum complices, Pictos dico et Britones, cum quibus de duabus ultimis oceani insulis, et his non totis, contra totum orbem stulto labore pugnant. . . . Mirum quare stultum appellare velitis laborem nostrum."—BEDE, l. c.

Peter had established the custom then followed at Rome, as if that custom had been always the same, and had not, in fact, been changed nearly a century before, to be brought into accordance with the best astronomical calculations. But Bishop Colman either knew nothing or understood nothing of this change, and was not able to cite it against his adversary. He perpetually recurred to the examples of St. John and the fathers of the Celtic Church, and with more vehemence still quoted Columba, whose life, so minutely described by the contemporaries of this very council of Whitby,⁴² contains no trace of peculiar attachment to the Celtic Easter, but shows that he merely followed with simplicity the ancient usage transmitted by St. Patrick to the Irish monks. Nothing gives us reason to suppose that the great Abbot of Iona, if once informed of the universal prevalence of the Roman custom, would have been opposed to it.

"Can we admit," said Bishop Colman, "that our most venerable father Columba, and his successors, men beloved of God, have acted contrary to the Divine Word? Many of them have given proof of their sanctity by miracles; and as for me, who believe in that sanctity, I choose to follow forever their teaching and their example." Here Wilfrid had the better of the argument. "As to your father Columba and his disciples, with their miracles, I might answer that, at the day of judgment, many will say to our Lord, that they have done miracles in His name, and He will answer that He never knew them. But God keep me from speaking thus of your father! it is better, when one is ignorant, to believe good than evil. I do not therefore deny that they were servants of God, and beloved by Him: no doubt they loved Him in their rustic simplicity, with the most pious intentions. I do not think there was much harm in their observance of Easter, because no one had told them of more perfect rules. If a Catholic calculator had been presented to them, I believe they would have followed his counsel as they followed the commandments of God which they knew. But as for you, without doubt you sin, if, after having heard the decretals of the Apostolic See, and even of the universal Church, confirmed by Holy Scripture, you still despise them. Even admitting the sanctity of your fathers, how can you prefer, to the Church spread over the whole earth, this handful of saints in one corner of a remote island? Finally, for your Columba (and I would willingly say our Columba, so far as he was the servant of Christ), however holy or powerful by his virtues he may have been, can we place him before the chief of the apostles, to whom our Lord himself said — ‘Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it; and I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven’? ”⁴³

⁴² The first of these biographers, Cumin the White, was at that very time Abbot of Iona, from whence Colman came; and the second Adamnan, then a monk in Ireland, was already forty years old in 664. The latter does not mention the Pascal difference except to relate the prophecy of Columba during his visit to Clonmacnoise, "De illa quæ post dies multos ob diversitatem paschalis festi orta est inter Scotiæ ecclesias discordia." — Lib. i. c. 3.

Close of the king's speech.

The Saxon king then addressed his bishop, “Is it true, Colman, that these words were said by our Lord to St. Peter?” “It is true, O king,” was the answer. “Can you then,” rejoined the king, “show me a similar authority given to your Columba?” “No,” said the bishop. “You are then,” continued the king, “both agreed that the keys of heaven were given to Peter by our Lord?” “Yes,” answered the two adversaries together. “Then,” said the king, “I say, like you, that he is the porter of heaven, and that I will not oppose him, but on the contrary, obey him in all things, lest when I reach the doors of the celestial kingdom, there be no one to open them for me if I am the adversary of him who carries the keys. In all my life I will neither do nor approve anything or any person that may be contrary to him.”⁴⁴

The assembly adopts the Romish
usages.

The whole assembly approved this conclusion of the king by vote, holding up their hands, both the nobles who were seated, and the freemen who stood round,⁴⁵ and all decided to adopt the Roman ⁴³ “Justius multo est de incognitis bonum credere, quam malum; unde et illos Dei famulos et Dei dilectos esse non nego, qui simplicitate rustica, sed intentione pia Deum dilexerunt . . . quos utique credo, si quis tunc ad eos catholicis calculator advenerat. . . . Etsi enim patres tui sancti fuerint, numquid universali quæ per orbem est ecclesiæ Christi, eorum est paucitas uno de angulo extremæ insulæ præferenda. Etsi sanctus erat et potens virtutibus ille Columba vester, immo et noster si Christi erat.” — BEDE, iii. 25. The dubious and slightly disdainful tone used by the young Wilfrid in speaking of the great Columba, of whose life he was evidently ignorant, is remarkable. However, this speech is only found in Bede, himself singularly hostile to Columba. Eddi, the contemporary and companion of Wilfrid, attributes to him much more humble language, of which he quotes little. Fleury, relating this scene, believes that he spoke against St. Columbanus of Luxeuil.

⁴⁴ “Ille est ostiarius et clavicularius, contra quem concluctationem controversiæ et iudiciorum ejus in vita mea non facio, nec facientibus consentio.” — EDDIUS, c. 10. Cf. BEDE, l. c.

⁴⁵ “Hæc dicente rege, elevatis in cælum manibus, faverunt adsidentes quique, sive adstantes.” — BEDE.

custom. The sitting ended without any discussion of the other contested points, which, no doubt, were regarded as settled by the first decision. Of the three bishops who had taken part in the deliberation, Agilbert, ex-Bishop of the Western Saxons, embarked for his own country, and Cedd, Bishop of the East Saxons, who had acted as interpreter to the two adverse parties, renounced the customs of Lindisfarne, in which he had been educated, and returned to his diocese of London to spread the Roman usages there.

But Colman, Bishop of the Northern Anglo-Saxons, refused to recognize the decision of the council. He could not resign himself to see his doctrine despised, and his spiritual ancestors depreciated; he feared, also, the anger of his countrymen, who would not have pardoned his defection.⁴⁶ Notwithstanding the affection and veneration showed for him by King Oswy, he determined to abandon his diocese. Accordingly, taking with him all the Lindisfarne monks of Scottish origin, who would neither give up the Celtic Easter nor shave their heads in Roman fashion, he left Northumbria forever, and went to Iona to consult the fathers of the order, or family of St. Columba. He carried with him the bones of his predecessor St. Aidan, the founder of Lindisfarne, and first Celtic evangelist of Northumbria, as if the ungrateful land had become unworthy to possess these relics of a betrayed saint, and witnesses of a despised apostleship. Undoubtedly this holy bishop, whose virtues, like those of his predecessors, draw, in this supreme hour, an eloquent and generous homage from the venerable Bede, would have done better to have yielded and remained in his diocese conforming to the customs of Rome. But what heart is so cold as not to understand, to sympathize, and to journey with him along the Northumbrian coast and over the Scottish mountains, where, bearing homewards the bones to his father, the proud but vanquished spirit returned to his northern mists, and buried in the sacred isle of Iona his defeat and his unconquerable fidelity to the traditions of his race?

Bishop
Colman
protests, abdicates,
and returns to Iona.

⁴⁶ "Propter timorem patriæ suæ." — EDDIUS, l. c. "Videns spretam suam doctrinam, sectamque esse despectam." — BEDE, iii. 26. Cf. iv. 4.

CHAPTER II.

WILFRID, BISHOP OF YORK, AND THE GREEK MONK THEODORE, PRIMATE OF ENGLAND.

Colman founds a half-Saxon, half-Celtic monastic colony in Ireland. — He is succeeded in Northumbria by the Anglo-Saxon Eata as prior of Lindisfarne, and by Tuda, an Irishman converted to the Romish ritual, as bishop. — Dedication of the great Monastery of Peterborough, founded by the Christian descendants of Penda, the last Pagan leader; at which Mercians and Northumbrians, Celts and Romanists, are present together; speech of King Wulphere. — Pestilence of 664; death of Tuda; Wilfrid elected Bishop of Northumbria. — Treating the Anglo-Saxon bishops as schismatics, he goes to be consecrated by the Bishop of Paris at Compiègne, and removes his see from Lindisfarne to York. — On his return he is shipwrecked on the coast of Sussex, and fights with the natives. — Celtic reaction against Wilfrid; King Oswy replaces him during his absence by an Irish abbot, Ceadda. — Sanctity and popularity of Ceadda. — The Northumbrians observe the decree of Whitby as to the celebration of Easter, but refuse to retain Wilfrid as bishop. — He retires to his Monastery of Ripon. — He resides with the Kings of Mercia and of Kent. — He assists the holy Queen Ermenilda in completing the conversion of the Mercians. — He introduces the Gregorian chant and the Benedictine rule into Northumbria. — The Kings of Kent and Northumbria leave to the Pope the choice of the new metropolitan of Canterbury. — The Pope chooses a Greek monk Theodore, and associates with him Adrian, an African, and the Anglo-Saxon Benedict Biscop. — They are all three seized on their way by Ebroin, but released. — The pontificate of St. Theodore, the first metropolitan recognized by all England. — He re-establishes Wilfrid in the see of York, who makes Ceadda bishop of the Mercians. — Holy and peaceful death of Ceadda. — Theodore and Adrian visit all England. — Theodore's ecclesiastical legislation; his book of penance. — He consecrates the Celtic Cathedral of Lindisfarne. — He creates the parochial system as it now exists, and holds the first Anglo-Saxon council at Hertford. — He fails in increasing the number of bishoprics, but introduces the Benedictine order into the monasteries. — Literary development of the English monasteries due to Theodore and Adrian. — The Church of England is constituted, and the English nation becomes a lever in the hands of the Papacy.

Colman
founds a monastic colony in Ireland.

It was not only the priests of Celtic origin, Irish or Scotch, who refused to sanction by their presence the introduction of Roman practices at Lindisfarne; Colman was also accompanied by thirty

Anglo-Saxon monks, perfectly versed in the study and offices of monastic life, who preferred the Celtic observances to those of Rome. After a short sojourn at Iona, he led these emigrants to his native country, and established himself with them in a desert island on the west coast of Ireland called Innisbowen, or the Isle of the White Heifer, a name it still retains. But when confined in this islet, beaten by the waves of the great ocean, the Anglo-Saxons, whose devotion to Celtic tradition had been strong enough to sever them from their country, were unable to live amicably with the Irish, their former companions at Lindisfarne. They quarrelled about a purely material matter, which manifests even thus early the natural incompatibility of the two races who were destined afterwards upon Irish soil to fight more cruel battles. The Irish monks wandered all the summer through about their favorite spots, probably in many instances their native places; but on their return in winter they expected to share the harvest which their English brethren had painfully cultivated and gathered in.⁴⁷ Colman was obliged to separate them; leaving the Irish in their island, he installed the Anglo-Saxons in a monastery which, under the name of Mayo, flourished greatly, and which a century later still continued to be occupied by English monks, fervent and laborious, who had, however, returned from Celtic usages to the orthodox rule, and probably to Benedictine discipline, which Wilfrid had established at the same time as he introduced conformity to the usages of Rome.

Colman, however, while withdrawing from Lindisfarne all his Celtic countrymen, and those of the Anglo-Saxons who sympathized with them, had no intention of handing over definitely to the enemy the sacred isle in which his predecessors had delighted to recognize a new Iona. Before setting out on his voluntary exile, he begged his friend King Oswy to allow the remaining monks at Lindisfarne to take for their superior that Eata whom Aïdan had chosen among his twelve first Northumbrian disciples, and who, out of love to Celtic traditions,

The new prelates in Northumbria.

⁴⁷ "Eo quod Scotti tempore ætatis quo fruges erant colligendæ, relicto monasterio, per nota sibi loca dispersi vagarentur; ut vero hieme succedente redirent, et his quæ Angli præparaverant, communiter uti desiderarent." — BEDE, iv. 4. Is not this precisely the fable of the Grasshopper and the Ant? and is it not curious to discover, in a hidden corner of monkish history, a fresh proof of the radical difference and fatal incompatibility of the two races, Celtic and Saxon? This intractable Bishop Colman died in 674 or 676; he is reckoned among the saints of the Irish martyrology.

had given up the monastery at Ripon, in which Wilfrid succeeded him, and had again become abbot of Melrose — that is to say, of the novitiate establishment of the Celtic monks in Northumbria. The king consented, and the confidant and friend of Colman became superior of Lindisfarne, with the title of prior, but the full authority of an abbot.

After this it became necessary to proceed immediately to replace Colman as bishop of all Northumbria. His successor was one of his own countrymen, who resided in the diocese, and, indeed, during the pontificate of Colman, had been famed for his virtues and apostolical activity. This monk, named Tuda, had been educated in the monasteries of southern Ireland; he had already conformed to the Roman ritual in the questions of the celebration of Easter and the form of the tonsure — these customs having been, it is said, adopted thirty years before by the district of Ireland to which he belonged. It was only, therefore, by his Celtic origin, that he was attached to the ancient traditions of the diocese. He died some months afterwards of a terrible pestilence, which in this year, 664, made cruel ravages in the British Isles. He was the last of the Celtic bishops of Northumbria.⁴⁸

Before his death, however, there occurred a great religious and national solemnity, at which he was present, and which was celebrated in this same critical year of 664, so decisive, under more than one aspect, for England. This solemnity seems to have united in sincere and unanimous enthusiasm all the principal personages of the most important states of the Heptarchy, and it exhibits, in a special degree, the increasing ascendancy of that Roman influence of which Wilfrid was henceforward the victorious champion. Its object was the dedication of a new monastery in Mercia, the kingdom which had been so long the stronghold of Saxon paganism and the seat of an obstinate resistance to the missionary spirit of Northumbria.

By one of those transformations so frequent among the Germanic races at the period of their entrance into the Christian life, all the descendants of the fierce Penda, the most obstinate and invincible of pagans, were destined to become intrepid champions of Christianity, or models of monastic life.

Conversion to Christianity of the descendants of Penda.

⁴⁸ "Famulus Christi Tuda qui erat apud Scottos austrinos eruditus, atque ordinatus episcopus, habens juxta morem provincie illius coronam tonsuræ ecclesiasticæ et catholicam temporis paschalis regulam observans." — BEDE, iii. 26.

Of his eight children who are known to us, three sons who reigned successively distinguished themselves by their religious zeal, the third becoming a monk after a reign of thirty years; while three daughters, two of whom are counted among the saints of the English calendar, ended their lives in the cloister. The eldest son, Peada, who was son-in-law of Oswy, brother-in-law and friend of Alchfrid, and the earliest Christian of Mercia, continued to reign over one part of the kingdom, even after the defeat and death of his father, who perished under the avenging sword of Oswy. The father-in-law and son-in-law, united more closely by their faith than the father and son had been by the ties of blood, determined to consecrate their alliance by founding a great monastery in honor of God and St. Peter, and chose for this purpose a retired situation in the east of Mercia.

Such was the origin of the Abbey of Peterborough, the burgh or castle of St. Peter,⁴⁹ the most ancient of those famous houses destined to rise successively in the midst of the vast fens which formed a sort of natural frontier between the eastern and central Saxons, between Mercia and East Anglia.

Foundation
of Peterborough.

Peada died a violent death when the work was but beginning.⁵⁰ But it was taken up, and continued by his young brother Wulphere, whom the Mercians, in revolt from Northumbrian domination, had chosen for their chief, who had been, like his elder brother, baptized by the second Celtic bishop of Lindisfarne,⁵¹ and who always showed an ardent zeal for the extension and consolidation of Christianity in his kingdom. His younger brothers and his two sisters, one of them the wife of the young King Alchfrid of Northumbria, the friend of Peada and Wilfrid, and all the witan — that is to say, the wise men and nobles, whether lay or ecclesiastical, of his public council⁵² — encouraged him to the utmost in finishing the first great monastic foundation in their vast territory.

656.

The abbot appointed from the beginning of the work was a monk named Sexwulf, descended from

Solemn
dedication
of Peter-

⁴⁹ It was at first called Medehamstede, which means the house in the meadow.

⁵⁰ By the treachery of his wife, daughter of Oswy, and sister of his friend Alchfrid, who, having married Peada's sister, was doubly his brother-in-law. — BEDE, iii. 24. Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, ad an. 665.

⁵¹ Act. SS. Bolland., vol. ii. February, p. 689.

⁵² Anglo-Saxon Chronicle: Gibson's ed., Latin-Saxon text, p. 34; Giles's ed., English text, p. 321.

borough. a great and noble family, devoted to the service of
 664. God, and much beloved by the Mercian Saxons. King Wulphere enjoined him to spare nothing to complete his brother's work magnificently, promising to be answerable for all the expense. When the building was finished the King of Mercia invited, for the day of consecration, the King of Northumbria, who was his godfather although he had become his political adversary, and whose dignity of Bretwalda entitled him to preside at the grand solemnities of the Saxon people; and with him the two kings of the neighboring states of Essex and East Anglia, the Archbishop of Canterbury and Bishop of Rochester,⁵³ who were the first Anglo-Saxon monks raised to the episcopate; Wini, who had taken the place of Agilbert as Bishop of the Saxons of the West;⁵⁴ the two bishops of Mercia and Northumbria,⁵⁵ both educated in Celtic monasteries; and, last of all, Wilfrid, on whom all eyes had been turned by his late victories. Around these distinguished guests, both lay and ecclesiastical, were ranged all the earls and thanes, or great landed proprietors of the kingdom.⁵⁶ It was therefore really a great political assembly as well as a religious one. When the Archbishop had ended the ceremony of dedication, and consecrated the monastery to St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. Andrew, King Wulphere, placing himself in the midst of his family and his nobles, spoke thus:—"Thanks be to the most high and almighty God for the good deed which I do to-day in honor of Christ and St. Peter! All, as many as are here present, be witnesses and sureties of the donation which I make to St. Peter, to the Abbot Sexwulf and his monks, of the land and water, the fens and brooks here mentioned. . . . It is a trifling gift; but I will that they hold and possess it so royally and freely that no impost may be levied upon it, and that the monastery may be subject to no other power on earth, except the Holy See of Rome, for it is hither that those of us who cannot go to Rome will come to seek and to visit St. Peter. I implore you, my brother, and you, my sisters, be witnesses

⁵³ Frithona and Ithamar.

⁵⁴ He was soon expelled from this usurped diocese; but thanks to the protection of Wulphere, he became Bishop of London, purchasing the see, according to Bede, who does not explain how the King of Mercia could dispose of the bishopric of the East Saxons.—Eccles. Hist., iii. 7, 28. Lappenberg concludes that Wulphere became Bretwalda after the death of Oswy.

⁵⁵ Jaruman and Tuda.

⁵⁶ "Et ibi fuerunt omnes illius thani quotquot essent in suo regno. . . . Cum comitibus, cum ducibus, et cum thanis."—Chron. Anglo-Sax., p. 35. Cf. Hook, Lives of the Archbishops, t. i. p. 131.

to this for the good of your souls, and sign it with your hands. I implore those who shall succeed me, whether my sons, my brothers, or others, to maintain this donation, as they wish to obtain eternal life, and to escape eternal torment. Whoever shall take away from it, or add to it, may the keeper of the celestial gates take away from, or add to, his part in heaven." The four kings, the five bishops, the two brothers and two sisters of the king, the earls and lords, successively signed the act of donation with the sign of the cross, repeating this formula, "I confirm it by my mouth and by the cross of Christ."⁵⁷ The document which contained the donation having been drawn up in accordance with the royal speech, the four kings and two princesses signed it first, then the bishops, and after them Wilfrid, who describes himself on this occasion as a "priest, servant of the Churches, and bearer of the Gospel among the nations."⁵⁸

Immediately following upon these events, came a terrible pestilence, which ravaged England, and chose its most illustrious victims among those prelates of whom we have been speaking. It carried off first Biohop Cedda, who had acted as interpreter at Whitby, and his thirty friends, of whose touching death at Lastingham we have already heard;⁵⁹ and after him the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of Northumbria, both of whom had signed the deed of dedication of the new monastery of St. Peter.⁶⁰ It became necessary, therefore, to provide for the see which the death of Tuda had left vacant, that of Northumbria, the largest and most important of all the English bishoprics. The Roman party believed itself so strong as to be able to disregard the tradition, not yet very venerable, which made that great see the right of the Celtic monks. They determined to go further back, to the recol-

Wilfrid is promoted to the bishopric. 661.

⁵⁷ All these details are taken from the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, the most important and most authentic of all the historic monuments of the Anglo-Saxon epoch, after the History of Bede. Kemble, and after him several recent authors, see only modern interpolations in these passages relating to the Abbey of Peterborough, but give no direct proof of this opinion. Kemble, however, describes the consent of the assembly, half lay and half clerical, to the king's donation. (Codex Diplomat., n° 984.) M. Augustin Thierry has quoted the speech of Wulphere as authentic (Hist. de la Conquête, t. i. p. 88, edit. of 1846), and I do not see any reason for not following his example. The most complete version of the deed is in Dugdale's Monasticon (vol. i. p. 63). There will be found in the Appendix some notes on the present condition of this famous abbey.

⁵⁸ "Ego Wilfridus presbyter, famulus ecclesiarum, et bajulus evangelii Dei in gentes, affectavi."

⁵⁹ Page 290.

⁶⁰ BEDE, iii. 25, 28, &c.

lections of the first mission sent from Rome, which, passing by Canterbury, was established at York by the Benedictine Paulinus. Besides this, the young king, Alchfrid, was impatient to see his friend Wilfrid master of spiritual authority in the kingdom which had been brought back by him to unity with Rome. He obtained the consent of his father, the Bretwalda Oswy, and both together reassembled the Wite-nagemot, to proceed to the election of a bishop, whose determination it should be to make Roman usages the law of his conduct. The Northumbrian thanes, consulted by the two kings, replied with one voice that no one in the whole country could be more worthy of the episcopate than Wilfrid, who was already priest and abbot. He himself was present at the assembly, and wished at first to decline the election. But he was commanded in the name of the Lord, and on the part of the kings and people of Northumbria, to submit his will to their unanimous choice.⁶¹

This was a great victory for the Roman observances. It was never forgiven by the vanquished, and Wilfrid had to bear the penalty during all the remainder of his life. The Northumbrian dissenters submitted to the decision of Whitby, but they retained an implacable antipathy to the conqueror. The great Abbess Hilda, the Celtic monks of Lindisfarne, all those who remained faithful to the sacred memory of St. Aïdan, and to that still more venerated, of Columba, appeared to have taken against Wilfrid the oath of Hannibal. Reduced to powerlessness on the Pascal question, in respect to which they could not struggle against Rome with the whole Church at her back, they regained the advantage when only the person of Wilfrid was concerned, who, dear as he was to the king's son, was perhaps for that very reason less liked by Oswy, who, though he adopted the Roman Easter, could not destroy all traces of attachment to the ideas and customs of his youth.

Wilfrid, meantime, chose this occasion to exhibit, yet more than at Whitby, the bigoted and exclusive side of his character. He would not be consecrated by any of the bishops of his own country, not even by the

He does not wish to be conse-

⁶¹ "Reges concilium cum sapientibus suæ gentis . . . inierunt, quem eligerent in sedem vacantem, qui voluisset sedis apostolicæ doctrinam sibi facere et alios docere. . . . Neminem habemus meliorem et digniorem nostræ gentis quam Wilfridum . . . consenserunt reges et omnis populus huic electioni, et Wilfridum omnis conventus in nomine Domini accipere gradum episcopalem præcepit." — EDDIUS, c. 2.

Metropolitan of Canterbury. Although they were all in communion with the Holy See, and though many of them are still venerated as saints,⁶² he took upon himself, on his own authority, to class them with schismatics. "My lord kings," he said, "I must first of all consider the best means of reaching the episcopate according to your election, without exposing myself to the reproaches of true Catholics. There are in this island many bishops whom it is not my business to accuse, but they have ordained Britons and Scots whom the Apostolic See has not received into communion, because it does not receive those that hold communion with schismatics."⁶³ I therefore humbly beseech you to send me into Gaul, where there are many Catholic bishops, so that I may receive the episcopal character without opposition to the Holy See." He thus confounded together the whole Celtic clergy of Great Britain and Ireland as schismatics, though his apologists have not left us the least trace of any Papal decision which authorized him in taking this attitude. However, the two kings made no objection, but, on the contrary, gave him a numerous train and enough money to present himself to the Franks with the pomp he loved, and which suited the bishop of a great kingdom. He thus crossed the sea and went to Compiègne to seek his friend Agilbert, formerly Bishop of the West Saxons, who had just been made Bishop of Paris. Agilbert received him with all honor as a confessor of the faith. Wilfrid was consecrated with the greatest solemnity, and with the assistance of twelve other bishops. He was carried through the church, in the midst of the crowd, on a golden throne, by the hands of bishops, who chanted hymns, and who were alone admitted to the honor of supporting his throne. He was instituted Bishop, not of Lindisfarne, like his four predecessors, but of York, like Paulinus, the first bishop sent from Canterbury and from Rome, as if by this means to efface all trace of the Celtic mission in Northumbria.⁶⁴

⁶² FABER, p. 44.

⁶³ At least this seems to be the meaning of the somewhat obscure language his friend Eddi attributes to him: "O domini venerabiles reges. . . . Sunt hic in Britannia multi episcopi, quorum nullum meum est accusare: quamvis veraciter sciam quod haud quatuordecim anni sunt, ut Britones et Scoti ab illis sint ordinati, quos nec apostolica sedes in communionem recepit, neque eos qui schismaticis consentiunt."—C. 12.

⁶⁴ "Tale consilium bene regibus complacuit, præparantes ei navem et auxilia hominum et multitudinem pecuniæ. . . . In sella aurea sedentem more eorum sursum elevarunt, portantes in manibus soli episcopi intra oratoria, nullo alio attingente. . . . Post spatium temporis ad sedem episcopalem

Shipwreck and combat on the coast of Sussex.

His stay in France was probably too much prolonged, and his return was not without disaster. While he was crossing the Channel, and the clergy who accompanied him, seated on deck, replaced the ordinary songs of the sailors by chanted psalms, a fearful storm arose, by which they were wrecked on the coast of Sussex — the smallest kingdom of the Heptarchy, inhabited, as its name indicates, by the Southern Saxons. The ebbing tide having left the ship aground, the people in the neighborhood made a rush to avail themselves of that right to wreck and derelict always so dear to maritime populations, and which has been too long maintained even among the most Catholic, as in our own Bretagne. As the Southern Saxons were still pagans, we can scarcely admit, with one of Wilfrid's biographers, that they were excited against him by the malice of Celtic Christianity; but they did not the less manifest their intention of taking possession of the vessel, and giving the shipwrecked strangers their choice between death and slavery. Wilfrid tried to pacify them, offering all he possessed for the liberty of himself and his followers. But the pagans were excited by one of their priests, who, standing on the cliffs, cursed, like Balaam, the people of God, and looked as if he meant to destroy them by sorcery. One of Wilfrid's followers, armed, like David, with a sling, flung a stone at the heathen pontiff, whose skull it shattered; and his corpse fell upon the sands. At this sight the rage of the savages redoubled, and they prepared to take the vessel by storm. Wilfrid's Northumbrians, one hundred and twenty in number, resolved to defend themselves. They swore, according to Saxon custom, not to abandon each other, and to think of no alternative save a glorious death or victory. Wilfrid and his priests, kneeling on the deck, prayed while the others fought. Three times the ferocious wreckers mounted to the assault, and three times they were repulsed. They were preparing for a fourth attack, under the command of their king, who had been attracted by the hope of booty, when the tide suddenly turned, lifted the stranded vessel, and saved the travellers from their enemies. They landed peaceably at Sandwich, on the same Kentish coast where Augustin and his companions had for the first time trodden the coast of England.⁶⁵

Ebracæ civitatis hunc emiserunt." — EDDIUS, l. c. Cf. BEDE, iii. 28; FRIDEGODUS, Vita Rhythmica, c. 11.

⁶⁵ "Canentibus clericis et psallentibus laudem Dei pro celeusmate in choro. . . . Mare navem et homines relinquens . . . littora detergens, in abyssi

A painful surprise awaited them. During the prolonged absence of Wilfrid the mind of Oswy had changed. The victory of Whitby, like all other victories, was less complete than it at first seemed to be. The Celtic party, apparently destroyed by the unanimous vote of the assembly, had now revived, and regained its credit with the Bretwalda. The return of Oswy to his former predilections for the Celtic Church, in which he had been baptized and brought up, may probably be ascribed to the influence of the holy Abbess Hilda of Whitby, princess of the Northumbrian blood-royal, to whom the king had confided his daughter when consecrating her to God as the price of his victory over the Mercians and the completed liberation of his country.⁶⁶ As long as she lived Hilda remained faithful to the Celtic traditions, and her opposition to Wilfrid never relaxed.⁶⁷ It has also been supposed that Oswy had begun to be jealous of his son Alchfrid, and of the influence procured for him with the Roman party by his close alliance with Wilfrid, although it was Oswy himself who had associated his son with him in the royalty, and although his position as Bretwalda or suzerain of the Anglo-Saxon Confederation might have reassured him on that score.⁶⁸ But the confidant and biographer of Wilfrid affirms that the Celts (whom he most unjustly styles quartodecimans), with the aid of the devil, persuaded the king to take advantage of the absence of Wilfrid to appoint one of their party Bishop of York in his place.⁶⁹

Celtic reaction against Wilfrid. King Oswy replaces him by the Irishman Ceadda.

It is unanimously allowed that the man whom Oswy substituted for Wilfrid was a saint. His name was Ceadda,⁷⁰ a monk of Anglo-Saxon birth, but matricem recessit. . . . Stans princeps sacerdotum idololatriæ coram paganis in tumulo excelso, sicut Balaam . . . ut suis magicis artibus manus eorum alligare nitebatur . . . retrorsum cadavere cadente sicut Goliathus in arenosis locis. . . . Inito pactu, ut nullus ab alio in fugam terga verteret, sed aut mortem cum laude, aut vitam cum triumpho habere mererentur." — EDDIUS, c. 13.

Saintly character of Ceadda, the

⁶⁶ See above, p. 297.

⁶⁷ VARIN, account already quoted. WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY, l. c.

⁶⁸ FABER, p. 46. A trace of this rivalry between father and son is clearly shown in this passage of Bede: — "Rex Alchfrid misit Wilfridum ad regem Galliarum, qui eum consecrari faceret episcopum. . . . Imitatus industriam filii rex Oswiu misit Cantiam, virum sanctum." — iii. 28.

⁶⁹ "Oswiu rex, male suadente invidia, hostis antiqui instinctu, alium præarripere inordinate sedem suam edoctus, consensit ab his qui quartodecimannam partem contra apostolicæ sedis regulam sibi elegerunt." — EDDIUS, c. 14.

⁷⁰ He is venerated in England under the name of St. Chad. "Religiosissimum admirabilem doctorem, de insula Hibernia venientem." — EDDIUS, c. 14. BEDE, iii. 21, 23; iv. 2.

intruded successor of Wilfrid. who had been a disciple of St. Aïdan. He was a brother of Bishop Cedd or Cedda, who had acted as interpreter at Whitby, and whose death, followed by that of his thirty friends, we have already mentioned. Ceadda had succeeded his brother as Abbot of Lastingham, the monastery which was, after Lindisfarne, the principal seat of the Celtic spirit in Northumbria. It was Oswy's desire, however, that the new bishop should be consecrated, not by the prelates of the Celtic ritual, but at Canterbury by the Saxon metropolitan,⁷¹ who had always preserved a good understanding with the people of the north. But when Ceadda arrived at Canterbury he found that the terrible pestilence of 664 had carried off the archbishop, whose successor was not yet appointed. He then went to the land of the Eastern Saxons to obtain consecration from Wini, of whom we have heard at Whitby and Peterborough, but who also appears to have been moved by a reactionary impulse against the vote of the Council, since he called to his aid, in the consecration of Ceadda, two British bishops who had remained faithful to the Pascal usage of the Celts.⁷² On his return to Northumbria, Ceadda peaceably took possession of his diocese, and displayed there the virtues which have for so long made his name popular among the English. Well versed in Holy Scripture, he drew from it rules of conduct which he never disregarded. His humility, his sincerity, the purity of his life, his love for study, excited the admiration of the Northumbrian people, to whose evangelization he devoted himself, visiting the cities, villages, and castles, nay, even the most retired hamlets, not on horseback, according to the favorite custom of the Saxons, but on foot, like the apostles, and like his master and predecessor St. Aïdan.⁷³

It does not appear, however, that Ceadda or any other of the Celtic adversaries of Wilfrid attempted to reverse the decision of the Council of Whitby, or to maintain or re-establish either the Celtic observance of Easter or the tonsure from ear to ear. It is probable that the opposition which arose against Wilfrid, continually increasing in violence, was directed less against Roman doctrines or practices than against himself personally. His precocious influence, and ⁷¹ Frithona, also called Deusdedit.

⁷² "Absumptis in societatem ordinationis duobus de Britonum gente episcopis, qui dominicum paschæ diem . . . secus morem canonicum, a quarta decima usque ad vigesimam lunam celebrant." — BEDE, iii. 28.

⁷³ "Oppida, rura, casas, vicos, castella propter evangelizandum, non equitando . . . peragraræ." — BEDE, iii. 28.

still more his violent proceedings against the Irish and their disciples, roused the popular dislike; for it is proved that, wherever he had the power, he allowed the Celts only the choice of giving up their own customs or returning to their native country.⁷⁴

Thus dispossessed of his see, Wilfrid regained all his influence by the moderation and dignity of his conduct. He was only thirty years of age. His youth might have excused some irritation, some warmth easy to be understood in the presence of so manifest an injustice. But far from yielding to this, he displayed the prudence and mature mind of a statesman, together with the humility and charity of a saint. He, so rigid an observer of the canon law, so scrupulous with regard to liturgical irregularities, had here to oppose an inexcusable abuse of power, a direct violation of the laws of the Church—he had to vindicate an evident right, solemnly conferred by the Northumbrian king and nation, and solemnly consecrated by the Church. And yet he preferred to be silent, to withdraw himself, and to trust to the justice of God and of the future. Thus the saint begins to be visible in his character; and it must not be forgotten, as an additional claim upon our interest, that the pious usurper of the see was himself already accounted a saint, and placed by public veneration in the high rank which he has for nine hundred years maintained in the regard of English Catholics.

Wilfrid, whose episcopal character no one could despise, but who had no longer a diocese, retired calmly, and even joyfully, to the Monastery of Ripon, which he held by the generosity of the young King Alchfrid, and there lived in study and seclusion.⁷⁵ It may be supposed that his friend Alchfrid went thither to console him—if, indeed, he were living at the time of Wilfrid's return; for from that moment he disappears from history, though there is no record of his death. But Wilfrid was not long permitted to remain in his monastery. Wulphere, King

Wilfrid retires to the Monastery of Ripon.

He stays with the Kings of Mercia and Kent.

⁷⁴ “Ipse perplura catholicæ observationis moderamina ecclesiis Anglorum sua doctrina contulit. Unde factum est, ut, crescente per dies institutione catholica, Scotti omnes qui inter Anglos morabantur aut his manus darent, aut suam redirent ad patriam.” — BEDE, iii. 28. “Hic primus verum pascha, ejectis Scottis, in Northumbria docuit.” — THOM. DE ELMHAM., Hist. Monast. S. Augustini, p. 198.

⁷⁵ “Placido vultu et hilari pectore cœnobium suum in Ripon repetiit, ibique cum magna mentis stabilitate.” — RICARD. HAGULSTAD., Hist. Eccles. Hagust., c. 6.

of Mercia, the founder of Peterborough, invited him to his kingdom, where at that time there was no bishop.⁷⁶

Although this kingdom had been converted and governed by Celtic monks, Wulphere was naturally drawn to favor the champion of the Roman ritual, by his marriage with Ermenilda, daughter of the King of Kent, and, consequently, sprung from that race which first received the teachings of St. Ermenilda, Queen of Mercia, afterwards abbess of Ely.

Rome from the lips of St. Augustin. She was niece of Eanfleda, Queen of Northumbria, who had been the first protectress of Wilfrid, and who had carried back from her exile and education at Canterbury so faithful an attachment to the Roman customs. King Wulphere, Queen Ermenilda, and the Abbot Wilfrid, therefore labored together to extend and consolidate the Christian faith, in that vast kingdom of Mercia, which already began to rival Northumbria in importance.

Thanks to the great territorial donations made to him by the king, Wilfrid was able to found several monasteries, in one of which he was destined to end his life. He thus lent powerful aid in achieving the happy results which were chiefly due to Queen Ermenilda. This gentle and noble woman, who, like so many other princesses of the race of Hengist, ended her days in the cloister, and is inscribed in the list of saints, had been chosen by God to complete the transformation into Christians of those terrible Mercians, who, more than all the other Anglo-Saxons, had remained faithful to their national paganism, and had been so long the terror of the new-born Christianity of England. She succeeded as much by her bounties and good example, as by her energetic perseverance. The unwearied activity of her self-devotion was only equalled by her angelic sweetness. She never ceased her exertions until, after a reign of seventeen years with Wulphere, idolatry had completely disappeared from Mercia. Then, on the death of her husband, she entered the monastery, where her mother awaited her, and which had been founded by her aunt.⁷⁷ ⁷⁷ "Sua dulcedine, blandifluis hortamentis, moribus ac beneficiis indomita mulcens pectora, ad suave Christi jugum rudes populos et indoctos excitabat. . . . Nec requievit invicta, donec idola et ritus dæmoniacos extirparet. . . . Act. SS. Bolland., vol. ii. Feb., p. 691. The history of the Monastery of Ely, founded by St. Etheldreda, and of which Ermenilda succeeded her mother, Sexburga, as abbess, will be found further on.

658-675.

⁷⁶ Bishop Jaruman had been sent by Wulphere to lead back to the true faith the Eastern Saxons, who, since the great pestilence of 664, had fallen into idolatry. See above, p. 291.

In order to understand clearly the aspect of these earliest ages of the political and religious history of England, it is needful to remember the ties of blood which united all the kings and princesses of different dynasties who governed the kingdoms of the Heptarchy, and claimed their descent from Odin. This relationship frequently serves to guide us through the maze of incidents which favored or retarded the preaching of the Gospel. Thus the gentle and noble Ermenilda was the sister of Egbert, King of Kent, who, faithful, like her, to the traditions of his family, always showed himself full of zeal for religion such as Augustin had preached it to his ancestor Ethelbert, and full of affection for Wilfrid. Accordingly, after the death of Augustin's fifth successor, the metropolitan see having remained vacant for some years, Egbert invited the Abbot of Ripon to preside over the spiritual government of his kingdom, and to provide for the ordinations.

Egbert,
King of
Kent.
664-673.

Wilfrid exercised this provisional authority for three years; dividing his time between his Northumbrian monastery, and the diocese of Canterbury, where he made many friends, whose aid he secured for the benefit of his Abbey of Ripon. One of his first acts was to bring to Ripon two monks of the monastery of St. Augustin, good musicians, who introduced among the Anglo-Saxons the Gregorian chant, always used at Canterbury; and it is to one of these, named Hedd, or Eddi, that we owe the extremely valuable and curious biography of his bishop. With these singers Wilfrid brought also masons, or rather architects, cæmentarii, and other artists or workmen, all, no doubt, monks of the same monastery, whose talents he proposed to employ in the great building of which he already dreamed. Finally, he brought from the first sanctuary created by the Benedictines in England, a gift yet more precious and more fruitful than music or architecture, the rule of St. Benedict, which no one had hitherto attempted to introduce into the Northumbrian monasteries.⁷⁸ Wilfrid constituted himself its ardent and zealous missionary, advancing its adoption side by side with that 666-669.

Wilfrid introduces the Gregorian music and the Benedictine rule into Northumbria.

⁷⁸ "Cum cantatoribus Ædde et Æona et cæmentariis omnisque pæne artis ministerio in regionem suam revertens cum regula Benedicti, instituta ecclesiarum bene melioravit." — EDDIUS, c. 14. "Nonne ego curavi . . . quomodo vitam monachorum secundum regulam S. Benedicti patris, quam nullus ibi prius invexit, constituerem?" — Ibid., c. 45. Cf. MABILLON, Act. SS. O. S. B., t. v. p. 633, puis Annales Benedictini, lib. xv. n. 64.

of the Roman tonsure, the exact observance of Easter, and the harmonious and alternate chanting of the liturgy. He succeeded thoroughly; for it is to him and to him alone that we must attribute the gradual but rapid substitution of the Benedictine rule for Celtic traditions in the great and numerous communities which the sons of St. Columba had created in the north of England. It has been already made apparent in the life of St. Columba, that there was no fundamental difference between monastic life as regulated by the great legislator of Monte Cassino, and that practised at Iona and in the other communities of Ireland and Great Britain. The only difference that can be indicated as distinctly characteristic of monastic life among the Celts, is a certain increased austerity in fasts and other mortifications, and a more decided application to the copying of manuscripts.⁷⁹ But in the opinion of Wilfrid, as in the general interest of the Church, it was of great consequence that the powerful regular army of Saxon Christianity should march under the same flag, and answer to the same watchword. The watchword and the flag had been brought from Rome by the Benedictine missionaries of Mont-Cœlius, and confided to the two great monastic foundations of Canterbury, from whence Wilfrid brought them to make of them the supreme, and henceforward ineffaceable, characteristics of English ecclesiastical organization.

Choice of a new metropolitan.

However, the aspect of affairs was about to undergo another change. It was needful to find a successor for Archbishop Deusdedit. For this purpose, the King of Northumbria, Oswy, made use of the superior authority in ecclesiastical affairs which seems to have been accorded to the Bretwalda; he showed, at the same time, that though the Celtic party, by appealing to the recollections of his youth, had been able to persuade him to make Wilfrid the victim of an unjust exclusion, he remained, nevertheless, sincerely submissive to the primacy of the Holy See, which he had so solemnly recognized at Whitby. After consulting with the young King Egbert of Kent and the chiefs of the Anglo-Saxon clergy, he appointed a monk of Canterbury, named Wighard, universally known to be worthy of the episcopate, a Saxon by birth, but trained in the school of the first missionaries sent from Rome by St.

⁷⁹ As to the election of abbots, which was one of the most essential bases of the Benedictine rule, it appears that Wilfrid himself departed from it without hesitation by naming to his monks the successor they were to give him.—EDDIUS, c. 61.

Gregory,⁸⁰ and thus uniting all the conditions necessary to satisfy at once the exigencies of the national spirit and those of the most severe orthodoxy. Then, still acting in conjunction with the King of Kent, he did what had never before been done by an English king, nor, indeed, so far as I know, by the king of any newly converted nation; he sent the archbishop-elect to Rome to be consecrated by the Pope, so that he might be able to ordain perfectly orthodox bishops in all the churches of England.

Wighard had but just arrived at Rome, when he died there with nearly all his attendants. The two kings then resolved to leave to the Pope the choice of the new metropolitan of England.

Referred by King Oswy to the Pope.

But great as was Oswy's zeal and humility in yielding to Roman supremacy, the want of eagerness displayed by Vitalien, who was then Pope, in using the power thus given up to him, was equally remarkable. He replied to Oswy that he had not yet been able to find a person suited for so distant a mission, but promised to make further attempts to find one, and in the mean time congratulated the king on his faith, exhorting him to continue to conform, whether with regard to Easter, or to any other question, to the traditions of the Apostles Peter and Paul, whom God had given to the world as two great lights, to enlighten every day the hearts of the faithful by their doctrine; and exhorted him to complete the work of the conversion and union of the whole island in the same apostolic faith. He sent him, at the same time, some relics of different martyrs, and a cross containing a portion of the chains of St. Peter for Queen Eanfleda, the friend of Wilfrid. "Your wife," said the Pope, "is our spiritual daughter; her virtues and good works are our joy, and that of all the Roman Church, and they bloom before God like the perfumed flowers of spring."⁸¹

⁸⁰ "Intellexerat enim veraciter quamvis educatus a Scottis, quia Romana esset catholica et apostolica ecclesia. . . . Cum electione et consensu sanctæ ecclesiæ gentis Anglorum. . . . Virum nomine Vigherdum qui a Romanis B. Gregorii papæ discipulis in Cantia fuerat omni ecclesiastica institutione sufficienter edoctus."—BEDE, Hist. Eccles., iii. 29; Hist. Abbatum in Wiramutha et Gircum, n. 3.

⁸¹ "Hominem docibilem et in omnibus ornatum antistitem, secundum vestrorum scriptorum tenorem, minime valebimus nunc reperire pro longinquitate itineris. . . . Festinet vestra celsitudo, ut optamus totam suam insulam Deo Christo dicare. . . . De ejus pio studio cognoscentes, tantum cuncta sedes apostolica una nobiscum lætatur, quantum ejus pia opera coram Deo fragrant et vernant."

St. Theodore, a Greek monk, seventh Arch-bishop of Canterbury.

After a new and long search the Pope fixed his choice on Adrian, an African by birth, and Abbot of a monastery near Naples, equally versed in ecclesiastical and monastic discipline, and in the knowledge of Greek and Latin. Adrian made no objection either to the distance or to his ignorance of the Anglo-Saxon language, but he declared himself unworthy of the episcopate, and pointed out to the Pope a monk whose age and qualifications accorded better with this difficult mission. This was a monk named Andrew, attached to a nunnery in Italy, and who was judged worthy to be chosen; but his bodily infirmities obliged him to give up the appointment. Then Adrian, again urged by the Pope, proposed to him another of his friends, a Greek monk named Theodore, born, like St. Paul, at Tarsus, but then living at Rome, of good life and morals, of a knowledge so profound and various, that he was surnamed the Philosopher,⁸² and already of a venerable age, being sixty-six years old. This proposition was accepted by the Pope, but with the condition that the Abbot Adrian should accompany his friend to England, to watch over his proceedings, that nothing contrary to the orthodox faith might be introduced into the Church, as was too often done by the Greeks. This precaution was justified by the cruel and sanguinary dissensions which then disturbed the Eastern

The Pope joins with him the African Adrian and the Anglo-Saxon Benedict Biscop.

Church, occasioned by the heresy of the Monotheists, and the constant interference of the Byzantine emperors in questions of faith. The matter being thus arranged, Theodore, who had his head entirely shaved, after the custom of the Eastern monks, was obliged to defer his journey for four months, that his hair might grow, before he could receive the crown-shaped tonsure of the West. As soon as his hair had been properly shaved, he was consecrated by the Pope, 26th March, 668, and started with the Abbot Adrian for England.

But to the Asiatic and the African, so strangely chosen to rule the Anglo-Saxon Church, and who so well fulfilled their task, the Pope wisely determined to add a third, whose help, especially at the commencement of their mission, would be indispensable to them. This was the young Northumbrian noble, Benedict Biscop, whom we have seen start from England to make his pilgrimage to Rome with Wilfrid, parting from him at Lyons. After his first journey, Benedict returned to England, and gave his countrymen an ecstatic account of all that he had seen at Rome, every recollection of which he cherished. These recollections drew him a second time to Rome, where, after new studies and new enjoyments, he received the tonsure, and embraced a monastic life at the great sanctuary of Lerins, where Abbot Aygulf had just introduced the Benedictine rule.⁸³ After remaining two years in this still venerated isle, he was unable to resist his desire of returning to Rome out of devotion to St. Peter. He arrived there for the third time in a trading vessel, and remained until Pope Vitalien commanded him to give up this pilgrimage in order to accomplish a much more meritorious one by returning to his own country as guide and interpreter to the new archbishop.⁸⁴ Benedict obeyed, and seventy years after the mission of St. Augustin, the three envoys started for England to take possession of it, as it were, a second time, in the name of the Church of Rome.

⁸² "Sæculari simul et ecclesiastica philosophia præditum virum, et hoc in utraque lingua, græca scilicet et latina." — BEDE, Hist. Abbatum, c. 3. Cf. Hist. Ecclesiast., iv. 1.

But their journey was not without hinderance ; it took them more than a year to go from Rome to Canterbury. Instead of finding in France, as Augustin had done, the generous assistance of a queen like Brunehilde, the new missionaries became the prey of the tyrant Ebroïn, mayor of the palace, the first of those great statesmen, too numerous in our history, whom posterity has so meanly admired or absolved, and who, to the misfortune of our country, sought the triumph of their personal greatness only in the universal abasement and servitude of others. The presence of these three personages, a Greek, an African, and an Anglo-Saxon, all bearing recommendations from the Pope, appeared suspicious to the all-powerful minister. The Byzantine emperor, Constantine II., at that time still sovereign of Rome, which he had lately visited and pillaged, but where he talked of re-establishing the seat of empire, had excited the anxiety of Ebroïn, who imagined that the Papal messengers might be charged with the management of some plot between the Emperor and the Anglo-Saxon kings against the Frankish kingdom of Neustria and Burgundy, of which he regarded himself as chief. The Abbot Adrian appeared to him the most dangerous, and he therefore detained him a prisoner for two years after the release of the others. Meanwhile, thanks to the direct intervention of King Egbert, the Archbishop Theodore was enabled to reach England, and solemnly take possession of his see. His first act was to confide to his pious companion, Benedict Biscop, the government of that great abbey near Canterbury which contained the sepulchres of the archbishops and kings, and which had been dedicated by St. Augustin to St. Peter, though it is now only known by the name of the Apostle of England. Benedict remained there as superior until the arrival of Adrian, to whom it was transferred by the new archbishop, according to the Pope's commands that the African abbot and the monks who accompanied him should be established in his diocese.⁸⁵

The apostolic travellers arrested on their journey by Ebroïn.

⁸³ ALLIEZ, Histoire du Monastère de Lérins, 1860, vol. i. p. 371. I am glad to mention, in passing, this monograph as one of the best works of our time on monastic history.

⁸⁴ "Ad patriam reversus studiosius ea quæ videt ecclesiasticæ vitæ instituta diligere et quibus potuit prædicare non desiit. . . . Non pauca scientiæ salutaris quemadmodum et prius hausta dulcedine. . . . Adveniente nave mercatorio, desiderio satisfecit. . . . Et quia Benedictum sapientem, industrium, religiosum ac nobilem virum fore conspexit (papa) huic . . . cum comitibus suis commendavit episcopum . . . cui pariter interpretes existere posset et ductor." — Hist. Abbatum, c. 2, 3.

The arrival of St. Theodore marks a new era in the history of the Anglo-Saxons.⁸⁶

There must have been, indeed, a stern courage and a holy ambition in this grand old man to induce him, at sixty-seven years of age, to undertake so laborious a task as that of the spiritual government of England. The history of the Church presents few spectacles more imposing and more comforting than that of this Greek of Asia Minor, a countryman of St. Paul, a mitred philosopher⁸⁷ and almost septuagenarian monk, journeying from the shores of the East to train a young nation of the West — disciplining, calming, and guiding all those discordant elements, the different races, rival dynasties, and new-born forces, whose union was destined to constitute one of the greatest nations of the earth.

Thanks to the assistance of the powerful King of Northumbria, the new Archbishop of Canterbury found himself invested, for the first time, with authority recognized by all the Anglo-Saxons. This supremacy, which the intelligent desire of the Bret-

Pontificate
of St. Theodore.
669-690.

He is the first metropolitan recognized
by all England.

⁸⁵ BEDE, Hist. Eccles., iv. 1; Hist. Abbat., c. 3.

⁸⁶ LINGARD, Anglo-Saxon Church, vol. i. p. 77.

⁸⁷ "Cofamulum et coepiscopum nostrum, magnæ insulæ Britanniae archiepiscopum et philosophum." — Epist. AGATHONIS Papæ ad Imp., ap. BARONIUM, an. 680.

walda Oswy for union with Rome enabled him to exercise, was solemnly recognized by Pope Vitalien, who renewed in his favor all the prerogatives conferred by Gregory the Great on Augustin and the see of Canterbury, omitting all mention of the second see which Gregory had wished to establish at York.⁸⁸ This supreme authority over all the Churches of Great Britain, whatever their antiquity or origin, had been, in the hands of Augustin and his successors, only a title and a right; in those of the venerable Greek monk, it now became, for the first time, a powerful and incontestable reality.

The first use which he made of this supremacy was to repair the injustice of which Wilfrid had been the victim. Oswy seems to have made no opposition; he yielded to the apostolic authority, whose decrees Theodore made known to him.⁸⁹ He thus crowned his reign by an act of reparation and of repentance, in allowing the man whom he had unjustly expelled⁹⁰ to be re-established in the episcopal see of the capital of his kingdom. The humble and pious Ceadda, who, by some strange forgetfulness of duty, had consented to replace Wilfrid, made no opposition to the application of canon law, which deprived him of his usurped see. He said to the archbishop, "If you are certain that my episcopate is not legitimate, I will abdicate it voluntarily; I have never thought myself worthy of it, and only accepted it in obedience." Upon which, as Wilfrid, when dispossessed by him, retired to the Monastery of Ripon, he himself returned to that of Lastingham, founded by his brother, from whence he had been taken to be made bishop. He lived for some time peacefully in this retreat. But the generous Wilfrid appreciating the vir-

He reestablishes
Wilfrid in the see of York.

⁸⁸ "Is primus erat in archiepiscopis, cui omnis Anglorum ecclesia manus dare consentiret." — BEDE, iv. 2. Cf. GUILL. MALMESB., De Gest. Pontif., Angl., i. 1. "Nobis visum est te exhortari et in presente commendare tuæ sagacissimæ sanctitati omnes ecclesias in insulas Britanniaë positas. Omnia ergo quæ a S. Gregorio prædecessore nostro Augustino sincello suo statuta sunt atque firmata vel etiam per sacrum usum pallii concessum, nos tibi in ævum concessimus." — Diplomo of Pope Vitalien in Act. SS. Bolland., t. vi. Septembris, p. 59.

⁸⁹ "Veniens ad regem . . . statuta apostolicæ sedis, unde emissus venerat, secum deportans." — EDDIUS, c. 15.

⁹⁰ It must be observed that Wilfrid was only bishop, never archbishop, of York. The metropolitan dignity attached by St. Gregory to that see disappeared after the flight of Paulinus, and was restored only in 735 to Egbert, known by the letter addressed to him by the venerable Bede, and by many relics of ecclesiastical legislation published in the Ancient Laws and Institutes of England.

tues of the holy intruder, whose diocese he had continued to inhabit, was determined to bring them back again to the light. The bishopric of the kingdom of Mercia having become vacant, he persuaded his faithful friend Wulphere to summon Ceadda thither, and gave up to him for his residence a place called Lichfield, previously bestowed by the king on Wilfrid, that he might establish an episcopal see there, either for himself or for another.⁹¹ Theodore and Ceadda both consented to this plan. The only condition made by the archbishop was that the bishop should be consecrated anew, with the assistance of Wilfrid, on account of the irregularity caused by the presence of the two Britons who had assisted at his first consecration.⁹² In other respects, Theodore never ceased to do him all the honor which his holy life deserved; and as, from love to his work, and according to the custom of the first Northumbrian bishops of Celtic race, Ceadda persisted in traversing on foot the immense extent of his new diocese, the primate commanded him to use a horse, and himself held the stirrup to oblige the humble bishop to mount.⁹³ With admirable delicacy, Wilfrid assigned to this innocent usurper the care of continuing the task which had occupied and consoled himself during his disgrace. For three years Ceadda occupied the same position in Mercia which Wilfrid himself had occupied, aiding the noble efforts of the king, and the holy Queen Ermenilda, to destroy the last traces of idolatry. In the intervals of repose left him by his pastoral journeys, he inhabited a little monastery which he had built near his cathedral, that he might there continue his life of prayer and study with seven or eight monks, his friends. It was here that he died, leaving behind him a noble example of humility, wisdom, fervor, and voluntary poverty. The narrative Ceadda, the intruded saint, is made bishop in Mercia by Wilfrid.

His death.
2d March,
672.

⁹¹ "Si me nosti episcopatum non rite suscepisse, libenter ab hoc officio discedo: quippe qui neque me unquam hoc esse dignum arbitrabar." — BEDE, iv. 2. "Ille servus Dei verus et mitissimus. . . . Sciebat (Wilfridus) sub Wulfario rege fidelissimo amico suo locum donatum sibi." — EDDIUS, c. 15. Lichfield, erected into a metropolis some time during the eighth century, and still a bishopric, derived its name from the number of bodies of martyrs killed in the reign of Diocletian which have been discovered there — Leich or Lich-field.

⁹² This is the first application of a canon which afterwards became law: "Qui ordinati sunt Scotorum vel Britonnum episcopi, qui in pascha vel tonsuræ catholica non sunt ordinati ecclesiæ, iterum a catholico episcopo manus impositione confirmentur." — AP. THORPE, p. 307.

⁹³ "Ipse cum sua manu levavit in equum, quia nimirum sanctum esse virum comperit." — BEDE, iv. 3.

of his last days was transmitted by the monk who attended him to the venerable Bede, always so scrupulous in indicating the sources from which he drew the materials for his religious history of the English nation. "My father," said a disciple to the dying bishop, "dare I ask you a question?" "Ask what thou wilt." "I conjure you to tell me what are those sounds of celestial harmony which just now we heard, and which sometimes descend from heaven, and sometimes return thither; are they not the ineffable strains of angels?" "Thou hast then heard and recognized the voice from on high which must not be spoken of before my death. Yes; it is they. The angels are come to call me to that heaven which I have always loved and desired; they have promised to return in seven days to take me with them." And when the day of deliverance and recompense arrived, the witness of this happy death saw not only heaven open and the angels appearing; he seemed to see also the brother of the dying man, his inseparable companion in former days, and, like him, a bishop and monk, descending from the opening heaven to seek the soul of Ceadda and conduct it to eternal happiness. Many details of this nature, floating on the bosom of an ocean of forgotten ages and races, show us how, among these rude converts, so rapidly transformed into austere monks and saints, natural affection preserved all its empire, and mingled, in sweet and holy union, with the grandeur and beauty of their supernatural vocation.⁹⁴

Having thus regulated or re-arranged the government of souls in the two largest kingdoms of the Saxon confederation, Northumbria and Mercia, the venerable archbishop pursued, with an activity in no way relaxed by age, the task which the Holy See had assigned him. He successively traversed all the provinces of the island already occupied by Anglo-Saxons. With the aid of the former bishops, and of those whom he ordained wherever they were wanting, he applied himself, in all the kingdoms, to pacify the sanguinary feuds of princes and nobles, to re-establish canonical order and ecclesiastical discipline, to correct abuses, to spread good morals, and to regulate, according to Roman custom, the celebration of Easter.⁹⁵ He is believed to have originated on this occasion that ecclesiastical law which commanded all fathers of families to repeat daily, and to teach to their children, the Lord's Prayer and the Creed in the vulgar tongue.⁹⁶

The Asiatic Theodore and the African Adrian make a visitation of England.

⁹⁴ "Vocem suavissimam cantantium atque lætantium de cœlo ad terras usque descendere. . . . Obsecro ut dicas quod erat canticum illud lætantium. . . . Revera angelorum fuere spiritus qui me ad cœlestia, quæ semper amabam ac desiderabam, præmia vocare venerunt. . . . Scio hominem in hac insula adhuc in carne manentem qui . . . vidit animam Ceddi fratris ipsius cum agmine angelorum descendere de cœlo, et assumpta secum anima ejus, ad cœlestia regna redire."—BEDE, vi. 3. This brother was Bishop Cedd, who had acted as interpreter at Whitby.

Abbot Adrian accompanied him everywhere, and seconded him in all things. These two aged monks, one Asian and the other African, were received, listened to, and obeyed by the Anglo-Saxons with that affectionate deference which in Christian hearts triumphs so easily over the prejudices and opposition of a narrow nationality. They repaid the popular attachment by their unwearied zeal for the souls and hearts of the people, preaching to them evangelical truth, with that intelligent and practical solicitude which makes true apostles.

Ecclesiastical legislation
of Theodore.
Liber Pœ-nitentialis.

The authentic monuments of their zeal are all preserved in the imposing collection of moral and penal institutes known as the Liber Pœnitentialis of Archbishop Theodore,⁹⁷ which has served as the model of so many other analogous collections. It is there apparent that if great excesses and shameful disorders had already appeared among the new Christians of England, these were kept in check by all the resources of spiritual fatherhood and priestly vigilance. It is surprising to find among these Germanic populations the traces of refined corruption mingled with the brutal vices of barbarians; but the art and authority which could inflict for every sin, even when confessed and pardoned, a penalty either public or secret, according to the circumstances, is all the more admirable. The punishments are generally of excessive severity, induced, it would seem, by the rudeness of barbarous manners, on which it was necessary first to act by means of intimidation. No doubt they were soon practically evaded by the equivalents of alms and other good works. At the same time, in this code set forth by a Greek prelate sent from Rome, there appears no trace of Roman or Byzantine law. On the contrary, it embodies the entire penal system of the Germanic laws, founded on the principle which required a punishment for every offence, or a compensation for every punishment.⁹⁸ And as it is always pleasant to find a loving and tender heart among the masters and teachers of the people, it is delightful to read, at the end of one of the most ancient manuscripts of this formidable code, a few lines, in which the archbishop thus commends his work and his soul to a prelate, one of his friends: "I beseech thee, noble and pious bishop, to pour out at the feet of God the abundance of thy prayers for Theodore, the poor stranger whom thou lovest."⁹⁹

⁹⁵ "Peragrata insula tota. . . . Libentissime ab omnibus suscipiebatur atque audiebatur . . . per omnia comitante et co-operante Adriano. . . . Gratosi ad pacificandum invicem inimicos." — BEDE, iv. 2.

⁹⁶ HOOK, i. 152. I have not been able to find this rule among the Acts of Theodore, but it is several times repeated in the Monumenta Ecclesiastica of the following century. See THORPE, passim.

⁹⁷ The most complete version is found in the great collection of Thorpe, Ancient Laws and Institutes of England. Cf. HOOK, op. cit., vol. i. p. 169.

In the course of this apostolic journey, Theodore naturally visited Lindisfarne, as well as the chief seats of the other dioceses. The metropolis of Celtic resistance was obliged to acknowledge the authority of the Roman metropolitan, who imprinted upon it the seal of subordination and union by dedicating, under the name and in honor of St. Peter, the monastic cathedral of the Celtic bishops which Bishop Aidan had commenced to build, in the Scottish mode, and entirely in wood, many years before.¹⁰⁰

It is to these pastoral visits of Archbishop Theodore that all agree in tracing back the commencement of parochial organization,—above all, in the south of England. Until then, the monasteries had been almost the only permanent centres of faith and religious instruction. The bishops issued from their monasteries to preach and to baptize; they were constantly wayfaring.¹⁰¹ The monks, especially those of the Celtic monasteries,

He organizes the parochial system.

⁹⁸ See some curious details in ELMHAM, p. 206, on the foundation of a monastery due to the application of this system of compensation.

⁹⁹ "Te nam, sancte speculator,
Verbi Dei digne dator,
Pontificum ditum decor,
Hæddi, pie presul, precor,
Pro me tuo peregrino
Preces funde Theodoro."

This was addressed to Hædda, Bishop of the West Saxons at Winchester, in 676, much praised by Bede, v. 18. A distinction must be made between the singer Hædd or Eddi, biographer of Wilfrid; Bishop Hædda, his contemporary and colleague at Winchester; Bishop Cædda, who supplanted him at York; and Bishop Cedd, brother of Cædda. The narrator condemned to open a way through this forest of obscure names, so easily confounded, and so subject to infinite alteration from the pens of more recent annalists, may well claim the sympathy of his readers.

¹⁰⁰ BEDE, iii. 25.

¹⁰¹ "Longe lateque omnia pervagatus." This is the eulogy which falls perpetually from the pen of Bede.

traversed the country, stopping at different stations previously indicated to administer the sacraments, just as is now done in lands under the charge of missionaries, and in certain districts of Ireland.¹⁰² But churches, regularly served by monks or secular priests, were speedily built on the continually increasing estates of the great abbeys and monastic cathedrals. The kings and nobles obtained from bishops and abbots the right of choosing in the monastery, or among the cathedral clergy, some priests who might, for the good of their souls, accompany them on their expeditions, or live with them in their rural residences. Theodore availed himself of this custom to lay the foundations of a parochial system, by persuading the princes and great proprietors to build churches on their domains, and to attach to them a resident priest, with an endowment in land or in fixed rents; in return for which they should have the right of choosing their priests. From this right has grown the system of church patronage, such as it now subsists in England, with the special impost, not yet abolished, called church-rate, levied on all the proprietors of a parish for the keeping of the church in repair: so true is it that everything bears the trace of solidity and permanence in the country which twelve centuries ago was constituted as a nation by that union of the Church with the Anglo-Saxon race, of which Italian and Greek monks such as Theodore and Augustin were the plenipotentiaries.¹⁰³ Nearly all the present names of counties date from this epoch. All the dioceses of that time exist still; everything has remained so unchanged, that a map of the country in the tenth century might serve for to-day; while there remains not one single trace of the ancient territorial divisions of France and Germany.

Theodore is anxious to increase the number of dioceses.

After having thus laid the foundation of parishes, it was Theodore's desire to proceed to a new episcopal division. Hitherto, except in Kent, each kingdom of the Heptarchy had formed a diocese, each king choosing to have one bishop of his own, ¹⁰² See above, pages 237 to 240, the first missions in Northumbria.

¹⁰³ "Ille excitavit fidelium voluntatem ut in civitatibus et villis ecclesias fabricarentur, parochias distinguarent, et assensus regios his procuravit; ut si qui sufficientes essent super proprium fundum construere ecclesias earumdem perpetuo patronato gauderent; si inter limites alterius alicujus domini ecclesias facerent, ejusdem fundi domini notarentur pro patronis." — THOS. DE ELMHAM, Hist. Monast. S. Augustini, p. 289; HOOK, i. 159. Cf. LAP-and only one. Northumbria, long divided into two kingdoms, had never formed more than one diocese, of which the seat was sometimes in the ancient Roman metropolis of York, sometimes in the sacred isle of Lindisfarne; and this diocese, even after a partial division, remained so vast that the venerable Bede mentions a large number of districts which had never yet been visited by their bishop.
PENBERG, p. 190; KEMBLE, c. 9; and, above all, LINGARD, Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church, vol. i. pp. 156–197. The secular priests placed in these parishes took afterwards the name of mass-priests.

The extreme inequality of extent and population in the different Saxon kingdoms, which a single glance at the map will make apparent, had thus led to a similar difference between the dioceses; those of the north and the centre being far too large for the administration of one man. But Theodore here met with the resistance which is almost always produced in similar cases. He convoked a council at Hertford in the fourth year of his pontificate, the first ever held in the Anglo-Saxon Church; but was obliged to adjourn his proposition, as he himself relates in the official report of the deliberations of this assembly, dictated by himself to his notary.¹⁰⁴ At the same time, he reserved to himself the means of returning to the charge by decreeing that the national council should meet once a year at a place called Cloveshoe, according to Saxon fashion, in the open air. He was happier, however, in the two canons regarding monasteries which he proposed, and which were unanimously adopted by the bishops and numerous abbots attached to the Roman ritual who composed the council.¹⁰⁵ Of these canons, naturally marked by the Benedictine spirit, since the greater part of the bishops in the council were sons of St. Benedict, the first forbade bishops to disturb monasteries in any way, or to despoil them of their goods; the second forbade monks to pass from one monastery to another without the permission of the abbot. This was a consecration of the vow of stability, which, though often neglected, was not the less an essential distinction of the order of St. Bene-

Council of Hertford.
24th Sept.,
673.

¹⁰⁴ "Nonum capitulum in commune tractatum est, ut plures episcopi, crescente numero fidelium, augerentur: sed de hac ad præsens siluimus.—BEDE, iv. 5. This notary Titillo, whose presence is proved by Theodore and Bede, seems to us to answer the objection raised by Kemble to the authenticity of Ethelbert's donation to Augustin on account of the mention of a referendary in that document.

¹⁰⁵ "Concilium episcoporum, una cum eis qui canonice patrum statuta et deligerent et nossent, magistris ecclesiæ pluribus."—BEDE, iv. 5. Of the eight bishops then in England, five assisted in person at the council, and Wilfrid was represented there by his envoys.

dict from the great monastic communities of the East or of Celtic countries.¹⁰⁶

The literary progress of the English monasteries due to Theodore and Adrian.

The monasteries having been thus placed under the most imposing safeguard by the Greek metropolitan of England, there yet remained for him, as well as for his African assistant, Adrian, an intellectual and literary development as worthy of the admiration as of the gratitude of posterity. Both were profoundly attached to and imbued with, not only ecclesiastical knowledge, but secular learning, that double intellectual current of which the middle ages never ceased to give examples. Theodore had brought with him a copy of Homer, which he read perpetually, and which was long preserved and admired by his ecclesiastical descendants.¹⁰⁷ They gathered round them, in the monasteries where they lived or which they visited, a crowd of young and ardent disciples, whom they led daily to the fountain of knowledge. While explaining Holy Scripture to them with particular care, they taught their scholars also ecclesiastical astronomy and arithmetic, which served to establish the Pascal computation, and afterwards the art of composing Latin verses. But it was chiefly the study of the two classic tongues which flourished under their care. These became so general that, sixty years after, there were still monks trained in the school of Adrian and Theodore who spoke Greek and Latin as readily as Anglo-Saxon. At the same time, music and chanting, hitherto cultivated only in the monasteries of Canterbury and by the deacon James at York, spread all over England.¹⁰⁸ Monasteries thus transformed into schools and homes of scientific study could not but spread a taste and respect for intellectual life, not only among the clergy, but also among their lay-protectors, ¹⁰⁶ "Tertium. Ut quæque monasteria Deo consecrata sunt, nulli episcoporum liceat ea in aliquo inquietare, nec quicquam de eorum rebus violenter abstrahere. Quartum. Ut ipsi monachi non migrent de loco ad locum, hoc est, de monasterio ad monasterium, nisi per demissionem proprii abbatis, sed in ea permaneant obedientia quam tempore suæ conversionis promiserunt." — BEDE, iv. 5. That Theodore did not intend to permit the monasteries to absorb all religious life, to the detriment of the secular clergy, is proved by this article of the pœnitentialis: "Nec libertas monasterii est pœnitentiam sæcularibus judicare, quia proprie clericorum est." — THORPE, p. 307.

¹⁰⁷ GODWIN, De Præsulibus Angliæ, p. 41.

¹⁰⁸ "Literis sacris simul et sæcularibus abundanter ambo instructi, congregata discipulorum caterva, scientiæ salutaris quotidie fluminia irrigandis eorum cordibus emanabant. . . . Sed et sonos cantandi in ecclesia. . . . Ab hoc tempore per omnes Anglorum ecclesias discere cœperunt." — BEDE, iv. 2.

the friends and neighbors of each community. Under the powerful impulse given to it by the two Roman monks, England became almost as important a literary centre as Ireland or Italy.¹⁰⁹

While recalling this peaceful and luminous period of which Theodore and Adrian were the stars, the enthusiasm of the venerable Bede breaks out into a kind of dithyramb: "Never," he says, "since the Anglo-Saxons landed in Britain, had more happy days been known. We had Christian kings, at whose bravery the barbarous nations trembled. All hearts were inflamed by the hope of those celestial joys which had just been preached to them; and whosoever wished to be instructed in sacred learning found the masters that he needed close at hand."¹¹⁰

Let us add, to characterize with more precision this pontificate of Theodore, that he was the last foreign missionary called to occupy the metropolitan dignity in England, and that the Greek monk succeeded, as has been justly remarked, in transforming into an indigenous and national establishment, into a public and social institution, that which had hitherto been only a missionary church. This transformation could only have been made by that special and supreme authority with which, at the demand of the Anglo-Saxons themselves, the Oriental archbishop had been invested by the Holy See, and the result was to give to the popes a whole nation as a lever for their future action both upon nations already Christian and upon those which still remained to be converted.

CHAPTER III.

BEGINNING OF THE TRIALS OF WILFRID: ST. ETHELDREDA. — 669-678.

Wilfrid, reduced to a subordinate position, reconciles himself to King Oswy, who dies after a prosperous reign of twenty-eight years. — Extension of Northumbrian domination, and of Wilfrid's jurisdiction towards the north. — At the commencement of the new reign, alliance between him and King ¹⁰⁹ HOOK, t. i. p. 165. MIGNET, Mémoire sur la Conversion de l'Allemagne par les Moines, p. 25.

¹¹⁰ "Neque unquam prorsus feliciora fuere tempora . . . dum omnium vota ad nuper audita cœlestis regni gaudia penderent." — BEDE, iv. 2.

Egfrid, who triumphs both in the insurrection of the Picts and the invasion of the Mercians. — Episcopal virtues and austerities of Wilfrid. — His confirmation journeys; the child resuscitated. — Wilfrid's monasteries become centres of public education. — Services which he renders to the arts; music, spread of the Gregorian chant. — Great architectural works at York, at Ripon, and especially at Hexham, where he builds the finest church on this side the Alps on land given by Queen Etheldreda. — Connection of Wilfrid with Etheldreda, the first and most popular of English female saints. — Her origin and connections. — Twice married, she succeeds in consecrating her virginity to God. — Wilfrid encourages her in her resistance to King Egfrid, and gives her the veil at Coldingham; Egfrid pursues her. — She flies to Ely. — Legends of her journey. — Foundation and monastic life at Ely. — The major-domo Owen. — Wilfrid continues to advise Etheldreda. — His quarrel with Egfrid provoked by the new queen, Ermenburge. — The Archbishop Theodore interferes in their disputes. — He deposes Wilfrid, and divides his diocese into three new bishoprics, which he confides to Celtic monks. — Wilfrid appeals to Rome. — The saints and great abbots of his country remain indifferent or hostile. — Strange ignorance of ecclesiastical right, even among the saints.

Wilfrid reduced to a subordinate position.

WHILE the Archbishop Theodore received everywhere the credit of the intellectual and moral prosperity of England, Wilfrid, re-established in his see, but eclipsed by the popularity and authority of the primate, appears to have been thrown back into a subordinate position. Nevertheless it was he who had given the first signal for this renewal of Roman influence in England, who had gained the decisive battle of Whitby, who had begun, supported, and decided the struggle against the insular spirit and its exclusive tendencies, and who, in more than one trial, had paid the price of his spontaneous devotion. And it was a stranger from the depths of Asia Minor who came to reap what he had sown, while not one special mark of pontifical approbation or gratitude had honored the first author and most intrepid champion of this happy revolution. In contemplating the triumphs of Theodore, there only remained for him to say, like the precursor of our Saviour, "He must increase, but I must decrease," and to prove the disinterestedness and sincerity of his soul, by lending all the assistance possible to his venerable rival.

Wilfrid reconciled to King Oswy.

This he did by sending deputies to the council of Hertford. Enough occupation besides remained to him in dividing his life between the duties of the episcopate and those of his monastic profession. Reduced to a secondary rank, he could yet find ample satisfaction for his zeal for the good of souls and of the Church, above all, since his reconciliation with Oswy. This reconciliation was complete, and accompanied by such an adhesion to the opinions of Wilfrid on the part of the Bretwalda, that, having fallen ill, he conceived the project of going, if he recovered — he, the first of Saxon kings — to pass the remainder of his life near the tombs of St. Peter and St. Paul at Rome. He implored Wilfrid to accompany him, promising him new gifts to keep up that pomp and magnificence of worship which was so dear to the bishop. But the death of Oswy put a stop to this project. He died at the age of fifty-eight, after a reign of twenty-eight years, which had been signalized by the deliverance of his country, and by the overthrow of the pagan domination of the Mercians, and which, had it not been stained by the murder of the pious Oswin, would have been the most glorious and happy in the Saxon annals. He was buried at Whitby, in the great maritime monastery to which he had given his daughter as the price of his decisive victory over the pagans. This daughter, Elflæda, on becoming abbess ten years after the death of her father, claimed his remains, and placed them beside those of her maternal grandfather Edwin, the first Christian king among the northern English, so that the two greatest princes of the two rival Northumbrian dynasties reposed together in this monastic necropolis.¹¹¹

Who dies.
15th Feb.,
670.

This famous Oswy, last and greatest Bretwalda of whom history keeps any record, had established in the north of his kingdom a supremacy still more extensive in some respects, and more durable, than in the south. Passing the frontiers which his predecessors Edwin and Oswald had given to Northumbria on the Caledonian side, he subjugated all the territory between the Forth and the Tay.¹¹² But it was chiefly in the east of the central peninsula, in those districts which have since received the names of Lothian and the Marches, that he impressed on the institutions, manners, and language, that Anglo-Saxon character which, throughout the history of Scotland, remains so visibly distinct from the manners and traditions of Caledonia. Hence

Supremacy of Oswy in the North.

¹¹¹ "In hoc monasterio et ipsa et pater ipsius Oswi et pater matris ejus Edwinus et multi alii nobiles in ecclesia S. Petri sepulti sunt."—BEDE, iii. 24, ¹¹² "Perdomuit . . . gentem Pictorum maxima ex parte regno Anglorum subjecit."—BEDE, iii. 24.

arose that partition of Scotland during the whole of its independent existence between two influences, or rather between two races, nominally ruled by the same kings, but distinct by language, laws, cultivation, and all the habits of life, and almost always at bitter feud with each other.¹¹³

Extension of the diocese of Wilfrid. Oswy's victories over the race which had formerly sheltered his youth and exile extended, out of all proportion, the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Northumbria, which had been originally established at Lindisfarne in the centre of the kingdom, but which, since the restoration of Wilfrid, had been fixed at York, much further south. The crosier of Wilfrid thus extended not only over the two primitive kingdoms of Bernicia and Deira, but also over three provinces inhabited by the vanquished races, the Picts of Lothian, the Britons of Cumberland, and the mingled population of Britons, Scots, and Picts in Galloway.¹¹⁴ His spiritual authority was recognized, at least nominally, by all the Celtic races, and it cannot be doubted that he used all his efforts to root out from among them, as from among the Northumbrians, the customs of their fathers. This also, was, no doubt, one of the causes of that flood of resistance and discontent which was to sweep him away in the end.

His union with the new King Egfrid. Oswy was replaced on the Northumbrian throne by his son Egfrid. During the first years of the new reign the concord between the king and the bishop was complete. The Picts, however, imagined that the youth of Egfrid would furnish them with an opportunity of regaining all that his father had taken from them. A general insurrection took place, seconded by all the auxiliaries which could be provided by the unconquered tribes of Victories over the insurgent Picts. 670. Caledonia. But Egfrid, a worthy successor of the valiant kings Oswy and Oswald, put himself at the head of a troop of cavalry, surprised his enemies, and exterminated them. We are not told whether religion had any part in this war, but it is plain that all the desires of Wilfrid were for the triumph of the Northumbrians by the language of his friend Eddi, who speaks of the Picts as brutes (though they were already Christians), describes as bestial their hatred of the Saxon yoke, and rejoices that two rivers were so choked with their corpses that it was almost possible to cross dryshod to attack the survivors and ¹¹³ AUGUSTIN THIERRY, Dix Ans d'Etudes Historiques, p. 166.

¹¹⁴ "Wilfrido administrante episcopatum, nec non et omnium Northymbrorum, sed et Pictorum, quousque rex Oswin imperium protendere poterat." — BEDE, iv. 3. Cf. VARIN, memoir already quoted.

bring them again under the detested yoke which fifteen years later they succeeded in throwing off forever.¹¹⁵

Wilfrid must have been more embarrassed when Wulphere, his old and faithful friend, the protector of his disgrace, the husband of the gentle Ermenilda, too faithful to the traditions of his father Penda, tried in his turn to destroy the young Egfrid, and to render Northumbria again tributary to Mercia. But he soon decided for his hereditary chief, and joined his exhortations, in the name of the men of God, to those addressed by the Northumbrian Parliament to the king, to excite him to a most vigorous resistance, in which they triumphed.¹¹⁶ Thus it was not Northumbria, but Mercia, which became tributary. Egfrid even seized a whole province to increase his kingdom, already so vast, and never allowed the Mercians to regain their independence till after the accession of Ethelred, brother of Wulphere, who had married the sister of the victor.¹¹⁷

And over the Mer-
cians.

Egfrid and Wilfrid were now both victorious: one over the enemies who had menaced his kingdom in the north and south; the other over the dissidents who occupied so large a portion of his diocese. During several years of a very temporary alliance, which was destined to end in the most bitter enmity, they combined all the power of their double authority to strengthen the edifice of Northumbrian royalty, and the just supremacy of Roman customs, over the vanquished Celts and the tributary Mercians. The young king showed great deference to the already celebrated prelate who had been the friend of his elder brother. Harvests of unusual abundance seemed to the people a pledge of celestial protection; and, as in the other parts of England, the harmony of the priesthood and royalty, under the auspices of a great bishop, seemed about to bring in an era of general peace and prosperity.¹¹⁸

¹¹⁵ "Tenero adhuc regno, populi bestiales Pictorum feroci animo subjectionem Saxonum despiciebant. . . . Statim equitatu exercito præparato . . . stragem immensam populi subruit, duo flumina cadaveribus mortuorum replens, ita . . . ut supra siccis pedibus ambulantes, fugientium turbas occidentes persequerentur, et in servitutem redacti populi . . . subjecti jugo captivitatis jacebant." — EDDIUS, c. 18.

¹¹⁶ "Rex vero, consilio senum patriam custodire, ecclesias Dei defendere episcopo docente, in Deo confisus." — Ibid., c. 19.

¹¹⁷ BEDE, iv. 12. See genealogical tables VI. and VIII., Appendix, pp. 000, and 000.

¹¹⁸ "Wilfrido episcopo ad austrum super Saxones, ad aquilonem super Britones et Scotos, Pictosque regnum ecclesiarum multiplicabatur. . . . Rex et regina simul Wilfrido obediens facti, pax et gaudium in populis, anni frugiferi." — EDDIUS, c. 20, 18.

Episcopal virtues of
Wilfrid.

The power of Wilfrid was used only for the good of souls, commencing with his own. He was surpassed by no one in those works of piety and mortification which the numerous temporal cares that oppressed him rendered yet more dear and yet more necessary. His nights passed in prayer, his days in studying the Holy Scriptures, perhaps edified and surprised his visitors and daily companions less than his fasts and abstinence. Saxon intemperance was confounded by the example of this powerful personage, the first in the country, except the king, who never permitted himself to drink more than the contents of a small phial, even when he was most exhausted, and after a long journey on foot under a burning sun. As to purity of body and soul, he believed that he preserved it by washing from head to foot in cold but consecrated water every night, summer and winter; and he preserved this habit — borrowed, perhaps, unconsciously, from the austerities of Celtic monachism¹¹⁹ — until he was forbidden to continue it by the Pope, on account of his age.¹²⁰

His zeal for good was tempered, at this time at least, by great moderation. We are told expressly in considering this epoch of his life, that he had made himself dear to all the different races of his immense diocese, from the Humber to the Clyde. He multiplied, as much as possible, the priests and deacons necessary for the new parishes, which were everywhere formed; but he reserved to himself the principal part in the fatigues and obligations of an apostolic ministry. He travelled, sometimes on foot, sometimes on horseback, in all weathers and all seasons, through his great province, to baptize, to preach even in the smallest hamlets, and, above all, to administer the rite of confirmation. Everywhere eager crowds pursued him and surrounded him, to obtain the benefit of the sacraments from his hands.¹²¹ It was in one of these journeys that an incident occurred, at the village of Tiddafrey, which ought to be recorded here. While the ceremony of confirmation was go-

His journeys for confirmation.

¹¹⁹ See p. 101.

¹²⁰ "In conviviis tam abstinenter vivebat, ut numquam solus, quamvis parvissima phiala esset, potu consumpsisset, aut pro calore sitiens, aut. . . . In vigiliis et orationibus, in lectione et jejuniis quis similis ei? . . . Corpus in aqua benedicta nocturnis horis inclementer æstate ac hieme consuetudinarie lavavit." — EDDIUS, c. 20.

¹²¹ "Omniibus gentibus charus et amabilis. . . . Inter sæculares undas fluctuantes moderate novas ecclesias gubernabat. . . . Equitante et pergente ad varia officia episcopatus sui." — EDDIUS, c. 20, 17.

ing on, a poor mother, agonized by the loss of her first born, made her way, weeping, through the crowd, with the little body of her child clasped to her heart. Having reached the first rank among the mothers, who pressed forward with their children, she presented her dead son to the bishop among the living, as if to be confirmed with them. Wilfrid, leaning over the child, perceived that it was dead. Then, comprehending how it was, he paused beside the desolate mother, and watched her a while in silence; upon which she threw herself at his feet, covering them with tears and kisses, and with a voice broken by sobs, adjured him to give her back her child. "O, holy man," she cried, "beware how you destroy the faith of a desperate woman! Help me to believe; restore my child to life, and baptize it. To God and to you it is still living. Courage! fear not to do it in the strength of Christ!" Wilfrid remembered the Canaanite of the Gospel. He knelt in prayer. Then placing his right hand on the heart of the child, he felt that it beat, and so restored it to life. After having thus raised it up, and baptized it, he returned it to the mother, exacting a promise that at seven years old she should bring it to him to be trained as a servant of God.¹²² This miracle may or may not be believed; but who can refuse to be touched by the cry of the mother? and it is pleasant to find in Wilfrid that goodness of heart which God sometimes gives to great disputants and stern champions, and which alone renders them completely irresistible.

The child
restored to life.

Let us add, to return to the dark reality of earthly things, that the mother, once in possession of her child, would not give him up, but fled with him to the Britons¹²³ — that is to say, to the enemies of the saint, probably in Cumbria, which was also in the diocese of Wilfrid, and from whence it was necessary for an officer of the bishop to bring the child back by force to his benefactor. He afterwards became a monk at Ripon, where he was called the bishop's son.

It is not easy to understand how Wilfrid should have needed unwilling recruits to fill his monaster-

The monasteries of Wilfrid be-

¹²² "Amaro animo susurrans, mœrore et onere fatigata . . . habens primogenitum mortuum sub sinu pannis involutum. . . . Coram facie agnoscens cecidit in terram . . . adjuravit eum audaciter . . . pedes deosculabatur, lacrymis irrigavit, . . . 'O sanctissime, noli orbatæ mulieris fidem extinguere, sed credulitatem meam adjuva: suscita eum et baptiza; tibi enim et Deo vivit: in virtute Christi ne dubites.'" — EDDIUS, c. 17.

¹²³ "Latentem sub allis Britonum," Eddi says.

come centres of public education.

ies, when the number of monks who thronged to them is one of the best established facts in his history. Besides, the Northumbrian monasteries, like others, were schools, and many of the children received there enrolled themselves among their masters. Some important details in the life of our saint prove that the education given in monasteries was a true public education, and fitted youths for the world as well as for the cloister. It is expressly said that the Anglo-Saxons of high rank, the earls and thanes, were eager to confide their children to Wilfrid, to be brought up in his monastic establishments; and that at the end of their education they chose between the service of God and that of the king. If they decided on a secular and military life, Wilfrid sent them to the king fully armed, as he himself at fourteen years of age had appeared before Queen Eanfleda.¹²⁴

Services rendered by Wilfrid to the arts. Music.

During all the course of his laborious episcopate, Wilfrid was moved, by the love of God and the love of souls, to make great efforts for the consecration, to the service of the Church, of those inexhaustible treasures of art which at that time found refuge alone in the monastic order. Music, above all, appeared to him an indispensable auxiliary of the new faith. He was not content with establishing within his monasteries a course of musical instruction, the teachers of which he had brought from the great school of Gregorian song at Canterbury; but with the help of Stephen Eddi, who has left us the story of his life, he spread this instruction through all the churches of the north of England. Thanks to him, the Anglo-Saxon peasants mingled with their labors as well as with their prayers the sweet and solemn chanting of psalms in the Gregorian tones.¹²⁵ Thanks to him, Northumbria became a great centre of music, rivalling the school of Canterbury, in which the priests and the faithful renewed their musical education periodically, as at the fountain head — a fact which must have associated the noble memory of Wilfrid with the solemn and consoling modulations of a popular and traditional liturgy.

¹²⁴ "Principes et sæculares viri nobiles filios suos ad erudiendum sibi dederunt, ut aut Deo servirent, si eligerent, aut adultos, si maluissent, regi armatos commendaret." — EDDIUS, c. 20.

¹²⁵ FABER, pp. 62, 66. "Sed et sonos cantandi in ecclesia, quos eatenus in Cantia tantum noverant, ab hoc tempore per omnes Anglorum ecclesias discere cœperunt . . . primusque magister Nortanhymbrorum ecclesiis Eddi . . . invitatus de Cantia." — BEDE, iv. 3. There is a second curious passage regarding other companions of Wilfrid: "Cantatorem quoque egregium, vocabulo Maban, qui a successoribus discipulorum B. papæ Gregorii in Cantia fuerat cantandi sonos edoctus, ad se suosque instituendos accersit, ac per annos duodecim tenuit: quatenus et quæ illi non noverant, carmina ecclesiastica doceret: et ea quæ quondam cognita longo usu vel negligentia inveterare cœperunt, hujus doctrina priscum renovarentur in statum. Nam et ipse episcopus Acca cantator erat peritissimus." — BEDE, v. 19.

But ecclesiastical architecture offered him a still wider field; and the results obtained by his exertions roused his contemporaries to an enthusiasm the echo of which has descended to us. Born with a taste for art and building, and also with a decided love of pomp and magnificence, he devoted all these natural dispositions to the service of God.¹²⁶ At the head of the monkish cæmentarii, whom he had brought from Canterbury, he began by thoroughly repairing the primitive Cathedral of York, which had been founded by Paulinus, the first Roman missionary, and where Edwin, the first Christian king, with his daughter Eanfleda, had been baptized. Since the translation of the bishopric to Lindisfarne, this church had been like a place abandoned. The rain entered on all sides, and birds built their nests in it. Wilfrid, like a prudent architect, began his work by covering the roof with lead; he then put transparent glass in the windows; and finally caused the stones injured by damp to be washed and scraped. It seems even possible that he may have been the inventor of that white-washing which has since been so greatly abused;¹²⁷ after which he provided the restored cathedral with rich ornaments and a territorial endowment.

His great architectural labors,

At the Cathedral of York;

But he was much more prodigal towards his beloved Monastery of Ripon, which he held by the gift of his first friend Alchfrid, and which had been the first centre of his independent and missionary action. He built there a vast basilica, dedicated to St. Peter, which excited universal amazement. Nothing had ever been seen equal to its lofty porches and columns of polished stone, nor, above all, to its magnificent Book of the Gospels, covered with plates of gold set with precious stones, which Wilfrid, for the good of his soul, had caused to be transcribed in letters of gold on purple vellum, and which he placed on the altar the day that the church was dedicated. On the day of

At his old Monastery of Ripon;

¹²⁶ "Creseebat ergo cum sæculari sumptu . . . pontifici nostro, amico sponsi æternalis, magis ac magis ardentissimus amor sponsæ."

¹²⁷ "Culmina corrupta tecti renovans, artificiose plumbo puro detegens, per fenestras introitum avium et imbrium vitro prohibuit; per quod tamen intro lumen radiabat Parietes lavans, secundum prophetam super lucem dealbavit." — EDDIUS, c. 15. "Ipse illas alba calce dealbavit." — GUILL. MALMESB., De Gest. Pontif. Angl., l. iii. f. 148.

this ceremony, in presence of King Egfrid, his brother, the neighboring abbots, the ealdormen,¹²⁸ the earls, lords, and other principal Saxons, Wilfrid, standing before the altar, turned towards the people who filled the church, and solemnly declared his right to all the lands and churches, enumerating them by name, which had been conceded to him by the kings, with consent of the bishops and assembly of nobles of the country, and which were situated principally in that district which the British clergy had abandoned when flying before the swords of the Saxons. Thus his hostility against the Celtic Christians reappeared, even in the midst of this joyful solemnity, which ended in true Saxon fashion with a grand banquet, where the Abbot of Ripon entertained all the guests, and which lasted three days and three nights.¹²⁹

The magnificence displayed by Wilfrid at Ripon was yet again surpassed in an entirely new foundation at Hexham, situated much further north, in the heart of Bernicia, not far from the place where the sainted King Oswald had planted, for the first time, the cross on the soil of Northumbria, and commenced that struggle which had secured the greatness and independence of his country. It was there — near to the blood-stained cradle of Northumbrian Christianity, at the foot of the lofty wall built as a defence against the Picts by the Emperor Severus, a little below the junction of the two branches of the Tyne, on a plain surrounded by undulating hills — that Wilfrid chose the site of a great monastery, destined, though he little suspected it, to be his own last asylum.¹³⁰ As he had dedicated his first abbey to St. Peter, he dedicated this to St. Andrew, the pat-

¹²⁸ This is the title then given to the greatest Saxon lords, earls, or governors, more or less hereditary, of provinces, — from hence the modern word alderman. The ealdorman is translated in the Latin works of the time by the word dux, and his functions were similar to those of the lord-lieutenant of each English county, or of the supreme courts of the kingdom of Hungary, the constitution of which so faithfully reproduced most of the English institutions.

¹²⁹ “Basilicam polito lapide a fundamentis in terris usque ad summum ædificatam variis columnis et porticibus suffultum. . . . Inauditum erat sæculis nostris miraculum. . . . Invitatis regibus, cum abbatibus præfectisque et subregulis totiusque dignitatis personæ. . . . Coram regibus enumerans regiones quas ante reges . . . et in illa die cum consensu et subscriptione episcoporum et omnium principum, illi dederunt. . . . Consummato sermone, magnum convivium trium dierum eo noctium . . . lætificantes inierunt.” — EDDIUS, c. 27.

¹³⁰ This site is perfectly described in a recent publication of the Surtees Society, which contains a complete history of Hexham — The Priory of Hexham, its Chroniclers, Endowments, and Annals, by JAMES RAINE. Durham, 1864.

ron of the church in which he had first prayed on arriving at Rome, and from whence the first apostles of England had been sent. The surprise and admiration which his previous works had awakened became indescribable at the sight of the deep foundations dug, and immense stones placed in them for the basement of a church which, when finished — with its porches and pillars, its numerous naves and clere-stories, its vast vaults underneath, its spiral staircases and galleries, and the imposing height of its spires — was regarded for two centuries as the most beautiful on this side the Alps, and as a kind of reproduction of Roman ambition.¹³¹

From the pinnacle of one of these towers, which was of unheard-of height, a young monk upon one occasion fell to the ground, breaking his arms and legs on the pavement. The rest believed him dead, and were about to carry him away in a coffin, when Wilfrid, in tears, stopped the bearers, collected the whole community, and said to them: — “Pray all of you to God, with lively faith, that He would grant us the grace which He gave to St. Paul, that He would restore this child to life, and that the enemy may not have such occasion to rejoice in our work.” The general prayer was granted. The medical members of the community bound up the broken limbs of the young monk, who recovered slowly, and lived long. This incident proves that Wilfrid himself directed the works,

The monk
mason fallen from the summit
of the building.

¹³¹ “Cujus profunditatem in terra cum domibus (?) mirifice politis lapidibus fundatam, et super terram multiplicem domum . . . variis linearum anfractibus viarum, aliquando sursum, aliquando deorsum, per cochleas circumductam, non est meæ parvitatibus explicare . . . neque ullam domum aliam citra Alpes montes, talem ædificatam audivimus.” — EDDIUS, c. 21. “Ibi ædificia minaci altitudine murorum, erecta . . . multa proprio sed et cæmentariorum, quos ex Roma munificentie attraxerat, magisterio . . . nunc qui Roma veniunt allegant ut qui Hagulstadensem fabricam vident, ambitionem Romanam se imaginari jurent.” — GUILLELM. MALMESB., De Gest. Pontif., l. iii. f. 155. The successor of Wilfrid collected here a crowd of relics placed in shrines. Each triforium, formed by the intercolumniation of the edifice, was occupied by one of these shrines. This wonderful church, with all its riches, was burnt by the Danes in 875. Nothing now remains but the crypt, of which a plan, extremely curious and complicated, will be found in the excellent Introduction to the Study of Gothic Architecture, by Mr. J. H. Parker, p. 11. This crypt is now covered by the beautiful Abbey Church, rebuilt in the twelfth century, the choir and transept of which have preserved their original beauty, the nave having been destroyed by the Scots in 1296. Those among my readers who are interested in architecture will forgive an old archæologist for presenting to their notice the text of Richard, Prior of Hexham, who wrote about 1150, and who had seen the ruins of Wilfrid’s church. It will be found in Appendix V., p. 000.

and that the monks of the monastery mingled with the cœmentarii by profession whom Wilfrid had brought from Canterbury, or even attracted from Rome by the offer of large salaries.¹³²

A hundred years later, an illustrious Northumbrian monk, who has been adopted by France and received into the number of her distinguished men, the great Alcuin, begged the sons of Wilfrid to reckon him among the number of their familiar friends, referring at the same time to the admiration excited, even beyond the seas, by the magnificent dwelling left to them by their founder. "Oh, noble posterity of saints," he wrote to them, "heirs of their honors and of their spotless life, inhabitants of that dwelling so marvellous in beauty, walk in the footsteps of your fathers, so that, passing from the splendor of your earthly home, you may be worthy, by the grace of God, to rejoin those from whom you are descended in the kingdom of eternal beauty."¹³³

Connection
of Wilfrid with Queen Etheldreda.

The land on which the new Monastery of Hexham was built had been given to Bishop Wilfrid, not by the king, but by the queen, Etheldreda, whose personal estate it was, a part of her dowry.¹³⁴ It was the residence he preferred to all others, as much on account of the calm which he enjoyed there as from his tender affection for the giver.¹³⁵ It is now time to turn to this saint, whose life was so singular, whose influence over the destiny of Wilfrid was so marked, and in whom we must recognize the earliest, and for a long time the most popular, of all the English female saints.¹³⁶

¹³² "Cum ædificarent cœmentarii murorum altitudines, quidam juvenis de pinna enormis proceritatis elapsus ad terram . . . ultima spiramina trahens jacebat. . . . Pontificis lacrymantis moratione . . . spiritum vitæ recepit et alligantes medici ossa confracta de die in diem melioratus est." — EDDIUS, c. 22. See preceding note in respect to the Roman workmen.

¹³³ "Ædilberto episcopo et omni congregationi in ecclesia sancti Andræ Deo servantium, Alcuinus vestræ clientellus caritatis in Christo salutem . . . O nobilissima sanctorum progenies patrum! illorum honoris venerabilisque vitæ successores et pulcherrimorum habitatores locorum vestrorum, sequimini vestigia patrum: ut de his pulcherrimis habitationibus ad eorum, qui vos genuerunt, æternæ beatitudinis consortium, in cælestis regni pulchritudinem, Deo donante, pervenire mereamini." — ALCUINI Opera, ed. Froben. 1777, t. i. p. 196.

¹³⁴ RAINE, p. xiv. This territory, known by the name of Hexhamshire, was twelve miles long and three broad.

¹³⁵ "Præ ceteris quibus præfuit ecclesiis, hanc creberius visitavit, devotius coluit." — ÆLRED, De Sanctis Eccles. Hagustaldensis, c. 1. "Tum ob amorem dilectissimæ dominæ suæ, tum propter secretiorem et quietiorem vitam." — RICARD. HAGUSTALD., De Ant. et Moderno Statu ejusdem Ecclesiæ, c. 2.

¹³⁶ Under the name of St. Audrey. This name, now quite fallen into disuse, is given by Shakespeare to one of his characters in As You Like It.

Etheldreda no doubt, like all the princes and princesses of the Anglo-Saxon dynasties, believed herself descended from Odin; but at least she was undoubtedly of the family of the Uffings, the royal race in East Anglia. Her father, King Anna, married a Northumbrian princess, sister of the Abbess Hilda, and grand niece of Edwin, first Christian king of Northumbria. It was to avenge the death of this father, who had fallen under the sword of the sanguinary Penda, that King Oswy, her father-in-law, made war on the Mercians, and not only delivered East Anglia, but also conquered and occupied Mercia. Etheldreda was the sister of Ermenilda, Queen of the Mercians, who had so well seconded Wilfrid in the work of converting her people.¹³⁷ She had also another sister, married to that King of Kent who was so zealous for the destruction of idols.¹³⁸ And she was niece, through her mother, of Hilda, the holy and powerful Abbess of Whitby, whose authority, though no doubt weakened since the victory gained by Wilfrid over her friends at Whitby itself, was, notwithstanding, always great throughout Northumbria.

Like all princesses whose history has fallen into the region of legends, the chroniclers boast of her precocious piety, the fervor and stainless purity of her early years. Nevertheless, she loved ornament; and on her death-bed still remembered the weight of the necklaces and jewels with which her delicate throat had been loaded.¹³⁹ These ornaments gave additional brilliancy to her great beauty, which excited, it is said, the passion of all the neighboring princes.¹⁴⁰ The most ardent of these, the Prince of the Gyrwiens, a Saxon colony established in the marshy country which separates East Anglia from Mercia, asked her in marriage, and obtained her from her father, two years before the death of that king on the field of battle.¹⁴¹ Etheldreda, however, having resolved to follow the example of the 652.

¹³⁷ See above, p. 340.

¹³⁸ See p. 287. Cf. BEDE, iv. 22; and THOMAS, Historia Eliensis, i. 2, 25, ap. Act. SS. O. S. B. sec. ii. A new edition of this historian is published by Stewart, London, 1848.

¹³⁹ "Merito in collo pondus languoris porto, in quo juvenulam me meministi supervacua monilium pondera portare." — BEDE, iv. 19.

¹⁴⁰ "Ab ipsis infantie rudimentis sobrietati et pudicitie indulgens. . . . Accedunt plurimi formae virginis excellentiam admirantes. . . . Innumeris ejus pulchritudo principibus complacebat: et venusta faciei ejus pulchritudo ad puellares promovebat amplexus." — THOM., Eliens., § 4.

¹⁴¹ "Postulatur a Tomberto principe . . . qui in amorem virginis totum animum informandum instituit. . . . Alligatur licet invita conjugali copula. . . . Desponsata matrem Domini meruit imitari. . . . In quorum copula blessed Virgin Mary, and to consecrate herself wholly to God, resisted to the utmost the will of her father, and succeeded in preventing the consummation of her marriage during the three years that she passed with the tender and generous Tombert. He died; and the young widow supposed herself forever delivered from the matrimonial yoke, and free to give herself up to Christ. But it was not so. Egfrid, the son and heir of the great King of Northumbria, the most powerful prince of the Anglo-Saxon nation, became in his turn enamoured of her. Her resistance was as vain as in the first instance. The entreaties of her uncle, who had succeeded her father as King of East Anglia, and those of all her relations, compelled her to a second marriage, which no doubt seemed to them a new and precious pledge of alliance between the two kingdoms.¹⁴² The impassioned Egfrid bestowed on her, in full sovereignty, ^{659.} considerable possessions, of which the vast territory of Hexham, which she afterwards gave to Wilfrid, formed part.

When Wilfrid became bishop, he acquired at once, as has been seen, a great influence over the king, and the queen was not slow to show him still greater confidence and affection.¹⁴³ But what must have been the surprise and irritation of the young king, whom the powerful testimony of his contemporary Bede represents to us as very pious and highly beloved by God,¹⁴⁴ when he found that Etheldreda persisted, as in her former marriage, in keeping her virginity for God! Like the terrible Clotaire, the husband of St. Radegonde, a century previous, he found that he had married not a woman, but a nun.¹⁴⁵ But although he loved not less than Clotaire the wife who refused to belong to him, he respected and feared her more. She seemed to him more his lady and mistress than his equal and queen. Several years thus passed; the refusals of Etheldreda serving only to increase his passion. He then determined to apply to Wilfrid, well non commixtione carnis unum corpus, sed, ut creditur, in Christo unus erat animus. . . . Ignara maritalis negotii, indefessis precibus apud Deum obtinuit, ut illam custodiret immaculatam." — Ibid.

¹⁴² "Gaudebat solutam se esse in Christi libertate de jugo conjugii. . . . Ægfridus . . . inflammatur in amorem virginis, opes confert innumeras, dotesque spondet multiplices. . . . Principis petitio vehementius facta est . . . licet invita . . . adquivit unanimi parentum voluntati." — THOM., Eliens., c. 4, 8.

¹⁴³ See above, p. 358. "Quem virgo regina præ omnibus in regno dilectum et electum habuerat." — Id., c. 15.

¹⁴⁴ Vita S. Cuthberti, c. 24.

¹⁴⁵ "Dicebat se habere jugalem monacham, non reginam."

knowing what was the empire of the bishop over the conscience of Etheldreda, as well as over her heart, since he was the man for whom she had the greatest affection.¹⁴⁶ He offered him, as Wilfrid himself related to the venerable Bede, large estates and much money as the price of the queen's consent to his wishes. Bede only sees in Wilfrid on this occasion a witness to the incorruptible virginity of the saint. But, if we are to believe the official panegyrist of Etheldreda, it was Wilfrid who encouraged her in her resistance, while at first pretending to second the views of the king, in order to preserve his favor. In his secret conferences with her, he showed her heaven as the reward of her perseverance. She made to him the vow of chastity, and he then counselled her to ask from the king a formal separation, that she might consecrate herself to God in a monastery. Egfrid at first refused this absolutely; but after long disputes — after twelve years of so strange and stormy a union, vanquished by the prayers and tears of her whom he ever loved with so faithful a passion — he suffered a kind of consent to be torn from him to the departure of his unconquerable wife.¹⁴⁷

¹⁴⁶ "Aciores Ægfrido stimulos adjicit, et ad copulam virginis feroces illius animos vehementer incendit . . . (sed) reginam impudice non tetigit, neque constrictavit . . . quoniam non ut reginam aut parem, verum tanquam dominam per omnia venerabatur. . . . Tamen optat ille debitum a conjugē." — THOM., Eliens., t. i. 8, 9.

¹⁴⁷ Respect for truth obliges me to give entire the text on which this singular history rests. In the first place that of the contemporary Bede, whose curiosity, at first incredulous, may be remarked; next that of the monk of Ely, who did not write until five centuries after the death of Etheldreda, but who lived in the monastery which she had founded, and surrounded with all the memorials which she had herself brought and left there, and which had passed from mouth to mouth until his time. "Data est regi præfato cujus consortio cum duodecim annis uteretur, perpetuæ tamen mansit virginitatis integritate gloriosa: sicut mihimet sciscitanti cum hoc an ita esset, quibusdam venisset in dubium beatæ memoriæ Wilfrid episcopus referebat; dicens se testem integritatis ejus esse certissimum: adeo ut Ægfridus promiserit se ei terras ac pecunias multas esse donaturum, si reginæ posset persuadere ejus uti connubio, quia sciebat illam nullum virorum plus illo diligere." — BEDE, iv. 19. "Vidit ejus assiduam cum beato præsule familiaritatem. . . . Hinc Dei præconem rex frustra fatigat præmiis. . . . Wilfridus voti virginei fautor existens, vigilantis animi sagacitate procurabat, ne qua femineæ mentis inconstantia virgo mutaret. . . . Dissimulavit provide, tanquam regi favens et desiderii sui efficaciam reginæ persuadendam pollicens; veritus ne, sicut contigit, ob rem hujusce modi offensum illum haberet. . . . Sic Dei virtute prædita, per consilium sancti præsulis nullatenus regi assensum præbuit; egitque vir beatus sua industria ut potius divortium quæreret. . . . Princeps, nec facile acquiescit graviterque dolendum se asserit, si aliquando contingat a conjugē dilecta ferre divortium, licet ei nunquam conjunctus esset more conjugatorum. Postulat iterum regina, fletibus et diutinis postulationibus tanto importunius insistit. . . . Rex tandem victus ipsius importu-

She was no sooner furnished with this tardy and painful acquiescence in her wishes, than she hastened to Coldingham, to the great seaside monastery governed by Ebba, aunt of the king, and sister of his predecessors Oswald and Oswy.

Wilfrid gives her the veil at Colding-
ham.

671.

Egfrid pursues her.

She flees to Ely.

Wilfrid very soon followed, to give her the veil and black robe, which should henceforward prove her new position as a nun.¹⁴⁸ Soon after, however, Egfrid followed her to her retreat; unable to endure her absence and the sacrifice she had imposed on him, he came with the furious determination of reclaiming her, and asserting his rights. The Abbess Ebba saw that she could not resist the violence of her nephew; she advised the queen, therefore, to flee. Etheldreda accordingly left Coldingham on foot, disguised in the dress of a poor woman, and accompanied by two brave nuns of the monastery. It did not occur to her to seek an asylum at Whitby, though the Abbess Hilda was her aunt. She must have known too well that that holy princess would encourage no enterprise in which Wilfrid had a share. She turned southward, through a thousand difficulties and adventures, towards the river which separated Northumbria from the rest of England, and having happily crossed that stream, she paused on the confines of her own country, East Anglia, in an estate which her first husband had given to her as her jointure.¹⁴⁹

Legends of the journey.

This long and fatiguing journey of the queen, disguised, and flying from her husband to bury herself in a cloister, touched deeply the imagination of the English people; and miraculous stories founded on it passed from mouth to mouth for ages, while they were also commemorated in the sculptured capitals and painted glass of nis precibus, licet invitus, tamen eam dimisit invincibilem." — THOM., Eliens., i. 9, 10. Let us add, finally, that Eddi, the disciple of Wilfrid, maintains a prudent and complete silence as to the intervention of his master in this delicate affair.

¹⁴⁸ "Accepto velamine sanctimonialis a Wilfrido." — BEDE, l. c.

¹⁴⁹ "In veste humili . . . latitando incessit. . . . Per innumera itinerum discrimina et labores diversos . . . ut possessionem propriam, quam a Tomberto primo sponso ejus, jure dotis . . . perpetuo possidendam acceperat." — THOM., Eliens., c. 15. This author continually appeals to the traditional evidences by which he was inspired: "Hoc in Beda nequaquam invenimus sed pro cunctorum usque nunc testimonio scribendum existimavimus. . . . Quicumque locum Coludi norunt, cum assertione hujus rei testes existunt. . . . Quæ ex priorum attestazione comperi, atque scriptura teste nosse contigit. . . . Res seniorum nostrorum relatione nobis tradita, quam omnis provincia in qua acciderat velut hesternum recitare solet et meminit." — C. 9, 11, 12, 13.

the great monastic churches.¹⁵⁰ Pious pilgrimages were made to the promontory washed by the sea, on which, in the first stage of her journey, pursued by Egfrid, she took refuge with her companions, and round which the tide rose so high as to render it inaccessible for seven consecutive days, until the king, discouraged, abandoned the pursuit.¹⁵¹ And the pilgrims pointed out to each other the spot where, travelling on foot on a day of great heat, she fell asleep from fatigue on the open plain. Its position was marked by a majestic ash, the largest tree in the district, which was believed to have been the travelling staff which the royal traveller had thrust into the ground while she slept, and which she found at her waking already covered with verdure; an emblem of the great monastery in the shade of which she was destined to pass the rest of her days, and to shelter, among many others, her friend and protector Wilfrid.¹⁵²

The lands she possessed in right of her first husband were very extensive, since they supported nearly six hundred families. Their position was almost that of an island, surrounded by fens, which could only be crossed in boats. This island was called Ely, or the Isle of Eels.¹⁵³ It is a name to be found on every page of the political and religious history of England.¹⁵⁴ Etheldreda built a monastery there, which grew into speedy greatness, and where many Anglo-Saxon virgins joined her, among whom were a number of princesses of her family, having at their head her sister, the Queen of Kent. Mothers confided their daughters to her to educate. Even men, and among them many priests, selected her also for their guide and mistress in the spiritual life. Many of the officials of her household followed her example when she quitted the throne

Establishment and monastic life at Ely.

673.

¹⁵⁰ For example, on the capitals of the beautiful Cathedral of Ely, in 1342.

¹⁵¹ "Mare suum alveum egrediens . . . locum, in quem sacræ virgines ascenderant, circumdedit, et sicut ab incolis loci accepimus, per septem continuos dies eas occuluit . . . solitos recursus obliviscens, quamdiu rex illic aut penes locum mirabatur."—Ibid., c. 11. This rocky cape is still called, as in the time of Thomas, Colbert's Head.

¹⁵² "De somno evigilata . . . invenit baculum itineris sui . . . jam viridi amicta cortice fronduisse . . . facta est fraxinus maxima . . . quam ex nostris adhuc plures viderunt."—Ibid., c. 13. This place was called, in Anglo-Saxon, Ædeldrethstowe, Etheldreda's Rest.

¹⁵³ "A copia anguillarum quæ in iisdem paludibus capiuntur."—BEDE, c. 1.

¹⁵⁴ After having been destroyed by the Danes, Ely became an abbey of monks, and was erected into a bishopric in 1108. Its cathedral, of which we shall speak later, is one of the marvels of Anglo-Norman architecture.

Her major-domo, Owin.

and the world to devote herself to God. The chief of these officials, who may be regarded as the queen's major-domo, was an East Anglian lord, named Owin, a man of faith and of amiable disposition, who had been attached to her from her cradle, had accompanied her from East Anglia to Northumbria, and had no desire to remain in the world after her and without her. He abandoned his honors and possessions, and, putting on a poor man's dress, went with a mattock and axe on his shoulder, and knocked at the door of the monastery where Abbot Ceadda lived, at Lichfield in Mercia. "I come here," he said, "to seek, not rest, as some do, but work. I am not worth much for meditation or study, but I will do as much manual labor as you like; and while the bishop reads in his cell I will take care of the work outside."¹⁵⁵ Others of her servants joined Etheldreda at Ely, where she soon found herself at the head of one of those double communities of men and women, or rather of brethren and sisters, which played so important a part in history at the epoch of which we are speaking.¹⁵⁶

She gave them, during the seven years she passed at their head, an example of all monastic virtues, and especially of zeal in fasting and prayer. Few details exist of this period of her existence, but the holiness of that life must have left deep traces in the memory of Anglo-Saxon Christians to have enabled it to triumph over time and human forgetfulness beyond that of any other woman of the race. Among her austerities, the greatest wonder was that so great a lady should wear nothing but woollen instead of linen garments, and that she took a bath only on the four great feasts of the year, and even then, after the rest of the community.¹⁵⁷ continues to direct her.

Wilfrid

Wilfrid never gave up his care of Etheldreda. As soon as he knew of her arrival at Ely he hastened thither.¹⁵⁸ It was he who instituted her ¹⁵⁵ "Ovini monachus magni meriti et pura intentione . . . eratque primus ministrorum et princeps domus ejus. . . . Securim atque asciam in manu ferens. . . . Non ad otium, ut quidam, sed ad laborem." — BEDE, iv. 3. Cf. BOLLAND., die 4 Martii. This Owin is the monk who attended Bishop Ceadda in his last moments. See above, p. 349. He himself is reckoned among the saints, and the Bollandists have consecrated an article to him in their volume i. of March. Bede relates the story of another of Etheldreda's officers — her cupbearer — who, after having been made a prisoner, and sold as a slave in the market at London to a Frisian, was bought back by the King of Kent, nephew of Etheldreda.

¹⁵⁶ THOM., Eliens., c. 15, 18, 22, and 23.

¹⁵⁷ BEDE, iv. 19.

¹⁵⁸ "Beatæ virginis non immemor, nec se a vicissitudine dilectionis illius abbess, who gave the veil to her nuns, and who regulated all that concerned the government and interests, temporal or spiritual, of the new community. He paid her frequent visits, and never ceased to give consolation and enlightenment to her for whom he must have felt more than ever responsible, since he had encouraged her to sacrifice the obligations of conjugal life to follow the path of supernatural virtue.

However touching and dramatic this history may be, it appears happily certain that no one in the Catholic Church would now authorize or approve the conduct of Wilfrid. It is not less certain that no one of his own time seems to have blamed him. Without any desire of judging him severely, it is evident that these events had no fortunate influence upon him. His life, hitherto agitated, but glorious and prosperous, became, after the consecration of Etheldreda, nothing but a tissue of trials and tempests. First of all, the intimate and fruitful union which had existed between him and the king of his country, was broken beyond remedy. Egfrid never pardoned him for his deceit, for having interfered in his domestic life, only to destroy its charm, and for having used his influence to encourage the wife whom he loved to desert him; and he long nourished his resentment in silence, waiting and preparing for the day when he might despoil him of his episcopal see.¹⁵⁹

Rupture
between Wilfrid and
Egfrid;

But the direct instrument of the rupture between them and of the disasters of Wilfrid, was the second wife of Egfrid, she who, thanks to Wilfrid, and to him alone, had taken the place of St. Etheldreda on the throne, and in the heart of the sovereign of Northumbria. This princess, Ermenburga, was a sister-in-law of the King of the West Saxons. It was she, if we may believe the companion and biographer of Wilfrid, by whom the perfidious enemy of the Christian flock chose to work,

Provoked especially by the new queen, Er-
menburga.

excludens, ut eam in Ely descendisse cognoverat, festinus advolat."—THOM., c. 16. Cf. 15 and 19. "A quo ipsa plurimum regendi consilium et vite solatium habuit."

¹⁵⁹ "Nec deinceps confessorum Domini Wilfridum a secretis seu affectis ut antea coluit, sed iram diu tacito contra illum sub pectore gessit; et expectata hora, ob istius modi causam, eum de sede sui episcopatus expulit."—THOM., Eliens., l. i. c. 11. Bede, the contemporary of Wilfrid, and who had questioned him with regard to the story of Etheldreda (iv. 19), simply mentions the rupture without alluding to its motives; he shows otherwise in all that regards the conflicts of Wilfrid with kings and bishops a singular reserve, very rare with him.

according to his custom of employing the weakness of women to corrupt the human race.

This wicked Jezebel, continues our ardent musician, drew from her quiver the most poisoned arrows to pierce the heart of the king, and to provoke him to a furious envy of the great bishop. With the eloquence of hatred she represented to him the shameless pomp and luxury displayed on every occasion by the Bishop of York; his immense riches, his services of gold and silver, the increasing number of his monasteries, the vast grandeur of his buildings, his innumerable army of dependants and vassals, better armed and better clothed perhaps than those of the king. She pointed out to him besides how many abbots and abbesses either gave up to him during their lives the government of their communities, or solemnly constituted him their heir; so that the moment might be foreseen when all those estates, given by the generosity of the Northumbrians to the sanctuaries of the new religion, would become the appanage of one man.¹⁶⁰ Such arguments could not but aggravate the resentment of a heart wounded by the desertion of a wife passionately regretted, and to whom another wife pointed out the way of vengeance.

Archbishop
Theodore
takes part with them.

The husband and wife thus decided upon the destruction of Wilfrid; but not daring to attack him directly, they had the art to engage the Archbishop Theodore in their plans, and to strike their enemy, the great champion of Rome, by the hand of the direct and supreme representative of Roman authority in England. Eddi distinctly accuses the primate of having been bribed by the King and Queen of Northumbria.¹⁶¹ It is repugnant to our minds to admit such an accusation against a saint placed in the Roman calendar side by side with St. Wilfrid. We can more easily believe that the archbishop suffered himself to be led away by an apprehension of the too great power of Wilfrid, and above all, by a perfectly legitimate desire to put in execution his project for augmenting and better dividing the English dioceses. It is also almost certain that he allowed himself to be influenced by a kind of Celtic reaction, the movers of which did not attempt to return to anti-Roman usages, but only to punish in Wilfrid the destroyer of their ancient ritual and their recent conqueror.

¹⁶⁰ "Consueta arma arripiens, vasa fragilia muliebria quæsit. . . . De pharetra sua venenatas sagittas venefica in cor regis, quasi impiissima Jezebel, per auditum verborum emisit, enumerans ei eloquenter . . . innumerumque sodalium exercitum regalibus vestimentis et armis ornatum. . . . Namque pæne omnes abbates et abbatissæ cœnobiorum, aut sub suo nomine secum substantias custodientes, aut post obitum suum hæredem illum habere optantes voto voverunt." — EDDIUS, c. 23, 20. "Quod aureis et argenteis vasis sibi ministrari faceret." — GUILL. MALMESB., f. 148.

¹⁶¹ "Ad auxilium suæ vesaniæ archiepiscopum Theodorum cum muneribus, quæ excæcant etiam sapientium oculos . . . invitaverunt. Venientes vero ad eos quid mente agerent in contemptu ejus patefacientes, et sine aliquo culpandi piaculo inique damnare consensit." — EDDIUS, c. 23. William of Malmesbury, in the twelfth century, repeats this account. The Bollandists do not admit that Theodore was corrupted, but do not hesitate to accuse him of culpable connivance with the enemies of Wilfrid. — Act. SS., vol. vi. Sept., p. 62.

Accordingly, during one of Wilfrid's numerous absences, Theodore came to York, and using, or abusing, the supremacy with which the Pope had invested him, he deposed Wilfrid, and also divided the diocese of York or Northumbria into three new dioceses. Nothing could be more significant of the spirit which animated him than his choice of bishop for these new dioceses, who were all monks taken from the ancient Celtic monasteries, who, while recognizing Roman customs, had still repelled the Roman customs, had still repelled the Roman bishop.¹⁶² One of these new sees naturally remained at York; there the archbishop placed Bosa, since venerated as a saint, whom he found in the community of Whitby,¹⁶³ and consequently of the school of the Abbess Hilda, always so hostile to Wilfrid. By a refinement of animosity, the capital of the second diocese was placed at Hexham, precisely in that great monastery which Wilfrid had created with such magnificence. The bishop placed there was the abbot of the Celtic novitiate of Melrose, that very Eata who had been superior of the Scottish community, formerly displaced from Ripon to make room for Wilfrid.¹⁶⁴ The third diocese, which comprehended that part of Mercia recently conquered by the Northumbrian king, was also confided to a Celtic monk, who had been the companion of Ceadda when he replaced Wilfrid after his first deposition by Oswy.¹⁶⁵ Finally, as if to add a touch of derision to violence,

He deposes Wilfrid, and divides his diocese into three. 678.

¹⁶² "Tres episcopus aliunde inventos, et non de subjectis illius parochias . . . inordinate solus ordinavit." — EDDIUS, c. 23.

¹⁶³ BEDE, iv. 12, 23. Bosa is honored (November 2) in the English martyrology.

¹⁶⁴ See above, p. 313.

¹⁶⁵ BEDE, iii. 28; iv. 12. This monk was named Eadhæd. He was afterwards placed by Theodore at Ripon, in order to neutralize the influence of Wilfrid in his earliest foundation.

a fourth diocese was carved out, according to several authors, in the vast territories of Northumbria, having for its chief seat Lindisfarne, the sanctuary and asylum of the Celtic spirit. This miserable relic of his extinct greatness it was proposed to leave to Wilfrid, thus taking care to place him in the midst of his adversaries.¹⁶⁵

All these measures bore the unmistakable mark of a Celtic reaction; but the archbishop gave as his reason that the diocese was large enough to give occupation to four bishops, and that its revenues furnished sufficient support for three instead of ministering to the luxury of one.¹⁶⁷

Wilfrid appeals to Rome.

At the first report of this attempt on the rights of the Church and his own, Wilfrid hurried home, and summoned the king and the archbishop publicly to explain their motives for having thus despoiled him not only of his ecclesiastical authority, but also of the lands which he held as the gift of the reigning king, his father and brother. "It is," he said to them, "mere robbery." The two potentates simply replied, "We have no crime with which to reproach you, but we will not change any part of the judgment we have delivered." "Then," replied Wilfrid, "I appeal to the judgment of the Holy See."¹⁶⁸ It was the first time that an appeal to Rome had been heard of in Eng-

¹⁶⁶ It appears more probable, according to Bede, that this diocese of Lindisfarne was not created, or rather renewed, until 681; but, supposing it to have been in 678, it is certain that Wilfrid did not then accept the government, as he did some years later. We must not, like Fleury, confound this diocese of Lindisfarne, situated in Bernicia, north of Northumbria, with that of Lindisfari, created by Theodore, and which comprehended the province of Lindsey (now Lincolnshire), a division of Mercia. In 681, Theodore finished his work, and created — quite to the north of the country conquered by the Anglo-Saxons, on the banks of the Forth — a last diocese, which he placed in the Monastery of Abercorn, and which was to comprise all the Picts subject to Northumbrian rule. The land to the north of the Humber was thus divided into five dioceses — York, Ripon, Hexham, Lindisfarne, and Abercorn; the twelve dioceses subject to the metropolis of York, of which Gregory had prescribed the foundation to Augustin, still lay far in the future. But Theodore did not intend to create in the north a rival metropolis to his own. On the other hand, he multiplied dioceses south of the Humber; he divided the immense diocese of Mercia into six — Lichfield, Leicester, Hereford, Worcester, Sydnamester, and Dorchester, since transferred to Lincoln. Of these six, the four whose names are in italics still exist.

¹⁶⁷ "Prætendebat causam justitiæ ut inde tres alerentur episcopi, unde unus tumebat." — GUILL. MALMESB., f. 149.

¹⁶⁸ "Interrogans quid causæ esset, ut . . . prædonum more defraudarent. . . Illi responderunt famosum verbum dicentes coram omni populo: Nul- lam criminis culpam in aliquo nocendi tibi adscribimus sed tamen statuta de te judicia non mutabimus."

land; but Wilfrid recalled St. Paul's "I appeal until Cæsar." The step he thus took was a prelude to those great appeals and solemn struggles which, after the Norman Conquest, stirred all the West, and gave so much celebrity to the pontificates of St. Anselm and St. Thomas of Canterbury.

As he passed out of the royal assembly where he had thus signified his refusal to obey, he turned towards certain flatterers of the prince who were enjoying and laughing at his disgrace. "On this day next year," he said to them, "you who now laugh at my expense shall weep bitterly at your own." And in fact next year, on the very same day, all the people of York were tearing their hair and their garments in token of mourning, as the funeral procession of the young brother and heir of Egfrid passed through their city. This young prince, who was scarcely eighteen years of age, and already dear to the Anglo-Saxons, had been the guest of Wilfrid at the solemn dedication of Ripon: he perished in a war against the Mercians, the beginning of a series of defeats which lasted during all the remainder of the hitherto prosperous reign of Egfrid.¹⁶⁹

The cowardly animosity of these courtiers against the haughty and intrepid prelate is, however, much less surprising than the fact that, incontestably, Wilfrid met with no aid and no sympathy among the great and holy churchmen who were his contemporaries. Not only did the illustrious Abbess Hilda, protectress of the Celtic ritual, remain always relentlessly, implacably hostile to him,¹⁷⁰ but not one of the abbots whom his example had imbued with the Roman and Benedictine spirit came to his succor; neither Benedict Biscop, who was as much Roman at heart, and by his numerous pilgrimages to Rome, as Wilfrid himself; nor the pious, humble, and austere Cuthbert, whose sanctity was already known in the very country and diocese of Wilfrid, and nourished through many ages the popular devotion of northern England. Except his own personal followers, very numerous indeed, and warmly attached to him, all that Northumbria in which the Celtic apostles had wrought so many wonders, remained either hostile or profoundly indifferent. This indifference and hostility of the country, arising, no doubt, from an excessive susceptibility of national sentiment, is again apparent at a later date in the histories of Anselm and Thomas à Becket. It is a point of resemblance between these illustrious men and the first great bishop of the English race which must strike every observer.

All the saints and chief abbots of his country are hostile or indifferent to him.

¹⁶⁹ "Adulatoribus dixit: Hoc anniversario die, qui nunc ridetis in meam pro invidia condemnationem, tunc in vestra confusione amare flebitis." — EDDIUS, c. 23. Cf. BEDE, iv. 21.

¹⁷⁰ "Ut putant sit quanta miseria involvat mortales, quod illi viri quos sanctissimos celebrat antiquitas, Theodorus, Berthwaldus, Johannes, Bosa, nec non et Hilda abbatissa digladiabili odio inpetierint Wilfridum." — GUILL. MALMESB., f. 152. Cf. FABER, p. 88.

The modern reader will not be less astonished at the ignorance of the Anglo-Saxon Church in the most elementary rules of canonical law as to the institution and immovability of bishops. When St. Wilfrid was superseded at York for the first time, without trial, before he had even taken possession, St. Chad accepted his see without hesitation; and other saints — Cuthbert, Bosa, and John of Beverley — afterwards followed his example, while the Metropolitan of Canterbury, himself inscribed in the Roman calendar, consecrated all these intruders. When the Holy See intervened on behalf of the law, its decrees met with but a tardy or equivocal acquiescence. But such causes of astonishment, too often awakened by the conscientious study of history, ought not to trouble sincere and serious minds. If the dogmas and morals taught by the Church have never varied, it has required many centuries to give to her discipline and government that form which now appears to us the only regular one. To expect in primitive times, and among young and restless nations, to find the monarchical concentration or uniform docility which, in our days, characterized the exercise of ecclesiastical authority, is to fall into the same error as those simple historians, lately so common among us, who mete out the royalty of Clovis or St. Louis by the measure of the monarchy of Louis XIV.

CHAPTER IV.

JUSTICE DONE TO WILFRID AT ROME: IN ENGLAND HE IS DEPOSED, IMPRISONED, EXILED, AND RESTORED.—678-686.

Wilfrid himself carries his cause to Rome. — A storm lands him in Friesland, where he evangelizes the people. — He thus becomes the first of the Anglo-Saxon apostles of Germany. — Generosity of the King of the Frisians and King of the Lombards, both of whom refuse to deliver him up to Ebroïn. — Wilfrid in Austrasia: Dagobert II. — Wilfrid at Rome. — Theodore and Hilda denounce him to the Pope St. Agathon. His cause is tried by a council at which the Pope presides. He obtains justice; but the principle of the division of dioceses is maintained, and the authority of the primate confirmed. Wilfrid hears at Rome of the death of Etheldreda. — He is present at the Council against the Monothelites, and bears witness to the faith of all the Churches of the British Isles. — He returns to England with the Papal charter for Peterborough. — He is repulsed by the king and assembly of the Northumbrians, and then imprisoned. — Connivance of Archbishop Theodore. — Wilfrid refuses to treat with the king. — He is put in irons at Dunbar: afterwards delivered by the intervention of the Abbess Edda of Coldingham, but exiled. — Obligated to leave Mercia and Wessex, where the brothers-in-law of Egfrid reign, he takes refuge among the Saxons of the South, whom he converts to Christianity. — He teaches them to fish with nets, and frees the serfs on the domains of his new Abbey of Selsey. — His connection with the proscribed Ceadwalla, who becomes King of Wessex, and afterwards dies at Rome. — Theodore again disposes of the diocese of Wilfrid: St. Cuthbert is made Bishop of Lindisfarne. — King Egfrid ravages Ireland cruelly: in spite of the entreaties of Bishop Cuthbert he invades Caledonia, and perishes there. — Queen Ermenburga, informed by Cuthbert of the death of her husband, becomes a nun. — Consequences of the defeat of Egfrid. — The Saxon bishop of the Picts takes refuge at Whitby, where Elffeda, sister of Egfrid, had succeeded Hilda. — Archbishop Theodore acknowledges his faults towards Wilfrid: he wishes to choose him as his successor: writes in his favor to the King of the Mercians and to the Abbess Elffeda. — Connection of Elffeda with Bishop Cuthbert. — Aldfrid, long an exile at Iona, becomes King of Northumbria. — Wilfrid is recalled and re-established in his diocese. — Storms raised by him at Lindisfarne, which he abandons to another bishop. — Death of Archbishop Theodore.

HAVING decided that he would himself carry his appeal to Rome, Wilfrid left Northumbria, accompanied by his friend the chorister Eddi, and by a numerous train of clergy and laymen, who never left him. He left behind thousands of monks, initiated by him into the rule of St. Benedict, and now in despair at finding themselves under the authority of new bishops strange to Benedictine traditions, and animated by a spirit totally opposed to that of their beloved superior.¹⁷¹ His route towards the Continent led him through the kingdoms of Mercia and East Anglia, the princes and people of which were always favorable to him; and when he stopped at the great monasteries, at Peterborough, of which he regarded himself as one of the founders, and, above all, at Ely, where he had often dwelt, and where Etheldreda always received him as her bishop, she commissioned him to obtain for her at Rome one of those acts of privilege which were earnestly sought by monastic establishments as their most efficient safeguard against the usurpations and violences which menaced them on all sides.¹⁷²

¹⁷¹ "Multa millia monachorum suorum sub manu episcoporum noviter ordinatorum, relinquens, mœrentes et flentes." — EDDIUS, c. 24.

It was supposed by his enemies, who increased every day in number and bitterness, that he would take the ordinary route of pilgrims to Rome, landing in the neighborhood of Boulogne at Etaples, and going through France. They therefore sent messages and gifts to the atrocious Ebroin, who, stained as he was by the blood of St. Leger and many other victims, still governed, as mayor of the palace, the provinces of Neustria and Burgundy. Knowing him to be capable of any crime, they begged him to lay hands on Wilfrid on his journey, rob him of all that he carried with him, and free them from the chance of his return.¹⁷³ But whether Wilfrid was warned of his danger, or whether he was simply guided by the west wind which rose while he was at sea — this wind saved his life, carrying him, and with him the first seeds of the Christian faith, to the low and marshy shores of Friesland.¹⁷⁴

Mission of
Wilfrid into Friesland.

He is thus the first of the Anglo-Saxon apostles of Germany.

The Frisians then occupied all the north-east of Germany. They were a warlike, numerous, and formidable people, of whom mention will often be made in the after history of monastic missions. The Gospel was then unknown to them, and Wilfrid, who had been the beginner of so many things, had also the glory of opening the way to those Anglo-Saxon apostles of Germany whose long and glorious annals we have yet to unfold. Wilfrid, who was hospitably received by the king of the country and its inhabitants, had no sooner landed on the unknown coast than he took advantage of the kindness shown him to begin a new evangelical mission. With the self-devotion and enthusiasm natural to him, he forgot the grave personal interests which were leading him to Rome in his eagerness to give himself up to this new work. He remained there a whole winter, preaching daily, with the permission of the king, Adalgisus, and with a success which repaid his toil. The year proved more than usually abundant in fish and other provisions, and this the Frisians attributed to the new God who was preached to them.¹⁷⁵ Nearly all their chiefs were baptized, with many thousands of the people.

¹⁷² "Apud Ely cum beatissima Etheldretha morabatur, ubi tunc et quotiens necessitas poposcerat, quoad vixit, officii jura episcopalis administravit. . . . Monasterium per dilectum suum Wilfridum Romæ nutu apostolico corroborandum destinavit. . . . Accepit privilegium . . . ut optaverat et eum rogaverat mater insignis Etheldretha." — THOM. ELIENSIS, c. 15, 19.

¹⁷³ The similarity of name between Wilfrid and Winfrid, bishop of Lichfield, must have been fatal to the latter. Having been deposed by the metropolitan Theodore, "per meritum ejusdam inobedientiæ," he also was going to France, and perhaps to Rome, when the satellites of Ebroin fell upon him, killed his companion, and left him naked, "errore bono unius syllabæ seducti," says Eddi, who judges of good and evil only as they affect the interests of his hero. — Cf. BEDE, iv. 3, 6.

¹⁷⁴ "Flante Favonio pulsus est." — BEDE, iv. 19. Cf. EDDIUS, p. 25.

Meantime Ebroïn was on the watch, with no inclination to let the rich prey of which he had been informed escape from him. Having heard of Wilfrid's residence in Friesland, he sent messengers to the king with very friendly letters, in which he promised him by oath a bushel of gold coins if he would send him Bishop Wilfrid alive, or even his head. Adalgisus had all the repugnance to secrecy which had been noticed by Tacitus among the princes of Germanic race, who love to discuss their affairs at feasts, since at such a moment the heart is most frank and open, most prone to generous impulses, and least apt to dissimulate.¹⁷⁶ The King of the Frisians accordingly collected all his people at a great banquet, together with his different guests; on the one side the emissaries of Ebroïn, on the other Wilfrid and his followers, amongst whom was Eddi, who has described the scene. After the banquet, he caused the letter of the powerful minister of the Franks to be read aloud. When this was finished he took the letter, tore it up, and threw the pieces into the fire, saying to those who had brought it, "Go and tell your master what you have seen, and add that I have said, 'Thus may the Creator tear, destroy, and consume the perjurer and traitor!'"¹⁷⁷ It is evident that chivalry was just bursting from the bud

Generosity of the King of the Frisians.

¹⁷⁵ "Doctrina ejus secundum paganos bene adjuvavit, erat enim in adventu eorum eo tempore solito amplius in piscatione et in omnibus frugifer annus." — EDDIUS, c. 25.

¹⁷⁶ "Plerumque in conviviis consultant: tanquam nullo magis tempore aut ad simplices cogitationes pateat animus, aut ad magnas incalescat. . . . Deliberant dum fingere nesciunt." — De Moribus Germaniæ, c. 22.

¹⁷⁷ "Modium plenum solidorum aureorum. . . . Rex, præsentibus nobis, et nuntiis coram populo suo in palatio epulantibus, omnibusque audientibus. . . . Enuntiate domino vestro hoc modo me dicentem: Sic rerum Creator regnum et vitam in Deo suo perjurantes, factumque nullum non custodientes sciens destruat, et consumens in favillam devellat!" — EDDIUS, c. 26.

among these new Christians. Wilfrid, however, could only stay to reap a first and rapid harvest. He had left in his monastery at Ripon a young Northumbrian, brought to him in infancy by his mother, whom he had carefully educated for thirteen years. And it was for this child, a faithful disciple of the great exile, since venerated by the Churches of England and Germany under the name of Willebrord, that God reserved the glory of bringing permanently into the ranks of Christianity this warlike nation.¹⁷⁸

679.

Wilfrid in Austrasia.

Wilfrid resumed his journey towards Rome in spring, crossing Austrasia where the throne was occupied by a prince who had occasion to know the generous hospitality of the Abbot of Ripon. This was Dagobert II., grandson of the first king of that name, who, dethroned in infancy by Grimoald, mayor of the palace, was sent secretly to Ireland, where he found refuge in a monastery; but when in 673 the Austrasian nobles determined to escape the yoke of Ebroïn, who was already master of Neustria and Burgundy, they recalled the tonsured prince whose brilliant youth, according to travelers, blossomed in a Hibernian cloister. It was to Wilfrid that they addressed themselves for the restoration of the royal exile; and it was Wilfrid who, after having magnificently received and entertained him at Ripon, sent him on his way to Austrasia with large presents and a great escort.⁶⁷⁹ Dagobert showed his gratitude not only by giving him an affectionate reception, but by his entreaties to Wilfrid to accept the bishopric of Strasbourg, then vacant, and the most important in the kingdom.

656.

Where he refuses the bishopric of Strasbourg.

Wilfrid, however, refused, and pursuing his route, arrived in Lombardy, where he was most hospitably received by Berchtaire, king of that country.¹⁸⁰ There, also, he had been anticipated by the enmity of his countrymen, and once more the great bishop owed his life to the honor and good faith of a barbarian, but already Christian, prince. He said to Wilfrid, "Your enemies have sent to me from England, with promises of great presents if I will prevent you by violence from proceeding to Rome; for they treat you as a fugitive bishop. I have replied to them thus: 'I was myself exiled from my country in my youth, and lived with a king of the Avares, who was a pagan, and who swore before his idol not to deliver me up to my enemies. Some time afterwards they sent to offer this pagan king a bushel of gold if he would give me up to them. He refused, saying that his gods would break the thread of his life if he broke his oath. With better reason I, who know the true God, will not lose my soul were it to gain the whole world.'"¹⁸¹ Having said this he gave Wilfrid and his people an honorable escort which guarded them all the way to Rome.

¹⁷⁸ Wilfrid always maintained his connection with Friesland. A curious story, told by Bede (iii. 13), which describes the veneration of their national saint, King Oswald, introduced by the Northumbrian missionaries, seems to indicate that Wilfrid himself visited the country a second time in one of his later voyages with Willebrord and his successor Acca. M. Albertingk Thym, in his recent and curious account of St. Willebrord, does not resolve this question. But the Bollandists (vol. vi. Sept., p. 68) decide that Wilfrid, in returning from Rome twenty years after his second voyage, passed through Friesland, and that he may then have been accompanied by Willebrord and Acca. Fourteen years after his first stay in Friesland in 692, it was to Wilfrid that they sent Bishop Swidbert, another Saxon missionary, to be consecrated. — BEDE, v. 11.

¹⁷⁹ "Amici et propinqui ejus viventem et in perfecta ætate florentem a navigantibus audientes, misere nuntios ad B. Wilfridum, petentes ut eum de Scotia et Hibernia ad se invitasset et sibi ad regem emisisset." — EDDIUS, c. 27.

The King of the Lombards refuses the offers of his enemies.

Thus on the north and south of that mass of Germanic nations just touched by Christianity, there flashed out at Wilfrid's touch sparks of that generous loyalty which afterwards developed into Christian honor, and the lofty ideal, ever inaccessible yet ever desired and pursued, of chivalry. Wilfrid may be congratulated on having been one of the first to awaken in the history of our forefathers the premonitory signs of this magnificent dawn.

At the moment when Wilfrid arrived at Rome for the second time — returning persecuted but famous to the city which he had left twenty years before obscure and unknown — the chair of St. Peter was occupied by a Sicilian monk named Agathon: since the time of St. Gregory the Great, all the monasteries of Italy and Sicily followed the rule of St. Benedict, and, consequently, we cannot doubt that he was a Benedictine. Accordingly it was natural that he should be favorably disposed towards the Bishop of York, in whom he found at once the propagator of Benedictine rule and the champion of Ro-

Wilfrid at Rome. 679.

The Pope Agathon a monk.

¹⁸⁰ It is apparent from the introduction to the text of Eddi published by Mabillon, that the latter and Adrian de Valois take this to prove that the country described by Eddi as Campania was no other than Lombardy.

¹⁸¹ "Fui aliquando in die juventutis meæ exsul de patria expulsus, sub pagano quodam rege . . . qui inivit mecum fedus in deo suo idolo. . . . Ego quanto magis, qui Deum meum scio, animam meam pro totius mundi lucro in perditionem non dabo." — EDDIUS, c. 27.

man authority. But he also showed great consideration for Wilfrid's antagonist, Archbishop Theodore, whom he had just summoned to Rome by a special envoy, for the council convoked against the Monothelite heresy. Theodore did not obey the summons of the Pope, but he sent a very exemplary monk named Coënwald with letters full of violent accusations against Wilfrid.¹⁸² Messengers charged with a similar commission arrived from the Abbess of Whitby, St. Hilda, still embittered against him who had won the day in the great struggle carried on in the very bosom of her monastery fifteen years before. This singular intervention of the great abbess, which is recorded and proved by a pontifical rescript a quarter of a century after the event,¹⁸³ shows at once the great place she held in the English Church, and the intensity of her resentment against Wilfrid.

Wilfrid's
cause is judged by council at which the Pope presides.

The Pope confided the judgment of the affair to an assembly of fifty bishops and priests collected in the Basilica of the Saviour, at which he himself presided. The companion of Wilfrid has left us a kind of official account of the last session of this assembly, which shows, under the profusion of superlatives then used in all the documents of the Roman Court,¹⁸⁴ an indulgent sympathy for both the rivals, together with the moderation and impartiality natural to the Head of the Church.

The cardinal-bishops of Ostia and Porto made a report to this assembly, equally founded upon the memorials sent by Theodore and others, in which Wilfrid was spoken of as a fugitive bishop, and on those which Wilfrid himself produced for his defence. They concluded thus:—"All being considered, we do not find him convicted canonically of any crime which merits deposition: on the contrary, we perceive that he has preserved great moderation, and has excited no sedition by which to regain his position. He has contented himself with protesting in presence of the other bishops his brethren, and has then had recourse to the Holy See, where Christ, who purchased the Holy Church by His blood, has founded the primacy of the priesthood." The pope then said, "Wilfrid, Bishop of York, is at the door of the hall of our secret deliberations with his petition—let him enter." The bishop being introduced, begged that his prayer should be again read in full assembly. It was expressed in terms equally able and touching: "I, Wilfrid, the humble and unworthy Bishop of the Saxons, have taken refuge here as in an impregnable fortress. I have climbed, by the grace of God, to this apostolic summit, from whence flows to all the Churches of Christ the rule of the holy canonical law; and I have a hope that justice will here be rendered to my humbleness. I have already explained, viva voce and in writing, how, without being convicted of any fault, I have been expelled from the diocese which I have governed for ten years; and how they have put in my place, not one bishop only, but three bishops, contrary to the canons. I do not dare to accuse the most holy Archbishop Theodore, because he has been sent by the Church. I submit myself here to your apostolic judgment. If you decide that I am no longer worthy to be a bishop, I humbly accept the sentence; if I am to reclaim my bishopric, I shall obey equally. I implore you only to expel, by the authority of this council, the usurpers of my diocese. If the archbishop, and the bishops my brethren, see fit to augment the number of bishops, let them choose such as I can live amicably with, and let them be elected with the consent of a council, and taken from the clergy of their future dioceses, so that the Church may not be ruled from without and by strangers. At the same time, confiding absolutely in apostolic justice, I shall obey implicitly its decrees."

¹⁸² "Modestæ religionis monachus. . . . Accusationes scriptas deferens et amaritudine delationis verbis immitibus." — GUILL. MALMESB., f. 149.

¹⁸³ See the letter of Pope John VI. quoted by Eddius (c. 51), written to the Kings of Northumbria and Mercia in 705.

¹⁸⁴ The Pope is always described as "sanctissimus et ter beatissimus," and Theodore as "sanctissimus;" Wilfrid is only named with the epithet "Deo amabilis." The violent Eddi himself is won by this example, and while he transcribes this document he treats Theodore as a saint, and his envoy Coënwald as "religiosus monachus."

After this speech, the Pope congratulated Wilfrid on his moderation and humility. Then the council decreed that Wilfrid should be restored to his see; that those who had replaced him should be expelled; but that the archbishop should ordain bishops with the title of coadjutors, bishops chosen by Wilfrid himself in a council assembled for that purpose. All this was commanded under pain of interdict, deposition, and anathema, against whosoever might oppose this decree, whether bishop, priest, deacon, monk, layman, or even king.¹⁸⁵

¹⁸⁵ "Agatho . . . dicit: 'Wilfridus Deo amabilis episcopus . . . præforibus nostri secretarii moratus, ad nostrum secretarium juxta suam postulationem cum petitione, quam secum adfere licitus est, ammittatur.' Wilfridus . . . dixit: 'Deprecor vestram pontificalem Beatitudinem ut mea

This sentence was a most wise and legitimate decision; for, while giving full satisfaction to that justice which had been outraged in the person of Wilfrid, it enforced, on the terms he had himself accepted, the evidently reasonable principle of the division of his overgrown diocese.

Besides this, the same assembly, probably in the same session, rendered full justice to the apostolic zeal of Archbishop Theodore, by prescribing a new arrangement of bishoprics, so that the metropolitan might have twelve suffragans, canonically elected and ordained, of whom none should interfere with the rights of his neighbor. It also sanctioned the prohibitions decreed by the archbishop, who forbade ecclesiastics to bear arms, and to mingle in secular amusements with female musicians and other profane persons. Finally, the Pope and the council charged Theodore to complete the work of St. Gregory and St. Augustin, by convoking an assembly, wherein the kings, princes, nobles, and leaders of the country might confer with the prelates, and where they could provide for the exact observance of apostolic rules. It was also recommended to him to hold assemblies of this kind as frequently as possible, in order to provide, in concert with the faithful and the wisest men of the kingdom, for those measures most advantageous to the Church and people of God.¹⁸⁶ humilitatis petitionem excipi coramque relegi præcipiatis. . . . Quid acciderit ut Theodorus sanctissimus me superstite in sedem quam . . . dispensabam . . . ordinaret episcopos, omittere magis quam flagitare pro ejus Dei viri reverentia concedet; quem eo quod ab hac apostolica sede directus est, accusare non audeo.' . . . Si placuerit archiepiscopo et coepiscopis meis ut augeatur numerus episcoporum, tales eligant de ipso clero Ecclesiæ, quales in synodo placeat congregatis episcopis, ut non a foris et alienis dominetur Ecclesia. . . . Si quis proinde contra horum statutorum synodaliū decreta ausu temerario obsistere tentaverit . . . ex auctoritate B. Petri . . . eum hac sanctione percellendum censemus, ut, si episcopus est . . . sed ab episcopali ordine destitutus, et æterni anathematis reus; similiter si presbyter . . . si vero clericus, monachus vel laicus cujuslibet ditionis, vel rex: extraneus efficiatur et corpore et sanguine Christi: nec terribilem ejus adventum dignus appareat conspiciere." — EDDIUS, c. 28, 30. It will be seen that this decree of the council does not repeat, with regard to kings and other powerful lay personages, the threat of deposition, together with excommunication, contained in the celebrated diploma of St. Gregory the Great cited above, vol. i. p. 382.

¹⁸⁶ "Armīs non utantur, nec citharedas habeant, vel quæcumque symphonia, nec quoscunque jocos vel ludos ante se permittent. . . . Ut ipse . . . cum universis præsulibus, regibus, principibus, universis fidelibus, senioribus, majoribusque natu totius Saxonix, publicam œcumenicamque faciant synodum. . . . Ut quidquid sanctus Theodorus cum sapientibus et fidelibus et viris religiosis in Anglorum provinciis, totis ecclesiis et universo populo Dei ibidem positus profuturum melius ac religiosius invenire potuissent . . . laborare atque transcribere." — Concilia, ed. COLETTI, t. vii. p. 603. The

Wilfrid made no haste to quit Rome, after having obtained justice. He remained there several months, and occupied himself among other matters in obtaining pontifical charters for two English monasteries which, though situated beyond the limits of his diocese, lay very near his heart — those of Peterborough and Ely. He had just succeeded in respect to Ely, and expected to carry back a deed of privilege such as the Abbess Etheldreda had requested of him, when he received news of the death of this sainted queen, whose friend and spiritual father he had been, and whose supernatural resolution had been the first cause of his pilgrimage as an exile and accused man to Rome. Probably of all the Christian souls of his own country, hers was the one most tenderly and closely united to his. All that he had suffered through her, and in her cause, must have rendered her peculiarly dear to his generous heart. Etheldreda died young, a victim to one of the contagious diseases which were then so frequent. She had predicted her own death, as well as the number of those brothers and sisters of her community who would follow her to the grave. Three days before her death she was obliged to submit to a painful operation in the throat; she rejoiced at it. “God,” she said, “has sent me this suffering to expiate the frivolity of my youth, the time when I remember to have worn with so much pleasure necklaces of pearls and gold on this neck now so swollen and burned by illness.” At the last moment, surrounded by the brothers and sisters of her numerous community in tears, she spoke to them at length, imploring them never to let their hearts rest on the earth, but to taste beforehand, by their earnest desires, that joy in the love of Christ which it would not be given to them to know perfectly here below.¹⁸⁷ She

Wilfrid receives at Rome intelligence of the death of Etheldreda.

23d June, 679.

Bollandists (vol. vi. Sept., p. 69), contrary to the opinion of P. Pagi and the editors of the Collections of Councils, believe that the council where Pope Agathon gave the decrees relative to Archbishop Theodore was distinct from that which did justice to Wilfrid a year later. While accepting their chronology, we do not think that their arguments ought to prevail against the ancient opinion, founded on the text of the Acts themselves.

¹⁸⁷ “Scio certissime quia merito in collo pondus languoris porto, in quo juveneculam me meminini supervacua monilium pondera portare: et credo quod ideo me suprema pietas dolore colli voluit gravari, ut sic absolver reatu supervacue levitatis: dum mihi nunc, pro auro et margaritis, de collo rubor tumoris ardorque promineat.” — BEDE, iv. 19. “Monens eas ut animum de supernis nunquam deponerent et suavem cibum celestis jucunditatis in Christi amore suspirando gustarent, quem adhuc in carne agentes perfecte apprehendisse non poterant.” — THOM. ELIENSIS, c. 21.

carefully directed that they should bury her, not in a stone vault like a queen, but in a wooden coffin, and among the simple nuns.¹⁸⁸

27th March,
680.

He assists at the council against the Monothelites.

The death of Etheldreda must have saddened Wilfrid's stay at Rome, where, however, he was still treated with confidence and distinction by the Pope. He was amitted to the council of one hundred and twenty-five bishops assembled under the presidency of Agathon, to name deputies for the sixth general council which was about to be held at Constantinople for the condemnation of the Monothelite heresy, a heresy which recognized but one single will in the Son of God made man. For half a century this heresy had troubled the Church; it had been adopted by various Byzantine emperors, and had thirty years before led the holy Pope, Martin I., to the most painful of martyrdoms. In the synodical letter which these hundred and twenty bishops, chiefly Italians, wrote to the emperors, in the name of all the provinces of the West, is found this passage: "You have ordered us to send you wise and virtuous ambassadors. There is no secular eloquence among us. Our lands are desolated by the fury of contending races; there is nothing but battles, inroads, and pillage. In the midst of these barbarians, our life is full of anguish; we live by the labor of our hands, for the ancient patrimony of the Church has been, little by little, devoured by various calamities. Our faith is the only patrimony which remains to us; to live for it is our glory; to die for it our eternal advantage." After having described the catholic and apostolic faith, held by all under the terms defined by the Holy See, they add: "We are late in replying to your appeal, because many of us live far away, and even ¹⁸⁸ In spite of these directions, sixteen years after her death, in 695, her sister, who had succeeded her as Abbess of Ely, wished to place her in a mausoleum of white marble, richly carved, which she took from the ruins of the Roman city of Grandchester, near Cambridge. On this occasion it was seen that her body had preserved all its freshness; she seemed to sleep; the surgeon who had opened the tumor in her neck, and who was present at this exhumation, recognized the wound he had made: "Pro aperto et hianti vulnere cum quo sepulta erat, tenuissima cicatricis vestigia parerent." This miraculous preservation appeared to all a decisive proof of the incorruptible virginity which she had guarded throughout her life, even to Bede, who celebrated the translation of the saint's body in an elegy which he has inserted in his History, and in which classic recollections are mingled with those of the martyrology to honor the Anglo-Saxon queen:—

"Bello Mars resonet, nos pacis dona canamus;
Carmina casta mihi, fœdæ non raptus Helenæ;
Dona superna loquar, miseræ non prælia Trojæ."

on the coasts of the great Ocean. We had hoped that our colleague and co-servitor Theodore, archbishop and philosopher of the great island of Britain, would come with the bishops of his country, as well as of yours and of other places, so that we might write to you in the name of our whole council, and that all may be informed of what takes place, for many of our brethren are in the midst of barbarous nations, Lombards, Slavonians, Goths, and Britons, all very curious touching the faith, and who being all agreed with us as to the faith, would become our enemies if we gave them any subject of scandal.”¹⁸⁹

This letter, signed by the Pope and the hundred and twenty-five bishops, was signed also by Wilfrid as representative at the council of the British bishops,¹⁹⁰ although those bishops had given him no commission on the subject; but he felt himself authorized to bear this witness to the faith of the British Church. His confidence was the better justified, since in the same year Archbishop Theodore held a national council at Hatfield, where all the bishops of England made their solemn profession of faith, and declared that they received the four general councils and the council of Pope Martin against the Monothelites.¹⁹¹ It seems even that Wilfrid undertook to guarantee not only the faith of the Anglo-Saxon bishops, but also of all the Churches scattered in the north of Great Britain and in Ireland, among the Scots and Picts. Thus the Celtic Christians, whom he had so persecuted and opposed as to peculiar rites, inspired him with no doubt as to their unity of belief on all points which related to the faith; and he did not hesitate to answer for them before the Pope and the universal church.¹⁹²

17th Sept.,
680.

He declares strongly in favor of all the Churches of the British Isles.

¹⁸⁹ “Sola est nostra substantia fides nostra: cum qua nobis vivere summa gloria est; pro qua mori lucrum æternum est. . . . Sperabamus de Britannia Theodorum confamilum et coepiscopum nostrum, magnæ insulæ Britannæ archiepiscopum et philosophum . . . exinde ad nostram humilitatem conjungere.” — Concilia, ed. COLETTI, t. vii. p. 707, 714.

¹⁹⁰ “Ego Wilfridus, humilis episcopus sanctæ Ecclesiæ Eboracenæ insulæ Britannia, legatus venerabilis synodi per Britanniam constitutæ, in hanc suggestionem quam pro apostolica nostra fide unanimiter construximus, similiter subscripsi.” — Cf. GUILL. MALMESB., f. 150. FLEURY, Hist. Ecclésiast., l. xl. c. 6, 7.

¹⁹¹ BEDE, iv. 17.

¹⁹² This is the result of another signature of his, different from that which we have quoted, though given in the same council, appealed to by him, and admitted by Pope John VI. twenty-five years later. It is thus expressed: “Ego Wilfridus . . . cum aliis cxxv. episcopis in synodo in judicii sede constitutus, et pro omni aquilonali parte, Britannia et Hibernia insulis quæ

Wilfrid returns to England.

When Wilfrid at last made up his mind to return to England, new dangers met him on the way. He expected to meet again his friend and host, King Dagobert, in Austrasia, but that prince had just fallen a victim to a plot fomented by Ebroïn, one of whose creatures, an unhappy bishop,¹⁹³ lay in wait for the great Anglo-Saxon with a band of armed men, with the intention of robbing him, killing or selling into slavery all his companions, and delivering him to the implacable Ebroïn. This bishop reproached Wilfrid with having sent back from exile the tyrant Dagobert, from whom they had just freed themselves. "I only did," said Wilfrid, "what you yourselves would have done if an exile of our race and of royal blood had come to you to seek an asylum." "You are more just than I am," replied the bishop; "pass on your way, and may God and St. Peter be your aid!"¹⁹⁴

He brings to Peterborough
the charter of Pope
Agathon.

When Wilfrid arrived in England, his first step before proceeding to his diocese in Mercia was to give to King Ethelred the charter he had obtained from the Pope, with the sanction of the hundred and twenty-five bishops of the council at Rome, in favor of the great abbey of that kingdom and of central England at Peterborough, the foundation of which he had approved fifteen years before, and to which he now put the final crown. The deed of Pope Agathon, addressed to the King of Mercia, to Archbishop Theodore, and to Bishop Sexwulf, who had been the first abbot of the Burg of St. Peter, conferred on the monastery an exemption from all ordinary charges and jurisdiction. In this document the king was recommended to be the defender of the community, but never its tyrant; the diocesan bishop to regard the abbot as his assistant in the evangelical ministry; the metropolitan to ordain in his own person the abbot elected by the community. This charter was sanctioned and signed by the King, the Queen, Archbishop Theodore, and his friend Abbot Adrian; and finally by Wilfrid himself, with this formula, "I, Wilfrid, on my way to reclaim, by apostolical favor, my ab Anglorum et Britonum, nec non Scotorum et Pictorum gentibus incolantur, veram et catholicam fidem confessus est, et cum subscriptione sua confirmavit." — BEDE, v. 19. EDDIUS, c. 50.

¹⁹³ Mabillon thinks this was Waïmer, Duke of Champagne, made Bishop of Troyes by Ebroïn, to reward his services against St. Leger.

¹⁹⁴ "O rectissime episcope, quid aliud habuisti facere, si exsul de genere nostro. . . . Video te justiorem me esse." — EDDIUS, c. 31.

see of York, being witness and bearer of this decree, I agree to it."¹⁹⁵

But the confidence which Wilfrid thus expressed was singularly misplaced. We now reach the most strange incident of all his stormy life. Having returned to Northumbria, conformably to the instructions of the Pope and the bishop, he humbly presented to King Egfrid, who had expelled him, that which he regarded as the standard of victory, namely, the decree of the Holy See and council of Rome, with the seals and signatures of all the bishops. The king convoked the assembly of nobles and clergy, and caused the pontifical letters to be read in their presence. Upon this there arose an ardent opposition. The authority of the Pope or the council was not disputed, but there were cries on all sides that the judgment had been bought. By the advice of the whole council, and with the express consent of the intruded bishops, the king condemned Wilfrid to an ignominious imprisonment of nine months. He was at once taken prisoner; nothing was left to him but the clothing he wore; his servants and adherents were dispersed, and his friends strictly forbidden to visit him. Queen Ermenburga, his old and pitiless enemy, took from his Chrismarium or reliquary which he wore round his neck, and took possession of it, having it always hung in her chamber or in her carriage when she travelled, either as a trophy of her victory or from that sincere but savage devotion which at times took such strange forms, and was the cause of such dishonest actions. This done, the noble Bishop was confided to one of the king's officers, Count Osfrid, who removed him so that none of his friends might know where he was, and shut him up in a cell which during the day was scarcely penetrated by a few feeble rays of light, and where at night he was not permitted to have a lamp.¹⁹⁶

Wilfrid is repelled by the king and the assembly of the Northumbrians.

He is imprisoned.

¹⁹⁵ "Ego Wilfridus, apostolico favore repetens sedem Eboracensem, testis et relator hujus sanctionis votivæ assentior." I follow the text given by Dugdale (i. 67), which P. Pagi considers free from the interpolations and anachronisms of that found in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (anno 680); the Bollandists, however, regard it as tainted with error.

¹⁹⁶ "Vexillum victoriæ ferens, hoc est, apostolicæ sedis judicium . . . cum bullis et sigillis signatis. . . . Omnibus principibus ibidem habitantibus, nec non servis Dei in locum synodalem accersitis. . . . Jussione regis et ejus consiliatorum, cum consensu episcoporum qui ejus episcopatum tenebant . . . novem menses sine ullo honore custodire censuerunt . . . in suo solo vestimento. . . . Regina chrismarium hominis Dei reliquiis plenum (quod me enarrantem horruit) de se abstractum, in thalamo suo manens,

It is comprehensible that a barbarous Saxon king, full of pride and cupidity, and a passionate and angry woman, should give themselves up to such excesses against a bishop whose wealth, power, moral influence, and fearless character, excited their jealousy. But what was St. Theodore doing meanwhile? He, so eager, three years before, to make himself the instrument of the King of Northumbria's violent deeds, where was he now when the repairing of his error was in question? He, the metropolitan and chief of the Anglo-Saxon bishops, how could he suffer the episcopal dignity to be outraged in the person of the most illustrious of his brethren? He, the veteran monk, so zealous for the traditions and privileges of his order, how could he yield to the violence of laymen or to the jealousy of the Celts the most ardent propagator of the Benedictine rule? He, the envoy and direct representative of the Holy See in England, how dared he condemn that pontifical decision which Wilfrid had been charged to signify to him? Above all, how dared he brave the anathemas which the decree of the council directed against all traitors, whatever their rank?¹⁹⁷ On these questions, history, so abundant in other details, keeps entire silence; she leaves us no other resource than to look for future repentance and expiation for so shameful a connivance at sin.¹⁹⁸

After a while King Egfrid resolved to treat with his captive. He offered to restore to him a part of his bishopric, with many gifts added to it, if Wilfrid would acquiesce in his will, and acknowledge the falsity of the apostolic decree. Wilfrid replied that it would be easier to take his head than to tear such a confession from him. When he was cast back into his cell, he there gave an example of patience and courage truly episcopal. The guards heard him chanting the psalms as if he were in his monastic stall at Ripon or Hexham; at night they saw his prison illumined by a light which terrified them. The wife of Earl Osfrid having fallen dangerously ill, her husband had recourse to the holy man whom he had been appointed to guard; he took him out of prison and led him to the bedside of the invalid. The latter, at an after period and when she aut curru pergens juxta se pependit. . . . Comes . . . in latebrosis locis ubi raro sol per diem inluxit, et lampas per horrorem noctis non accenditur."

¹⁹⁷ "Si quidem episcopus est, qui hanc piam dispositionem temerare tentaverit, sit ab episcopali ordine destitutus, et æterni anathematis reus."

¹⁹⁸ BOLLAND., l. c., p. 62.

had herself become an abbess, often related to her new family, with tears of gratitude, that the prisoner found her in the last stupor of departing life, yet that a few drops of holy water cast on her face, with prayer, were sufficient to cure her. Osfrid, penetrated with gratitude and admiration, quickly informed the king of what had happened. "I conjure you," said the brave Saxon, "both for your own welfare and for mine, no longer to persecute this holy and innocent bishop; as for me, I would rather die than continue this jailer's trade."¹⁹⁹ Far from listening to him, the king took from him the guardianship of the captive, who was sent to a castle still more remote, near Dunbar, on the shore of the Scottish sea, where he was intrusted to another earl much more harsh than Osfrid, with orders to keep him strictly isolated in his prison, and to put him in irons. But they were never able, Eddi tells us, to make these of the right size; they were always either too large or too small to confine the hands and feet of the prisoner.

He is transferred to Dunbar.

While Wilfrid thus paid the price of his glory and his courage, the king and queen made a triumphant progress through the very country where he was held prisoner. In the course of this tour, they arrived at the Monastery of Coldingham, on the seashore, not far from Dunbar, and half way between the prison and the holy island of Lindisfarne. In this great establishment, where Etheldreda had first taken refuge, two communities, one of men and one of women, obeyed the Abbess Ebba, sister of Oswy, and aunt of Egfrid. Like Hilda at Whitby, Ebba exercised at Coldingham, with great wisdom and authority, that sort of rule at once spiritual and temporal which was the inheritance of more than one Anglo-Saxon princess; but far from being, like Hilda, the enemy of Wilfrid, she became his liberator. During the night which the royal couple passed at the monastery, Queen Ermenburga was seized with an attack of delirium; in the morning the abbess appeared, and as the queen, whose limbs were already contracted, seemed at the point of death, Ebba, with the double authority of a cloistered superior and of a princess of the race of Odin, said to her nephew, "I know all that you have done; you have superseded Bishop Wilfrid without having a crime to Delivered by the intervention of the prin-

¹⁹⁹ "Adhuc vivens illa, nunc sanctimonialis materfamilias, nomine Æbba, cum lacrymis hoc narrare consuevit. . . . Adjuro te per vitam meam et salutem tuam . . . quia magis eligo mori, quam cum innoxium flagellare." — EDDIUS, c. 35, 36.

cess Ebba,
Abbess of Colding-
ham.

accuse him of; and when he returned from his exile with an apostolic verdict in his favor, you robbed and imprisoned him, foolishly despising the power of St. Peter to bind and to loose. My son, listen to the words of her who speaks to you as a mother. Break the bishop's chains; restore to him the relics which the queen has taken from his neck, and which she carries about with her to her own injury, as the Philistines did the ark of God; and if (as would be best) you will not restore him to his bishopric, at least let him be free to leave your kingdom and go where he will. Then, upon my faith, the queen will recover; if not, I take God to witness, that He will punish you both." ²⁰⁰

Egfrid understood and obeyed: he sent the reliquary to Dunbar, with orders to set the bishop at liberty immediately. Ermenburga recovered, and Wilfrid, having speedily collected some of his numerous friends and disciples, took refuge in Mercia, the king of which country he supposed would be friendly towards him, in consequence of his having brought him from Rome the deed of privilege for Peterborough. But here also his expectations were vain. He had just founded a small monastery for the use of his troop of exiles, when the hatred of his enemies discovered and pursued him. Ethelred, King of Mercia, had married a sister of Egfrid; and the queens, as we see in Saxon history, were often more powerful than the kings, for evil as well as for good. Ethelred, moved by the instigation of his wife, or by fear of displeasing his powerful brother-in-law, signified to his nephew, who had given one of his estates to the persecuted bishop, that he would endanger his head if he kept the enemy of King Egfrid another day in his territory. Wilfrid,

He is, however, compelled to leave Mer-
cia,

therefore, was obliged to leave Mercia, and went into the neighboring kingdom of Wessex. But here the hatred of another queen assailed him. The wife of Centwin, King of the Western Saxons, was the sister of that Ermenburga who had been the first cause of the poor exile's troubles; she had espoused her sister's sex.

And Wes-

quarrel; and again he was obliged to fly from a country in which there was no hospitality for him.

²⁰⁰ "Sapientissima materfamilias veniens ad reginam contractis membris stricte alligatam et sine dubio morientem videns. . . . Ego scio et vere scio. . . . Et nunc, fili mi, secundum consilium matris tue fac, disrumpere vincula ejus et sanctas reliquias quas regina de collo spoliati abstraxit, et in perniciem sui (sicut arcam Dei . . .), dimitte." — EDDIUS, c. 37.

These three brothers-in-law, kept by a common animosity in unwonted union, reigned over the three kingdoms which together occupied three-quarters at least of Saxon England.²⁰¹

Wherever the influence of the Northumbrian king could extend, there was no longer for Wilfrid either security or peace.

Thus pursued by the influence of Ermenburga, her husband, and brothers-in-law, from almost the whole territory of the Saxon Confederation; repelled from Canterbury and its environs by the hostility or indifference of Archbishop Theodore, he took refuge in the smallest and most obscure of the seven kingdoms, and the only one which had not yet been christianized, the kingdom of the Southern Saxons. The asylum which Christian kings refused him he hoped to find among his pagan countrymen. It may perhaps be recollected that he had been in great danger fifteen years before, at the commencement of his episcopate, on his return from his consecration at Compiègne, when wrecked on this inhospitable coast.²⁰² The King of Sussex himself, who was still a pagan like his subjects, had been then the leader of the wreckers. Now the king was a Christian, thanks to his wife, a Mercian princess; but the country continued almost completely inaccessible to Catholic missionaries. This kingdom had furnished to the Heptarchy its first known Bretwalda, Ælla, but since that time had fallen into obscurity, being defended at once against the invasions of its powerful neighbors, and against the efforts of the Canterbury monks, by its rocks and forests, which rendered it difficult of approach,²⁰³ a circumstance which is hardly comprehensible now in sight of that soft and fertile country. The inhabitants held sternly to their ancient faith; they reproached the other Saxons, who were already Christians, with their apostasy. At the same time, they had among them the begin-

He takes refuge with the Saxons
of the South, and converts them to Christianity.
681-683.

²⁰¹ "In eo territorio pro Deo donato monasteriolum fundavit, quod adhuc usque hodie monachi ejus possident. . . . Audientes hominem Dei . . . illic manentem et modicum quiescentem, Beorthvaldo in sua salute interdiciunt, ut sibi eo minus diei spatium esset pro adulatione Egfridi regis. . . . Nam illic regina . . . odio odebat eum, uti propter amicitiam regum trium dehinc fugatus abscessit. . . . Ita ut de propria provincia expulsus, nec in aliena regione, ultra vel citra mare, ubi potestas Egfridi prævaluit, requiem haberet." — EDDIUS, c. 38, 39.

²⁰² See above, p. 336.

²⁰³ "Prærupium multitudine et silvarum densitate . . . inexpugnabilis." — EDDIUS, c. 39.

nings from which, in ordinary cases, the conversion even of the most obstinate was produced — namely, a Christian princess and a monastery. This monastery, however, was occupied only by a small community of Celtic monks, of whom mention has already been made,²⁰⁴ and the people of Sussex gave no heed to their teaching. It was to this new soil that Wilfrid came: he might be driven from his country and from his diocese, but nothing could prevent his being, wherever he was, the minister of the living God, and the preacher of the truth. His first exile had made him the Apostle of the Frisians; his second gave him occasion to open the doors of the Church to the last pagans who remained to be converted in the British Isles. Like Æneas at Carthage, he touched and gained the heart of the king and queen by his story of the cruel trials of his exile. He enlightened and roused their minds; he preached to them with infinite sweetness the greatness and goodness of God; and he obtained permission to address the mass of their people to whom no one had yet dared to carry the word of life.

Thus daily, for many successive months, the prescribed and fugitive bishop stood forth among those unconquered Saxons, and told them all the series of miracles worked by the Divine Power since the creation of the world; he taught them to condemn idols, to believe in a future judgment, to fear eternal punishment, and to desire eternal happiness. His persuasive eloquence triumphed over all obstacles. The chiefs of the nation, the earls and thanes, demanded baptism at his hands; four priests of his followers baptized the rest of the nation; a few, however, resisted; and the king thought himself authorized to compel them to follow the example of their countrymen.²⁰⁵ This melancholy fact must be confessed with regret, and forgiven, in consideration of the age and race, to which violence was so natural and so contagious; but it must be added that this is the sole instance in which force was employed in the whole history of the conversion of the Anglo-Saxons, a work which Wilfrid had the glory of completing by the noble labors of his exile.²⁰⁶

²⁰⁴ Page 301.

²⁰⁵ "Et si propter inimicitias regis in patria sive parochia sua recipi non potuit; non tamen ab evangelizandi potuit ministerio cohiberi . . . concedendo, imo multum gaudente rege primos provinciæ duces ac milites sacrosancto fonte abluebat." — BEDE, iv. 13. "Totius exsilii sui austeritatem per ordinem narravit . . . leniter suadens. . . . Stans episcopus noster in medio gentilium . . . per plures menses longo ambitu verborum . . . suaviloqua eloquentia omnia mirabiliter per ordinem prædicavit . . . paganorum utriusque sexus, quidam voluntarie, alii vero coacti regis imperio . . . in una die multa millia baptizata sunt." — EDDIUS, c. 39.

The God whom he preached to these last pagans permitted his mission to be the channel of other blessings besides the gift of salvation. Before Wilfrid's arrival, a drought of three years' duration had desolated the country, and famine decimated the population. The poor famished creatures might be seen dragging themselves, by forty or fifty at a time, to the edge of the precipitous cliffs on the shore, and thence, holding each other by their emaciated hands, they would plunge together into the sea.²⁰⁷ But on the very day when Wilfrid administered baptism to the chiefs, a soft and abundant rain watered the desolate fields, and restored to all the hope of a plentiful harvest.²⁰⁸ While the cruel famine lasted the bishop had taught his future converts a new means of gaining their subsistence by fishing with nets. Until his arrival, although the waters of the sea and of their rivers abounded with fish, they had been able to catch nothing but eels.²⁰⁹ Wilfrid did not disdain to teach them how to join all their little nets into one large enough to catch the biggest fish. By such services he gradually gained the hearts of those whose souls he wished to save. The King of Sussex was as grateful as his people. He proved it by giving to the apostle of his country, for a residence during his exile, the domain on which he himself lived, and which supported eighty-seven families — that is to say, was, according to Saxon calculations, capable of feeding that number of mouths, and consequently quite sufficient for the train of monks and other Northumbrians who followed the exile in his wanderings. This estate formed a peninsula, which was called Seal's Island. Here Wilfrid founded a monastery, which afterwards became the seat of the most southern diocese of

He teaches them the art of fishing with nets.

Foundation of Selsey.

²⁰⁶ Bede says nothing of this use of force which contrasted too strongly with the conduct he had so much praised in the first Christian King of Kent (i. 26); but, unhappily, we must believe the testimony of Eddi, who, if not actually with Wilfrid on his mission to Sussex, as at other places, must yet have known better than any one else exactly what passed there.

²⁰⁷ "Sæpe quadraginta simul aut quinquaginta . . . procederent ad præcipitium . . . et junctis misere manibus, pariter omnes aut ruina perituri aut fluctibus absorbendi deciderent."

²⁰⁸ "Ipso die . . . pluvia serena sed copiosa descendit, refluuit terra, rediitque viridantibus arvis annus lætus et frugifer." — BEDE, iv. 13.

²⁰⁹ "Docuit eos piscando victum quærere. Piscandi peritia genti nulla nisi ad anguillas tantum inerat. . . . Collectis undecumque retibus anguillaribus." — BEDE, iv. 13.

England,²¹⁰ and which he filled, half with monks who had come with him from the north, and half with novices taken from the converts of the south. These monks soon united in celebrating, among the other festivals of the Catholic liturgy, the feast of St. Oswald, the king who died fighting for the Christian faith and the independence of Northumbria, some years after the birth of Wilfrid; and this particular shows us how the unity of faith and associations consecrated by the new religion prepared the way for the social and political union of the different races of Great Britain.²¹¹

Wilfrid found on his new possessions two hundred and fifty slaves of both sexes, whom he not only delivered from the yoke of Satan by baptizing them, but also from that of men by setting them free.²¹² It was thus that the monastic apostles sowed from a full hand, in England as elsewhere, bread for the soul and for the body, salvation and freedom.

681-686.

Five years thus passed over Wilfrid, in his laborious but fruitful exile, of which the conversion of the Southern Saxons was not the only consolation. While the proscribed bishop reconstituted a centre of monastic life and Christian evangelism in his peninsula of Selsey, the forests of Sussex gave asylum to a whole band of other exiles, of whom the chief was a young prince of the Western Saxons named Ceadwalla, who had been banished from Wessex by the same king who, acting on the suggestion of his wife, expelled Wilfrid. The similarity of their fortunes united the two fugitives, though the western prince was still a pagan. Wilfrid, who seems never to have feared a danger, or refused to do a service, procured horses and money for Ceadwalla. The exiled prince, whose impetuosity and boldness were only surpassed by his cruelty, seized, one after the other, the two kingdoms of Wessex and Sussex, laid waste the kingdom of Kent, and ended by conquering the Isle of Wight. This picturesque island, so much admired by modern travellers, and which lies between the two districts occupied by the Saxons of the West and South, was inhabited by twelve hundred pagan families of the tribe of the Jutes, a race which first of all the German invaders had landed upon the coast of Kent. The ferocious Ceadwalla slaughtered them all, to avenge the wounds he had received in attacking them. But his mind was pervaded by a vague instinct of religion such as he had seen in Wilfrid, although he had not been moved to adopt it. Before he invaded the island he made a vow that, if victorious, he would give a quarter of his booty to the God of Wilfrid, and he kept his word by granting to the bishop a quarter of the conquered and depopulated island. He even carried his cruel condescension so far as to permit the monks to instruct and baptize two young brothers of the chief of the island before cutting them down in the general massacre. And the two young victims marched to death with so joyous a confidence, that the popular veneration long counted them among the martyrs of the new faith. This savage, as soon as he returned to Wessex, summoned Wilfrid thither, treated him as his father and friend, and put himself definitely under instruction. But as soon as he understood, thanks to the teaching of Wilfrid, what religion and the Church meant, he found baptism by Bishop Wilfrid insufficient, and it will be hereafter seen that he went to Rome, as much to expiate his crimes by a laborious pilgrimage, as to receive baptism at the hands of the Pope.

Relations of Wilfrid with Ceadwalla, an exile like himself,

And who becomes King of Wessex.

²¹⁰ "Donavit terram octoginta septem familiarum ubi suos homines qui exules vagabantur. . . . Vocabulo Selo-seu," afterwards called Selsey, created a bishopric in 711, and transferred to Chichester in 1070.

²¹¹ "Ex hoc tempore non solum in eodem monasterio, sed in plerisque locis aliis, cœpit annuatim ejusdem regis ac militis Christi natalitias dies missarum celebratione venerari." — BEDE, iv. 14.

²¹² "Servos et ancillas . . . quos omnes, non solum baptizando a servitute dæmoniaca salvavit, sed etiam libertatem donando humanæ jugo servitutis absolvit." — BEDE, l. c.

He gives Wilfrid a fourth part of the Isle of Wight.

21st Aug., 686.

Although the report of Wilfrid's fresh apostolic conquests, and of his relations with the kings of the provinces nearest the metropolis of Canterbury, must certainly have reached the ears of Archbishop Theodore, the conduct of that prelate towards him continued inexplicable. In spite of the decrees of the Holy See, he held at Twyford, in Northumbria, a council, where, with the consent of King Egfrid, he disposed of the episcopal sees of Hexham and Lindisfarne, exactly as if these dioceses had not been parts of that of York, or as if Wilfrid had been dead or canonically deposed.²¹³ The first bishop thus placed by Theodore at Hexham, a see created in the very monastery built and endowed by Wilfrid, was an admirable monk, named Cuthbert, whose virtues and sanctity had long been celebrated in Northumbria; and, what is stranger still, nothing in the fully detailed life of this saint which has been preserved to us, shows that his repugnance to be made bishop had any connection with the manifest violation of the rights of him whose place he was called upon to usurp. All that he desired was to be transferred from Hexham to Lindisfarne — that is to say, to the episcopal monastery where he had been educated, and in which, or in one of its dependencies, he had always lived. He evidently believed that the metropolitan supremacy of Theodore was without limit, and dispensed him from following the canons of the Church.

Theodore disposes anew of the diocese of Wilfrid. 684.

²¹³ BEDE, iv. 28; BOLLAND, t. vi. Sept., p. 64.

King Egfrid professed the most affectionate devotion to Cuthbert; but this need not astonish us.

The persecutor of Wilfrid was far from being the enemy of the Church or of the monastic order. He was, on the contrary, the founder and benefactor of many of the great monasteries of the north of England, and the friend of all the saints of his time, except Wilfrid alone; and it seems to have been his wish to transfer to Cuthbert the confiding affection and respectful deference with which he had treated Wilfrid in the early part of his reign. Ermenburga, the cruel enemy of Wilfrid, was, like her husband, filled with the most ardent veneration for the holy monk, who had become one of the successors of her victim. But this devotion did not prevent Egfrid from giving himself up to ambition, and indulging in a thirst for war and conquest too much conformed to the traditions of his ancestors and pagan predecessors, “the ravages Ireland,

Cruelly
684,

Ravager,” and “the Man of Fire.”²¹⁴ In 684, without any known motive, he sent an army against Ireland, which devastated that island with pitiless cruelty. This invasion is the first of the unexpiated national crimes of the Anglo-Saxons against Ireland. It excited the indignation, not only of the victims, but also of the witnesses of its barbarity. The venerable Bede himself, though little to be suspected of partiality, or even of justice, as regards the Celts, points out the crime committed by the king of his nation against an innocent people, who, far from espousing the cause of the British Celts, had always been the friends and allies of the Anglo-Saxons. The soldiers of Egfrid did not even spare those great and holy monasteries where the Anglo-Saxon youth were in the habit of going to learn evangelical piety and knowledge, or where, as at Mayo, there lived a numerous community of Northumbrian monks who had preferred to forsake their country, and remain faithful to the teachings of their first apostles, rather than to submit to the triumph of Wilfrid and the Roman rule. The poor Irish, after defending themselves to the utmost, were everywhere vanquished, and had no other resource left but that of seeking by constant and solemn imprecations to call down the vengeance of heaven upon their unworthy assailants.²¹⁵ This time at least their too legitimate curses were realized.

²¹⁴ See p. 203.

In vain the Northumbrian Egbert, an illustrious and most learned monk of Lindisfarne, who had voluntarily banished himself to Ireland for the love of Christ and the benefit of his soul,²¹⁶ and who had great authority in both islands, supplicated the king of his native country to spare a people who had in no way provoked his anger. In vain the holy bishop Cuthbert, together with the best friends of the king, endeavored in the following year to dissuade him from commencing a war, not less cruel, and perhaps not less unjust, against the Picts. Egfrid would listen neither to one nor the other, but hurried to his ruin. He himself led his troops, and permitted them under his very eyes to devastate the invaded country with atrocious cruelty.²¹⁷ The Northern Celts retired before him, and thus succeeded in drawing him into a Highland pass, where he perished with his whole army, while still scarcely forty years of age, and after a reign of fifteen years. It was the counterpoise and return for the victory he had gained at the beginning of his reign in the days of his happy union with Wilfrid. This disaster was the signal for the liberation of the Celtic races whom Oswald, Oswy, and Egfrid had brought under the yoke of Northumbria, a yoke now broken forever. The Picts, the Scots, and the Britons of Strathclyde, together rushed upon the Angles, and drove them from the whole conquered territory between the Firth of Forth and the Tweed. Since then the northern frontier of Northumbria and of all England has remained fixed at the line which runs from the mouth of the Tweed to the Solway Firth. And since then,

Despite the entreaties of the Northumbrian monk Egbert.

Despite those of Bishop Cuthbert, he invades Caledonia, and perishes there.

20th May, 685.

²¹⁵ "Gentem innoxiam et nationi Anglorum semper amicissimam. . . . At insulani . . . cælitus vindicari continuis diu imprecationibus postulabant." — BEDE, iv. 26.

²¹⁶ "Venerabilis et cum omni honorificentia honorandus famulus Christi et sacerdos Egbert quem in Hibernia insula peregrinans ducere vitam pro adipiscenda in cælo patria retulimus." — BEDE, v. 9.

²¹⁷ "Dum Egfridus . . . eorum regna atroci sævitia devastabat." — BEDE, Vita S. Cuthberti, c. 27.

also, the Angles who remained north of the Tweed have been subject to the Scots and Picts, forming with them the kingdom henceforward called Scotland. From that day the splendor of Northumbria was eclipsed.²¹⁸

Queen Ermenburga informed by Cuthbert of the fate of her husband.

Queen Ermenburga awaited the result of her husband's expedition in a monastery governed by one of her sisters at Carlisle, in the centre of the British population of Cumberland;²¹⁹ and the holy bishop Cuthbert, to whom King Egbert had given this town with its environs, came to the same place to console her in case of a misfortune which he but too clearly foresaw. On the day after his arrival, as the governor of the town accompanied him towards the ancient ramparts of the Roman city, he made a sudden pause, and, leaning on his staff, said with a sigh, "Alas! I fear that all is over, and that the judgment of God has come upon our army." When he was urged to explain what he meant, he merely replied, "See how clear the sky is, and remember that the judgments of God are inscrutable."²²⁰ Upon this he immediately returned to the queen, and told her that he feared the king had perished, and that she ought to start not the next day, which was Sunday, a day on which it was unlawful to travel in a carriage,²²¹ but on the Monday, to seek refuge in the royal fortress of Bamborough, where he promised to join her.

Two days afterwards a fugitive from the battle came to tell that at the very hour indicated by the saint, King Egfrid, whose guards had all perished in his defence, had been killed by the avenging sword of a Pict.

Takes the veil.

Ermenburga bowed to the Divine hand which struck her. She took the veil from the hands of ²¹⁸ "Ex quo tempore spes cæpit et virtus regni Anglorum fluere ac retro sublapsa referri." — BEDE, Hist. Eccles., iv. 26.

²¹⁹ Carlisle was, as we have said, emphatically British. Even to the present day Cumberland has retained its British population. It bore the title of Kingdom in the middle ages, after it had escaped from the Northumbrian yoke. — VARIN, memoir already quoted, p. 368; see also Spruner's Historic Atlas.

²²⁰ "Stans juxta baculum sustentationis . . . suspirans, ait: O, ô, ô! existimo enim perpetratum esse bellum, judicatumque est judicium de populis nostris bellantibus adversum. . . . O filioli mei, considerate quam admirabilis sit aer, et recogitate quam inscrutabilia sint judicia Dei." — Tertia Vita auctore Monacho cœvo, ap. BOLLAND., t. iii. Martii, p. 123. The version of Bede, in the Life of S. Cuthbert, ch. 27, says, on the contrary, "Nonne videtis quam mire mutatus et turbatus sit aer!"

²²¹ "Quia die dominico curru ire non licet." Even now, among the descendants of the Anglo-Saxons inhabiting Scotland, popular piety renders it difficult to travel on Sunday.

Cuthbert in her sister's monastery at Carlisle. This Jezebel, as she is called by the friend of Wilfrid, changed suddenly from a wolf into a lamb,²²² and became the model of abbesses. The body of her husband was not buried at Whitby, as those of his father and grandfather had been,²²³ but carried, perhaps as a trophy of the victory, to the monastic island of Iona, which had been the asylum of his race in their exile, and which was still the national sanctuary of the victors.

Wilfrid, banished and deprived of his diocese, was thus but too well avenged. The Northumbrian kingdom, which had struck in his person at the independence and growing authority of the Church, paid the price of its fault by losing half its dominions, and by witnessing the downfall of that political and religious edifice which had been built upon the ruin of the Bishop of York.

Consequences of Egfrid's defeat.

One of the new bishops substituted for Wilfrid, a Saxon monk, named Trumwine, whose see had been placed at Abercorn, on the banks of the Forth, at the extreme limit of the Northumbrian territory, escaped with difficulty from death or slavery, the only alternative which the Celtic conquerors left to their defeated enemies. With him came all his monks, whom he dispersed, as he best could, among the Northumbrian communities, as it was necessary to do afterwards with the Saxon nuns of his diocese, who fled before the irritated Celts, whom they regarded as savages. He himself sought a refuge at Whitby, where he passed the rest of his days, rendering such services as were compatible with his episcopal character to the abbess, who was invested with the difficult mission of ruling a double community of monks and nuns.²²⁴ It was no longer Hilda the holy foundress who governed this great establishment; it was a daughter of Oswy, a sister of the three last

The Saxon Bishop of the Picts flees to Whitby.

²²² "De lupa, post occisionem regis, agna Domini et perfecta abbatissa materque familias optima commutata est." — EDDIUS, c. 23. Cf. BEDE, Vita S. Cuthberti, c. 27, 23.

²²³ See above, page 357.

²²⁴ "Inter plurimos gentis Anglorum vel interemptos gladio, vel servitio addictos, vel de terra Pictorum fuga lapsos . . . recessit cum suis, eosque ubicumque poterat amicis per monasteria commendans . . . in monastica districtione non sibi solummodo, sed et multis utilem ducit . . . ipse in supradicto famulorum famularumque Dei monasterio. Adveniente illuc episcopo, maximum regendi auxilium simul et suæ vitæ solatium devota Deo doctrix invenit." — BEDE, iv. 26. He died there in 700. We find that St. Cuthbert assigned a residence in a town of his diocese to the Northern nuns, "timore barbarici exercitus a monasterio suo profugis." — Vita S. Cuthberti, c. 30.

Northumbrian kings, that Elfleda, whom her father had devoted to God as the price of his victory over the Mercians, and who, intrusted from infancy to Hilda, had grown up in the shadow of the great sea-side monastery. Her mother, Queen Eanfleda, the widow of Oswy, and first protectress of Wilfrid, had joined her there, to end her days in peace beside the tomb of her husband, and under the crosier of her daughter.

Archbishop
Theodore
acknowledges his wrongs toward
Wilfrid,

The adversaries of Wilfrid thus vanished one by one. Of the three principal authors of his ruin, Egfrid was now dead, and Ermenburga a veiled nun. There still remained Archbishop Theodore. Whether the death of Egfrid had acted as a warning to him, or whether the recollection of his apostolic mission, which, in respect to Wilfrid, he had so ill fulfilled, came back to his mind, with a remorse made keener by age and illness, at least it became apparent to him that the moment for confessing and expiating his fault had come, and he did so with the complete and generous frankness which belongs to great minds.²²⁵ He was an old man even at the moment when he was taken from his Eastern monastery to be placed at the head of the English Church, and he had now labored nearly twenty years in that fruitful but rude and thorny field. He was thus more than eighty, and the day of his death could not be far distant. The archbishop perceived that if death overtook him before he was reconciled to Wilfrid, the great works he had accomplished in regulating, purifying, and consolidating the morals and Christian institutions of England would be in some degree contradicted before God and men, by the sight of the great bishop, who had been robbed and exiled solely for having defended his rights and obeyed the Holy See. Accordingly, he summoned Wilfrid to him. Sussex, the residence of the exile, was near to Canterbury, or rather to London, where the interview took place, in presence of a holy monk, who was Bishop of London and of the East Saxons.²²⁶ In presence of these two bishops, the countryman and successor of St. Paul²²⁷ made his general confession. When he had ended, he said to Wilfrid, "My greatest remorse ²²⁵ "Auctoritatem apostolicæ sedis, a qua missus fuerat, metu agitante, honorificans." — EDDIUS, c. 41. "De peccato in Wilfridum commisso satisfaciens conscientiam." — GUILL. MALMESB., f. 151.

²²⁶ Earconwald, of whom more will be said later. — BEDE, iv. 6, 11.

²²⁷ The English have an old tradition, according to which St. Paul, born, like Theodore, at Tarsus in Cilicia, was the first to preach the Christian faith in Britain.

is for the crime I have committed against you, most holy bishop, in consenting to the will of the kings when they robbed you of your possessions and sent you into exile without any fault of yours. I confess it to God and St. Peter, and I take you both to witness that I will do what I can to make up for this sin, and to reconcile you with all the kings and nobles, among my friends, whether they wish it or not. God has revealed to me that I shall die within a year; therefore I conjure you, by the love of God and St. Peter, to consent that I establish you during my life as heir to my archiepiscopal see, for I acknowledge that of all your nation you are the best instructed in all knowledge and in the discipline of Rome.”²²⁸ Wilfrid answered, “May God and St. Peter pardon you all our controversy. I shall always pray for you as your friend. Send letters now to your friends that they may be made aware of our reconciliation, and the injustice of that robbery of which I have been the victim, and that they may restore to me at least a part of my goods, according to the command of the Holy See. After which we will examine with you in the great council of the country who is the most worthy to become your successor.”²²⁹

And desires to secure to him the succession to the archbishopric.

The old archbishop immediately set to work to repair as far as possible the injury he had done to Wilfrid. He wrote letters to all quarters, to plead his cause and to secure for him as many friends as he had once sought to make him enemies.²³⁰ Unfortunately only one of these letters had been preserved, but it is sufficient to do honor to his goodness of heart, and to show how the old Greek monk, transplanted into the midst of a Germanic population, could rule and train the souls under his authority, like a worthy successor and countryman of him who acknowledged himself, according to Scripture, “debtor both to the Greeks and Barbarians.” It is addressed to Ethelred, King of Mercia, who by his means had become the

He writes in favor of Wilfrid to the King of Mercia

²²⁸ “Sapienter totius vitæ suæ cursum cum confessione coram Domino pure revelavit. . . . Cunctos amicos meos regales et principes eorum ad amicitiam tuam . . . volentes nolentesque constringens adtraho . . . quia veraciter in omni sapientia et in judiciis Romanorum eruditissimum te vestræ gentis agnovi.” — EDDIUS, c. 41.

²²⁹ “Ero pro tua confessione orans pro te amicus in perpetuum. . . . Modo primum mitte nuntios cum litteris . . . ut me olim innoxium exspoliatum agnoscant . . . et postea . . . quis dignus sit . . . cum consensu tuo in majori consilio consulamus.” — EDDIUS, c. 41.

²³⁰ “Sibi ubique amicos, quasi prius inimicos, facere diligenter excogitavit.” — Ibid.

friend and brother-in-law of Wilfrid's chief persecutor.²³¹ "My very dear son, — Let your holiness know that I am at peace with the venerable Bishop Wilfrid; therefore I beseech and enjoin you, by the love of Christ, to give him your protection as you formerly did, to the utmost of your power, and as long as you live; for all this time while robbed of his possessions, he has labored for God among the heathen. It is I, Theodore, the humble and infirm bishop, who in my old age address to you this exhortation, according to the apostolic will, so that this holy man may forget the injuries of which he has been so unjustly the victim, and that amends may be made to him. I would ask you besides, if you still love me, although the length of the journey may make my request importunate, let me see once more your dear countenance, that I may bless you before I die. But above all, my son, my dear son, do what I conjure you to do for the holy Wilfrid. If you obey your father who will not be much longer in this-world, obedience will bring you happiness. Adieu, peace be with you, live in Christ, abide in the Lord, and may the Lord abide in you."²³² This letter had its due effect. Ethelred received Wilfrid with great honor, although six years before he would not suffer him to spend a single night in his kingdom; he restored all the monasteries and domains which had formerly been his in Mercia, and to the end of his life remained faithfully attached to him.

To the Abbess Elfreda.

But it was in Northumbria above all that it was important to obtain restitution for the robbed and humiliated bishop. For this purpose Theodore addressed himself to the new king Aldfrid and to the princess Elfreda, sister of the king, and Abbess of Whitby, who had naturally inherited a dislike for Wilfrid from St. Hilda, from whom she had received her education, before becoming her successor, and whose vast building she was about to complete.²³³

²³¹ See BEDE, iv. 21.

²³² "Cognoscat tua miranda sanctitas, pacem me in Christo habere cum venerando episcopo Wilfrido. . . . Ego Theodorus, humilis episcopus, decrepita ætate, hoc tuæ beatitudini suggero . . . et licet tibi pro longinquitate itineris durum esse videatur, oculi mei faciem tuam jucundam videant. . . . Age ergo, fili mi, fili mi, taliter de illo supra fato viro sanctissimo, sicut te deprecatus sum. . . . Vale in pace, vive in Christo, dege in Domino, Dominus sit tecum."

²³³ "Præcipuum monasterium . . . quod ab insignis religionis femina Hilda cœptum, Edelfleda ejusdem regis filia in regimine succedens, magnis fiscalium opum molibus auxit." — GUILL. MALMESB., De Gest. Reg., iii.

Hilda had been quickly followed to the grave by her illustrious rival Ebba, who was, like herself, a princess of the Northumbrian royal dynasty, and abbess of a double monastery at Coldingham. The young Elfreda, niece of Ebba and heiress of Hilda, was therefore the sole representative in Northumbria of that great and salutary authority which was so willingly yielded by the Anglo-Saxon kings and people to those princesses of their sovereign races who became the brides of Christ. The noble Elfreda, who was scarcely twenty-five years of age when she was called to succeed Hilda as Abbess of Whitby, is described by Bede as a most pious mistress of spiritual life. But like all the Anglo-Saxon princesses whom we meet with in the cloister at this epoch, she did not cease to take a passionate interest in the affairs of her race and country. All the more strongly, in consequence, she felt the need of spiritual help to aid her virgin motherhood in ruling the many souls gathered together under her crosier.²³⁴ It was chiefly to Cuthbert that she had recourse. Before he had become bishop, while he lived on a desert rock near Lindisfarne, she had prevailed on him to grant her an interview in an island on the Northumbrian coast, called then, as now, Coquet Island, and which lies nearer Lindisfarne than Whitby. This was while her brother Egfrid still reigned. The hermit and the abbess went each to their meeting by sea; and when he had answered all her questions, she threw herself at his feet, and entreated him to tell her, by virtue of those prophetic powers with which he was known to be gifted, whether her brother Egfrid should have a long life and reign. "I am surprised," he answered, "that a woman well taught and versed as you are in the knowledge of Holy Scripture should speak to me of length with regard to human life, which lasts no longer than a spider's web, as the Psalmist has said, 'Quia anni nostri sicut aranea meditantur.' How short then must life be for a man who has but a year to live, and who has death at his door!" At these words, she wept long; then, drying her tears, she continued, with feminine boldness, and inquired who should be the king's successor, since he had neither sons nor brothers. "Do not say," he replied,

Death of Ebba of Colding-
ham.
25th Aug., 683.

Connection
of the Abbess Elfreda with Bishop Cuthbert.
680.

²³⁴ "Devota Deo doctrix . . . quæ inter gaudia virginitatis non paucis famularum Christi agminibus maternæ pietatis curam adhibebat . . . venerandissima virgo et mater virginum . . . multo virum Dei semper excolebat amore." — BEDE, iv. 26, in Vita S. Cuthberti, c. 24. Cf. 34.

"that he is without heirs; he shall have a successor whom you will love, as you love Egfrid, as a sister." "Then tell me, I entreat you, where this successor is." "You see," returned Cuthbert, directing the eyes of his companion towards the archipelago of islets which dots the Northumbrian coast around Lindisfarne, "how many isles are in the vast ocean; it is easy for God to bring from them some one to reign over the English." Elfreda then perceived that he spoke of a young man supposed to be the son of her father Oswy, by an Irish mother, and who, since his infancy, had lived as an exile at Iona, where he gave himself up to study.²³⁵

Accession
of King
Aldfrid in Northum-
bria.
685-705.

And it thus happened in reality that the cruel and warlike Egfrid was succeeded on the most important throne of the Anglo-Saxon confederation by a learned prince who, during twenty years of a long and prosperous reign, sustained and restored to the utmost extent of his powers the ancient glory of the Northumbrian kingdom, within the new limits to which the victorious insurrection of the Picts had restricted it, but who specially distinguished himself by his love of letters and knowledge. Aldfrid²³⁶ had passed his early days at Iona, in that island retreat where his father Oswy and his uncle Oswald had both found refuge in their youth, and whither the bleeding body of the brother whose crown descended to him had just been carried. During his long, and perhaps voluntary, exile in the Scottish monasteries and schools, he had been trained in theology and dialectics, cosmography, and all the studies then cultivated by the Celtic monks. He brought back from his residence at Iona, and his visits to Melrose and other places, that passionate curiosity and lavish liberality which may be traced among the Irish of the seventh century, and which seems a kind of prelude to the revival of learning in the fifteenth century.²³⁷

²³⁵ "Repente in medio sermone advoluta pedibus ejus, adjuravit eum. Hæc audiens fuis lacrymis præsentia dira deflebat: extersaque facie, rursus audacia feminea adjuravit per majestatem summæ divinitatis. . . . Cernis hoc mare magnum et spatiosum, quot abundat insulis! Facile est Deo de aliqua harum sibi provideri, quem regno præficiat Anglorum. Intellexit ergo quia de Aldfrido diceret, qui tunc in insulis Scotorum ob studium litterarum exsulebat." — BEDE, Vita S. Cuthberti, c. 24.

²³⁶ It has already been said that he must not be confounded with Alchfrid, the eldest legitimate son of Oswy, and Wilfrid's first friend. Aldfrid was a natural son, and probably the eldest of Oswy's children.

²³⁷ "Qui nunc regnat pacifice, qui tunc erat in insula quam Hy nominant." — Vita brevis S. Cuthberti, ap. BOLLAND., t. iii. Mart., p. 141. "Vir in

To this new king, as well as to his sister, the Abbess Elfleda, Archbishop Theodore wrote, to exhort them both to lay aside their enmity against Wilfrid, and to receive him with unreserved kindness.²³⁸ A prince so much given to letters could not remain deaf to the prayers of an archbishop who added to his authority as legate of the Holy See and primate of the Anglo-Saxon Church the fame of greater learning and zeal for intellectual culture than had ever before been seen in Britain. Accordingly, in the second year of his reign, Aldfrid recalled Wilfrid to Northumbria, and restored to him, first, the Monastery of Hexham, with all the surrounding parishes, then the bishopric of York, and finally Ripon, which had been his chosen home, and the centre of his reforms. It is easy to understand the joy of the monks of those great communities, formed by Wilfrid, who had, no doubt, daily prayed for the restoration of their father. They went out to meet him in crowds, and led him back in triumph to the churches he had built for them.²³⁹ The bishops formerly placed by Theodore at Hexham, Ripon, and York,²⁴⁰ were dismissed; and the holy Bishop of Lindisfarne having voluntarily abdicated to return to his solitary rock of Fern, and there prepare for his approaching death, Wilfrid was charged to appoint his successor.

Wilfrid is recalled.

686.

20th March, 687.

The four dioceses formed by the division of the great diocese of York, which comprehended all the country north of the Humber, were thus once more united under the crosier of Wilfrid. But a restoration so complete lasted only a year: the administration of Wilfrid met great opposition at Lindisfarne. On this Storms excited by Wilfrid at Lindisfarne.

Scripturis doctissimus. . . . Destructum regni statum quamvis intra fines angustiores nobiliter recuperavit.—BEDE, Hist., iv. 26. “Qui in regionibus Scotorum lectioni operam dabat, ibi ob amorem sapientiæ spontaneum passus exilium.”—BEDE, Vita Cuthberti, c. 14. “Ab odio germani tutus, et magno otio litteris imbutus, omni philosophia composuerat animum.”—WILLELM. MALMESB., De Gest. Reg., c. 52.

²³⁸ “Ut simultatibus retropositis incunctanter caritatem ejus complecterentur.”—BOLLAND., t. ii. Febr., p. 184.

²³⁹ “In gaudio subjectorum suorum de exilio . . . rediens.”—EDDIUS, c. 43. “Crebra monachorum examina patri obviam procedunt.”—EADMER, Vita S. Wilfridi, c. 21.

²⁴⁰ This is affirmed by Eddi, a contemporary and witness of most of the facts he relates, while Bede and other authors suppose that St. John, called of Beverley, a monk of Whitby, who had been placed at Hexham in 685 by the Archbishop Theodore, was transferred to York when Wilfrid returned. Probably Bede anticipated by some years the nomination of John, who was certainly the successor of Wilfrid at York, after his second exile.

subject the venerable Bede, who was as prudent as sincere, speaks only by hints.²⁴¹ It may be divined that Wilfrid took advantage of his re-establishment in his diocese to strike a last blow at Celtic traditions, and that spirit of independence which the first Scottish apostles of Northumbria had introduced into the holy island. The changes he attempted to introduce were so unbearable to the Anglo-Saxon monks of the school of Cuthbert and his masters, that they declared themselves ready to imitate their brethren who had left Ripon at the arrival of Wilfrid. They preferred to leave the first sanctuary of Christianity, and the cradle of their order in Northumbria, rather than to yield to the tyranny of their new superior. He himself became aware that their resistance was insurmountable, and at the end of a year he gave up Lindisfarne to a new bishop who, being both wise and gentle, calmed all parties.²⁴²

688.

About this time the prediction of Archbishop Theodore was verified; he died at the age of eighty-eight, after a pontificate of twenty-two years. His conduct towards Wilfrid is open to the widest censure, and can scarcely be explained otherwise than the Archbishop St.

Death of
Theodore.
19th Sept.,
690.

by the jealousy inspired in the metropolitan of England by the splendor and power of the immense bishopric of York under a ruler such as Wilfrid. But an impartial posterity owes him at least the justice rendered him by his contemporaries, and is bound to recognize in him a man who did more than any of his six predecessors to organize and consolidate the Church of England, on the double basis of Roman supremacy and of the union of the Anglo-Saxon bishoprics among themselves by their subordination to the metropolitan see of Canterbury.²⁴³ No bishop before him had labored so much for the intellectual development of the native clergy, or for the union of the different Anglo-Saxon dynasties. The Greek monk, therefore, may well be reckoned among the founders of the English Church and nationality; and when he was buried, wrapped in his monastic habit in place of a shroud,²⁴⁴ in the ecclesiastical burying-ground of Canterbury, it was but just that he should be laid on the right hand of St. Augustin, the Italian monk who a century earlier had cast the first seeds of faith and Christian civilization into the soul of the Anglo-Saxon race.²⁴⁵

²⁴¹ "Tanta ecclesiam illam tentationis aura concussit, ut plures e fratribus loco magis cedere, quam talibus vellent interesse periculis." Then speaking of the successor of Wilfrid: "Fugatis perturbationum procellis . . . sanavit contritos corde, et alligavit contritiones eorum . . . quia post ejus (Cuthberti) obitum repellendi ac destruendi essent cives sed post ascensionem minantis iræ cælestis protinus miseratione refovendi." — Vita S. Cuthberti, c. 39.

²⁴² BEDE, iv. 29. His name was Eadbert.

²⁴³ "Tantum profectus spiritalis tempore præsulatus illius Anglorum ecclesiæ, quantum nunquam antea potuere, cœperunt." — BEDE, v. 8.

CHAPTER V.

SECOND EXILE OF WILFRID, AND SECOND APPEAL TO ROME. — 686-705.

Rupture of Wilfrid with King Aldfrid. — New accusations against Wilfrid. — He is exiled the second time. — He is received by the King of Mercia, who gives him the bishopric of Lichfield. — He there lives eleven years in tranquil obscurity. — Theodore's successor hostile to Wilfrid, as also Abbot Adrian. — Assembly of Nesterfield. — Degrading proposals made to Wilfrid; he rejects them. — His speech. — He appeals to Rome. — Precocious talent of the Anglo-Saxons in diplomacy and despotism. — King Ethelred of Mercia remains faithful to Wilfrid. — The monks of Ripon are excommunicated. — Wilfrid's third voyage to Rome. — Contrast with the first. — Pope John VI. — The trial lasts four months, and occupies seventy sittings. — Wilfrid is acquitted. — Returning to England, he falls ill at Meaux. — His friend Acca. — His life is prolonged in answer to the prayers of his monks. — He is reconciled to the archbishop. — He goes to visit his faithful friend Ethelred, now become a monk at Bardeney. — Aldfrid, King of Northumbria, refuses to recognize the sentence of the Holy See. — He dies. — His successor expels Wilfrid within six days, but is himself dethroned. — National assembly on the banks of the Nid. — The Abbess Elfleda and the Ealdorman Bertfrid interpose on behalf of Wilfrid. — General reconciliation. — The Monasteries of Ripon and Hexham given up to him. — Influence of Anglo-Saxon princesses on the destiny of Wilfrid.

²⁴⁴ "Jacebat uti a primordio erat depositus integra forma metropolitani sacerdotii pallio et monachiti tantum obductus cuculla." — GOTSSELINUS, Translatio SS. Reliq., l. ii. c. 27.

²⁴⁵ The following lines were written by a poet of the time on the seven monks who were the first seven Archbishops of Canterbury, and who were buried side by side: —

"Septem primates sunt Anglis et proto-patres, Septem rectores, septemque per æthra triones;
Septem sunt stellæ, nitet his hæc area cellæ;
Septem cisternæ vitæ, septemque lucernæ."

WILFRID was fifty-six when his great rival, thus tardily transformed into a repentant and faithful ally, died; and for more than a quarter of a century his life had been one continued conflict. He might therefore hope for a little repose, and even perhaps believe it possible. But God still had in reserve for him long years of renewed trials. The first half of his history is repeated in the second with a wearisome monotony as to the events, but with the same constancy and courage in the hero of the endless struggle.²⁴⁶

Rupture of Wilfrid with King
Aldfrid.
686-691.

The truce which was granted to him in the midst of his laborious career lasted but five years. It was more than once disturbed: calm and storm alternately characterized his relations with King Aldfrid, a monarch justly dear to the Northumbrians, whom his courage and ability preserved from the disastrous consequences of Egfrid's downfall. But in 691, the king, freed from the influence which Archbishop Theodore had exercised over him, as well as over all England, cast off all pretences towards the bishop, whose moral and material power was an offence to him, as it had been to his father and brother. Predisposed, also, by his education and his long residence in Ireland to favor Celtic tendencies, it may be supposed that he easily allowed himself to be influenced by the rancor and ill-will naturally entertained towards Wilfrid by the disciples and partisans of Scotie monks and bishops. Thus war was once more declared between the court of Northumbria and that exclusively Roman and Benedictine spirit of which Wilfrid was the uncompromising champion.²⁴⁷

²⁴⁶ The following are the principal dates of the life of Wilfrid:—

664. Named Bishop of York and of all Northumbria.

665. Replaced by Ceadda, during his absence in France for his consecration. He retires to Ripon.

669. Recalled to York by the intervention of Theodore.

678. Dismemberment of the diocese; he is removed from York, and transferred to Lindisfarne; he refuses, and appeals to Rome.

679. On his return from Rome, with a judgment in his favor, he is imprisoned, and afterwards exiled.

686. After the death of Egfrid, he is a second time re-established.

691. Third expulsion by King Aldfrid, and second exile.

692. He is made Bishop of Lichfield.

703. Assembly of Nesterfield. Wilfrid refuses to sign his deposition. Second appeal to the Holy See; third voyage to Rome.

705. He returns to England. Assembly on the banks of the Nid; his two monasteries of Ripon and Hexham are restored to him.

709. He dies at Oundle.

²⁴⁷ "Nam antiquæ inimicitiae suasores, quasi de sopore somni excitati . . . faciem dissensionis extinctam resuscitavere, quippe inter regem sapientissi-

Three complaints in chief were brought against the great bishop, two of which dated back to the origin of the struggle begun by Wilfrid between the Celts and Romanists. The matter in question was the Monastery of Ripon, founded originally for a colony of Celtic novices from Melrose, but afterwards given to Wilfrid, to the injury of the first owners, and dedicated by him to St. Peter, as if with the intention of holding up the standard under which he intended to fight. His new adversaries at first propose to deprive the Church of Ripon, the true capital of Wilfrid's spiritual kingdom, of a portion of its vast possessions, and to erect this into a new bishopric, dividing a second time the diocese of York, for the extension of Celtic influence, but in contempt of the Pontifical verdict and of the royal grant which had irrevocably guaranteed to Wilfrid and his monks the existence of this community free and exempt from all other jurisdiction.²⁴⁸ Wilfrid, with his usual firmness, refused to consent to this division; upon which his adversaries changed their tactics, and reproached him for not obeying all the decrees issued by Archbishop Theodore as legate of the Holy See. This was in evident reference to the new bishoprics erected by Theodore in Wilfrid's diocese. With address worthy of a more civilized century, the theologians of the Northumbrian king thus taught him to transform the most devoted champion of Rome into an insurgent against the authority of the Holy See, and to make of the archbishop who had just died reconciled to Wilfrid, an adversary not less dangerous after his death than during his life. Wilfrid replied that he willingly recognized the statutes made by Theodore before their rupture, and after their reconciliation — that is to say, while all the churches were canonically united — but not those which dated from the interval in which division reigned. This was a sufficient pretence for his enemies to treat him as a rebel, and consign him to a new exile.

Thus Wilfrid found himself, for the third time, deprived of the see to which he had been canonically appointed by the father and brother of King

Charges against
Wilfrid.

He is exiled for the second time.

mum et sanctum virum . . . iterum in concordia, atque iterum in discordia alternatim per multos annos viventes . . . usque dum postremo maxima flamma inimicitiae exardecescente . . . expulsus recessit. Prima causa est dissensionis eorum de antiqua origine descendens. — EDDIUS, c. 43.

²⁴⁸ "Ut monasterium quod in privilegium nobis donabatur . . . in episcopalem sedem transmutetur; et libertatem relinquere, quam sanctus Agatho et quique reges censuerunt fixe et firmiter possidere." — EDDIUS, c. 43.

Aldfrid twenty years before ; and sentenced to a second exile for refusing to lend himself to the schemes of the adversaries of law and of monastic and ecclesiastical freedom. He

Wilfrid received in Mercia by King Ethelred, sought refuge in Mercia, the country which he had so often visited in the time of his sainted friend Etheldreda, where the great Monastery of Peter's Burg, with its hitherto unquestioned independence, reminded him of ancient efforts happily accomplished, and where King Ethelred, who had been definitively won over to his side by the touching letter of the aged Archbishop Theodore, and who saw in him the representative of Roman authority, offered him effectual protection and an affection which never wavered in its fidelity.²⁴⁹ This king immediately who makes him Bishop of Lichfield. 692.

called him to the vacant see of Lichfield, which, since the new episcopal division arranged by Theodore, no longer comprehended the whole of Mercia, but which still offered a sufficient field to the apostolic zeal of Wilfrid. It was the see which had been held by the gentle and pious Ceadda, who superseded Wilfrid at York, at the time of his first quarrel with King Oswy in 665. Wilfrid now succeeded his former supplanter, changing for the fourth time his episcopal residence.²⁵⁰ In this obscure and restricted sphere, he contented himself with fulfilling his duties as bishop, and awaiting better days with patience. Here he lived eleven years, and during that long interval one single trace of his active work is all that is visible—the consecration of a missionary bishop named Swidbert. This missionary, destined to be the apostle of Westphalia, had already visited that region of Friesland whither Wilfrid himself carried the first revelation of the Gospel, and whither his example had led several Anglo-Saxon monks, the traces of whose light-giving progress will be met with further on.

691-703.

A descendant of Odin succeeds the Greek Theodore at Canterbury. 1st July, 692.

It is evident that no one thought of doing anything to carry out the intention, so clearly expressed by Theodore, of making Wilfrid his successor. On the contrary, after an interval of two years, a priest named Berchtwald, formerly a monk at Glastonbury, and afterwards abbot of a monastery built at Reculver, on the site of the palace to which the first Christian king had retired, after giving up his capital to ²⁴⁹ "Ad amicum fidelem accessit . . . qui eum cum magno honore propter reverentiam apostolicæ sedis suscepit." — EDDIUS, c. 43.

²⁵⁰ York, Hexham, Lindisfarne, and Lichfield.

Augustin, was elected to the vacant see. Berchtwald was descended from the dynasty which reigned in Mercia, and was the first of the race of Odin who took his place among the successors of the apostles.²⁵¹ One Anglo-Saxon had already figured among the archbishops of Canterbury; but as he had changed his name into the Roman appellation of Deusdedit, he has been reckoned among the foreign prelates, and the national historians, chronicling the promotion of Berchtwald, write proudly, "Hitherto our bishops had been Roman; from this time they were English."²⁵² As there was no other metropolitan in England, he had to go to Lyons to be consecrated. He presided over the English Church for nearly forty years. He was very ^{21st June, 693.} learned, deeply imbued with the knowledge of Holy Scripture, and of monastic discipline; but the Saxon Bede acknowledges that he was far from equalling his predecessor, Theodore the Greek.²⁵³

But from whence arose the hostility of the new archbishop to Wilfrid? Perhaps the seeds of it ^{He is hostile to Wilfrid.} had been sown in the Celto-British Monastery of Glastonbury. Except at the moment of the holy Archbishop Theodore's tardy confession and restitution, Wilfrid, from the beginning of his struggle with the Anglo-Saxon princes and prelates, seems never to have met with the least sympathy at Canterbury, the natural centre of Roman traditions and authority, and it was never thither that he went to seek a refuge in his troubles. Nothing more strongly proves to what a point national feeling already prevailed, not indeed over the power of love and respect for Catholic unity, but over all that would compromise, even in appearance, the interests or the self-love of the Anglo-Saxon Church. Abbot Adrian, the friend and companion of Theodore, like him charged by the Holy See to watch over the maintenance of English orthodoxy, and who survived the archbishop nearly twenty years,²⁵⁴ never extended a friendly hand to the man who, not without good cause, declared himself the dauntless champion and innocent victim of Roman unity. The case was the same, as we have already seen, with the illustrious

²⁵¹ He is also called Beorchwald, and Brithwald. — GUILL. MALMESB., Gesta Reg., i. 29; HOOK, vol. i. p. 178.

²⁵² Anglo-Saxon Chron., an. 690.

²⁵³ "Ecclesiasticis simul ac monasterialibus disciplinis summe instructus, tametsi prædecessori minime comparandus." — BEDE, v. 8.

²⁵⁴ He died in 710, having been thirty-nine years abbot of the Monastery of St. Peter or of St. Augustin at Canterbury.

and holy abbot Benedict Biscop, the founder of several new foundations, entirely Roman in spirit and heart, in the country, and even in the very diocese of Wilfrid. Is it not necessary to conclude that Wilfrid appeared, at least to his most illustrious contemporaries, to go much too far in his zeal, and to mistake the indispensable conditions of religious peace in England?

Assembly of Nesterfield.
703.

However this may have been, the new archbishop (who, we may say in passing, holds a place among the saints of the English and Benedictine calendars),²⁵⁵ soon formed an alliance with King Aldfrid. The resentment of this prince had not been disarmed, nor his resolution modified, either by the long exile of Wilfrid, or by the impunity with which Bishops Bosa²⁵⁶ and John had since occupied the usurped sees of Hexham and York. Twelve years after the last expulsion of Wilfrid, the king convoked an assembly in the plain of Nesterfield, near the Monastery of Ripon, which was one of the principal causes of the struggle. Almost all the British bishops were present, the Archbishop Berchtwald himself presided, and Wilfrid was invited to take part in the proceedings, under a promise that justice would be done him, according to the canon law. He came; but the promise was so far from being kept, that his presence was only made an occasion for heaping recriminations and accusations upon him. Certain bishops, probably those who occupied the sees into which his diocese had been partitioned, distinguished themselves by their bitterness; they were supported by the king, and it must be added, by several abbots, who perhaps disliked the Benedictine rule. An attempt was made to force him into an entire acceptance of all the statutes of the deceased archbishop. Wilfrid replied that he would do all they wished, provided it was agreeable to the canon law. Then turning upon his adversaries, he reproached them vehemently for the obstinacy with which for twenty-two years they had opposed the apostolic authority; he demanded under what pretence they dared to prefer the laws made by the archbishop during the division of the Church of England to the decrees of three popes specially delivered for the salvation of souls in Britain? While his adversaries deliberated over the wording of their minutes, a young man attached to the service of the king, but passionately devoted to Wilfrid, who had educated him along with many other young Saxon nobles, secretly left the royal tent, and, stealing in disguise through the crowd, warned Wilfrid that a treacherous attempt would be made to obtain his signature in approval of all the council might decree — a sort of blank resignation, by means of which he might be deprived of everything he had a lawful right to, whether bishoprics or monasteries, in Northumbria, Mercia, and all other places. “After which,” said this secret friend, “nothing would be left for you but to give yourself up, and lose even your episcopal character in virtue of your own signature.”²⁵⁷ The actual event to which this warning referred is made known to us by the account given later by Wilfrid himself to the Pope. “I sat,” he said, “in my place, with my abbots, priests, and deacons, when one of the bishops came to ask, in the name of the king and the archbishop, if I submitted to the archbishop’s judgment, and if I was ready to obey what should be decreed with the consent of all, yes or no? I replied that I preferred to know, in the first place, the nature of the judgment before making any engagement. The bishop insisted, saying that he himself knew nothing, that the archbishop would say nothing until I had declared in a document, signed by my hand, that I would submit to his judgment, without deviating to the right or left. I replied that I never had heard of such a proceeding, and that it was unheard-of to attempt to bind the conscience by an oath before it was known what the oath implied. However, I promised before all the assembly that I would obey with all my heart the sentence of the archbishop in everything that was not contrary to the statutes of the holy Fathers, to the canons, or to the council of the holy Pope Agathon and his

681-703.

²⁵⁵ Under the name of Brithwaldus or Brivaut, on 9th January.

²⁵⁶ We have already said that this intruder figures among the English saints. Bede also calls him Deo dilectus et sanctissimus, v. 20. It must be remembered that he, as well as his colleague St. John of Beverley, had been trained in the school of the Abbess Hilda.

Proposals made to Wilfrid.

²⁵⁷ “Multæ ac magnæ altercationum quæstiones ab eis exortæ . . . consensu quorundam abbatum qui pacem ecclesiarum, avaritia instigante, nullatenus habere concupiverunt. . . . Multis et duris sermonibus eorum pertinaciam increpavit ac interrogavit eos quo fronte auderent. . . . Unus ex ministris . . . quem ille a primævo vagentis ætatulæ incunabulo enutrivit, ex tentorio regis latenter erupit. . . . Hac fraude te moliantur decipere, ut primitus per scriptionem propriæ manus confirmes eorum tantummodo judicium . . . ut postquam isto alligatus fueris districtiōnis vinculo, de cetero in posterum permutare nullatenus queas. . . . Ad postremum temetipsum donando, de tuo sanctitatis honore cum subscriptione degraderis.” — EDDIS, c. 44.

orthodox successors.”²⁵⁸ Then the excitement rose to its height; the king and archbishop took advantage of it by a proposal to deprive Wilfrid of all that he possessed on either bank of the Humber, leaving him no shelter whatsoever in England. This extreme severity provoked a reaction in his favor, notwithstanding the double force of the royal and archiepiscopal authority. At last it was agreed to leave him the monastery which he had built at Ripon, on condition that he should sign a promise to live there peaceably, not to leave it without the permission of the king, and to give up the exercise of all episcopal functions.²⁵⁹

He rejects them, and appeals to Rome. To this insulting proposal Wilfrid replied with an indignant eloquence, which his companion has well earned our gratitude by preserving for us. “By what right do you dare to abuse my weakness, force me to turn the murderer’s sword against myself, and sign my own condemnation? How shall I, whom you accuse of no fault, make myself a scandal in the sight of all who know that for nearly forty years I have borne, though unworthy, the name of bishop? Was not I the first, after the death of those great men sent by St. Gregory, to root out the poisonous seeds sown by Scottish missionaries? Was it not I who converted and brought back the whole nation of the Northumbrians to the true Easter and the Roman tonsure, according to the laws of the Holy See? Was it not I who taught them the sweet harmonies of the primitive Church, in the responses and chants of the two alternate choirs? Was it not I who constituted monastic life among them, after the order of St. Benedict, which no one had before introduced? And after all this, I am now to express with my own hand a sudden condemnation of myself, with no crime whatever upon my conscience! As for this new persecution, by which you try to violate the sacred character with which I am invested, I appeal boldly to the Holy See. I invite any of you who desire my deposition to go there with me to receive the decision. The sages of Rome must learn the causes for which you would degrade me, before I bend to your sole will.” At these words the king and the archbishop cried out, "He is guilty by his own acknowledgment. He is worthy to be condemned, if only because he prefers the judgment of Rome to ours — a foreign tribunal to that of his own country." And the king added, "If you desire it, my father, I will compel him to submit by force. At least for once let him accept our sentence." The archbishop said nothing against this proposal; but the other bishops reminded the king of the safe-conduct he had promised — "Let him go home quietly, as we shall all do."²⁶⁰ Such clumsy violence, addressed to objects of controversy so out of date, may no doubt cause the learned and the victorious of our day to smile; but the spirit manifested in the war made upon Wilfrid by the king and bishops is one which is never out of date. It is impossible not to be struck by the singular analogy between the means thus used and those that have been employed ever since to obtain the triumph of a bad cause. It is ever astonishing to perceive the clear-sightedness with which the Anglo-Saxons, both laymen and ecclesiastics, divined and availed themselves of weapons which seemed reserved for a more advanced state of civilization. Persecution and confiscation are of all ages; but it is a striking proof of the precocious intelligence of the Anglo-Saxons of the seventh century that they thus stigmatized as a crime and anti-national preference for foreigners that instinct and natural law which induces every victim of oppression or violence to seek justice where it is free and independent; and, above all, that they had recourse to that fine invention of a blank signature, a blind assent to the will of another, wrung from those who had been skilfully reduced to the formidable alternative of a Yes or a No. And yet the men who worked by such means were neither impious nor rascally. On the contrary, King Aldfrid ranks among the most enlightened and justly popular princes of his time.

²⁵⁸ “Eram in concilio sedens cum abbatibus meis. . . . Respondebam quæ erat illius iudicii sententia, scire prius oportet, quam confiteamur, utrum pati ea valeamus exsequendo, an aliter. . . . Istius tam augustam districtiōnis coarctationem nunquam antea a quoquam hominum coactam audivi.” — EDDIUS, c. 50.

²⁵⁹ “Ut nec in Ultra-Umbrensi regno, nec in Merciorum minimam quidem unius domunculæ portiunculam haberet. Hujus iudicii inclementia ab archiepiscopo et rege diffinita.” — EDDIUS, c. 50.

²⁶⁰ "Constanter et intrepida voce elevata. . . . Qua ex causa me compellitis ut tam lugubri calamitatis miseria in memetipsum gladium diræ interfectionis . . . convertam? Nonne si aliquo reatu suspicionis offendiculum faciam? nonne et ego primus post obitum priorum procerum a sancto Gregorio directorum, curavi ut Scoticæ virulenta plantationis germina eradica-rem . . . aut quomodo juxta ritum primitivæ Ecclesiæ consono vocis modulamine binis adstantibus choris persultare . . . instruerem? Et nunc contra me quomodo subitani damnationis ipse protulero, extra conscientiam alicujus facinoris, sententiam? Fiducialiter sedem appello apostolicam. . . . Modo utique culpabilis factus a nobis notatus damnetur, quod magis illorum, quam nostrum elegit judicium." — EDDIUS, c. 44. "Si præcipis, pater, opprimam eum per violentiam." — GUILL. MALMESB., 151, b.

The archbishop, and most of the bishops who persecuted Wilfrid, have been and still are, venerated among the saints. The only conclusion to which we can come is, that the instincts of despotism exist always and everywhere in the human heart, and that unless vigorously restrained and curbed by laws and institutions, they break out even in the best, choosing the same forms, laying the same snares, producing the same baseness, inspiring the same violences, perversities, and treacheries.

It was not without difficulty that, after the dispersion of the assembly of Nesterfield, the noble old man escaped from the violence of his enemies, and returned to Mercia to his faithful friend King Ethelred. When Wilfrid had repeated all the threats and insults with which the bishops had loaded him: "And you," said he to the king, "how do you intend to act towards me with regard to the lands and goods you have given me?" "I," replied the honest Ethelred, "I shall certainly do nothing to add to so great a wrong; nor, above all, to injure the monastic life which now flourishes in our great Abbey of St. Mary; ²⁶¹ I shall on the contrary maintain it as long as I live, and will change nothing of what I have been able to do by the grace of God, until I have sent to Rome ambassadors who will accompany you, and take with them my deeds of gift. I hope they will there do me the justice deserved by a man who desires no other recompense." ²⁶²

But while the generous Ethelred thus promised and continued his protection to the persecuted bishop and to the monks of the Burg of St. Peter, who had always so deeply interested him, the King of Northumbria and his adherents redoubled their violence and their anger. Sentence of excommunication was pronounced against the monks of Ripon, because of their fidelity to the cause of their founder, who was at the same time their abbot and bishop. Poor Eddi, who was one of them, relates with indignation how the spoilers, not content with invading the patrimony of Wilfrid, showed and excited every-

²⁶¹ The king thus designated the Abbey of Peterborough, first called Medehampstede, and situated on the borders of Mercia and East Anglia, in the fenny country, where at the same period arose Ely, Croyland, Thorney, &c.

²⁶² "Majorem non addo perturbationem, destruendo monachorum vitam . . . usquequo prius tecum nuntios proprios vel scripta proprietatis ad Romanam præmisero interrogare de his imminentibus causis, quomodo recta desiderans salvus inveniar." — EDDIUS, c. 45.

King
Ethelred of Mercia remains faithful to him.

Excommunication of his monks at
Ripon.

where, against his disciples and partisans, the horror which attached to excommunicated persons. Food or drink which had been blessed by a monk or priest of Wilfrid's party was thrown away as if it had been offered to idols; and every cup or other utensil touched by a Wilfridian had to be washed and purified before it could be used by these pretenders to orthodoxy.²⁶³

The unfortunate excommunicated monks of Ripon, to whom the result of the Assembly of Nesterfield was communicated by the invectives and outrages of which they were the object, consoled themselves as they best could by redoubling their prayers and austerities, and praying night and day, in sorrowful union with all the other Wilfridian monasteries, for their aged and courageous father, who was again about to undertake the long and laborious journey to Rome.²⁶⁴ Thus Wilfrid again set out, as he had done

Third journey of Wilfrid to Rome.

three times before, to seek enlightenment and justice from the successor of St. Peter. A party of faithful monks accompanied him; but he had no longer the stately train of former days, and it was on foot that he crossed the immense space which divided him from Rome.²⁶⁵ And how many other changes were there since his first journey, when the young favorite of Queen Eanfleda travelled, with all the eagerness of a youth of twenty, towards the Eternal City! He was now seventy: he was a bishop, and had been so for forty years, but a bishop robbed of his possessions, expelled from his diocese for the third time, misunderstood, persecuted, calumniated, not only by the wicked and tyrants, but by his brethren in the episcopate, by his hierarchical superior, and by his countrymen. The old saints, the old kings, the good and holy queens, who had encouraged his first steps in the apostolic life, had disappeared, and with them how many friends, how many brothers in arms, how many disciples prematurely snatched from his paternal hopes! Not only the delightful illusions of youth, but also the generous persistence of manhood, had been compelled to give place in his soul to the consciousness

Contrast
with his first.

²⁶³ "In tantum communionem nostram exsecraverunt, ut si quispiam . . . refectionem suam . . . signo crucis Dei benediceret, foras projiciendam ac effundendam, quasi idolo-lythum judicabant: et vasa de quibus nostri vescebantur, lavari prius, quasi sorde polluta jubebant, antequam ab aliis contingerentur." — EDDIUS, c. 46.

²⁶⁴ "Die noctuque clamantes, in jejunio et fletu cum omnibus subjectis nostris congregationibus fundentes precem." — EDDIUS, c. 47.

²⁶⁵ "Pedestri gressu." — EDDIUS, c. 47.

of treason and ingratitude and failure — failure a hundred times proved of his efforts, yet a hundred times renewed in behalf of truth, justice, and honor.

Nevertheless he went on and persevered; he held high his white head in the midst of the storm; he was as ardent, eloquent, resolute, and unconquerable in his old age as in the first days of his youth. Nothing in him betrayed fatigue, discouragement, vexation, nor even sadness.

Thus he pressed on, and, after a second stay in Friesland,²⁶⁶ crossed the countries of Neustria, Austrasia, and Lombardy, all agitated and eaten up, like other nations, by the struggles and passions of this world; all wasted, desolated, and ruled by the wild license of military and material force. He advanced into the midst of them, bearing in his heart and on his countenance the love of law, a law purely spiritual, which swayed souls, which addressed hearts, and which alone could overcome, regulate, and pacify all those new and different races — a law which can never perish, but which from age to age, even to the end of the world, will inspire in its champions the same courage, constancy, and fervor, which burned in the heart of the aged Wilfrid during his long and fatiguing journey. He was going to Rome, but what might be his reception there? Would any recollection still remain of the brave young pilgrim of the time of St. Martin, the last martyr pope? or of the victorious and admired bishop of the time of St. Agathon, the Benedictine pope? Five other popes had occupied the chair of St. Peter since Agathon.²⁶⁷ During this long interval, no mark of sympathy, no aid had come from Rome to Wilfrid, in all his struggles and sufferings for the cause which he loved to regard as that of the Roman Church and its law, authority, and discipline. And the apostolic throne at this moment was occupied by John VI., a Greek, countryman of that Theodore who had cost Wilfrid so many contradictions and trials.

Pope John VI. It was to this pontiff that he and his companion presented, on their knees, their memorial, declaring that they came to accuse no one, but to defend themselves against accusations, by flying to the foot of his glorious see as to the bosom of a mother, and submitting themselves beforehand to all that his authority might prescribe. Accusers could not have been wanting, for there soon arrived envoys from the holy Archbishop Berchtwald, with a written denunciation of Wilfrid.²⁶⁸ The Pope inquired into the matter in a council at which many bishops and all the Roman clergy were present. Eddi, who must have accompanied his bishop to Rome this time also, has preserved the details in full. Wilfrid perceived the necessity of being conciliatory and moderate in his pretensions, and restrained his ambition within the bounds of a humble prayer. He read before the assembly a paper, in which he recalled to its recollection the decrees given in his favor by Popes Agathon, Benedict, and Sergius, and demanded the execution of them in his own name and in that of the monks who had accompanied him to Rome. He then entreated the Pope to recommend King Ethelred to guarantee to him, against all covetousness or enmity, the monasteries and domains which he held from the Mercian kings for the redemption of their souls. Finally, in case the complete execution of the Pontifical decrees, which had ordained his reinstatement in his bishopric and in all his patrimony, should appear too hard to the King of Northumbria, the generous old man consented to give up his diocese of York, with all the monasteries depending on it, to be disposed of at the Pope's pleasure, except his two beloved foundations of Ripon and Hexham, which he asked to be allowed to retain, with all their possessions. In another sitting the messengers of Berchtwald were heard in their turn. They declared, as their chief accusation, that Bishop Wilfrid, in full council at Nesterfield, had cast contempt upon the decrees of the Archbishop of Canterbury, whom the Holy See had placed at the head of all the churches of Great Britain. Then Wilfrid rose, and, with all the authority he derived from his venerable age, related what had really occurred. His tale gained the sympathies of the whole assembly; and the bishops, while showing the most amiable aspect to the friends of Wilfrid, began to talk Greek among themselves, so as not to be understood by the English.²⁶⁹ They then addressed ²⁶⁸ "Neminem per invidiam accusandum advenimus. . . . Interim legati a sancto archiepiscopo Berchtvaldo cum suis scriptis accusationis directis . . . pervenerunt." — EDDIUS, c. 47.

²⁶⁶ It is only at this period of Wilfrid's life that I can place his residence in Friesland with his pupil Willibrord, whose successor, Acca, entertained Bede, and of whom the latter speaks in his Ecclesiastical History, book iii. chap. 3.

²⁶⁷ Leo II., Benedict II., John IV., Conon, Sergius I. From a passage of Wilfrid's speech at Nesterfield, it appears that Popes Benedict II. and Sergius had interposed in his favor, but no trace of their acts on the subject has been preserved.

²⁶⁹ "Stans episcopus noster, venerabili senio confectus, cum fratribus suis venerabilibus in conspectu totius congregationis. . . . Tunc inter se græcizantes et subridentes nos . . . loqui cœperunt."

the Canterbury envoys as follows: "You know, dear brethren, that those who do not prove their chief accusation ought not to be allowed to prove the rest; however, to do honor to the archbishop-legate, and to this holy bishop Wilfrid, we will examine the matter fundamentally in all its details."

The council holds seventy sittings.
703-704.

And, in fact, they held, during four months, seventy sittings. This was certainly giving a scrupulous, and, it may be said, amazing attention to a cause which may have appeared to the Italian bishops as but of secondary and far-off interest; and nothing better proves the conscientious solicitude brought by the Church of Rome to bear on the judgment of all causes submitted to her, as well as her unquestionable authority. Wilfrid appeared before his judges almost daily, and underwent a minute examination.²⁷⁰ In these debates the aged orator displayed all the vigor and energy of his youth. He overturned by a word the most unforeseen objections of his accusers; with a presence of mind, which God and the truth alone could have inspired, he swept away their arguments like spiders' webs: it was a true torrent of eloquence, as says a monastic historian who, many centuries after, was still proud of the effect produced by the words of the old Saxon bishop upon the astonished Romans.²⁷¹ Nothing contributed more to the ultimate triumph of Wilfrid than the discovery, made in studying the precedents of the case, of his presence at the council held against the Monothelites twenty-four years before.²⁷² In the course of reading the acts of the former council, which was done by order of the Pope, in presence not only of the clergy but also of the nobles and people of Rome, when they came to a passage which proved the presence of Wilfrid, then as now accused, but triumphantly acquitted, and admitted to bear witness to the faith of the other bishops of Great Britain, the assembly was confounded, the reader stopped short, and each man asked himself who this other Wilfrid was.²⁷³ Then Boniface, an old ²⁷⁰ "Per quatuor menses et septuaginta conciliabula sanctissimæ sedis, de fornace ignis . . . purificatus evasit. Pene quotidie in conflictu diligenter examinatus." — EDDIUS, c. 50, 52.

²⁷¹ "Mirantibus Romanis . . . illius eloquentiam, dum quicquid accusationum objecissent, ille nullo excogitato responso, sed Dei et veritatis fultus auxilio, quasi casses araneorum primo motu labiorum discuteret et subrueret . . . venerandum senem . . . torrentem eloquentiæ." — GUILL. MALMESB., f. 152.

²⁷² See page 388.

²⁷³ "Cum ergo causa exigente synodus eadem coram nobilibus et frequentia populi jubente apostolico diebus aliquot legeretur, ventum est ad locum counsellor of the Pope, who had lived in the time of Agathon, declared that the Wilfrid who was thus again brought to their bar was assuredly the same Wilfrid whom Pope Agathon had formerly acquitted and placed by his side as a man of irreproachable faith and life. When this was understood, the Pope and all the others declared that a man who had been forty years a bishop, instead of being persecuted in this manner, ought to be sent back with honor to his own country; and the sentence of absolution was unanimously pronounced.

Wilfrid is acquitted.

The Pope summed up and terminated the entire discussion in a letter to the two Kings of Northumbria and Mercia. After having reminded them of the sentence given by Pope Agathon, and described the regularity of the new trial over which he had himself presided, he enjoined Archbishop Berchtwald to convoke a council along with Bishop Wilfrid, to summon Bishops Bosa and John (who occupied the usurped sees of York and Hexham), and after having heard them, to end the differences between them, if he could; if not, to send them to the Holy See to be tried by a more numerous council, under pain, for the recalcitrants, of being deposed and rejected by all bishops and by all the faithful. "Let your royal and Christian majesties," said the Pope in conclusion, "for the fear of God, and for love of that peace which our Lord left to His disciples, lend us your help and assistance, that those matters into which, by the inspiration of God, we have fully examined, may have their due effect; and may the recompense of so religious a work avail you in heaven, when, after a prosperous reign on earth, you enter among the happy company of the eternal kingdom." ²⁷⁴

Wilfrid thus issued from what his friend calls the furnace in which God completed his purification. He and his followers thought themselves the victors; and although the sentence against his adversaries was neither severe nor definite, the sequel showed clearly that it was all the state of the English mind could endure. It was even Wilfrid's desire, instead of availing himself of the Pope's

Wilfrid returns to England.
705.

ubi scriptum erut Wilfridus Deo amabilis, etc. Quod ubi lectum est, stupor adprehendit audientes: et silente lectore, cœperunt alterutrum requirere quis esset ille Wilfridus episcopus." — BEDE, v. 20.

²⁷⁴ "Omnia quæque in scriptis, vel anterioribus, vel modernis, partes detulerunt, vel hic inveniri potuerunt, vel a partibus verbaliter dicta sunt, subtiliter inquisita, ad cognitionem nostram perducta sunt. . . . Vestra proinde Christiana et regalis Sublimitas . . . subventum faciat atque concursus."

decision, to remain in Rome and end his days in penitence. He obeyed, however, when the Pope and council constrained him to set out, forbidding him, at the same time, to continue the cold baths which he had every night imposed upon himself as a mortification; and after visiting for the last time all the sanctuaries which were so dear to him, he left Rome, carrying with him a new provision of relics and of rich sacerdotal vestments for the Saxon churches.

He made the return journey not on foot, but on horseback; which, however, was too much for his old age; and this new journey through Italy, the Alps, and France, added to his many travels, affected him so much, that he fell dangerously ill before reaching his destination. After this he
He falls sick at Meaux. had to be carried in a litter, and arrived, apparently dying, at Meaux. There he lay for four days and nights, his eyes closed, neither speaking nor eating, and in a state of apparent unconsciousness; his breathing alone showed that he still lived. On the fifth day he raised himself in his bed, and seeing round him a crowd of Acca. monks, who chanted the psalms, weeping, he said, "Where is my priest Acca?" ²⁷⁵ This was a monk of Lindisfarne, of great learning and fervor, and an excellent musician, who, though educated by one of the rivals of Wilfrid, the intruding bishop of York, had left his first master to follow Wilfrid for love of Roman orthodoxy, and had accompanied him to Rome on this last and laborious journey. ²⁷⁶

Seeing his master thus revived, Acca fell on his knees with all present to thank God. Then they talked together with holy awe of the last judgment. On which Wilfrid, having sent away all the rest of his attendants, said to Acca, "I have just had a vision which I will only confide to you, and of which I forbid you to speak until I know the will of God regarding it. A being clothed in white has appeared to me; he told me that he was the Archangel Michael, sent to tell me that God had spared my life in answer to the prayers and tears of my brethren and my children, as well as to the intervention of the Holy Virgin His Mother.²⁷⁷ He added that I should yet live several years, and should die in my own country, and in peace, after having regained the greater part of that which has been taken from me." And in fact he did recover, and pursued his journey without any further hinderance.

²⁷⁵ "Feretio portatus . . . tantum halitus et calida membra vivum demonstrabant . . . resedit, apertisque oculis vidit circa se choros psalterium simul et flentium fratrum. . . . Ubi est Acca presbyter?" — EDDIUS, c. 53; BEDE, v. 29.

²⁷⁶ "Doctissimus . . . castissimus . . . in ecclesiasticæ institutionis regulis . . . solertissimus, cantator peritissimus . . . deinde ad Wilfridum episcopum spe melioris propositi adveniens . . . cum quo etiam Romam veniens, multa illic quæ in patria nequiverat, Ecclesiæ sanctæ institutis utilia didicit." — BEDE, v. 20. Bede dedicated his Hexameron to Acca, who first became Abbot and then Bishop of Hexham after Wilfrid, and died only in 740. He has a place among the saints, and his miracles are told among those of Wilfrid. — Act. SS. O. S. B., vol. iii. p. 204-220.

As soon as he landed in England, he caused his return to be announced to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who, already informed by his envoys of Wilfrid's success at Rome, yielded to apostolic authority, was sincerely reconciled to him, and promised to pronounce the revocation of the decrees of the Assembly of Nesterfield. They had a friendly interview near London, in presence of a multitude of abbots from various monasteries of Wilfrid's party.²⁷⁸ From London Wilfrid went to Mercia, but not to find his friend Ethelred on the throne. The preceding year, in the very midst of Wilfrid's labors at Rome, his old friend had made up his mind to exchange the cares of royalty for the peace of the cloister, and had become a monk at Bardeney, in the monastery where his wife, Ostryda of Northumbria, assassinated seven years before by the Mercian lords, had, not without difficulty, succeeded in placing the relics of her uncle, the holy King Oswald.²⁷⁹

He is reconciled to Archbishop Berchtwald.

704.

Ethelred, who had as yet no saint in his own family, thus found a patron both powerful and popular in England, and even elsewhere,²⁸⁰ in the family of his wife; and it was beside the relics of this venerated uncle that he decided to end his life after a reign of nearly thirty-one years. There Wilfrid

He visits his faithful friend Ethelred, now a monk at Bardeney.

675-704.

²⁷⁷ "Visio mihi modo tremenda apparuit. . . . Adstitit mihi quidam dicens se Michaellem archangelum." — BEDE, v. 19. It was to commemorate this intercession of the Mother of God that Wilfrid on his return to Hexham caused the Church of St. Mary to be erected, of which some remains may be seen near the great church of the ancient priory; it was of a form quite new in England: "Ecclesiam construxerat opere rotundo, quam quatuor porticus, quatuor respicientes mundi climata, ambiebant." — ÆLREDUS, De Sanctis Ecclesiæ Hagulstadensis, c. 5.

²⁷⁸ "Apostolica auctoritate coactus, et per nuntios suos directis scriptis territus et tremebundus, pacifice et sine simulatione (sicut rei eventus probavit) sancto pontifici nostro reconciliatus est." — EDDIUS, c. 54.

²⁷⁹ See above, p. 299, the resistance of the Mercian monks to the religious practices of the Northumbrian king.

²⁸⁰ In Friesland and Ireland. — BEDE, iii. 13.

sought him; and finding his old friend, his generous host, and faithful protector, clad in the same monastic habit as himself, and weeping for joy at his return, Wilfrid threw himself into his arms; and the two clasped each other in this embrace in one of those moments of perfect union and sympathy which God sometimes grants to two generous hearts which have together struggled and suffered in His cause.²⁸¹

The bishop then showed the king the Pope's letter addressed to him, which contained the apostolic judgment, with the bulls and seals all in order. Ethelred, having read it, cried, "I will neither infringe it nor allow it to be infringed in the smallest particular while I live; I will support it with all my power." He immediately sent for his nephew, who had succeeded him on the Mercian throne, told him of the Pope's decision, and conjured him to execute it fully in everything connected with the Wilfridian monasteries in their kingdom. The new king promised willingly, with all the eagerness of a man already inclined to that monastic life which he afterwards embraced in his own person.

But Wilfrid was not at the end of his troubles. King Aldfrid refuses to recognize the judgment of the Holy See. Mercia had always been to him a friendly and hospitable country. It was a different matter in Northumbria. Ethelred advised him to send to Aldfrid two monks whom the king favored, an abbot and the professor of theology at Ripon, to inquire whether he would receive Bishop Wilfrid with the verdict given at Rome. The king at first made an evasive answer, but on his second interview with these ambassadors, by the advice of his counsellors, he refused. "Dear and venerable brothers," he said to them, "ask what you will for yourselves, and I will give it you willingly; but do not ask anything in behalf of your master Wilfrid; he was judged in the first place by my predecessors in concert with Archbishop Theodore and their counsellors, and afterwards by myself, with the concurrence of another archbishop sent by the Holy See, and almost all the bishops of the country; so long as I live I will change nothing out of regard to what you call a mandate of the Holy See."²⁸² This speech sounds like an anticipation of the famous Nolumus leges Anglice mutare of the English barons in the days of the Plantagenets.

²⁸¹ "Ad Ethelredum . . . semper fidelissimum amicum, nimirum pro nimio gaudio lachrymantem. . . . Mitissime eum salutavit, osculantes et amplexantes se invicem; honorifice ab amico more suo susceptus erat." — EDDIUS, c. 54. Cf. BEDE, v. 19.

²⁸² "Sicut consiliarii ejus persuaserunt. . . . O fratres, mihi ambo ven-

"As long as I live," said King Aldfrid; but he had not long to live. He soon after fell dangerously ill, and believed himself smitten by God, and punished for his contempt of apostolic authority. He openly confessed his sin against Wilfrid, expressed his desire to receive a visit from him before his death, and vowed, if he recovered, to conform to the desires of the bishop and the sentence of the Pope. "If it be the will of God," said he, "that I should die, I command my successor, whosoever he may be, in the name of the Lord, for the repose of my soul and his own, to make peace with Wilfrid."²⁸³ Many witnesses heard these words, and chief among them his sister, Princess Elfleda, Abbess of Whitby, who, since the death of her other brother Egfrid, twenty years before, had been completely won to the interests of Wilfrid.²⁸⁴ Soon afterwards Aldfrid lost the power of speech, and died. He left none but young children, and the Northumbrian crown descended to a prince named Eadwulf. Wilfrid, who had already returned to Ripon, and who, it is not known why, counted on the new king's favor, was preparing to go to him, when Eadwulf, by the advice of his counsellors, and perhaps of the Witen-Gemot, which had misled Aldfrid, gave him to understand that if he did not leave Northumbria within six days, all his followers who could be seized should be put to death.²⁸⁵

Death of King
Aldfrid.
703.

His successor expels Wilfrid within six days.

But the prosperous days of Northumbria were over, and civil wars were about to destroy the order and prosperity which had reigned there since the establishment of national independence during the great reign of Oswy. Bernicia revolted in the name of the eldest son of Aldfrid. This was a child of eight

He is himself dethroned, and replaced by Osred, son of Aldfrid.

erabiles . . . quia quod ante prædecessores mei reges et archiepiscopus cum consiliariis suis censuerunt, et quod postea nos cum archiepiscopo ab apostolica sede emissio . . . judicavimus: hoc, inquam, quamdiu vixero, propter apostolicæ sedis (ut dicitis) scripta, nunquam volo mutare." — EDDIUS, c. 55.

²⁸³ "Præcipio in nomine Domini, quicumque mihi in regnum successerit, ut cum Wilfrido episcopo pro remedio animæ meæ et suæ pacem et concordiam ineat." — EDDIUS, c. 56.

²⁸⁴ "Ælfleda abbatissa et sapientissima virgo, quæ est vere filia regis." — Ibid.

²⁸⁵ "Persuasus a consiliariis suis. . . Per salutem meam juro, nisi de regno meo in spatio sex dierum discesserit, de sodalibus ejus quoscunque invenero, morte peribunt." — EDDIUS, c. 56.

years old, named Osred, who was already considered as the adopted son of Wilfrid.²⁸⁶ By means of some mysterious influence, the nature of which is unknown, the aged exile Wilfrid, who had been expelled from the country for fourteen years, and was to all appearance forgotten, betrayed, and set aside, became all at once the master of the situation, and the arbiter of events.

He soon acquired a more powerful protector than the young sovereign in the person of an ealderman named Bertfrid, who was considered the most powerful noble in the kingdom, and who was at the head of Osred's party. King Eadwulf marched against the insurgents, and obliged them to retreat to the fortress of Bamborough, capital of the first Northumbrian kings, near the holy isle of Lindisfarne. Bertfrid and his men, shut up in the narrow enclosure of this fortified rock, were reduced to the last extremity, and not knowing what saint to invoke, they made a vow that, if God would deliver them, and give to their young prince the throne of his father, they would fulfil exactly the judgment of the Holy See regarding their aged bishop.²⁸⁷ Scarcely had this vow been solemnly taken by the besieged when a change took place in the minds of their assailants. A number of Eadwulf's followers forsook him and came to an understanding with Bertfrid, who made a sally at the head of his garrison, by which Eadwulf was vanquished, dethroned, and himself exiled, after a short reign of two months over the kingdom from which he had brutally expelled the venerable bishop.

As soon as the royal child was placed on the throne, the Archbishop of Canterbury made his appearance, perceiving that the time was come for executing the apostolic judgment, and definitely settling Wilfrid's affairs in a general assembly. This was held in the open air on the banks of the Nid, a river which flows a little to the south of the fertile plain in which Wilfrid's Abbey of Ripon was situated. The council was composed of the three bishops who shared among them the diocese of Wilfrid, and of all the abbots and nobles of Northum-

²⁸⁶ "Regnavit puer regius . . . et sancto pontifici nostro filius adoptivus factus est."

²⁸⁷ "Undique circumcincti hostili manu in angustiaque rupis lapideæ mansimus; inito consilio inter nos, si Deus nostro regali puero regnum patris cui concessisset, quæ mandavit sancta apostolica auctoritas de sancto Wilfrido episcopo adimplere, Deo spondimus." — EDDIUS, c. 57.

bria; it was presided over by the archbishop, who had the king by his side. Wilfrid too was present, and met there his two powerful adherents, Bertfrid and the Abbess Elfreda. This noble and sainted princess, sister of the three last kings of Northumbria, and sister-in-law of two neighboring kings, those of East Anglia and Mercia, was yet more influential on account of her virtues than of her birth. All the Northumbrians regarded her as the consoler and best counsellor of the kingdom. The archbishop opened the sitting with these words, "Let us pray the Holy Spirit to send peace and concord into all our hearts. The blessed Wilfrid and myself have brought you the letter which the Holy See has addressed to me by his hands, and which shall now be read to you."²⁸⁸ He then read the pontifical decrees delivered in the different councils at Rome. A dead silence followed; on which Bertfrid, who was universally recognized as the first personage in the kingdom after the king, said, "We do not understand Latin, and we beg that you will translate to us the apostolic message."²⁸⁹ The archbishop undertook the necessary translation, and made all understand that the Pope ordered the bishops to restore to Wilfrid his churches, or that all parties should go to Rome to be judged there, under pain of excommunication and deposition to all opposers, lay or ecclesiastical, even including the king himself.²⁹⁰ Nevertheless the three bishops²⁹¹ (all of whom have places among saints) did not hesitate to combat this decision, appealing to the decrees made by King Egfrid and Archbishop Theodore, and to those of the Assembly of Nesterfield, under Aldfrid. At this point the holy Abbess Elfreda interposed: in a voice which all listened to as an utterance from heaven, she described the last illness and agony of the king her brother, and how he had vowed to God and St. Peter to accomplish all the decrees he had before rejected. "This," she said, "is the last will of Aldfrid the king; I attest the truth of it before Christ."

Abbess Elfreda and Count Bertfrid intervene in favor of Wilfrid.

²⁸⁸ "Rex cum totius regni sui principibus et tres episcopi ejus cum abbatibus, nec non et beata Eanfleda abbatissa semper totius provincie consolatrix, optimaque consiliatrix . . . sedentibus in loco synodali. . . Habemus, enim ego et beatus Wilfridus episcopus, scripta apostolica."—EDDIUS, c. 57.

²⁸⁹ "Nos qui interpretatione indigemus."

²⁹⁰ "Si quis contemnens . . . sciat se, si rex sit aut laicus, a corpore et sanguine Christi excommunicatum: si vero episcopus aut presbyter . . . ab omni gradu ecclesiastico degradari."

²⁹¹ These three bishops were, Bosa of York, John of Hexham, and Eadfrid of Lindisfarne, bishop since 698.

Bertfrid afterwards spoke in the name of the king, commencing thus: "The desire of the king and nobles is, in all things, to obey the commandment of the Holy See and of King Aldfrid."²⁹² He then related the history of the siege of Bamborough, and the vow which bound the consciences of the victors.

Nevertheless the three bishops would not yield; General reconciliation. they retired from the assembly to confer among themselves, and with Archbishop Berchtwald, but above all with the sagacious Elfleda. Thanks to her, and thanks also to the extreme moderation of Wilfrid, who required only the minimum of the conditions imposed at Rome, all ended in a general reconciliation. It was decreed that there should be perpetual peace and alliance between the Northumbrian bishops, the king, and the thanes on one side, and Bishop Wilfrid on the other; but that Wilfrid should content himself with his two best monasteries, and the large possessions attached to them — that is, with Ripon, where no new bishopric had been erected, and Hexham, into the see of which he entered; its late titular holder, John of Beverley, being, by a fresh concession made for the sake of peace, removed to York.²⁹³

As soon as the treaty was concluded, the five bishops embraced, and received the holy communion together. The assembly dispersed amidst general rejoicing, which soon spread all over Northumbria. The most inveterate enemies of Wilfrid were glad of a peace which gave repose to their consciences. But the cloisters and arches of the Wilfridian monasteries echoed with the voice of a more enthusiastic gladness, receiving back again multitudes of disciples and monks, some of whom had been dispersed by persecution and exile, some enslaved by detested masters, who hastened with delight to find themselves once more under the sway of a father whom all the world henceforth considered as a saint, and who had always possessed the faculty of inspiring a passionate affection in his children.²⁹⁴

²⁹² "Episcopi vero resistentes . . . beatissima Elfleda abbatissima benedicto suo ore dicebat: Vere in Christo dico testamentum Aldfridi regis. Prefatus regis princeps, respondens dixit: Hæc est voluntas regis et principum ejus."

²⁹³ It is not known what the arrangement was in respect to Bosa, the intruding Bishop of York, who died most opportunely about this time. — BEDE, v. 3. As to the bishopric of Lindisfarne, it remained in the hands of the new titular, Bishop Eadfrid.

²⁹⁴ "Reddentes ei duo optima cænobia . . . cum omnibus redditibus suis. . . Et hæc est maxima beatitudo ex utraque parte, tam illorum . . . quam

This was the last act of Wilfrid's public life. It began in that famous assembly where the Celtic Church was bound by his youthful and vigorous influence to the feet of Roman tradition — an assembly which partook at once of the character of a council and a parliament, presided over by King Oswy, in presence of the Abbess St. Hilda, and held at her monastery. He ended his career, after forty years of unwearied struggles, in another assembly of the same kind, held in presence of the grandson of Oswy, and influenced in the highest degree by another Abbess of Whitby, the gentle Elfleda, who was, like Hilda, a saint and a princess of that Northumbrian dynasty with the destinies of which those of Wilfrid were so intimately connected.

It is impossible not to be struck by the great and singular influence exercised over the destiny of Wilfrid by women, or, to speak more correctly, by the Anglo-Saxon princesses whose contemporary he was. It is a peculiarity found in the history of no other saint, and which few historic personages manifest to the same degree. Many, such as St. Paulinus, St. Jerome, St. Augustin, St. Francis d'Assisi, St. François de Sales, St. Jean de la Croix, have owed to their wives, their mothers, their sisters, and their spiritual friends, a portion of their glory and some of their best inspirations; but we know none whose life has been so completely transformed or modified by the affection or the hatred of women. He was protected in his youth and seconded in his monastic vocation by the granddaughter of St. Clotilda, who then shared the throne of Northumbria; and it was by encouraging another queen of that country, St. Etheldreda, to change her married life for that of the cloister, that he drew upon himself his first misfortune. A third Queen of Northumbria, whom he had indirectly aided to take the place of his spiritual daughter, Etheldreda, persecuted him for two years with a bitterness which she communicated to her sister the Queen of Wessex, and her sister-in-law the Queen of Mercia; and the three together uniting their efforts, used their influence with the kings their husbands to aggravate the distresses of the proscribed bishop, until the time when the Queen of the pagan Saxons of the South, herself a Christian, secured him an asylum, and offered him a nation to convert.

*Influence of the Anglo-Saxon princesses
over the destiny of
Wilfrid.*

nostrorum, qui per diversa exsilia dispersi, tristes sub alienis dominis servieramus, nunc enim . . . capite charissimo . . . gaudentes et exultantes in benedictione vivimus."

Those princesses who had forsaken the life of the world to govern great monastic communities were not less mingled with his stormy career. The abbess-queen of Ely, St. Etheldreda, continued to follow his counsels in the cloister as on the throne. St. Hilda, the Abbess of Whitby, pursued him with an enmity as constant as the affection of her niece; while St. Ebba, the Abbess of Coldingham, interfered in his favor, and delivered him from a painful captivity. It has just been seen how St. Elfeda, the sister and daughter of the four Northumbrian kings under whom he had lived, after inheriting the crosier of St. Hilda, came forward as the advocate and protectress of the prelate, contributing more than any other to his last triumph. Finally, he himself, when more than seventy years old, and on his death-bed, left his vestments to her whom he called "his abbess," to Cyndreda, who owes her place in the history of the Church and the history of souls to this latest homage of the aged champion of Rome and of spiritual independence.

CHAPTER VI.

THE LAST YEARS OF WILFRID. — 705-709.

Wilfrid's illness assembles all the abbots of his monasteries about him. — He divides his treasures : his farewell to the monks of Ripon. — His last journey to Mercia. — He consecrates the Church of Evesham monastery. — Bishop Egwin of Worcester and the smiths. — Vision of the three virgins in the forest. — Simon de Montfort, creator of the House of Commons, buried at Evesham. — Wilfrid narrates all his life to his successor Tatbert. — His death. — His funeral at Ripon. — His worship and his miracles. — He appears with St. Cuthbert to relieve Hexham against the Scots : the Christian Dioscouri. — His banner appears at the battle of the Standard. — Services which he rendered to the monastic order, to the Church of England, to the universal Church, to the English nation. (Note on the Culdees of York.) — He begins that long succession of pontiff-confessors which has no rival out of the Church of England. — His character.

WILFRID passed the four last years of his life in peace at his Monastery of Hexham, which had, though not by his will, become a cathedral and the

Wilfrid's
illness gathers all his abbots

seat of a diocese, the last of those of which he had been successively bishop.²⁹⁵ As he travelled on one occasion from Hexham to Ripon, he was attacked by a sudden faint, even more serious than that which seized him at Meaux. He was carried into a house on the roadside, and there ensued a scene which proves the love with which he was regarded, and how it was at once a bishop, a king, and a father whom his great and powerful monastic family was about to lose. At the first report of his illness all the abbots of his numerous monasteries, and even the anchorites who had gone out from his foundations, hurried to Hexham. Distance was no obstacle to them; they travelled day and night, questioning every passer-by, and continuing their course with hastened steps or saddened hearts according as the answer they received told them that their father was yet living, or that they would arrive too late. It was the desire of all to see once again their master and beloved father, and to join their prayers and tears to those of the community, that he might be permitted to regain consciousness, and to put his succession in order by dividing his property, and naming the future superiors of all his houses;²⁹⁶ for his influence was everywhere so great that the monks had given up their right to elect their own chiefs, which was, however, one of the constitutional principles of the Benedictine order. Their prayers were heard. Wilfrid recovered; but considering himself to have been thus warned that the time fixed by the archangel in his vision at Meaux would soon expire, he occupied himself in putting all his affairs in order, in preparation for his death. When he arrived at Ripon, he had the door of his treasury opened by the official who kept the keys, in presence of the two abbots of his monasteries in Mercia, and of eight of the most devout monks. It is curious to note the inexperience of the persecutors and spoilers of those remote times, which is shown by the fact that, after his two periods of exile, his condemnations, and his long absence, this treasury, left in the keeping of a few monks and often of unfriendly superiors, in the midst of a country whose government had been for around his couch.

He proceeds to the distribution of his treasure.

²⁹⁵ York in 665, Lindisfarne 678, Lichfield 681, and Hexham in 705.

²⁹⁶ "Cum intimo cordis mœrore . . . indesinenter diu noctuque canentes et deprecantes . . . omnes abbates ejus de suis locis et anachoretæ concito cursu pergentes . . . secundum traditiones hominum de morte ejus hæsistantes. . . . Ne nos quasi orbatos sine abbatibus relinqueret . . . ut et omnem vitam nostram in diversis locis secundum suum desiderium sub præpositis a se electis constitueret."—EDDUS, c. 58.

thirty years at constant war with Wilfrid, still contained treasure enough to make up four large portions of gold, silver, and precious stones. "My dearest brothers," said Wilfrid to the ten witnesses of his last wishes, "I have thought for some time of returning yet once more to that see of Peter from which I received justice and freedom, to end my life there. I shall take with me the chief of these four portions for an offering to the basilicas of Santa Maria Maggiore and St. Paul the Apostle. But if, as often happens to the old, I should die before accomplishing my wishes, I enjoin you, my faithful friends, to send these gifts to the churches I mention. Of the other three parts, you must divide one among the poor of my people for the salvation of my soul. Another shall be for the use of the two future abbots of Hexham and Ripon, and will enable them to conciliate the king and the bishops by gifts; and the last is for those who shared with me the long fatigues of exile, and to whom I cannot leave lands, that they may still have the means of living after my death." Here he stopped, overcome perhaps by emotion or fatigue; but after a while he resumed: "Remember that I appoint the priest Tatbert, my cousin, who up to this day has never left me, to be prior of the Monastery of Ripon, to take my place while I live, and to succeed me when I die. I do all this that the Archangel Michael may find me ready when my hour arrives; and I do not think it is far off." ²⁹⁷

His farewell to the monks of Ripon.

When he had finished these arrangements, he caused the bell to be rung to summon his monastic family around him. When all the monks were assembled in the chapter-house, he entered, and sat down in the midst of them. "Your prior Celin," he said, "has for a long time labored in all the duties of monastic life; I can no longer refuse him permission to return to the life of solitude and contemplation for which he thirsts. I exhort you to preserve scrupulously the regularity of your life until I return and bring you the person I judge worthy to be your superior. But if it please God that I do not return, take him who shall be pointed out to you by these my fellow-travellers: make him your abbot, and pay him the obedience ²⁹⁷ "Gazophylacium aperire claviculario præcepit. . . . Alteram partem inter se dividant, ut cum muneribus regis et episcoporum amicitiam impetrare potuerint. Tertiam vero partem iis qui mecum longa exsilia perpessi laboraverunt. . . . Hæc statuta dico ut me Michael archangelus visitans paratum inveniat." — EDDIUS, c. 59.

you have promised to God and to me." At these words, in which they foreboded a last farewell, all the monks fell on their knees weeping, and, bending their heads to the earth, promised to obey him. While they thus remained prostrate, Wilfrid blessed them, recommended them from the bottom of his tender heart to God, and departed, to see them no more.²⁹⁸

The new King of Mercia, Ceonred, nephew of his old friend Ethelred, had invited him to visit and confer with him at once as to the state of the Mercian monasteries and of his own soul; for, drawn by the example of his uncle towards monastic life, he wished to consult Wilfrid before joining that uncle in the cloister. The aged saint obeyed this call, and, crossing the Humber for the last time, entered Mercia, where he visited one after another all the monasteries he had founded or adopted in that great kingdom, making everywhere arrangements similar to those he had made at Ripon to further the well-being and security of his different communities.²⁹⁹ He even went in this last effort of his old age to a district in which he had founded no monastic houses, into the country of the Wiccians, on the borders of the Welsh Celts and Western Saxons, to consecrate a Benedictine church just built at Evesham by the young King of the Mercians and Bishop Egwin.

His last journey in Mercia.

Consecration of the Monastery of Evesham, founded by Egwin, Bishop of Worcester. 689.

The name of Egwin is worthy of a moment's pause in our narrative. He was a scion of the reigning dynasty of Mercia, and had been, in his youth, made bishop of one of the new bishoprics created by Theodore, at Worcester; but the post was a difficult one, and, notwithstanding his unwearied self-devotion, he did not succeed in purifying or regulating the morals of his flock. They would neither obey nor even listen to him. One day

²⁹⁸ "Pulsato signo tota familia Hyrporum simul in unum congregata est . . . geniculantes lacrymantesque, inclinato capite in terram . . . proneque orantes . . . et ab eo die ultra faciem ejus simul non viderunt." — EDDIUS, c. 50.

²⁹⁹ "Abbatess suos omnes in adventu suo gaudentes invenit . . . et unicuique eorum secundum suam mensuram, aut cum terris vitam monachorum suorum augmentavit, aut cum pecunia corda eorum lætificavit." — EDDIUS, c. 61. To the various monasteries, the foundation of which by Wilfrid we have described, and the names of which are known, such as Hexham, Ripon, Peterborough, Ely, and Selsey, we ought to add Stamford, in the part of Mercia conquered by the Northumbrians, which was given to him on his first return from Rome to England, by his friend the young King Alchfrid.

when he had preached against the habitual vices of the population, in a great forge situated in the depths of a wood, the smiths, far from ceasing their work, struck as hard as possible with their hammers on the anvils, so as to deafen him and drive him away.³⁰⁰ His zeal for the strict observance of the marriage vow among these new Christians had above all irritated them against him.

To put an end to the persecutions and calumnies with which he was loaded, he determined to go, following Wilfrid's example, to justify himself before the Holy See. Though he did not admit the truth of any of the accusations brought against him, he yet remembered with confusion certain sins of his youth, and to expiate them determined to undertake this long journey with his feet loaded with iron chains, and, thus voluntarily fettered, entered Rome, where Pope Constantine did him entire justice.³⁰¹ Two years after his first pilgrimage he went again to Rome, from whence he brought back the Papal charter for the monasteries which a singular circumstance had determined him to build in a forest given him by King Ethelred. A swineherd, pushing his way through the tufted thickets of this wood, once came to a clearing where he saw three lovely girls seated, whose beauty appeared to him more brilliant than the sun; the one in the middle held a book, and all three were singing celestial harmonies. Modern learning

Vision of the three virgins in the forest.

³⁰⁰ "Cum conflandi ferrum locus esset aptissimus, et fabris et ferri excusoribus maxime repleretur, gens incredula incudes malleis ferreis tanto strepitu continuo percutiebat, ut beati viri sermo non audiretur. . . . Præ concussione, immo confusione malleorum et incudum adhuc tinniebant ambæ aures ejus, ac si percutientes incudes eum suquerentur." — Act. SS. O. S. B., t. iii. p. 322, and Chronic. Abbatiae de Evesham, London, 1863, p. 26. The legend written in the eleventh century by a Prior of Evesham adds that the forge and its inhabitants were swallowed up by an earthquake, and that since then no one has been able to exercise the trade of a smith on the site of the castrum thus punished, a story which suggests the following verse of Ovid —

"Pœna potest demi, culpa perennis erit ;"

changing it thus : —

Culpa potest demi, pœna perennis erit.

Epist. ex Ponto, i. 64.

³⁰¹ "Peccatorum juvenilium quondam conscium." — GUILL. MALNESB., De Pontif. Angl., lib. iv. p. 284. "Pedes suos vinculis ferreis astrinxit quæ clave poterant firmari ac reserari." — Chron. Evesh., p. 6. The legend adds that the key of these fetters, which he had dropped into the Avon, a river of his own country, was found at Rome, in a salmon which had come up the Tiber. This miracle greatly contributed to the popular renown of St. Egwin among the English of the middle ages, who, like their descendants, were great salmon-fishers.

has supposed the locality of this vision to have been a place consecrated by Saxon superstition to the worship of the three Goddess Mothers, a worship which had struck deep root among the rural population of all the northern provinces of the Roman Empire, and which resisted the anathemas of the Councils longer than most other vestiges of idolatry.³⁰²

Egwin, when he was informed by the herdsman, went to pray humbly on the place of the vision. When his prayer was ended, he in turn saw the three virgins, one of whom, taller and infinitely more beautiful than the others, held, besides her book, a cross, with which she blessed him before she disappeared.³⁰³ He recognized the Mother of the Saviour, and immediately resolved to build a monastery in her honor in that hitherto inaccessible spot. The new king of the country, godson and pupil of Egwin, seconded his master in this design, and gave him eighty-four *manse*s or pieces of ground in the neighborhood of the forest.

On the very site of the great forge where the workmen had deafened Egwin with the noise of their hammers, and quite near the new monastery at Alcester, the Mercian parliament was convoked to give validity to the donations and privileges conferred on Egwin; and Wilfrid, as the great champion of the Benedictine rule in England, was appointed to preside at this solemnity, and to place on the altar he was about to consecrate the charter of endowment and freedom which had just been voted.³⁰⁴ At the moment when he was about to accomplish, Consecration of the Monastery of Evesham.

³⁰² ROACH SMITH, Illustrations of Roman London. The same author relates that Wolstan, a monk of Winchester, at the end of the tenth century, in his poem on the Miracles of St. Swithin, has left a singular story of three nymphs or fairies who exercised their power in the forests of his neighborhood.

³⁰³ "Surgenti ab oratione tres virgines . . . apparuere, quarum quæ media eminebat præcelsior omnique nitore splendentior, aliis præfulgebat, liliis candentior, rosis vernantior, odore inastimabili fragrantior. . . . Quum cogitaret hanc Domini Genitricem esse." — Chron. Evesh., p. 9.

³⁰⁴ "Ex mandato apostolico fuit sapientium conventus in loco qui Alnceastra vocatur . . . et Brythwaldus archiepiscopus ex ore omnium et terram loci et libertatem in carta descripsit. Tunc elegerunt sapientes ut dominus Wilfridus episcopus et ego privilegium idem ad locum eundem afferemus. Eadem autem die . . . Wilfridus episcopus et ego . . . cartam et loci libertatem . . . super altare posuimus, et sic coram omnibus locuti fuimus." — Chronicon Abbatix de Evesham, edid. W. D. MACKAY, 1863, p. 20. Cf. Pref. p. xviii. in the new collection of Rerum Britannicarum Medii Ævi Scriptores. It is needless to say that I do not quote the authority of the Rule of Pope Constantine in favor of Evesham, so cruelly turned into ridicule, together with so many other pretended Pontifical charters, by the formidable irony of Père Papebroch. (BOLLAND., vol. ii. April, pp. 30, with his colleague Egwin, this solemn mission, in presence of all the people, he made the following prayer, which was immediately enrolled in the acts of the foundation:—

“Lord God, who dwellest in heaven, and who hast created all things, save him who shall give peace and security to this place, and shall confirm the inheritance of God in that liberty in which we offer it to Him. For this reason, in the name of Almighty God and of all heavenly virtue, we enjoin that neither king, nor prince, nor minister, nor any man of what rank soever, shall have the audacity to rob this holy place, or to appropriate any part of it whatever to his own profit; that this place may always remain as we will it, consecrated to the use of the flocks and shepherds of God, and under the sway of its own abbot, according to the rule of God and St. Benedict. But if—which God forbid!—any man, led astray by avarice, should contravene this institution, may he be judged before the tribunal of God, may he be forgotten by Christ, may his name be struck out of the book of life, and himself chained in the eternal pains of hell, unless at least in this life he does penance. As to him who shall respect and preserve this foundation, may God and all the saints have him in their holy keeping, and give joy to his soul in this life and happiness in the next.”³⁰⁵

Egwin was buried in the monastery he had founded, the later annals of which are not without interest. Five hundred years afterwards it became one of the most venerated sanctuaries and most frequented places of pilgrimage in England, 31.) We may remark that the chronicler of Evesham has not dared to cite this bull at its proper date, that of the foundation, and only transcribes it in speaking of the suit decided by Pope Innocent III., Dec. 24, 1205, between the Bishop of Worcester and the Abbot of Evesham; the Pope, deceived by false documents, of which many were then fabricated, pronounced for the monastery. The monk Thomas of Marleberge, charged to plead the cause at Rome, and who has left us a very honest and animated narrative of the whole procedure, tells us that he fainted at the feet of the Pope when he heard the sentence read, partly from fatigue on account of the fast of the vigil of Christmas, partly for joy to feel that they were delivered from a quasi-Egyptian servitude.

³⁰⁵ “Domine Deus . . . conserva illum qui locum istum pacificabit et conservabit et hanc Dei hereditatem et hanc libertatem confirmabit quam Deo obtulimus. Nos etiam præcipimus . . . ut neque rex, neque princeps, neque minister, nec ullius ordinis homo, id præsumat ut locum istum sanctum diminuat aut sibi in privatam potestatem aliquid vindicet, sed sit locus hic, ut nos optamus, gregibus et Dei pastoribus ejusdem loci in usum, et bene dispositus in potestate proprii abbatis secundum regulam Dei et beati Benedicti. Si autem aliquis (quod absit) avaritiæ spiritu arreptus vertere velit, judicetur ante tribunal Dei et nunquam in Christi veneat memoriam.”
— Chron. Evesh.

the bleeding remains of Simon de Montfort, the great Earl of Leicester, slain in the great battle fought under its walls, having been carried thither. This proud aristocrat retains a just eminence in history as having completed the establishment of the most famous political assembly of modern times—the British House of Commons—by calling together the representatives of the cities and boroughs, and seating them beside the knights of the shires. Although a victorious enemy of the throne, and condemned by the Pope, he won to his side the popular and religious sentiment of the nation. During his life, and long after his death, he was the idol of the English people, who gave expression to their passionate attachment for the champion of their rights in a mode adapted to the spirit of the time, by going to pray at his tomb, attributing to him numerous miracles, and by comparing this new St. Simon to Simon Peter and Simon Maccabeus.³⁰⁶

Simon de Montfort buried at Evesham, 1265.

The consecration of this Church of Evesham, which was reserved for such memorable destinies, was the last episcopal function exercised by Wilfrid, the last act of that long life so entirely devoted to the extension of monastic life and the defence of the Roman Church. From the banks of the Avon he returned slowly to the neighborhood of Ely and Peterborough, which had long been dear and familiar to him. During this last journey it occurred to him, as to the most illustrious monk of our own day shortly before his death, to tell the story of his life to a younger friend and faithful companion, who might be his witness to posterity. It was to his inseparable follower Tatbert, as he rode by his side, that Wilfrid thus gave, not a general confession, but a detailed narrative of his long life, with the certainty of having reached the eve of its last day.³⁰⁷ Death, indeed, arrested him on his journey, at Oundle, in one of his monastic foundations near Northampton, which he had dedicated to St. Andrew the Apostle, patron of that church at Rome, from whence the first English apostles had proceeded, and where he himself, the first of Anglo-Saxon rates his life to his successor

He nar-
Tatbert.

³⁰⁶ There are seven pages of these pretended miracles in the Chronicles of the Monks of Melrose.—Cf. LINGARD, Hist. Eng., vol. ii. p. 166 of the Paris edition; and FREEMAN, Gentleman's Magazine, Sept., 1862. Evesham has preserved nothing of the splendor of its ancient abbey, except one beautiful tower of the fourteenth century.

³⁰⁷ "Omniem vitæ suæ conversationem memorialiter prius enarravit Tatberto, . . . quadam die equitantibus per viam, quasi præsciens obitum suum."

pilgrims, had prayed on his first arrival.³⁰⁸ His last illness was short, and his death gentle and without pain. He had only time to remind his companions of his former instructions, and to designate as his successor at Hexham that Acca who stood by him in his trial at Rome and during his mortal illness at Meaux.

Death of
Wilfrid.
23d June,
709.

When he had given them a last blessing, his head fell back upon the pillow, and rested there in calm repose, without a single groan or sigh. The whole weeping community chanted prayers around his bed. As they reached Psalm CIII. and the verse Emitte spiritum tuum et creabuntur, his breathing ceased, and he yielded up his soul to his Creator.³⁰⁹ The aged soldier of God died more gently than an infant in the cradle. He was seventy-six years of age, forty-four of which he had been a bishop.

His funeral was celebrated with a mingled pomp and grief which can readily be imagined. Tatbert, his disciple, confidant, and successor, was also his chief mourner. Before the burial, and in obedience to the last affectionate injunction of the dying, he sent the shirt of the saint, still moist with his last sweat, to an abbess named Cyndreda, who had been converted by Wilfrid, who now governed one of the monasteries of his congregation,³¹⁰ and who had, doubtless, like the Abbess of Coldingham and Whitby, distinguished herself by her fidelity to the exiled and persecuted pontiff. The body was carried to Ripon, and buried in the church which he had built and dedicated to St. Peter, the apostle whom, along with St. Andrew, he had most venerated.³¹¹ Tatbert ordained that a special mass should be said for him; and that every year, on the day of his anniversary, the tithe of his flocks should be distributed to the poor, besides the daily

³⁰⁸ See above, p. 309.

³⁰⁹ "Cum quiete, non cum gemitu et murmure, caput ad cervical lectuli inclinavit et requievit."

³¹⁰ "Ad abbatissam sancti pontificis nostri, nomine Cynedryd."—EDDIUS, c. 62.

"Interulamque puer sancti sudore madentem
Corripuit, normatrici tulit atque beatæ
Quam sibi flaminco sociaverat apte verendo
Egregius heros, redimitim castificando."

FRIDEGODUS, Carmen de Sancto Wilfrido, c. 55.

The holy Bishop Cuthbert, who died in 687, also sent his last garment to an abbess who had touched him by her pious devotion.

³¹¹ EDDIUS, c. 61 and 64.

alms which were given also by Tatbert's orders, for the soul of his dear master and for his own.³¹²

As soon as he was dead, Wilfrid appeared to the eyes of all in his true light, as a great saint and a great man. The popular veneration, restrained or disturbed during his life by the struggles of race, party, and opinion in which he had been engaged, found expression beside his tomb. Miraculous cures on earth, luminous apparitions in the sky; a supernatural power which protected the cell where he died from profanation and from the ravages of fire — such were the first wonders which awoke the enthusiastic confidence of the Anglo-Saxons in this saint of their own race,³¹³ a confidence which, having once taken root, went on increasing, and shone out with redoubled intensity four centuries later under the first Norman Kings. It was not only the blind, the infirm, the dying, and the shipwrecked who found occasion to rejoice that they had invoked the powerful intercession of the sainted Abbot of Hexham with God, but also many innocent victims of persecution, many outraged virgins, and whole populations desolated by the ravages of war or by the oppression of foreign conquerors.³¹⁴

His worship and miracles.

At Hexham, in honor of the sanctuary which he had created,

³¹² The beautiful epitaph which Bede has preserved to us, and of which he was probably the author, deserves to be quoted, at least in part: —

“Wilfridus hic magnus requiescit corpore præsul,
Hanc Domino qui aulam ductus pietatis amore
Fecit, et eximio sacravit nomine Petri,
Cui claves cæli Christus dedit arbiter orbis. . . .
Paschalis qui etiam sollemnia tempora cursus
Catholici ad justum correxerat dogma canonis,
Quem statuere patres, dubioque errore remoto
Certa suæ genti ostendit moderamina ritus:
Inque locis istis monachorum examina crebra
Colligit, ac monitis cavet quæ regula patrum
Sedulus instituit: multisque domique, forisque
Jactatus nimium per tempora longa periculis,
Quindecies ternos postquam egit episcopus annos
Transiit, et gaudens celestia regna petivit.
Dona, Jesu, ut grex pastoris calle sequatur.”

³¹³ EDDIUS, c. 62, 63.

³¹⁴ See the curious narrative of Abbot Ælred of Rievaulx, entitled De Sanctis Ecclesiæ Hagulstadensis et eorum Miraculis, ap. MABILLON, Acta SS. O. S. B., vol. iii. pp. 204, 220, and RAINE's Priory of Hexham. We may remark especially the incident of the young man unjustly condemned, who, at the moment of his execution, turned to the church of the saint, crying, “Adjuva nunc, Wilfride, quia si modo nolueris, paulo post non poteris.” On which there arrived in hot haste two fidejussores, who gave security for him more patrio, and saved him. This story is cited by Palgrave as a proof of the utility of invoking saints and miracles against the iniquity of the law.

and for so long a time inhabited, the right of sanctuary was allowed to extend to a great circle round the monastery, the great enclosure — a sanctuary not only for ordinary criminals, but, especially in time of war, for the neighboring population, who took refuge there with their cattle, and whom the sword of the most cruel invaders dared not follow thither. The limits of this sanctuary were marked only by crosses erected at certain distances. The town which was soon after built close to the great monastery had no walls; the universal veneration for the memory of Wilfrid served it instead of ramparts. Nearly four centuries after his death, this veneration, and the confidence it inspired in the surrounding people, were expressed in a touching and truly poetic legend. King cruel incursions into England, irritated by the murder of his messengers near Hexham, ordered the sack of the town and a general massacre of its inhabitants. The Galloway Picts, the most ferocious of all the Scotch, were charged with the execution of this atrocious order, which was but too much in accordance with the spirit of the time. The tears and supplications of the intended victims had been as vain as the entreaties of the clergy to move the king from his purpose. On the eve of the day fixed for the massacre, the whole population, disarmed and desperate, fled to the church of Wilfrid, which resounded with their cries. At this crisis one of the principal priests of the town fell asleep from fatigue, and had a dream, in which he saw two bishops arriving on horseback from the south. These Christian Dioscouri³¹⁵ came at a gallop to announce to the unfortunate inhabitants of Hexham that they were saved. "I am Wilfrid,"

Malcolm of Scotland, in one of his numerous and 1060-1093.

He hastens with St.
Cuthbert to the aid of his town of Hexham
against the Scots.

said one, "and this is Cuthbert, whom I brought with me as I passed by Durham. We are come to deliver you. I have heard the weeping and cries of those who pray in my church. Fear nothing. At the dawn of day I will spread my net over the whole course of the Tyne, and no one shall be able to cross it to hurt you." Accordingly, in the morning a thick fog covered the whole valley. The messengers of the king lost their way, and when the fog dispersed the Tyne had risen so high that, there being no bridge, the Scots could not pass over. The husband of St. Margaret saw in this the finger ³¹⁵ This recalls the apparition of Castor and Pollux at the battle of Lake Regillus.

of God, and gave up his cruel design, and the inhabitants of Hexham were more and more convinced that the arm of Wilfrid was ever ready to defend them.³¹⁶

But it is specially at Ripon, where his relics reposed, that the universal faith manifested itself. Crowds came thither from all quarters, as if they expected still to find in bodily presence the aged saint who had feared neither man nor obstacles, and whose protection they invoked and even exacted with blind trust and tender familiarity, against the iniquities of conquest, the abuse of power, and the unjust severity of the law.³¹⁷

Fifty years after the deliverance of Hexham, the Scotch, under their sainted King David, reappeared in Northumbria, and committed horrors rarely equalled even in the barbarous wars of the period.³¹⁸ The alarmed population took arms under the leadership of the Archbishop of York, and of those Anglo-Norman barons who were most celebrated for the munificence they displayed in the monastic restorations of the twelfth century — the Bruces, Mowbrays, Percies, and Estoutevilles. They marched against the cruel invaders, and met them at some distance to the north of Ripon. The English were drawn up round a cart similar to that famous carroccio which the Lombards of the same period led into battle against the Emperor Frederic Barbarossa: on this humble pedestal, above a pyx containing the host, they had planted the banner of Wilfrid — Wilfridi Ripensis vexillum — between those of St. Peter and St. John. This cart, which they called the

His banner appears at the battle
of the Standard.
1138.

³¹⁶ "Rex vocat Gallowenses homines cæteris crudeliores. . . . 'Mox ut dies illuxerit, transeuntes flumen, irruite in eos. Non parcat oculus vester non ordini, non sexui, non ætati.' . . . Clamor ingens, ploratus et ululatus. . . . Et ecce apparuerunt duo viri . . . sedentes in equis. . . . Wilfridus vocor, et ecce hic mecum est sanctus Cuthbertus, quem transiens per Dunelmum adduxi. . . . Ecce, albescente aurora, extendam rete meum." — ÆLRED RIEVALENSIS, De SS. Ecclesie Hagulstad., c. 2, ed. Surtees. Cf. Pref., p. lx. Wilfrid is said to have come from Ripon, where his tomb was, and to have gone towards the north, passing by Durham, which is south of Hexham.

³¹⁷ "Ita ad eum in hac ecclesia quasi ad viventem confugerent, in omnibus necessitatibus quasi præsentem consulerent, in tribulationibus et angustiis ejus auxilium non tam peterent quam exigerent."

³¹⁸ See the contemporary historians quoted by Lingard, and above all the discourse of a bishop before the battle, omitted in the edition given by Twysden of the special account by Ælred, Abbot of Rievaulx, De Bello Standardi, but restored, after the manuscripts, by Raine, in Priory of Hexham, vol. i. p. 89.

Standard,³¹⁹ gave its name to the battle, in which the King of Scotland and his ferocious army were completely routed. After the victory, they brought back to Ripon in triumph the banner of the saint, who had thus protected and saved his former diocese. The banner often reappeared at the head of battalions armed for the defence of the country.³²⁰

Of this enduring and touching popularity there now remains nothing but a shadow, a name, a meaningless word. In the modern town of Ripon, which has grown out of the great monastery founded by Wilfrid, the people have retained the habit of calling a certain Sunday in the year Wilfrid's Sunday; ³²¹ but when they are asked why, it becomes plain that they know nothing either of the saint to whom they owe their municipal existence, nor of the Church whose apostle and champion he was.

What the work of Wilfrid was. Happily for us, his work and his glory are inscribed in ineffaceable characters in the history of that Church, as well as of his country. His work was as varied as it was successful and lasting. Let us first remark its importance in respect to the monastic order. No one has done more for the extension and consolidation of that order in England, in the first place, by the introduction of the Benedictine rule, then established only at Canterbury; and afterwards by charters and exemptions obtained from Rome, and from the Saxon kings and parliaments, in behalf of the great foundations of his time, such as Hexham and Peterborough; but above all, by the strongly woven links of intimate and active association between the numerous monasteries who regarded him as their head — a connection which gave them mutual security against the violence and usurpation of the princes and powers around them.³²²

In the year which followed his death, the first anniversary

³¹⁹ "Dicitur a stando Standardum, quod stetit illic militiæ probitas vincere sive mori."

³²⁰ RICARDI HAGULSTADENSIS, De Gestis Regis Stephani et de Bello Standardi, ed. Surtees, pp. 91, 93.

³²¹ FABER, p. 204. There are no remains of Wilfrid's church, unless it be the crypt of the present cathedral, which is attributed to that period. In the time of Leland, a little before the Reformation, there were only three crosses, antiquissimi operis, on the site of the ancient monastery. One of the three spires of the church, rebuilt in the fourteenth century, bore the name of St. Wilfrid. It was blown down by the wind in 1660.

³²² "In ipsis exiliis non otio deditus, sed cœnobiis et episcopatibus fundandis industrius. . . . Reliquit cœnobia quot nullus, quæ solus aggregaverat, multis dividens hæredibus." — WILL. MALMESB., f. 153.

of his funeral brought together at Ripon all the abbots of the numberless monasteries which he had either founded, adopted, or received among his own communities. They came from the four corners of England, disturbed and anxious as to the situation in which the death of their venerable chief had placed them. "While he lived," they said, "we often had to suffer the violence of kings and nobles; but by his holiness, his wisdom, and the great number of his friends, he was always able to deliver us. We must now believe that he will be our protector in heaven, as are St. Peter and St. Andrew, whom he loved so much, and to whom he dedicated all his possessions, and all his followers." On the evening of this anniversary, after supper, during the twilight of the long summer day, all the abbots, followed by the whole community of Ripon, went out to sing complines in the open air. There they saw the whole heaven lighted up by a great rainbow, the pale radiance of which proceeded from the tomb of the saint, and wrapt the whole enclosure of the monastery in light. Eddi, the faithful biographer of Wilfrid, was there, and saw with wonder this luminous circle. "We all understood," he says, "that the intercession of the saint was to be, by the goodness of God, an impregnable rampart round the vine of the Lord and His family; and the event has proved it, for since that time we have lived in safety, under abbots freely chosen by ourselves, and when some have been threatened, others have come to their help, and that throughout all England, north as well as south of the Humber."³²³

Our musician thus indicates, as it seems, that Wilfrid had succeeded in making, at least for a time, a first attempt at that association of different monasteries among themselves which many great monastic saints had dreamed of as the completion of the rule of St. Benedict, and which is realized on so vast a scale in the orders of Cluny and Cîteaux.

To the Church of England Wilfrid did the immense service of securing the permanence of the episcopate. Proceeding in opposition to him, and by uncanonical methods, to partition the primitive bishoprics, Archbishop Theodore, his rival and enemy, established a new diocesan division, better adapted to the wants of the country. In addition to this, the same pontiff appointed the election of bishops to be conducted by popular assemblies presided over by the primate, at which deputies from the vacant church might be heard, and where the nominations of the king were discussed and controlled by the bishops and nobles; so that it might be truly said that, in principle, the choice of the bishops, as well as of the abbots, depended on the clergy.³²⁴ But the power of the episcopate became rapidly so great, and its dignity so much sought after, that the elections were soon interfered with in an injurious and oppressive manner by the throne. Wilfrid opposed a far more efficacious barrier to this lay influence by resisting to the utmost the claim made by the kings to nominate, depose, or remove bishops at their pleasure, and by consecrating the principle of permanence and immovability in the episcopate as much by the support of the Holy See as by the national synods. Thanks to him, until the Norman Conquest, four centuries later, no English king dared arbitrarily depose a bishop from his see.

Services rendered to the English Church;

³²³ "Undique abbates ejus cum subjectis suis . . . ab oriente et occidente, ab aquilone et austro. . . . Quamdiu vixit optimum caput vitæ nostræ, frequenter a regibus et principibus tentationes sustinimus, quibus . . . finem venerabilem semper imponere consuevit. . . . In crepusculo vespertino . . . candidum circulum totum cœnobium circumdans quasi per diem arcus cœli absque variis caloribus. . . . Nos vero adorantes laudavimus Dominum."—Eddius, c. 64.

To the Church
universal;

To the whole Catholic Church he rendered the important service of fighting, overcoming, and destroying the exclusive spirit of Celtic Christianity. Without being in any way a revolt or protest against Catholic unity, without deserving at all that imputation of heresy or schism of which Wilfrid and his followers were too prodigal, this spirit might readily have degenerated into a sort of narrow and jealous provincialism. After having long repulsed the idea of communicating the benefits of the faith to the Anglo-Saxon conquerors of Britain, the Celtic Church reconsidered the matter, and the ice having been once broken by Roman missionaries, she took measures to supplant and eclipse them everywhere. But the Celtic apostles of England, no doubt without knowing it, by a series of pedantic details, isolated their new converts from the Church of Rome, the centre of Christian action, precisely at the moment when that Church, called by Providence to evangelize the immense family of Teutonic tribes beyond the Rhine and Danube, had the most imperative need of help from that Teutonic race whose mission St. Gregory the Great had prophetically pointed out, and whom God had made the most active, the hardest, and the most persevering of all barbarous races. England was about to become a mere ecclesiastical branch of Ireland, and her character in that case would have become doubly insular, to the detriment of Catholic unity and the common interest of the Christian world. Wilfrid appeared: by a fifty years' struggle, and at the cost of his peace, his safety, and even his personal freedom, he first neutralized, and finally annihilated, the Celtic spirit, without at any time being guilty of persecution, coercion, or violence towards the vanquished. He did more than check the Celtic movement; he sent it back into chaos; he extirpated all the ritual and liturgic differences which served as a veil and pretext for the prejudices of race and opinion; he extirpated them, not only in his immense diocese, the vast region of Northumbria,³²⁵ but throughout all England; and not in England only, but, by the contagion of his example and his influence, in Ireland, in Scotland, and finally in the very sanctuary of Celtic Christianity, at Iona.³²⁶

³²⁴ "Electio olim præsulum et abbatum tempore Anglorum pene clericos et monachos erat." — GUILL. MALMESB., De Gestis Pontif., c. 3, f. 157. Cf. LINGARD, Antiquities, pp. 91-96, 145.

Last of all, by himself converting the last of the conquering tribes which still remained pagan, that of the South Saxons, Wilfrid gloriously ended the conversion of England, which had been begun nearly a century before by missionaries from Rome. He did yet more. By his own pilgrimage, the first of his race to knock at the door of the Vatican, and to pray at the tomb of the Apostles — by thus

To England.

³²⁵ A few faint vestiges of Celtic traditions and institutions are all that can be found in Northumbria at a later period. For instance, in 936, King Athelstane, as he marched against the Scots, solicited the prayers of the Culdees, Colidei, who served the Cathedral of St. Peter: "Videns in dicta ecclesia viros sanctæ vitæ et conversationis honestæ dictos ad tunc Colideos, qui multos sustentabant pauperes, et modicum habebant unde viverent, concessit . . . ut melius possent sustinere pauperes confluentes, hospitalitatem tenere." This evidently refers to the Celtic Celi-Dé; and their existence at York in the tenth century must have dated back from the institutions of the Irish missionaries anterior to Wilfrid. It is apparent also, that according to the universal custom of Celtic as well as Benedictine monks, they combined the celebration of divine service with the care of the poor. Athelstane granted them, after his victory, "unam travam bladi de qualibet caruca arante in episcopatu York, quæ usque in præsentem diem dicitur Petercorn." These travæ had been given up to the king on the condition of his exterminating the wolves which destroyed "fere omnes villanorum bestias." The wolves killed, the rents remained available, and the king bestowed them on the Colidei. This gift, largitione fidelium, was confirmed by William the Conqueror and William Rufus, who transferred them and their rents to a hospital founded by the same Colidei at York under the name of St. Leonard. — DUGDALE, Monasticon, quoted by REEVES, The Culdees of the British Isles, pp. 59-144.

³²⁶ It will be seen further on how Adhelm, Egbert, and Adamnan finished Wilfrid's work.

instituting pilgrimages and appeals to Rome — by obliging Saxon kings and bishops to acknowledge, in law and in fact, the intervention and supremacy of the Papacy, — he brought England into the orbit of that great movement of European civilization of which the Holy See became gradually the pivot and the centre. It was he who completed and crowned the work of Gregory and Augustin. He placed the seal on the conquest of England by popes and monks. England owed it to him that she was not only Christian, but Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman. No other Anglo-Saxon exercised a more decisive and more sovereign influence on the destinies of his race.

Character of Wilfrid. In modern England, all that Wilfrid did is destroyed, all that he loved has perished. He no longer lives except in history, where he has left, for every attentive observer, an ineffaceable trace. By placing him upon her altars, the Church teaches us that by his devotion to justice, truth, and the good of souls, he has gained an eminent position among the saints. But in a purely historical point of view, his character and his career offer a study equally curious and interesting. We find in him no analogy with the great monks of the primitive Church, the solitaries of the Thebaïd, nor even with the solemn and mystic ascetics of Celtic Christianity. Though he was not insensible to the consolations and aspirations of spiritual life, the predominating features in his character are not those of an exclusively spiritual being, of a man of prayer and solitude; they are rather those of the man of action and movement, the soldier of religious life.

In Wilfrid begins that great line of prelates, by turns apostolic and political, eloquent and warlike, brave champions of Roman unity and ecclesiastical independence, magnanimous representatives of the rights of conscience, the liberties of the soul, the spiritual powers of man and the laws of God; a line to which history presents no equal out of the Catholic Church of England; a lineage of saints, heroes, confessors, and martyrs, which produced St. Dunstan, St. Lanfranc, St. Anselm, St. Thomas à Becket, Stephen Langton, St. Edmund, the exile of Pontigny, and which ended in Reginald Pole. By a strange and touching coincidence, it is beside the tomb of this last Roman Catholic Archbishop of Canterbury, in the cathedral, sprinkled with the blood of St. Thomas the Martyr, that the relics of Wilfrid now rest, having been transferred to the church of the primacy in 959 to save them from the sacrilegious rapacity of the Danes.³²⁷

In addition to all this, Wilfrid was the precursor of the great prelates, the great monks, the princely abbots of the middle ages, the heads and oracles of national councils, the ministers and lieutenants, and often the equals and rivals of kings. When duty called, no suffering alarmed, no privation deterred, and no danger stopped his course; four times in his life he made the journey to Rome, then ten times more laborious and a hundred times more dangerous than the voyage to Australia is now. But, left to himself, he loved pomp, luxury, magnificence, and power. He could be humble and mild when it was necessary; but it was more congenial to him to confront kings, princes, nobles, bishops, councils, and lay assemblies, in harsh and inflexible defence of his patrimony, his power, his authority, and his cause.

He was never without adversaries, and as it has been justly remarked, he seems to have foreseen and practised that axiom of Rancé, which says, "A Christian should spend his money in buying enemies." But many of his enemies were saints; and of all the holy bishops and abbots of his time, so numerous in the Anglo-Saxon Church, not one was his ally, not one held out to him a friendly hand in his trials and combats. Many even showed a sort of inexplicable animosity against him. It must be concluded that he did not sufficiently consider the susceptibility of national sentiment, which was always so powerful among his countrymen, and which finally detached them from Catholicism. And in addition, while making the greatest possible allowance for provincial rancor and personal jealousy, it must be admitted that there was in him an unjust contempt for former generous services, a certain sickly irritability, a tiresome pertinacity in dispute, and a haughty and injurious violence of language;³²⁸ but of language alone, for in his acts he was always tolerant and generous.

On the other hand, he had many friends. The monks who came spontaneously to range themselves under his crosier were counted by thousands; among them he found bold and faithful companions in all his travels, shipwrecks, dangers, and exiles: and these life-long followers were the same who prayed by his bedside with so many tears that his life might be spared. He inspired the most illustrious and most holy women of his race, Queen Etheldreda, the Abbess Ebba, and Elfreda, his last protectress, with an affection which vanquished all obstacles. He exercised over them, and over the most delicate and generous souls of his time, as well as over the savage Frisians and the dauntless Lombards, an irresistible influence; and this power lasted all his life from the time when, arriving at the Northumbrian court in the light armor of a boy, he gained the heart of Queen Eanfleda, until the last crisis, when the heroic Bertfrid, saviour of the Bernician dynasty, declared himself in favor of the aged exile.

³²⁷ FABER, p. 202.

³²⁸ This is admitted by the most enthusiastic of his modern biographers, Father Faber, p. 203. Compare Hook, p. 138.

This influence is explained by the rare qualities which more than redeemed all his faults. His was, before all else, a great soul, manly and resolute, ardent and enthusiastic, full of unconquerable energy, able to wait or to act, but incapable of discouragement or fear, born to live upon those heights which attract at once the thunderbolt and the eyes of the crowd. His eloquence, superior to anything yet known in England, his keen and penetrating intelligence, his eager zeal for literary studies and public education, his knowledge and love of those wonders of architecture which dazzled the Christian nation, and to which his voice attracted such crowds; his constancy in trial, his ardent love of justice, — all contributed to make of him one of those personages who sway and move the spirits of their contemporaries, and who master the attention and imagination even of those whom they cannot convince.³²⁹ Something generous, ardent, and magnanimous in his nature commended him always to the sympathy of lofty hearts; and when adverse fortune and triumphant violence and ingratitude came in, to put upon his life the seal of adversity nobly and piously borne, the rising tide of emotion and sympathy carried all before it, sweeping away all traces of those errors of conduct which might have seemed to us less attractive or comprehensible.

He was the first Anglo-Saxon who secured the attention of other nations, and the first of whom a special biography

³²⁹ "Vir pro justitiæ merito multis jactatus periculis . . . egregie factus ad promerendam gratiam principum apud quos exularet, idemque pro rigore justitiæ compatriotis regibus odiosus." — WILL. MALMESB., f. 153. Eddi, who, like all the learned monks of his time, knew his Horace by heart, does not fail, like a parliamentary orator of the nineteenth century, to apply to his hero, in the preface of his biography, the well-known lines —

"Feriuntque summos Fulgura montes."

Odes, ii. 2.

has been preserved. In each detail, as well as in the general impression made by this biography, he appears to us a type of the qualities and singularities of his nation ; of their obstinacy, courage, laborious and untiring energy, their dogged love of work and of conflict, their resolution to strive till death for their patrimony, honor, and rights. Dieu et mon droit ! This proud English motto is written on every page of the life of Wilfrid. In the service of a cause which now, by the misfortune of the ages and the blindness of men, has become the most unpopular of all causes in the eyes of the English nation, Wilfrid displayed all the virtues which are most characteristic of his countrymen, and most fitted to attract them. All the passions and all the noble instincts of his people palpitated in him. That mind must indeed be besotted by hatred, a thousand times blinder than ignorance itself, which does not recognize in him the eldest son of an invincible race, the first of the English nation.

BOOK XIII.

CONTEMPORARIES AND SUCCESSORS OF ST. WILFRID, 650-735.

"Ye are all the children of light, and the children of the day."—1 THESSAL., v. 5.

"For God hath not given us the spirit of fear; but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind."—2 TIM., i. 7.

CHAPTER I.

ST. CUTHBERT. — 637-687.

Contrast between Wilfrid and the saints of the Northumbrian coast. — His glory eclipsed by that of Cuthbert. — Childhood of Cuthbert, a shepherd on the Scottish borders. — He becomes a novice at Melrose. — He evangelizes the Scottish marches. (Note upon the Monastery of Dull, cradle of the University of St. Andrews.) — His austerities: his baths: legend of the otters. — He goes from Melrose to Ripon, from which he is expelled by Wilfrid, along with all the Celtic monks. — He becomes prior at Lindisfarne, where he establishes the customs of Rome and the Benedictine rule. — His life at Lindisfarne in its cloistral and in its external aspect. — His extreme modesty. — He becomes a hermit in a cave of the Isle of Farne. — Popular traditions concerning this portion of his life. — The birds of St. Cuthbert, and the beads of his chaplet. — His charity towards the crowd of penitents who sought him there. — His hospitality. — His humility. — King Egfrid takes him from his rock to make him Bishop of Lindisfarne. — He continues both monk and missionary during his short episcopate. — His compassion for the sufferings of his penitents. — The mad countess. — The mother consoled. — His affection for his foster-mother, for Queen Etheldreda, and the great abbesses Ebba of Coldingham and Elfreda of Whitby. (Note upon the exclusion of women from his monastery.) — His last visit to the Abbess Verca. — He returns to his rock to die. — The abbess's shroud. — Last exhortations of Cuthbert: his death. — His closest friend dies at the same hour on the same day. — Their annual interview upon the rock of Farne. — Great and lasting popularity of his memory. — Translation of his relics to Durham. — Magnificence and wealth of that cathedral, after Toledo the richest in the world. — Right of asylum. —

Efficacy of his protection to the oppressed. — Alfred, Canute, and William the Conqueror. — The independence, almost sovereign, of Cuthbert's successors under the Anglo-Norman monarchy. — He is invoked by the English against the Scottish invasions. — Battle of Neville's Cross. — His banner appears for the last time in the insurrection of the North against Henry VIII. — It is profaned and burned with his body. — His popularity at sea. — The sailor-monks. — Cuthbert, while a child, saw them like seabirds on the waves. — His appearance to sailors in danger. — The hermit Ethelwold prays for the shipwrecked. — Grace Darling, the Christian heroine of these islands in the nineteenth century.

BESIDE the great figure of Wilfrid there appears in history an entire family of monastic saints, his contemporaries and countrymen, who should have found a place in the narrative we have just concluded, had it not been already too much prolonged. But although they were all inhabitants of Northumbria during the rule of Wilfrid, they form naturally into a group apart. This separation is due partly to the

Contrast
between Wilfrid and the saints of the Northumbrian coast.

reserve, sometimes approaching enmity, which they manifested towards him, and still more to the essentially peaceful nature of their character and position. If in some cases they are found in contact with the struggles and agitations of their age and country, it is evidently against their inclinations. Their desire for peace, and ascetic and studious retirement, was as great as that of Wilfrid for the fatigues and hazards of the fight; and their history and aspect, retired as they were in their monasteries upon the coast of the Northumbrian kingdom, where the conflict between Wilfrid and the descendants of the Man of Fire was continually breaking out with fresh force, afford a pleasant and refreshing contrast to the stormy career of the great abbot.

In the first rank of these peaceful men stands the monk honored by the Church under the name of St. Cuthbert,¹ and whose glory soon eclipsed that of St. Wilfrid, though the place he holds in history is of much inferior importance. Yes, great as was the influence of Wilfrid — a great bishop, a great abbot, the offspring of a noble race — his popularity was surpassed among his contempora-

His glory
eclipsed by that of St.
Cuthbert.

¹ His Life was first written by a monk of Lindisfarne during the reign of King Aldfrid — that is, before 705, less than twenty years after the death of the saint — and afterwards, both in verse and prose, by Bede, who had attained the age of fourteen when Cuthbert died, and who takes care to state, with his usual exactness, the names and profession of all who supplied him with materials.

ries as well as with Catholic posterity by that of a shepherd boy, who also became a bishop, and whose diocese was one of those produced by the division of that of Wilfrid. The Celts have claimed Cuthbert as belonging to them, at least by birth.² They make him out to have been the son of an Irish princess, reduced to slavery, like Bridget the holy patroness of Ireland, but who fell, more miserably, victim to the lust of her savage master. They have also given him a place among the disciples of their great sanctuary in Iona.³ His Celtic origin would seem to be still more conclusively proved by his attitude towards Wilfrid than by the constant tradition of the Anglo-Saxon monks of Durham. But, to tell the truth, nothing is certainly known either of his place of birth or the rank of his family.

His first appearance in history is as a shepherd in Lauderdale, a valley watered by a river which flows into the Tweed near Melrose, upon the borders, as now defined, of England and Scotland. It was then a district annexed to the kingdom of Northumbria, which had just been delivered by the holy King Oswald from the yoke of the Mercians and Britons. As he is soon afterwards to be seen travelling on horseback, lance in hand and accompanied by a squire, it is not to be supposed that he was of poor extraction. At the same time it was not the flocks of his father which he kept, as did David in the plains of Bethlehem; it is expressly noted that the flocks confided to his care belonged to a master, or to several mas-

Youth of Cuthbert.

A shepherd
on the Scottish borders.

² The Irish origin of Cuthbert is undoubtingly asserted by Reeves, in his Notes on Wattenbach, p. 5. Lanigan (vol. iii. p. 88) states that Usher, Ware, and Colgan entertained the same opinion. There exists a Life of Cuthbert, translated from Irish into Latin, which was partly published, first in the collection of Capgrave, and afterwards reprinted by the Surtees Society in 1838, from a MS. much more full, but dating only from the fourteenth century. In this Life, his mother is said to have been a daughter of the King of Leinster, whom the King of Connaught outraged and kept as his slave, after having slain all her family. Her child, whom she sent into Britain, was named Nullhoc—that is to say, wailing—because of the tears of his outraged mother. (COLGAN, Act. SS., ad 20 Mart.) Many other ancient authors, both Irish and English, pronounce him an Irishman. Bede makes no reference to his birthplace. The Bollandists, who reckon him among the Anglo-Saxons in the article devoted to him on the date of the 20th March, seem to count him as Irish in their Life of St. Wiro, on the 8th May. Mabillon supposes him to have been born where he kept his sheep, on the banks of the Leader, but without giving any proof. Lanigan evidently inclines to the same opinion.

³ “Una cum matre puer ad insulam, quæ Hy dicitur, profectus est: ubi aliquandiu cum religiosis viris loci illius conversatus est.” — Libellus de Ortu S. Cuthberti, ed. Surtees, p. 79.

ters. This family must have been in the rank of those clients or vassals to whom the great Saxon lords gave the care and superintendence of their flocks upon the vast extent of pastures which, under the name of folc-land or commons, was left to their use, and where the cowherds and shepherds lived day and night in the open air, as is still done by the shepherds of Hungary in the pustas on both sides of the Danube.⁴

Popular imagination in the north of England, of which Cuthbert was the hero before as well as after the Norman Conquest, had thus full scope in respect to the obscure childhood of its favorite saint, and delighted in weaving stories of his childish sports, representing him as walking on his hands, and turning somersaults with his little companions.⁵ A more authentic testimony, that of his contemporary Bede, informs us that our shepherd boy had not his equal among the children of his age for activity, dexterity, and boldness in the race and fight. In all sports and athletic exercises he was the first to challenge his companions, with the certainty of being the victor. The description reads like that of a little Anglo-Saxon of our own day — a scholar of Eton or Harrow.⁶ At the same time a precocious piety showed itself in him, even amid this exuberance of youth. One night, as he said his prayers, while keeping the sheep of his masters, he saw the sky, which had been very dark, broken by a track of light, upon which a crowd of angels descended from heaven, returning afterwards with a resplendent soul which they had gone to meet on earth.⁷ Next morning he heard that Aidan, the holy Bishop of Lindisfarne, the apostle of the district, had died during the night. This vision determined his monastic vocation.

⁴ "Ac statim commendans suis pecora quæ pascebat dominis." — BEDE, De Vita et Miraculis S. Cuthberti, c. 54. Cf. KEMBLE, Saxons in England.

⁵ "Cum jocantibus satis jucundus apparuit. Quidam saltu, alii luctamine . . . nonnulli vertice capitis in terram depresso, pede utroque in sublime porrecto, se subrigere decertabant." — Ibid., p. 80.

⁶ "Omnes cœtaneos in agilitate et petulantia superans." — MONACH. LINDISFARN., ap. BOLLAND., t. iii. Martii, p. 118. "Agilis natura . . . acutus ingenio . . . fessis nonnunquam aliis, ille indefessus, si quis ultra secum vellet certare, quasi victor lætabundus inquireret. Sive enim saltu, sive cursu, sive luctatu, sive quolibet alio membrorum sinuamine . . . ille omnes æquævos et nonnullos etiam majores a se gloriabatur esse superatos." — BEDE, De Vita et Miraculis S. Cuthberti, c. 1. Cf. c. 6.

⁷ "Vidit subito fusum de cœlo lumen medias largæ noctis interrupuisse tenebras. In quo cœlestium choro agminum terram petisse." — BEDE, c. 4.

Some time afterwards we find him at the gates of the Monastery of Melrose, the great Celtic establishment for novices in Northumbria. He was then only fifteen, yet nevertheless he arrived, like Wilfrid at the court of Queen Eanfleda, on horseback, lance in hand, attended by a squire; for he had already begun his career in the battlefield, and learned in the face of the enemy the first lessons of abstinence, which he now meant to practise in the cloister.⁸ He was received by two great doctors of the Celtic Church — the abbot Eata, one of the twelve Northumbrians first chosen by Aidan, and the prior Boswell, who conceived a special affection for the new-comer, and undertook the charge of his monastic education. Five centuries later, the copy of the Gospels in which the master and pupil had read daily was still kissed with veneration in the Cathedral of Durham.

He becomes a novice at Melrose.

The robust and energetic youth very soon showed the rarest aptitude for monastic life, not only for cenobitical exercises, but, above all, for the missionary work, which was the principal occupation of monks in that country and period. He was not content merely to surpass all the other monks in his devotion to the four principal occupations of monastic life — study, prayer, vigils, and manual labor⁹ — but specially applied himself to the work of casting out from the hearts of the surrounding population the last vestiges of pagan superstition. Not a village was so distant, not a mountain-side so steep, not a cottage so poor, that it escaped his zeal. He sometimes passed weeks and even months out of his monastery, preaching to and confessing the rustic population of these mountains.¹⁰

The roads were very bad, or rather there were no roads; only now and then was it possible to travel on horseback; sometimes, when his course lay along the coast of the districts inhabited by the Picts, he would take the help of a boat.¹¹ But generally it was on foot

His missionary life.

⁸ "In castris contra hostem cum exercitu sedens, ibique habens stipendia parva." — BOLLAND., p. 118. "Cum equo desilisset et hastam quam tenuerat manu ministro dedisset." — BEDE, c. 6.

⁹ "Legendi videlicet, orandi, vigilandi, atque operandi solertior." — BEDE, Vita S. Cuthb., c. 6.

¹⁰ "Solebat ea maxime loca peragraré, illis prædicare in viculis, qui in arduis asperisque montibus procul positi, aliis horrore erant ad visendum, et paupertate pariter ac rusticitate sua, doctorum prohibebant accessum. . . . In montanis plebem rusticam." — BEDE, Vita S. Cuthberti, c. 9.

¹¹ "Cum duobus fratribus pergens et navigans ad terram Pictorum, ubi Mudpialegis (?) prospere pervenerunt." — BOLL., p. 119. "Ad terram Pictorum qui Nidwari vocantur." — BEDE, c. 11. The late Mr. Joseph that he had to penetrate into the glens and distant valleys, crossing the heaths and vast table-lands uncultivated and uninhabited, where a few shepherds' huts, like that in which he himself had passed his childhood, and which were in winter abandoned even by the rude inhabitants, were thinly scattered. But neither the intemperance of the seasons, nor hunger, nor thirst, arrested the young and valiant missionary in his apostolic travels, to seek the scattered population, half Celts and half Anglo-Saxons, who, though already Christian in name and by baptism, retained an obstinate attachment to many of their ancient superstitions, and who were quickly led back by any great calamity, such as one of the great pestilences which were then so frequent, to use of magic, amulets, and other practices of idolatry.¹²

He evangelizes the country between the Solway and the Forth.

The details which have been preserved of the wonders which often accompanied his wanderings show that his labors extended over all the hilly district between the two seas — from the Solway to the Forth.¹³ They explain to us how the monks administered the consolations and the teachings of religion, before the organization of parishes, ordained by Archbishop Theodore, had been everywhere introduced or regulated. As soon as the arrival of one of these apostolic missionaries in a somewhat central locality was known, all the population of the neighborhood hastened to hear him, endeavoring with fervor and simplicity to put in practice the instruction they received from him. Cuthbert especially was received among them with affectionate confidence: his eloquence was so persuasive that it brought the most rebellious to his feet to

Robertson, one of the greatest antiquarians in Scotland, who kindly exerted himself to enlighten me upon the principal difficulties of the history of Cuthbert, supposed this place to be Newburn, near Largo, in the county of Fife.

¹² "Ecce, inquit, in itinere quo vadis, nullum viculum, nulla hominum habitacula reperies. . . . Tuguria pastorum quæ, æstate infirmiter posita, tunc jam deserta patebant. . . . Aliquoties equo sedere at sæpius pedes. . . . Ad erronea idololatriæ medicamina currebant . . . per incantationes vel alligaturas vetata quælibet dæmoniæ artis arcana." — Vita, c. 5, 9. BOL-
LAND., pp. 119, 120.

¹³ It would even appear that the sphere of his operations extended much farther north, for the Libellus de Ortu S. Cuthberti, written in the Irish tongue, a Latin version of which has been published by the Surtees Society, mentions a stone cross raised by him when he left the Monastery of Dull, in the district of Athole, close to Taymouth. This monastery, which is celebrated in the annals of the Celtic Church, was the cradle of the University of St. Andrews. In the eleventh century it had for Coarb or Combarba — that is, for lay and hereditary abbot — the ancestor of the royal house of the Stuarts.

hear their sins revealed to them, and to accept the penance which he imposed upon them.¹⁴

Cuthbert prepared himself for preaching and the administration of the sacraments by extraordinary penances and austerities. His austerities. Stone bathing-places, in which he passed the entire night in prayer, lying in the frozen water, according to a custom common among the Celtic saints, and which Wilfrid himself, as has been seen, had borrowed from them, are still shown in several different places.¹⁵ When he was near the sea, he went to the shore, unknown to any one, at night, and, plunging into the waves up to his neck, sang his vigils there. As soon as he came out of the water he resumed his prayers on the sand of the beach. On one occasion one of his disciples, who had followed him secretly in order to discover the aim of this nocturnal expedition, saw two otters come out of the water, which, while the saint prayed on his knees, licked his frozen feet and wiped them with their hair until life and warmth returned to the benumbed members.¹⁶ The legend of the otters. By one of those strange caprices of human frivolity which disconcert the historian, this insignificant incident is the only recollection which now remains in the memory of the people. St. Cuthbert is known to the peasant of Northumberland and of the Scottish borders only by the legend of those compassionate otters, even as the name of Columba recalls to the mariners of the Hebrides only the history of the tired crane, which he sent back to Ireland, its native country.

He had been for some years at Melrose, when the Abbot Eata took him along with him to join the community of Celtic monks established by King Alchfrid at Ripon. Cuthbert held the office of steward: He is sent from Melrose to Ripon. 660. and in this office showed the same zeal as in his missions.

¹⁴ "Erat quippe moris eo tempore populis Anglorum, ut veniente in vilam clerico vel presbytero, cuncti ad ejus imperium verbum audituri confluebant. . . . Cudbercto tanta erat dicendi peritia, tantus amor persuadendi." — Vita, c. 9.

¹⁵ "Vas quoddam balnearium de lapide integro sibi fabricavit . . . quod vas adhuc in montis vertice permanet." — Libellus, c. 25. See above, p. 272, the history of Drychthelme, the penitent of Melrose, and for Wilfrid, p. 360.

¹⁶ "Homo Dei obstinata mente . . . in mediis fluctibus et mari aliquando usque ad ascellas tumultuante et fluctuante tinctus est. . . . Venere continuo de profundo maris quadrupedæ quæ vulgo lutræ vocantur. . . . Ilæ . . . anhelitu suo pedes ejus fovere cœperunt . . . lambentes pedes, volutantes tergebant pellibus suis, et calefacientes odoribus suis." — BOLL., p. 119. BEDE, c. 40.

When travellers arrived through the snow, famished and nearly fainting with cold, he himself washed their feet and warmed them against his bosom,¹⁷ then hastened to the oven to order bread to be made ready if there was not enough. It may be perhaps remembered that the sons of Melrose had to give place to Wilfrid, when he, at the commencement of his campaign in favor of the Roman ritual and paschal unity, attempted to compel the Celtic colony of Ripon to give up their national customs.¹⁸ It was a great and sudden storm, said Bede, with the prudent reserve which he observes in all that relates to the struggle between Wilfrid and other saints. Cuthbert returned with his countrymen to Melrose, resumed his life of missionary preaching, and again met his friend and master, the prior Boswell, at whose death in the great pestilence of 664,¹⁹ Cuthbert was elected abbot in his place. He had been himself attacked by the disease; and all the monks prayed earnestly that his life might be preserved to them. When he knew that the community had spent the night in prayer for him, though he felt no better, he cried to himself, with a double impulse of his habitual energy, "What am I doing in bed? It is impossible that God should shut His ears to such men. Give me my staff and my shoes." And getting up, he immediately began to walk, leaning upon his staff. But this sudden cure left him subject to weakness which shortened his life.²⁰

He is transferred to Lindisfarne. However, he had not long to remain at Melrose.²¹ The triumph of Wilfrid and the Roman ritual at the Conference of Whitby brought about a revolution in the monastic metropolis of Northumbria, and in the mother monastery of Melrose at Lindisfarne. Bishop Colman, as has been seen, had returned to Iona, carrying with him the bones of his predecessor, the first apostle of the country, and fol-

¹⁷ See the Legend of the Angel. — Vita S. Cuthberti, c. 7.

¹⁸ See above, p. 313, "Instante subito turbine, præfatus abbas cum Cuthberto et cæteris . . . domum repulsus est." — BEDE, c. 8.

¹⁹ See above, p. 333.

²⁰ "Utquid jaceo? . . . Date baculum et caligas. Statimque exurgens, cœpit tentare incessum baculo innitens." — Vita, c. 8.

²¹ It is difficult to reconcile the per aliquot annos of Bede (c. 9) with the precise dates assigned by Simeon of Durham, or rather Turgott, the official historian of the diocese, who recognized Cuthbert as his patron — dates which are drawn from a comparison of the most ancient records. The Bollandists, agreeing with Simeon, fix in 664, the year of Boswell's death, and consequently the first year of Cuthbert's priorate, his translation to Lindisfarne. The chronology of his life is simple enough. He was born in 637, became a monk at Melrose in 651, prior at Lindisfarne in 664, an anchorite at Farne in 676, bishop in 684. He abdicated in 686, and died in 687.

lowed by all the monks who would not consent to sacrifice their Celtic traditions to Roman unity. It was of importance to preserve the holy island, the special sanctuary of the country, for the religious family of which its foundress had been a member. Abbot Eata of Melrose undertook this difficult mission. He became Abbot of Lindisfarne, and was invested with that kind of episcopal supremacy which has been already described, and which on Wilfrid's first downfall was to change into a full episcopate. He took with him the young Cuthbert, who was not yet thirty, but whom, however, he held alone capable of filling the important office of prior in the great insular community.

The struggle into which Eata and Cuthbert, in their proper persons, had entered against Wilfrid on the subject of Roman rites—a struggle to which they had themselves been victims at Ripon—did not point them out as the best men to introduce the novelties so passionately defended and insisted upon by the new Bishop of Northumbria. Notwithstanding, everything goes to prove that the new abbot and prior of Lindisfarne adopted without reserve the decisions of the Assembly of Whitby, and took serious pains to introduce them into the great Celtic community. Cuthbert, in whom the physical energy of a robust organization was united to an unconquerable gentleness, employed in this task all the resources of his mind and heart. All the rebels had not left with Bishop Colman; some monks still remained who held obstinately by their ancient customs. Cuthbert reasoned with them daily in the meetings of the chapter; his desire was to overcome their objections by patience and moderation alone: he bore their reproaches as long as that was possible; and when his endurance was at an end, raised the sitting without changing countenance or tone, and resumed next morning the course of the debate without ever permitting himself to be moved to anger, or allowing anything to disturb the inestimable gift of kindness and light-heartedness which he had received from God.²²

²² "Erant in monasterio fratres qui priscae suae consuetudini quam regulari mallent obtemperare custodiæ, quos . . . modesta patientiæ suae virtute superabat et quotidiano exercitio . . . paulatim convertebat. . . . Sæpius in cœtu fratrum de regula disputans, cum acerrimis contradicentium fatigaretur injuriis . . . placido vultu atque animo egrediens. . . . Erat namque vir ad perferenda fortiter omnia quæ vel animo vel corpore adversa ingerebantur invictissimus, nec minus inter tristia quæ contigissent faciem prætendens hilarem."—Vita, c. 46. "Omni hora hilaris et lætus."—Monach. Lindisf., p. 121.

He insists upon uniformity in monastic discipline.

It was not only the orthodox Eastern and other liturgical observances which he had to make acceptable to the monks of Lindisfarne. The difficulty of establishing in his monastery that regularity and uniformity which become monastic life was not less great. Was it the Benedictine rule in all its purity, such as Augustin had brought into Canterbury, and which Wilfrid at that very moment was laboring to communicate to Northumbria, which Cuthbert desired to introduce at Lindisfarne? The opinions of the most competent authorities are divided in respect to this.²³ Everything leads us to believe that the young and holy prior was desirous of adding to the rule of St. Benedict certain special customs justified by the habits and necessities of the Northumbrian climate and people. But his great desire was the strict observance of the rule when once established; and his historian boasts as one of his most remarkable victories the obligation he imposed forever upon the monks of Lindisfarne of wearing a simple and uniform dress, in undyed wool, and thus giving up the passionate liking of the Anglo-Saxons for varied and brilliant colors.²⁴

His life both in the cloister and in the world at Lindisfarne. 664-676.

During the twelve years which he passed at Lindisfarne, the life of Cuthbert was identical with that which he had led at Melrose. Within doors this life was spent in the severe practice of all the austerities of the cloister, in manual labor united to ²³ Mabillon maintains the affirmative in opposition to the Bollandists (pp. 96 and 115), which latter go so far as to believe that the troubles which ensued on Wilfrid's arrival at Lindisfarne to replace Cuthbert as bishop, and of which Bede (see above, page 410) speaks so mysteriously, were caused by his attempt to introduce the rule of St. Benedict in place of the observances followed and recommended by Cuthbert. The opinion of Mabillon is founded chiefly on these words of the Lindisfarne monk: "Nobis regularem vitam primum componens constituit, quam usque hodie cum Regula Benedicti observamus." The Bollandists recognize the trace of a modern interpolation in the narrative of this monk, where he says that Cuthbert received on his entrance at Melrose "tonsurae Petri formam, in modum coronae spinæ caput Christi cingentis," whereas it is known that Melrose was the citadel of the Celtic tonsure. Let us acknowledge, in passing, that whatever was the rule established by Cuthbert, the saint, himself so austere, softened its regulations greatly for his monks, since we see that he recommended, and even enjoined them to eat a fat goose, upon which Mabillon adds, "Nec mirum si monachi illi anserina carne vescerentur, qui jam tum forsitan volatilia in piscium numero habebant." Finally, we observe that the use of wine was perfectly admitted among the companions of Cuthbert, and that they seem to have been connoisseurs in this matter.

²⁴ "Ut neque munditiis neque sordibus esset notabilis, ne quis varii aut pretiosi coloris habeat indumentum, sed ea maxime specie quam naturalis ovium lana ministrat."—Vita, c. 16.

the punctual celebration of divine worship, and such fervor in prayer that he often slept only one night in the three or four, passing the others in prayer, and in singing the service alone while walking round the aisle to keep himself awake. Outside, the same zeal for preaching, the same solicitude for the salvation and well-being, temporal as well as spiritual, of the Northumbrian people, was apparent in him. He carried to them the word of life; he soothed their sufferings by curing miraculously a crowd of diseases which were beyond the power of the physicians—a class which does not seem to have been wanting among the Anglo-Saxons of this period, as they are mentioned almost at every page of their miraculous records. But the valiant missionary specially assailed the diseases of the soul, and made use of all the tenderness and all the ardor of his own spirit to reach them. When he celebrated mass before the assembled crowd, his visible emotions, his inspired looks, his trembling voice, all contributed to penetrate and overpower the multitude. The Anglo-Saxon Christians who came in crowds to open their hearts to him in the confessional, were still more profoundly impressed: though he was a bold and inflexible judge of impenitent vice, he felt and expressed the tenderest compassion for the contrite sinner. He was the first to weep over the sins which he pardoned in the name of God; and he himself fulfilled the penances which he imposed as the condition of absolution, thus gaining by his humility the hearts which he longed to convert and cure.²⁵

But neither the life of a cenobite nor the labors of a missionary could satisfy the aspirations of his soul after perfection. When he was not quite forty, after holding his priorship at Lindisfarne for twelve years, he resolved to leave monastic life, and to live as a hermit in a sterile and desert island, visible from Lindisfarne, which lay in the centre of the archipelago, south of the holy isle, and almost opposite the fortified capital of the Northumbrian kings at Bamborough.²⁶ No one dared to live on this island, which was called Farne, in consequence of its being supposed the haunt of demons. Cuthbert took possession of it as a soldier of Christ, victorious over the tyranny of evil, and built there a palace worthy of himself, hollowing out of the living rock a cell from which he could see nothing but the sky, that he might not be disturbed in his contemplations. The hide of an ox suspended before the entrance of his cavern, and which he turned according to the direction of the wind, afforded him a poor defence against the intemperance of that wild climate. His holy historian tells us that he exercised sway over the elements and brute creation as a true monarch of the land which he had conquered for Christ, and with that sovereign empire over nature which sin alone has taken from us.²⁷ He lived on the produce of a little field of barley, sowed and cultivated by his own hands, but so small that the inhabitants of the coast reported among themselves that he was fed by angels with bread made in paradise.

He becomes an anchorite in the desert island of Farne. 676.

²⁵ "Circuibat insulam, . . . pariter et longitudinem psalmodiæ ac vigiliam incedendo alleviabat. . . . Circumquaque morantem vulgi multitudinem more suo crebra visitatione ad cœlestia quærenda et promerenda succendebat. . . . Spiritu mansuetudinis modestus ad ignoscendum pœnitentibus, ita ut nonnunquam confitentibus sibi peccata sua his qui deliquerant, prior ipse miserans infirmos, lacrymis funderet, et quid peccatori agendum esset, ipse justus suo præmonstraret exemplo." — Vita, c. 16.

²⁶ A minute description and plan of this island, now inhabited and crowned by two lighthouses, will be found in the History of St. Cuthbert, by Mgr. Eyre; London, 1858.

Popular traditions respecting his sojourn at Farne.

The legends of Northumbria linger lovingly upon the solitary sojourn of their great national and popular saint in this basaltic isle. They attribute to him the extraordinary gentleness and familiarity of a peculiar species of aquatic birds which came when called, allowed themselves to be taken, stroked, and caressed, and whose down was of remarkable softness. In ancient times they swarmed about this rock, and they are still to be found there, though much diminished in number since curious visitors have come to steal their nests and shoot the birds. These sea-fowl are found nowhere else in the British Isles, and are called the Birds of St. Cuthbert.²⁸ It was he, according to the narrative of a monk of the thirteenth century, who inspired them with a hereditary trust in man, by taking them as the companions of his solitude, and guaranteeing to them that they should never be disturbed in their homes.²⁹

²⁷ "Miles Christi, devicta tyrannorum acie, monarchus terræ, quam adierat, factus est. . . . Condidit civitatem suo aptam imperio . . . vivam cædendo rupem. . . . Qui enim Auctori omnium creaturarum fideliter et integro corde famulatur, non est mirandum si ejus imperiis ac votis omnis creatura deserviat. At nos plerumque idcirco subjectæ nobis creaturæ dominum perdimus, quia Domino et Creatori omnium ipsi servire negligimus." — Vita, c. 17, 21.

²⁸ Eider or Cuthbert-Ducks, — the Oie à duvet of Buffon, the Anas molissima of Linnæus.

²⁹ "Aves illæ B. Cuthberti specialiter nominantur. . . . Ipse, adhuc viv-

It is he, too, according to the fishers of the surrounding islands, who makes certain little shells of the genus Entrochus, which are only to be found on this coast, and which have received the name of St Cuthbert's Beads. They believe that he is still to be seen by night seated on a rock, and using another as an anvil for his work. This tradition, like many others, has been consecrated by Sir Walter Scott in the poetic picture which he has drawn of the Northumbrian coast, between the two great monasteries of Whitby and Lindisfarne.³⁰

The pious anchorite, however, in condemning himself to the trials of solitude, had no intention of withdrawing from the cares of fraternal charity. He continued to receive frequent visits, in the first place from his neighbors and brethren at Lindisfarne, and in addition from all who came to consult him upon the state of their souls, as well as to seek consolation from him in adversity. The number of these pilgrims of sorrow was countless. They came not only from the neighboring shores, but from the most distant provinces. Throughout all England the rumor spread that on a desert rock of the Northumbrian coast there lived a solitary who was the friend of God, and skilled in the healing of human suffering. In this expectation no one was deceived; no man carried back from the sea-beaten island the same burden of suffering, temptation, or remorse which he had taken there. Cuthbert had consolation for all troubles, light for all the sorrowful mysteries of life, counsel for all its perils, a helping hand to all the hopeless, a heart open to all who suffered. He could charity towards the penitents who came to consult him.

His tender

ens, avibus illis firmam pacem et quietem in patribus suis dederat. . . . Quod patribus avium antiquitus dederat, hoc, de illarum genere pullis procreandis, et filiis hereditarie in pacis et misericordiæ custodia perpetuis temporibus conservando præstabat. . . . Dum solitarius in rupe secum commaneret, ita edomuit prædicta volatilia et natilitia. . . . Se palpantes capere, contrectare et tenere permittunt . . . in gremio tuo ludendo reticent . . . ad mensam tuam si incola fueris veniunt . . . ad manus etiam blandientis, alis palpitantibus, confugiunt." — REGINALD DUNELMENSIS, De Admirandis Cuthberti Virtutibus, c. 27. Cf. RAINE'S St. Cuthbert; Edinburgh, 1828, p. 22.

³⁰ "But fain Saint Hilda's nuns would learn,
If on a rock by Lindisfarne,
Saint Cuthbert sits, and toils to frame
The seaborn beads that bear his name.
Such tales had Whitby's fishers told,
And said they might his shape behold,
And hear his anvil sound."

SCOTT, Marmion, canto ii.

draw from terrestrial anguish a proof of the joys of heaven, deduce the certainty of these joys from the terrible evanescence of both good and evil in this world, and light up again in sick souls the fire of charity — the only defence, he said, against those ambushes of the old enemy which always take our hearts captive when they are emptied of divine and brotherly love.³¹

His hospitality.

To make his solitude more accessible to these visitors, and above all to his brethren from Lindisfarne, he had built at some distance from the cave which was his dwelling-place, at a point where the boats could land their passengers, a kind of parloir and refectory for the use of his guests. There he himself met, conversed, and ate with them, especially when, as he has himself told, the monks came to celebrate with him such a great feast as Christmas. At such moments he went freely into all their conversations and discussions, interrupting himself from time to time to remind them of the necessity of watchfulness and prayer. The monks answered him, "Nothing is more true; but we have so many days of vigil, of fasts and prayers! Let us at least to-day rejoice in the Lord."³² The venerable Bede, who has preserved to us the precious memory of this exchange of brotherly familiarity, has not disdained to tell us also of the reproaches addressed by Cuthbert to his brothers for not eating a fat goose which he had hung on the partition-wall of his guests' refectory, in order that they might thoroughly fortify themselves before they embarked upon that stormy sea to return to their monastery.³³

This tender charity and courteous activity were united in him to treasures of humility. He would not allow any one to suspect him of ranking the life of an anchorite above that of a member of a community. "It must not be supposed," he said, "because I prefer to live out of reach of every secular care, that my life is superior to that of others. The life of good cenobites, who obey their abbot in everything, and whose time is divided between prayer, work, and fasting, is much to be admired. I know many among them whose souls are more pure, and their graces more exalted than mine; especially, and in the first rank, my dear old Boswell, who received and trained me at Melrose in my youth."³⁴

³¹ "Nec eos fefellit spes. Nullus ab eo sine gaudio consolatione abibat; nullum dolor animi quem illo attulerat redeuntem comitatus est. Noverat quippe mœstos pia exhortatione refovere: sciebat angustiatos gaudia vite cœlestis ad memoriam revocare . . . didicerat tentatis multifarias antiqui hostis pandere versutias, quibus facile carperetur animus, qui vel fraterno, vel divino amore nudatus exsisteret." — Vita, c. 22.

³² "Quondam cum adhuc demorarer in mea insula solitarius. . . . Obseco, fratres, caute agamus et vigilanter. . . . Cumque post hoc aliquandiu epulis, exultationi ac fabulis indulgeremus, rursus admonere cœpi ut solliciti exsisteremus in orationibus et vigiliis. . . . Et illi: Bene, inquit, et optime doces, sed tamen, quia abundant dies jejuniorum, orationis et vigiliarum, hodie gaudeamus in Domino . . . epulantibus nobis et diem lætum ducentibus." — Vita, c. 27.

³³ "Pendebat autem auca in pariete. . . . Citissime mittite eam in caldaria: coquite et comedite, et sic in nomen Domini ascendite navem ac domum redite." — Vita, c. 36.

Thus passed, in that dear solitude, and among these friendly surroundings, eight pleasant years, the sweetest of his life, and precisely those during which all Northumberland was convulsed by the struggle between Wilfrid and the new king, Egfrid. All those important events, the expulsion of the great bishop from his see of York, his first appeal to Rome, his return with a verdict in his favor, his fruitless application to Egfrid, his imprisonment and exile, have left no trace upon the life which Cuthbert, tranquil and happy, lived on his island rock, until a day arrived when the reverberation of this blow struck him in his turn.

This was the day upon which the king of the Northumbrians, accompanied by his principal nobles and almost all the community of Lindisfarne, landed upon the rock of Farne, to beg, kneeling and with tears,³⁵ that he would accept the episcopal dignity to which he had just been promoted in the synod of Twyford, presided over by the Archbishop Theodore. He yielded only after a long resistance, himself weeping when he did so. It was, however, permitted to him to delay his consecration for six months, till Easter, which left him still a winter to pass in his dear solitude, before he went to York, where he was consecrated by the primate, Theodore, assisted by six bishops. He would not, however, accept the diocese of Hexham, to which he had been first appointed, but persuaded his friend Eata, the Bishop and Abbot of Lindisfarne, to give up to him the monastic bishopric where he had already lived so long, and to occupy in his place the diocese created to vex Wilfrid in his own monastery. There is, however, no 676-684.

He is made Bishop of Lindisfarne.

26th March,
685.

³⁴ "Jure est cœnobitarum vita miranda . . . quorum plurimos novi parvitatem meam longe et munditia mentis et culmine gratiæ prophetalis anteire. E quibus . . . Boisilus qui me quondam senex adolescentem nutrebat." — Vita, c. 22.

³⁵ "Genuflectunt omnes, adjurant per Dominum. lacrymas fundunt, donec ipsum quoque lacrymis plenum dulcibus extrahunt latebris." — Vita, c. 24. Cf. Hist. Eccles., iv. 28.

evidence that he was influenced in this change by any reluctance to become an accomplice, even indirectly, in the spoliation of which Wilfrid had been the victim.³⁶

The diocese of Lindisfarne spread far to the west, much beyond Hexham. The Britons of Cumbria, who had come to be tributaries of the Northumbrian kings, were thus included in it. King Egfrid's deed of gift, in which he gives the district of Cartmell, with all the Britons who dwell in it, to Bishop Cuthbert, still exists.³⁷ The Roman city of Carlisle, transformed into an Anglo-Saxon fortress, was also under his sway, with all the surrounding monasteries. It has been already told how the inhabitants were exhibiting to him the fine ruins, the walls and fountains of their city, at the moment when the mysterious intimation of Egfrid's downfall was given to him.³⁸ It was at Carlisle that he offered the first consolation to Queen Ermenburga, whom that calamity made a widow; and it was there also he returned to give to the queen the veil of the brides of Christ.

He remains a monk and missionary during his episcopate.

The episcopate of Cuthbert attaches itself to general history only by means of this dramatic episode of Carlisle, and by his connection with the enemy of Wilfrid, from this moment struck in her turn, and converted by adversity. But the history of his life receives an additional lustre from the virtues and good works which distinguished the brief course of this apostolical mission. His new dignity made no difference in his character, nor even in his mode of life. He retained his old habits as a cenobite, and even as a hermit. In the midst of his episcopal pomp he remained always the monk and missionary of old. His whole episcopate indeed, seems to bear the character of a mission indefinitely prolonged. He went over his vast diocese, to administer confirmation to converts, traversing a crowd more attentive and respectful than ever, lavishing upon it all kinds of benefits, alms, clothing, sermons, miraculous cures — penetrating as of old into hamlets and distant corners, climbing the hills and downs, sleeping under a tent, and sometimes indeed finding no other shelter than in the huts of branches brought from the nearest wood to the desert, in which he had made the torrent of his eloquence and charity to gush forth.³⁹

³⁶ See above, page 375. Let us repeat here that from the first deposition of Wilfrid in 678, his vast diocese, which comprehended all Northumberland, had been divided into two new dioceses, the boundaries of which seem to have been those of the two kingdoms of Deira and Bernicia. The seat of the former remained at York, and that of the latter was established either at Hexham or Lindisfarne. The Abbot of Lindisfarne and of Melrose, Eata, was placed in the Bernician bishopric. In 681, Archbishop Theodore, always occupied with the thought of diminishing the size of dioceses, separated Hexham from Lindisfarne, and, leaving Eata in his monastic cathedral, nominated to Hexham Trumbert, who had just been deposed by the synod of 684 pro culpa cujusdam inobedientiæ. When he gave up Lindisfarne to his former prior, Cuthbert, and went to Hexham, he took up again the government of a church which he had already occupied for three years. There was also the monastic bishopric of Abereorn, quite in the north, the bishop of which, Trumwine, accompanied Egfrid when he went to Cuthbert to pray him to accept the episcopate. Eata died in 686, and was replaced by St. John of Beverley.

³⁷ CAMDEN'S Britanniæ, iii. p. 131. Melrose was in the diocese of Lindisfarne; thus the population of Cuthbert's diocese was in a great part composed of vanquished races — Picts and Britons. This diocese was produced by the reaction of the foreign population whose lands had been absorbed in the kingdom of Bernicia." — VARIN, p. 33.

³⁸ See above, p. 402.

Here also we find illustrations, as at all previous periods of his life, of the most delightful feature of his good and holy soul. In the obscure missionary of Melrose, in the already celebrated prior of Lindisfarne, and still more, if that is possible, in the powerful and venerated bishop, the same heart, overflowing with tenderness and compassion, is always to be found. The supernatural power given to him to cure the most cruel diseases was wonderful. But in his frequent and friendly intercourse with the great Anglo-Saxon earls, the ealdormen, as well as with the mixed populations of Britons, Picts, Scots, and English, whom he gathered under his crosier, the principal feature in the numerous and detailed narratives which remain to us, and which gives to them a beauty as of youth, always attractive, is his intense and active sympathy for those human sorrows which in all ages are the same, always so keen, and capable of so little consolation. The more familiar the details of these meetings between the heart of a saint and true priest and the simple and impetuous hearts of the first English Christians, the more attractive do they become; and we cannot resist the inclination of presenting to our readers some incidents which show at once the liveliness of domestic affections among those newly-baptized barbarians, and their

Tenderness
and compassion of his heart.

³⁹ “Implebat episcopi dignitatem, non tamen ut propositum monachi et anachoretæ virtutem desereret.” — BOLLAND., p. 122. “Inter frequentiam turbarum monachicæ vitæ rigorem sollicitus observare . . . dum parochiam suam circumiens omnibus ruris casis et viculis monita salutis largiretur . . . devenit in montana et agresta loca, ubi multi erant de circumpositis villulus, quibus manus erat imponenda. . . . Tetenderunt ei tentoria, et cæsis de vicina silva ramusculis.” — Vita, c. 26, 29, 32.

The mad
countess. filial and familiar confidence in their pastor. One of the ealdormen of King Egfrid arrived one day in breathless haste at Lindisfarne, overwhelmed with grief, his wife, a woman as pious and generous as himself, having been seized with a fit of violent madness. But he was ashamed to disclose the nature of the attack; it seemed to him a sort of chastisement from heaven, disgracing a creature hitherto so chaste and honored: all that he said was that she was approaching death; and he begged that a priest might be given him to carry to her the viaticum, and that when she died he might be permitted to bury her in the holy isle. Cuthbert heard his story, and said to him with much emotion, "This is my business; no one but myself can go with you." As they rode on their way together, the husband wept, and Cuthbert, looking at him, and seeing the cheeks of the rough warrior wet with tears, divined the whole, and during all the rest of the journey consoled and encouraged him, explaining to him that madness was not a punishment of crime, but a trial which God inflicted sometimes upon the innocent. "Besides," he added, "when we arrive we shall find her cured; she will come to meet us, and will help me to dismount from my horse, taking, according to her custom, the reins in her hand." And so the event proved; for, says the historian, the demon did not dare to await the coming of the Holy Ghost, of which the man of God was full. The noble lady, delivered from her bondage, rose as if from a profound sleep, and stood on the threshold to greet the holy friend of the house, seizing the reins of his horse, and joyfully announcing her sudden cure.⁴⁰

On another occasion, a certain Count Heunna, from whom he sought hospitality during one of his pastoral journeys, received him on his knees, thanking him for his visit, but at the same time telling that his wife was at the point of death, and he himself in despair. "However," said the count, "I firmly believe that were you to give her your blessing, she would be restored to health, or at least delivered by a speedy death from her long and cruel sufferings." The saint immediately sent one of his priests, without entering into the sick-room himself, to sprinkle her with water which he had blessed. The patient was at once relieved; and herself came to act as cupbearer to the prelate, offering him, in name of all her family, that cup of wine which, under the name of the loving cup, has continued since the time of the Anglo-Saxons to form a part of all solemn public banquets.⁴¹

⁴⁰ "Erat præfectus Egfridi regis Hildmer nomine . . . a B. Cuthberto specialiter dilectus, et . . . crebro ab eo visitatus. Cujus uxor . . . membra in diversa raptando, non minimum cunctis incutebat horrorem. . . . Adscendit vir equum et concitus venit. . . . Erubescere eam confiteri insanam quam vir Domini sobriam semper videre consueverat . . . olim tam pudicam et castam. . . . Hoc est meum ministerium: non alium sed ipse tecum pergere debes. Cumque agerent iter, videns socium suum flentem . . . profluentibus in maxillas lacrymis . . . consolari eum mitissimis verbis cepit. . . . Ipsa mihi occurrens in acceptione habenarum istius equi quas nunc teneo . . . ministrabit nobis."—Vita, c. 15. "Viro Dei gratulabunda, occurrens, jumentum quo sedebat per frenum tenuit."—BOLLAND., p. 120.

A contagious disease at another time broke out in one part of his diocese, to which Cuthbert immediately betook himself. After having visited and consoled all the remaining inhabitants of one village, he turned to the priest who accompanied him, and asked, "Is there still any one sick in this poor place whom I can bless before I depart?" "Then," says the priest, who has preserved this story to us, "I showed him in the distance a poor woman bathed in tears, one of whose sons was already dead, and who held the other in her arms, just about to render his last breath. The bishop rushed to her, and taking the dying child from its mother's arms, kissed it first, then blessed it, and restored it to the mother, saying to her, as the Son of God said to the widow of Nain, 'Woman, weep not; have no more fear or sorrow; your son is saved, and no more victims to this pestilence shall perish here.'"⁴²

No saint of his time or country had more frequent or affectionate intercourse than Cuthbert with the nuns, whose numbers and influence were daily increasing among the Anglo-Saxons, and especially in Northumberland. The greater part of them lived together in the great monasteries, such as Whitby and Coldingham; but some, especially those who were widows or of advanced age, lived in their own houses or with their relatives. Such was consoled.

The mother

His relations with women;

⁴¹ "Pervenit ad comitis vicum. Ille . . . rem ut erat miserabilis et lacrymabilis omni familiæ, hoc est, uxoris vel horticæ, vitam desperabilem episcopo revelavit. . . . Jam surgens, sicut soerus Petri, sanata ministravit eis. Illa enim primum totius episcopo poculum laticitiæ dedit, qui sibi expiranti calicem mortis auferebat."—BOLLAND., p. 122.

⁴² "Presbyter Tidi . . . in quodam vico qui dicitur Medelpong. . . . Conversus ad me mitissime dixit: Est-ne aliquis in villa hac adhuc pestilentia languens? . . . Ego jam ostendens signavi ei mulierem . . . quæ lacrymis faciem rigantibus præteritam ac præsentem testabatur ærumnam. . . . O mulier, noli flere . . . ne metuas, nec mæsta sis."—BOLLAND., p. 124. Vita, c. 33.

With his foster-mother; a woman devoted to the service of God, who had watched over Cuthbert's childhood (for he seems to have been early left an orphan) while he kept his sheep on the hills near Melrose, from the eighth year of his age until his entrance into the convent at the age of fifteen. He was tenderly grateful to her for her maternal care, and, when he became a missionary, took advantage of every occasion furnished to him by his apostolic journeys to visit her whom he called his mother, in the village where she lived. On one occasion, when he was with her, a fire broke out in the village, and the flames, increased by a violent wind, threatened all the neighboring roofs. "Fear nothing, dear mother," the young missionary said to her; "this fire will do you no harm;" and he began to pray. Suddenly the wind changed; the village was saved, and with it the thatched roof which sheltered the old age of her who had protected his infancy.⁴³

With Queen Etheldreda; From the cottage of his foster-mother he went to the palaces of queens. The noble Queen of Northumberland, Etheldreda, the saint and virgin, regia virgo, says the historian, before she left her throne and conjugal life to bury herself in the cloister, loved to surround herself with the religious of both sexes most renowned for their piety, and to converse familiarly with them for the good of her soul. She often called the young prior of Lindisfarne to her as well as Wilfrid, her guide and spiritual master, and this is the only occasion on which a meeting between these two contemporaries, so venerable yet so different, can be supposed to have taken place. The holy queen had a great friendship for Cuthbert. She overwhelmed him and his monastery with gifts from her own possessions, and wishing, besides, to offer him a personal token of her close affection, she embroidered for him, with her own hands (for she embroidered beautifully), a stole and maniple covered with gold and precious stones. She chose to give him such a present that he might wear this memorial of her only in the presence of God whom they both served, and accordingly would be obliged to keep her always in mind at the holy sacrifice.⁴⁴

⁴³ "A quadam muliere, nomine Kenspid, adhuc vivens, sanctimonialis vidua. . . . Namque eam matrem appellavit, sæpe visitans eam. . . . Ventus abripiebat ignitos fœnei tecti fasciculos. . . . Præfata Dei famula concita accurrit. . . . Non timeas, inquit, mater; animi æquior esto: non enim tibi tuisve hæc quamlibet ferox flamma nocebit." — BOLLAND., p. 120. Vita, c. 14.

⁴⁴ "Regia virgo . . . sanctæ religionis ministros in fœdus amicitiae viros

Cuthbert was on still more intimate terms with the holy princesses, who, placed at the head of great communities of nuns, and sometimes even of monks, exercised so powerful an influence upon the Anglo-Saxon race, and particularly on Northumbria. While he was still at Melrose the increasing fame of his sanctity and eloquence brought him often into the presence of the sister of King Oswy, who then reigned over the two Northumbrian kingdoms. This princess, Ebba,⁴⁵ was abbess of the double monastery of Coldingham, of which mention has already been made, the farthest north of all the religious establishments of Northumbria, and that in which Queen Etheldreda sought refuge first after leaving her husband. Cuthbert was the guest for several days of the royal abbess; but he did not intermit on this account his pious exercises, nor, above all, his austerities and long prayers by night on the sea-shore. During the day he preached to Ebba's two communities, edifying them by the wonderful harmony between his life and his doctrine.⁴⁶ Perhaps he was not himself equally edified by all he saw, if we give faith to the assertions of later historians, who trace back to that visit the severe regulations attributed to him in respect to the intercourse of monks with women of whatsoever condition.⁴⁷

With the great abbesses;

Ebba of Colding-
ham;

ac mulieres sibi admittebat, quorum consilio atque consortio in omnem sanctimoniam provehi . . . arbitrabatur . . . præsertim . . . in familiaritatem colligendam fore ex cœtu monastico asserebat, inter quos . . . vitæ sanctitatis decore insignitum Cuthbertum . . . in gratiam ac dilectionem exhibuit. . . . Opus eximium et præclarum . . . ex auro et lapidibus pretiosis, propriis ut fertur manibus docta auri texturæ ingenio . . . ob internæ dilectionis intuitum . . . festinavit. . . . Juste enim virgo virginem et dilecta dilectum tali decebat oppugnari obsequio. . . . Unde solum in conspectu regis Domini assistens uteretur." — THOMAS ELIENSIS, Vita S. Etheldr., c. 9. This writer of the twelfth century affirms that the stole and maniple embroidered by Etheldreda for Cuthbert were venerated till his time at the Cathedral of Durham.

⁴⁵ "Sanctimonialis femina et mater ancillarum Christi nomine Ebba, regens monasterium . . . religione pariter ac nobilitate cunctis honorabilis." — Vita, c. 10.

⁴⁶ "Nec negare potuit quod ab eo charitas ex ancillæ Dei corde poposcit. . . . Dies aliquot ibi permanens, viam justitiæ quam predicabatur, omnibus actu pariter ac sermone pandebat." — Vita, c. 10.

⁴⁷ No trace of this prohibition is to be found in Bede, or in the narrative of the monk of Lindisfarne. But an obstinate tradition, repeated by all more recent writers, declares that Cuthbert forbade the entrance of women into the church of the monastery at Lindisfarne. When his body was transferred, along with the episcopal see, at an after period to Durham, the same prohibition was maintained there. No woman could enter the great cathedral of that city. The history of this celebrated church is full of anecdotes relative to the attempts made by ladies of high rank to evade this

With El-fleda of Whitby.

But the authority of this tradition, weakened as it is by the total silence of Cuthbert's biographers, is contradicted by his example. To the end of his life he maintained a very intimate and constant friendship with another abbess of the blood-royal of Northumbria, Elfleda, niece of St. Oswald and of King Oswy, who, though still quite young,⁴⁸ exercised an influence much greater than that of Ebba upon the men and the events of her time. It has been seen,⁴⁹ that, out of consideration for her, the holy anchorite left his islet of Farne to hold a conference with her in another island nearer to Whitby, in respect to the anxieties by which she was assailed on account of her brother, King Egfrid. Cuthbert was heartily attached to all the royal family of Northumbria, the Bernician dynasty, which had been restored in his childhood under the great and saintly Oswald. He had a special devotion for that martyred king, whose head was represented on his seal. Oswald's niece, the Abbess Elfleda, before she became the generous and powerful protectress of Wilfrid, was thus the friend and client of St. Cuthbert, linking together these two illustrious personages as the holy Queen Etheldreda had done. She had the liveliest affection for the Prior of Lindisfarne, and at the same time an absolute confidence in his sanctity. When she was assailed by an alarming illness, which fell into paralysis, and humiliation. As time went on the severity relaxed, and there is still shown in the cathedral a line in blue marble which no woman could cross, but which permitted them at least to enter the nave, and see from a distance the choir and shrine of the saint. One of his historians adds: "Non tamen sexum illum detestando persequitur, sed occasionis delinquendi materiam amputando elidere conatur." — REGINALDUS DUNELMENSIS, De Admirandis B. Cuthberti Vertutibus, p. 151. The Irish version of his Life gives two reasons for this prohibition — the first, that the daughter of the Pictish king, "in domo patris adulterata a quovis juvene," had represented the young hermit as being the father of her child; and afterwards, that, when he was a bishop, and during a pontifical procession, he saw himself followed by a woman of dazzling beauty, who attracted the eyes and troubled the minds of all present. "Vidit plerosque hominum cachinno resultando ridere. . . . Circumspiciens videt quendam sub specie mulieris, et crine, et facie, cum nitente vestium varietate, miro modo fulgentem. Omnem humanum effigiem sui pulchritudine præcedebat. . . . Quicumque illius vultus inspexerant præ nimie cupidinis lascivia pene seipsos excesserant." It was a devilish apparition, which he put to flight by sprinkling it with holy water. From that time until the twelfth century women were forbidden to be interred in churches dedicated to him, Libellus de Ortu, c. 29. One of these churches gave its name to the town and county of Kirkcudbright (Cuthbrichtiskirche), REGINALDUS, c. 84.

⁴⁸ She was born in 654, and was not thirty when Cuthbert met her in Coquet Isle. See the genealogical table, Appendix VI., p. 752.

⁴⁹ Page 407.

found no remedy from physicians, she cried, "Ah, had I but something which belonged to my dear Cuthbert, I am sure I should be cured." A short time after her friend sent her a linen girdle, which she hastened to put on, and in three days she was healed.⁵⁰

Shortly before his death, and during his last pastoral visitation, Cuthbert went to see Elfleda in the neighborhood of the great Monastery of Whitby, to consecrate a church which she had built there, and to converse with her for the last time. They dined together, and during the meal, seeing his knife drop from his trembling hand in the abstraction of supernatural thoughts, she had a last opportunity of admiring his prophetic intuition, and his constant care for the salvation of souls. The fatigue of the holy bishop, who said, laughingly, "I cannot eat all day long; you must give me a little rest" — the eagerness and pious curiosity of the young abbess, anxious to know and do everything, who rushes up breathless during the ceremony of the dedication to ask from the bishop a memento for a monk whose death she had just heard of — all those details form a picture complete in its simplicity, upon which the charmed mind can repose amid the savage habits and wild vicissitudes of the struggle, then more violent than ever, between the Northumbrians and Picts, the Saxons and the Celts.⁵¹

But the last of all his visits was for another abbess, less illustrious and powerful than the two His last visit to the Abbess
Verca.
 princesses of the blood of Ethelfrid, but also of high birth, and not less dear to his heart, if we may judge by the mark of affection which he gave her on his deathbed. This was Verca, abbess of one of that long line of monasteries which traced the shores of the Northern Sea, seated on the high promontories, or at the mouths of the ⁵⁰ "Sanctimonialis virgo et regalis. . . . Multo virum Dei semper excolebat amore. . . . Cum nil curationis adhibere medici. . . . Utinam haberem aliquid de rebus Cuthberti mei! Scio certe et credo et confido in Domino quia cito sanarer." — BOLLAND., 121. Vita, c. 23.

⁵¹ "Fidelissima abbatissa Elfleda de sancto episcopo aliud scientiæ spiritualis miraculum mihi revelavit. . . . Cum in parochia quæ dicitur Osingadum, simul in convivio sederent . . . præscius vicini sui obitus . . . rogatus a nobilissima et sanctissima virgine . . . venit ad possessionem monasterii ipsius, quatenus ibidem et ipsam videre atque alloqui, et ecclesiam dedicare deberet. . . . Manus ejus tremefacta, cultellus quem tenebat decedit in mensam. Jocese respondit: Num tota die manducare valebam? jam aliquando quiescere debui. Hæc audiens illa confestim misit ad majus suum monasterium. . . . Illa statim ad episcopum cucurrit . . . anhelans in basilicam pervenit." — MONACH. LINDISF., ap. BOLLAND., 123. BEDE, Vita, c. 34.

Northumbrian rivers. Her convent was on the mouth of the Tyne, the river which divided the two Northumbrian kingdoms, Deira and Bernicia, and to it the body of the holy King Oswin had been carried after his murder.⁵² She gave Cuthbert a magnificent reception; but the bishop was ill, and after the mid-day meal which was usual in all the Benedictine monasteries, he became thirsty. Wine and beer were offered to him, yet he would take nothing but water; but this water, after it had touched his lips, seemed to the monks of Tynemouth, who drank the remainder, the best wine they had ever tasted. Cuthbert, who retained nothing of the robust health of his youth, already suffered from the first attacks of the disease which carried him off. His pious friend was no doubt struck by his feebleness, for she offered him, as the last pledge of spiritual union, a piece of very fine linen to be his shroud.⁵³

Two short years of the episcopate had sufficed to consume his strength. After celebrating the feast of Christmas in 686 with the monks of Lindisfarne, the pre-sentiment of approaching death determined him to abdicate, and to return to his isle of Farne, there to prepare for the last struggle. Here he lived but two months in the dear and pleasant solitude which was his supreme joy, tempering its sweetness by redoubled austerities. When his monks came to visit him in his isle, which storms often made

He returns to his rock to die.
Jan., 687.

⁵² See above, p. 251.

⁵³ "A religiosa et ad sæculum quoque nobilissima famula Christi Verca abbatissa magnifice susceptus, postquam de meridiana quiete surrexerunt. . . . Confitebantur alterutrum quod videretur sibi nunquam melius vinum bibisse, sicut unus ex ipsis postea in nostro monasterio . . . sua mihi relatione testatus est." — BEDE, Vita, c. 35. I do not know why the Bollandists, Mabillon, and M. Varin, agree in placing the monastery of Verca, not at Tynemouth on the Northumbrian Tyne, which flows past Hexham and Newcastle, on the road from Whitby to Lindisfarne, but at Tynningham, a little monastery founded by St. Baldred († 606), also on the seaside like Tynemouth, but more to the north, at the mouth of the Scotch Tyne, which traverses Lothian and flows through Haddington. The remains of this very ancient monastery are still to be seen in the Earl of Haddidgton's park. This district had been restored to the Pictish dominion after the defeat of Egfrid and the flight of the Bishop of Abercorn, with all the communities of the country. The last historian of our saint, Mgr. Eyre, having more complete information, and writing on the spot, proves that it was Tynemouth, where there were two monasteries, one of monks on the north, the other of nuns on the south of the stream. Mr. Joseph Robertson is of the same opinion; he attributes the error of Mabillon to the inexact information given him by a priest of the Scottish college at Paris, who, though a learned man, had the mania, so common among the Scotch, of claiming for his country both places and personages belonging to Ireland and England.

inaccessible for weeks together, they found him thin, tremulous, and almost exhausted. One of them, who has given us a narrative of the end of his life, revived him a little by giving him warm wine to drink, then seating himself by the side of the worn-out bishop upon his bed of stone to sustain him, received from his beloved lips the last confidences and last exhortations of the venerated master. The visits of his monks were very sweet to him, and he lavished upon them to the last moment proofs of his paternal tenderness, and of his minute care for their spiritual and temporal well-being. His last illness was long and painful. He fixed beforehand the place of his burial, near the oratory which he had hollowed in the rock, and at the foot of a cross which he had himself planted. "I would fain repose," said he, "in this spot, where I have fought my little battle for the Lord, where I desire to finish my course, and from whence I hope that my merciful Judge will call me to the crown of righteousness. You will bury me, wrapped in the linen which I have kept for my shroud, out of love for the Abbess Verca, the friend of God, who gave it to me."⁵⁴

The abbess's shroud.

He ended his holy life preaching peace, humility, and the love of that unity which he thought he had succeeded in establishing in the great Anglo-Celtic sanctuary, the new abbot of which, Herefrid, begged of him a last message as a legacy to his community. "Be unanimous in your counsels," the dying bishop said to him, in his faint voice; "live in good accord with the other servants of Christ; despise none of the faithful who ask your hospitality; treat them with friendly familiarity, not esteeming yourself better than others who have the same faith and often the same life. But have no communion with those who withdraw from the unity of Catholic peace, either by the illegal celebration of Easter or by practical ill-doing. Remember always, if you must make a choice, that I infinitely prefer that you should leave this place, carrying my bones with you, rather than that you should remain here bent under the yoke of wicked heresy. Learn and observe with diligence the Catholic decrees of the fathers, and also the rules of monastic life which God has deigned to give you by my hands. I know that many have despised me in my life, but after my death you will see that my doctrine has not been despicable." These energetic words, and the allusion to his predecessor Colman, who had left Lindisfarne, carrying with him the bones of the holy Bishop Aidan, rather than submit to ritualistic unity with Rome, shows that this unity had in the Celt Cuthbert a champion less impetuous and less rash than Wilfrid, but not less resolute and devoted.⁵⁵

His last exhortation.

⁵⁴ "Ad dilectum eremiticæ conversationis agonem quantocius remeare curavit, quatenus indita sibi sollicitudinis mundanæ spineta liberior priscae compunctionis flamma consumeret. . . . Qui cum duo menses in magna repetitæ suæ quietis exultatione transigeret, multo consuetae distractionis rigore corpus mentemque constringeret. . . . Vinum calefaciens attuli . . . videbam namque in facie ejus quia multum inedia simul et languore erat defessus. Completa curatione resedit quietus in stratu: resedi et ego juxta eum. . . . Illic ubi quantulumcumque pro Domino certamen certavi . . . unde ad coronam justitiæ sublevandam me a pio iudice spero. . . . Nolui quidem ea vivens indui, sed pro amore dilectæ Deo feminae, quæ hanc mihi misit, Vercae abbatisse, ad obvolvendum corpus meum reservare curavi."—Vita, c. 36, 37. This shroud, recognizable by its extreme fineness, was found when his tomb was opened in 1104, according to Reginald, De Admirandis, &c., c. 41.

His death.
20th March,
687.

This effort was the last. He lost the power of speech, received the last sacraments in silence, and died, raising his eyes and arms to heaven, at the hour when it was usual to sing matins, in the night of the 20th March, 687. One of his attendant immediately mounted to the summit of the rock, where the lighthouse is now placed, and gave to the monks of Lindisfarne, by waving a lighted torch, the signal agreed upon to announce the death of the greatest saint who has given glory to that famous isle. He was but fifty, and had worn the monastic habit for thirty-five years.

His most intimate friend dies on the same day and at the same hour.

Among many friends, he had one who was at once his oldest and most beloved — a priest called Herbert, who lived as an anchorite in an island of Lake Derwentwater, one of those fine lakes which make the district of Cumberland and Westmoreland the most picturesque part of England. Every year Herbert came from his peaceful lake to visit his friend in the other island, beaten and undermined continually by the great waves of the Northern Sea; and upon that wild rock, to the accompaniment of winds and waves, they passed several days together in a tender solitude and intimacy, talking of the life

⁵⁵ "Pondus ægritudinis facilitatem loquendi minoraverat. Verum me diligentius inquirente, quem hereditarium sermonem, quod ultimum vale fratribus relinqueret, cœpit disserere pauca sed fortia. . . . Multo plus diligo ut eruentes de tumultu tollentesque vobiscum ossa mea recedatis ab his locis, et ubicumque Deus providerit incolæ maneatis, quam ut ulla ratione consentientes iniquitati schismaticorum iugo colla subdatis. . . . Scio enim quia etsi quibusdam contemptibilis vixi, post meum tamen obitum, qualis fuerim, quam mea doctrina non sit contemnenda videbitis." — Vita, c. 39.

to come. When Cuthbert, then a bishop, came for the last time to Carlisle, to give the veil to Queen Ermenburga, Herbert seized the opportunity, and hastened to refresh himself at that fountain of eternal benefits which flowed for him from the holy and tender heart of his friend. "My brother," the bishop said to him, "you must ask me now all that you want to know, for we shall never meet again in this world." At these words Herbert fell at his feet in tears. "I conjure you," he cried, "do not leave me on this earth behind you; remember my faithful friendship, and pray God, that, after having served Him together in this world, we may pass into His glory together." Cuthbert threw himself on his knees at his friend's side, and after praying for some minutes, said to him, "Rise, my brother, and weep no more; God has granted to us that which we have both asked from Him." And in fact, though they never saw each other again here below, they died on the same day and at the same hour, the one in his isle bathed by the peaceable waters of a solitary lake, the other upon his granite rock fringed by the foam of the ocean; and their souls, says Bode, reunited by that blessed death, were carried together by the angels into the eternal kingdom.⁵⁶ This coincidence deeply touched the Christians of Northumbria, and was long engraven in their memory. Seven centuries later, in 1374, the Bishop of Carlisle appointed that a mass should be said, on the anniversary of the two saints, in the island where the Cumbrian anchorite died, and granted an indulgence of forty days to all who crossed the water to pray there in honor of the two friends.⁵⁷

In all the histories of the saints, where shall we find a more complete contrast than that between Wilfrid and Cuthbert, though they were contemporaries, and devoted, from the bottom of their hearts, to the same cause? The life of Cuthbert, much shorter and less afflicted than that of Wilfrid, affords rest to the observer in the midst of the disturbances of a conflict to which,

Contrast between Cuthbert
and
Wilfrid.

⁵⁶ "In insula stagni illius pergrandis . . . jamdudum Cuthberehto spiritualis amicitiae fœdere copulatus. . . . Dum sese alterutrum cœlestis sapientiæ poculis debriarent. . . . Memento, frater Hereberte, ut modo quidquid habes me interroges. . . . Obsecro per Dominum ne me deseras, sed tui memor sis fidissimi sodalis. . . . Unius ejusdemque momento temporis egredientes e corpore spiritus eorum, mox beata invicem visione conjuncti sunt, atque angelico ministerio pariter ad regnum translati cœleste." — Vita, c. 28.

⁵⁷ EYRE, p. 59. English readers will thank us for reminding them of the beautiful lines dedicated to our two saints by Wordsworth, a poet whose style at the same time, he was not a stranger ; but his part seems always to have been that of mediator and consoler. He liked better to persuade and to heal than to fight and vanquish. Besides Wilfrid, who is the saint of active life, of polemics, of publicity, of the struggle with kings, princes, and prelates, Cuthbert appears to us as the saint of nature, of a life retired and humble, of popular preaching, of solitude, and of prayer.

Notwithstanding this, the popularity of Cuthbert was immense, infinitely more general and more lasting than that of Wilfrid, or indeed of any other saint of his country and century. The Northumbrians listened with delight to the story of the pontiff who lived their own rustic and sea-faring life, a shepherd and a sailor by turns — who understood and had shared their occupations, their feelings, their necessities — who had taught them goodness by practising it himself, and truth by serving it without remission, but with a boundless charity.

While these recollections were engraved in the faithful memory of the laboring classes, kings, lords, and prelates of expression does not always equal the nobility and purity of his inspiration, but who deserves to be better known than he is in France : —

“ If thou, in the dear love of some one friend,
 Hast been so happy that thou know'st what thoughts
 Will sometimes, in the happiness of love,
 Make the heart sink, then wilt thou reverence
 This quiet spot ; and, stranger, not unmoved,
 Wilt thou behold this shapeless heap of stones —
 The desolate ruins of St. Herbert's cell.
 Here stood his threshold ; here was spread the roof
 That sheltered him, a self-secluded man,
 After long exercises in social care
 And offices humane, intent to adore
 The Deity with undistracted mind,
 And meditate on everlasting things
 In utter solitude. But he had left
 A fellow-laborer, whom the good man loved
 As his own soul ; and when, with eye upraised
 To heaven, he knelt before the crucifix,
 While o'er the lake the cataract of Lodore
 Pealed to his orisons, and when he paced
 Along the beach of this small isle, and thought
 Of his companion, he would pray that both,
 Now that their earthly duties were fulfilled,
 Might die in the same moment. Nor in vain
 So prayed he, as our chronicles report.
 Though here the hermit numbered his last day,
 Far from St. Cuthbert, his beloved friend,
 These holy men both died in the same hour.”

rivalled each other in demonstrations of respect and munificence to his relics and his spiritual posterity. All these different but equally persevering kinds of admiration produced an incredible amount of offerings, and especially gifts of land, made in his honor to the churches of Lindisfarne and Durham, in which successively he found a tomb. The words of Scripture were never more completely verified — “Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth.”

It would require a volume to tell the history of the worship of St. Cuthbert and his relics, a history which, during many centuries, is mixed up with the history of the north of England, and sometimes takes the leading place in it.⁵³ The history of the various journeys made by the monks of Lindisfarne, in the ninth and tenth centuries, to take back from the Danes the corpse of their beloved saint, along with the skull of the martyr-king Oswald, would make of itself an Odyssey full of varied and curious episodes. This treasure at last found an asylum upon a steep platform formed like a horseshoe, covered with wood, and surrounded on three sides by a rapid river, where was built in 995, a chapel which took the name of Durham, and to which was afterwards transferred the episcopal and abbatial see. From this moment the name and memory of Cuthbert hovered over the magnificent Cathedral of Durham, one of the most beautiful in the world. This magnificent building, with its three stories of arched windows, its two towers, its five naves and two transepts, forms, with the ancient castle of the bishop, built by William the Conqueror, a monument at once of religion and art as admirable as it is little known. It can be compared only to Pisa, to Toledo, to Nuremberg, or Marienburg. It has even a great advantage over all these celebrated places, in the beauty of the landscape which encloses it. It is the sole existing example of a splendid cathedral situated in the midst of an old wood, and on the height of a rock, the abrupt descent of which is bathed by a narrow and rapid river.⁵⁹

Posthumous glory of St. Cuthbert.

Translation to Durham.

⁵³ This volume actually exists; it has been compiled with great care and elegance by Mgr. Eyre, Catholic priest of Newcastle, under the title of History of St. Cuthbert, with an Account of the Wanderings with his Body during 124 years, of the State of his Body until 1542, and of the various Monuments erected to his Memory (London, 1862); and has very serviceable maps and plans. It contains the later history of Lindisfarne and of the Cathedral of Durham. Amongst other curious details we are told that a statue of the holy bishop, erected four centuries after his death, bore this inscription: “Sanctus Cuthbertus monachus, episcopus Lindisfarnensis, nunc patronus ecclesiæ ac libertatis Dunelmensis.”

⁵⁹ I may draw attention to the view from the corner of Framwellgate Bridge

The extreme veneration with which the Saxon people surrounded the relics of St. Cuthbert made this church the best endowed in England. The humble anchorite, who had lived on his rock by the modest produce of his manual labor alone, thus created the richest benefice, after Toledo, in Christendom.

Cuthbert had vainly asked his monks to bury him upon his rock of Farne, in order to spare them the trouble caused by the criminals who would come to take refuge at his tomb.⁶⁰ The monks of Lindisfarne exposed themselves willingly to these importunate visitors, rather than deprive their church of what was to be its most precious treasure. After his translation to Durham, universal consent conferred in an ever increasing degree upon the sanctuary where his relics reposed a universally respected right of asylum. The ring of sculptured bronze attached to the door of the cathedral, which any pursued criminal or persecuted innocent had but to grasp in order to have part in the inviolability of the sanctuary, is still shown. The few who ventured to disregard this inviolability incurred celestial punishment, which increased the fame of the sanctuary. But the good saint did not wait until they had sought the shelter of his tomb to extend the hand of tutelary protection over the unhappy and the oppressed. The records of his church are rich in narratives of his miraculous interposition in behalf of the unfortunate victims of feudal tyranny, or of the too often arbitrary and pitiless justice of the middle ages.⁶¹ The poor who as one of the most picturesque and curious in Europe. The visitor must follow the shady avenue of oaks and beeches which skirts the left side of the horseshoe formed by the Wear opposite to that on which the cathedral stands. Those who know the little town of Semur in Auxois, with its castle and church built on a peninsula surrounded by the Armançon, may, by trebling the proportions of the landscape and its monuments, form an idea of the situation of Durham. Those who have visited Toledo, and recollect how the Tagus hollows out a bed for itself between two rocks and winds about the plateau on which is built the ancient capital of Spain, can still better imagine the site of Durham; but at Toledo the metropolitan church, buried among houses, does not equal the effect of the English cathedral; it lacks also the fine trees which surround the sanctuary of St. Cuthbert with so beautiful a girdle.

⁶⁰ "Vobis commodius esse arbitror ut hic requiescam propter incursionem profugorum vel noxiorum quos non libet: qui cum ad corpus meum forte confugerint, qui (qualiscumque sum) fama tamen exivit de me quia famulus Christi sum: necesse habetis sepius pro talibus apud potentis sæculi intercedere idque ideo de præsentia corporis mei inultum tolerare laborem." — BEDE, Vita, c. 37.

⁶¹ See the curious anecdotes of the twelfth century, related by the monk Reginald in his Libellus de Admirandis Beati Cuthberti Virtutibus quæ invoked him saw the saint penetrate into the hideous dungeons where they were buried alive. At his voice their chains fell off, their instruments of torture were broken, and, like the angel who delivered St. Peter, Cuthbert led them to a safe place through the midst of sleeping jailers and closed doors.

But in this posthumous history of the holy abbot of Lindisfarne nothing is more singular or more touching than to see a man so humble, so modest, and so pacific, transformed into the patron saint, historical, warlike, and political, of all Northumbria, and that for six centuries at least after his death.

He becomes the patron saint of Northumbria against internal oppression and foreign invasion.

It became a matter of pride to Northumbrian patriotism to sustain and demonstrate that Cuthbert was the most powerful intercessor produced by the Anglo-Saxon race, and that neither the glorious Queen Etheldreda nor the holy King St. Edmond, martyred by the Danes, nor St. Thomas of Canterbury himself, were so much listened to by God.⁶² The principal Anglo-Saxon kings emulated each other in seeking his protection. The great King Alfred, when hidden in the marsh of Glastonbury, at the most critical moment of his struggle with the Danes, saw St. Cuthbert in a vision, who encouraged him, and promised him victory and the deliverance of his country. Canute, the great king of the Danes, when he became master of England, went barefooted to the tomb of Cuthbert, to pray there for the protection of the saint most venerated by the people he had just subdued. William the Conqueror himself, when he hastened to Durham to avenge the death of those Normans whom the inhabitants, intrenched in their sacred peninsula, had repulsed and slain, experienced a sort of supernatural impression before the tomb of the Anglo-Saxon saint, and respected the immunities on which novellis patrata sunt temporibus, which was written after the year 1172, at the request of the holy abbot Ælred of Rievaulx, and published for the first time by the Surtees Society in 1835. This collection is one of the most curious memorials of the religious and social condition of England in the twelfth century. Among a crowd of legends more or less fabulous, it contains many details equally original and authentic of the manners and institutions of the time. Side by side with great examples of sanctity and of habitual study of the Holy Scriptures, we find, both in lay and in religious life, scandals and excesses of tyranny which nothing could now make supportable in Western Europe, and which could only be reproduced under the dominion of the Czars.

⁶² "Gloriosæ reginæ Etheldrithæ . . . tribus præcipuis Anglorum sanctis."
— REGINALD, c. 19, 115.

the vassals of the bishopric plumed themselves in honor of their patron.⁶³

In fact, the Norman Conquest did not in any way diminish the popularity of Cuthbert; Normans and Saxons were rivals for his protection. It is on record that an Anglo-Norman knight of the eleventh century returned from a pilgrimage to Rome, carrying the whole way, upon his bosom, a great piece of antique marble intended to decorate the altar of the holy bishop.⁶⁴

Under the Anglo-Saxon monarchy Durham thus inherited at once all the veneration which attached to Lindisfarne, the cradle of faith and of the national Church of Northumbria — and to the personal memory of St. Cuthbert. Under the feudal royalty of the Plantagenets, the bishops who took special honor to themselves as his successors, succeeded in some degree in identifying themselves and their domains with him. Devotion to St. Cuthbert became so respected and so officially efficacious, that all that was given to them and all they acquired was legally invested with what was called, in the middle ages, freedom — that is to say, exemption from all taxes and all jurisdiction except that of the possessor. All the vast bishopric was considered the patrimony of St. Cuthbert, and bore his name. By reason of this privilege the bishops of Durham acquired by degrees all the attributes of royalty. They had a chancery, an admiralty, an exchequer, civil and criminal judges, the right of coining money, and in addition the defence and suzerainty of the English frontier against the Scotch.⁶⁵ It was in consequence of having wasted the lands of St. Cuthbert that King David of Scotland drew upon himself the terrible defeat known as the Battle of the Standard; ⁶⁶ and it was upon a fief of the saint's patrimony, though enclosed by the diocese of York, that this decisive victory of the Anglo-Norman barons was gained.⁶⁷

Two centuries after that great day, Normans and Saxons finally melted down into one nation, marched to battle against the Scots under the vexillum Sancti Cuthberti, which was no other than the corporal used by the prior of Lindisfarne to cover the chalice at mass, and which his pious admirers had ⁶³ SIMEON DUNELMENSIS, c. 44.

⁶⁴ REGINALD, c. 74.

⁶⁵ CAMDEN'S Britannia, Gough's ed., vol. iii. p. 109.

⁶⁶ See above, p. 446.

⁶⁷ RICARD. HAGULSTAD., pp. 82, 88, 93, Surtees edition.

taken the fancy of placing on the point of a lance, and carrying in place of a banner.⁶⁸ Edward III. was in France, where he had just won the battle of Crecy, and was besieging Calais. King David II. of Scotland, son of the illustrious Robert Bruce, had taken advantage of his absence to make a new invasion of Northumberland. He came as far as the walls of Durham at the head of thirty thousand Scots, whose devastations recalled only too distinctly those of their ancestors the Picts. The Queen of England, the generous Philippa of Hainault, led in her own person, to meet the enemy, an army inferior in number, but inspired by the idea of punishing the sacrilegious cruelty of the invaders. The Scots had not even respected the possessions and vassals of the abbey, which was still called the patrimony of St. Cuthbert. At the moment when the fight was about to begin, the prior of the monastery planted the standard of the saint upon a height near the field of battle, around which all the monks assembled in prayer. Victory pronounced itself for the English: their formidable archers, drawn specially from among the vassals of St. Cuthbert, made short work with the Scottish men-at-arms. The Scottish army was annihilated, and King David wounded and made prisoner along with his archbishop and the flower of his nobility. The next morning the victors, led by the chiefs of the two great chivalric houses of Norman Northumberland, the Nevilles and Percies, carried back to the monastic cathedral, along with the banners taken from the Scots, the precious relic they had borrowed. It reappeared in many battles, always assuring victory to the English, up to the reign of Henry VIII. The last time that this holy banner appeared on a field of battle was again in

Battle of Neville's
Cross.
17th Oct.,
1346.

⁶⁸ REGINALD, De Virtutibus, c. 39. See also BOLLAND., p. 127, for another curious instance of the protection given by St. Cuthbert against the Scotch in 1297, from whence Camden derived his saying — “Anglorum reges et proceres credidisse S. Cuthbertum contra Scottos tutelarum divum fuisse.” Walter Scott, always so skilful in invoking the poetical and religious traditions of the Scottish Marches, has not passed over this one: —

“Who may his miracles declare?
Even Scotland's dauntless king, and heir, . . .
Before his standard fled.
’Twas he, to vindicate his reign,
Edged Alfred's falchion on the Dane,
And turned the Conqueror back again,
When with his Norman bowyer band
He came to waste Northumberland.”

— Marmion, canto ii. 15.

the hands of the Nevilles and Percies, in the glorious but ill-fated insurrection of the Northumbrians against the atrocious tyranny of Henry VIII. in 1536.⁶⁹ This insurrection, known under the name of the Pilgrimage of Grace, in favor of the religion which the saints of Lindisfarne had brought into Northumbria, and which the miserable husband of Anne Boleyn wished to destroy, ended only in the massacre of the rural population, and in the judicial murder of the principal nobles and priests of the country — among others, of the last successor of St. Wilfrid at Hexham. Under the reign of this Defender of the Faith the standard of St. Cuthbert had the same fate as his body, which up to that time had remained uncorrupted. These holy remains, along with the bones of the venerable Bede, were torn from the shrine in which they had been venerated by so many grateful generations; and the noble banner was also torn from the sanctuary and thrown into the fire by the wife of an apostate priest.⁷⁰

⁶⁹ RAINE'S Priory of Hexham, Appendix, p. 136, notes 141, 150. The instruction of Henry VIII. to the Duke of Norfolk, as to the punishment of rebels, may be read p. 151. They direct that a good number of the inhabitants of every city, village, and hamlet shall be hanged and quartered, and, above all, as many priests and canons as possible are without ceremony to be tyed uppe. It reads like the instructions of the Committee of Public Safety to the Terrorist generals in La Vendée.

⁷⁰ The shocking details of this profanation, with an extremely curious description of the ancient usages of the great Cathedral of Durham before the Reformation, are to be found in a rare volume, entitled The Ancient Rites and Monuments of the Monastical and Cathedral Church of Durham. By J. D. (Davies), of Kidevelly; London, 1672, in 8vo.

James Raine, an Anglican writer whose erudition is clouded by his bigoted prejudices against the religion and the times which he has studied, affirms that at the opening of the tomb of St. Cuthbert in 1827 his body was discovered, together with his garments, comb, and other objects represented in the illustrations of a work entitled St. Cuthbert, with an Account of the State in which his Remains were found upon the opening of his Tomb in Durham Cathedral in the year 1827. By James Raine, rector of Meldon; Durham, 1828, in 8vo. The authenticity of this discovery is denied by Mgr. Eyre, according to whom the body of the saint is deposited in a hiding-place, the secret of which is known only to three English Benedictines!

The British Museum now contains the most ancient monument consecrated to the honor of the great Northumbrian saint — the Gospel called St. Cuthbert's. This celebrated MS. was the gift of Sir Robert Cotton, 1631. It was written between 700 and 720 by two bishops of Lindisfarne, Eadfrith and Ethelwold, and illuminated by the latter. The monk Betfrith enriched it with gilding and precious stones. It has a Northumbrian glossary of the end of the ninth century, interlined by a priest, Aldred — "bonæ mulieris filius eximius." The whole four, according to a final note, "Deo et Cuthberto construxerunt vel ornaverunt." It is a most curious monument of Irish art. According to Sir Frederick Madden, it bears all the marks of this special and extremely elegant art. It is discussed at length in an essay by Dr. Reeve, entitled On Early Irish Calligraphy, 1860, in 4to.

Less dazzling and less universal, but not less lasting, was the popularity of the holy Bishop of Lindisfarne with the seafaring population of the Northumbrian shores. This is apparent through all the different narratives which remain to us concerning the worship of which he was the object during so many centuries, and which throw a precious light upon the ideas, manners, and belief of the ancient English people. But let us state, in the first place, that all the monks of that district were, like Cuthbert, bold and unwearied sailors. Popularity of St. Cuthbert on sea as on land.
Sailor monks.
 There are no more interesting recollections of their life than those which show them to us in constant conflict with the element on which England has established her dominion. In that point, as in all else, the monks show themselves in history the pioneers of the Anglo-Saxon race. It is pleasant to see them sounding a prelude, as it were, by their courage and address, to the exploits of the most maritime nation in the world.

“Rule, Britannia! Britannia, rule the waves!”

The narratives of the seventh century are full of the cruel tempests which reigned upon the east coast of England, still one of the shores most abounding in shipwrecks.⁷¹ But no danger stopped the sons of those bold sailors who owed the conquest of Great Britain to their experience of the sea. The Anglo-Saxon monks, under the frock and scapular, wore hearts which did not yield either in vigor or activity to any of their ancestors or countrymen. They coasted continually between the different monasteries and their dependencies, which extended along that coast bristling with rocks and reefs. Sometimes the furious waves drove them out to sea, out of sight of land, sometimes held them shut up in some desert isle or solitary bay for whole days and weeks. Then, as soon as the wind fell, they put out again to encounter new dangers in their miserable barks, rocked on the crest of the waves like sea-gulls. They were compared to sea-birds by those who from the shore saw them struggling against the storm; and it was under this aspect that they appeared for the first time to Cuthbert, when in his youth, before he became a monk, he witnessed, in the midst of a mocking and hostile crowd, the fruitless efforts of the monks of Tynemouth to effect a landing, against wind and tide, with the wood for building, which they were carrying to their monastery in five little boats.⁷² The prayer of Cuthbert saved them, and brought them happily into port, where their brethren awaited them, all kneeling in a mass upon a point of rock which projected into the raging waves, to implore from heaven the safety of their companions.

⁷¹ “En tellus nivibus, nebulis cælum horrescit, aer flatibus adversis furit, fluctibus æquor . . . manente triduo tempestate prævalida. . . . Exorta subito tempestas fera, omnem eis naviganda facultatem abstulit . . . septem dies fervente unda conclusi, tristes in insula resederunt . . . quinque diebus obstitit tempestas ne redire possemus.” — Vita S. Cuthberti, c. 11, 36, 37. “Ecce subito, positus in medio maris . . . tanta ingruit tempestatis hiems ut neque velo neque remigio quicquam proficere valeremus. . . . Cumque diu cum vento pelagoque frustra certantes tandem post terga respiceremus . . . invenimus nos undique versum par tempestate præclusos.” — BEDE, Hist. Eccles., v. i.

Cuthbert, when a child, sees them like sea-birds on the waves.

When Cuthbert himself became a monk, his duties as missionary and prior, and afterward his prolonged sojourn upon the isle of Farne, familiarized him with all the dangers and habits of that seafaring existence which was so closely associated with monastic life. This recollection, joined to the popular glory of his name, gave him the place of patron saint to the poor seamen condemned to gain their bread by braving daily that stormy sea. Late in the twelfth century it was still told among them how, in the midst of the hurricane, the sailors in extremity saw the holy bishop of Lindisfarne appear in the midst of them, with his mitre on his head and his crosier in his hand, which he used sometimes as a helm, sometimes as an oar, sometimes as a grappling-iron, to save them from shipwreck, and bring them to a place of safety: no one dared to ask him his name, for all recognized, by the sheen of his beautiful and gentle countenance, the tender-hearted pontiff whom they had all been taught to venerate from their infancy as the protector of the country and of the coast.⁷³ It occurred to no one in those days to doubt the reality of such an apparition. For all the nations of Christendom at this period there was nothing more natural than the supernatural. It was only a more frequent and more direct intervention of the omnipotence of God, which appalled them or consoled them, but did not surprise.

His appearance to lost sailors.

⁷² "Quod videntes e monasterio fratres, emissis in fluvium naviculis, eos qui in ratibus laborabant adjuvare nitebantur. . . . Sed vi fluminis et violentia ventorum superati, nequaquam valebunt. . . . Collecti in proximo obice flectebant genua . . . adeo ut quasi quinque aves parvulae, quinque rates undis insidentes apparuerent." — Vita S. Cuthberti, c. 3.

⁷³ "Cuthbertus, quasi in specie corporali, omnibus visibilis et palpabilis apparuit, et in prora navis, gubernatoris de more, resedit. . . . Baculo pastoralis de modo gubernaculi, pontem savientem secando dividebat." — REGINALDUS, De Virtutibus S. Cuthberti, c. 23.

In this dangerous archipelago, and on the precipitous isle and where Cuthbert had his favorite dwelling and where he died, he had more than one successor ambitious of following his holy footsteps in the same spot where he had best known and served his God. The first of these was a monk of Ripon called Ethelwold, who, more effectually moved by the example of Cuthbert than by the lessons of Wilfrid, lived for twelve years in the cell of his holy predecessor, the opening of which he attempted to close against the wind and rain by clay, hay, and finally by a hide, that he might not be troubled in his contemplations.⁷⁴ But when the moaning of the wind and the waves, which broke against the basaltic precipices of his isle, warned him of coming calamity, he issued from his shelter to hasten to the aid of the shipwrecked; and the sailors, driven in the midst of storm, saw him kneeling on the summit of his rock with his hands raised to heaven imploring from God the salvation of his brethren.⁷⁵

The hermit Ethelwold prays for the shipwrecked. 687-695.

The Anglo-Saxon anchorite thus set up before God and man, on his unknown isle, and in the depths of an unknown age, a touching and glorious symbol of the everlasting part played by his fellow-monks, always ready to lavish upon Christians treasures of intercession, and to encounter public plagues and perils, as well as those temptations and tempests of the soul of which the waves in fury are but an imperfect image.

It is pleasant to connect with this old saint of the past a Christian heroine of our own days, the young and touching figure of Grace Darling, who came from the very isle of Cuthbert and Ethelwold to expose her life on behalf of the shipwrecked — as if that wild and threatening coast had been pre-

Grace Darling, the Christian heroine of the same archipelago in the nineteenth century.

⁷⁴ "Sumto fœno, vel argilla, vel quicquid hujusmodi materiæ reperisset, stipaverat rimulas, ne quotidianis imbrium sive ventorum injuriis ab orandi retardaretur instantia. . . . Pelliculam vituli in angulo, quod et ipse et prædecessor Cuthbertus sæpius orans stare vel genuflectere solebat, clavis affixam violentiis procellarum opposuit." — Vita S. Cuthberti, c. 46.

⁷⁵ "Ubi longius visum levavimus, vidimus in ipsa insula Farne, egressum de latibulis suis amatissimum Deo patrem iter nostrum inspicere. Audito fragore procellarum ac ferventis Oceani, exierat videre quid nobis accideret, cumque nos in labore ac desperatione positos cerneret, flectebat genua." — BEDE, Hist. Eccles., v. 1.

destined by God up to our own time to be at once the locality and the witness of the noblest deeds of charity. Grace was the daughter of the keeper of one of those lighthouses which modern science has raised upon the group of isles between Lindisfarne and Bamborough. One night, ^{5th Sept., 1838.} in the midst of a terrible storm, she was awoken by the cries of the crew of a great ship which had gone ashore on a neighboring reef. She awoke her father, and alone with him, oar in hand, in a frail boat, she rushed to the help of the perishing. The sea had never been more furious, nor the difficulty and danger of managing a boat greater. After desperate efforts, she at last reached the rock to which clung the last survivors of the crew. They were but nine in number, all of whom she took into her boat. The rage of the waves and violence of the wind were such that it took almost an entire day to row them back to the lighthouse, where she harbored and cared for them for three days and nights. All England burst into a unanimous transport of enthusiasm on learning this heroic act; and from the royal palace to the smallest village all echoed her praise. She was only twenty, and was no doubt already attacked by the pulmonary disease of which she died four years afterwards. ^{1842.} She died without any desire to leave her father and her island, leaving only a name worthy of eternal recollection, worthy to be inscribed among the heroes and saints. In Anglo-Saxon times she would have been canonized by the popular voice, as were all the saints whose history we record; and her place would have been fixed between Hilda and Ebba, the two great abbesses of her race and country, whose profaned altars and forgotten fame still hallow in the north and south the historic region which Grace Darling has lighted up with a modern and touching glory.⁷⁶ ⁷⁶ The ship wrecked upon the reefs of Longstone Island was a steamboat called the Forfarshire. Grace Darling's lighthouse is situated upon the isle called Longstone or Outer Farne. See the fine notice of this incident given by M. Alphonse Esquiros in one of his excellent articles upon England and English life (Revue des Deux Mondes, 1864), and for the localities Cruchley's excellent Reduced Ordnance Map, No. 62. Grace Darling's father died in May, 1865. He is buried beside his daughter, who rests in the cemetery at Bamborough, upon the site of the ancient capital of those Northumbrian kings of whom we have spoken so much. The monument raised by a national subscription to this young heroine of Christian charity is visible at sea a great distance off.

CHAPTER II.

ST. BENEDICT BISCOP, AND THE MONASTERIES OF WEARMOUTH AND YARROW.

Benedict Biscop represents science and art, as Wilfrid represents public, and Cuthbert spiritual, life. — His birth and conversion. — His four first expeditions to Rome. — He gains the heart of King Egfrid. — Foundation of Wearmouth. — He brings masons and glassmakers from France. — His fifth and sixth visits to Rome, from which he brings back many relics, books, and pictures. — Important works of painting in the new monasteries. — A Roman abbot teaches liturgical music to all the Northumbrian monasteries, and assures himself of the orthodoxy of the English clergy in respect to the heresy of the Monothelites. — Foundation of Yarrow. — Fraternal union of the two monasteries in imitation of their patrons Saints Peter and Paul. — Benedict takes his nephew Easterwine as his coadjutor. — The occupations of a Saxon noble transformed into a monk. — Death of Easterwine. — Severe illness of Benedict. — His last injunctions. — His touching death by the side of his dying coadjutor. — After him Ceolfrid, the son of an ealdorman, disciple of Wilfrid and Botulph, governs the two monasteries. — History of Botulph, the founder of Boston and apostle of the Benedictine order. — Ceolfrid, as abbot, takes great pains to increase the libraries. — He makes an exchange of a book for an estate with the King of Northumbria. — His desire to die at Rome. — Grief of the six hundred monks who accompanied him to the spot where he embarked. — Their letter to the Pope. — He is able to go only as far as Langres, where he dies. — How Christianity taught the barbarous Saxons to love each other.

A THIRD saint, whose name has been already mentioned in this record, comes in between Wilfrid and Cuthbert, Benedict Biscop, the companion of Wilfrid in his first journey to Rome, and during the last half of his life the neighbor of Cuthbert, whom he followed closely to the tomb. In the retirement of the cloister, and, so to speak, in private life, Benedict held the position which Wilfrid held in public life, as the champion of Roman unity and propagation of the Benedictine rule. He represents, besides, in the monastic constellation of the seventh century, intelligence, art, and science, as Cuthbert represents the gift of preaching and ascetic life. His fame was less than that of Wilfrid, and, with still greater reason, less than that of Cuthbert; but he has, notwithstanding, won a noble place in the annals of the Anglo-Saxon Church. We find various features in his life which do honor to his soul, and which are not without interest in the history of human intelligence.

Benedict Biscop, the representative of art and science as Wilfrid was of public, and Cuthbert of spiritual, life.

Birth and conversion of Benedict Biscop. 628.

customs

653.

Benedict was born, like Wilfrid, but several years before him, of the highest Anglo-Saxon nobility.⁷⁷ While he was still very young, he held an office in the household of King Oswy, who, according to the customs of the new-born feudalism, invested him with a fief taken from the national property, and proportioned to the importance of his office.⁷⁸ At twenty-five he gave up secular life, marriage, and his family, restored his lands to the king, and dedicated himself to the service of God. Before he settled in any community he went to Rome, where he had been long attracted by that desire of paying his vows at the tombs of the apostles which became so general among the Anglo-Saxons. It has been seen, in the history of Wilfrid,⁷⁹ how, after beginning their journey together, the two young Northumbrian nobles separated at Lyons, and how Benedict, after his first visit to Rome, returned there a second and third time, having in the meantime assumed the monastic habit in the island of Lerins, a monastery which had just entered into the family of St. Benedict. It may also be remembered that Pope Vitalinus, struck with the piety and knowledge of so constant and zealous a pilgrim, assigned him as guide and interpreter to the Greek Theodore, who undertook, at the age of sixty-seven, to take the place of St. Augustin, and who retained his Anglo-Saxon guide with him for two years, transforming him from a monk of Lerins into the abbot of the principal monastery in Canterbury.⁸⁰

His journey to Rome.

669.

671.

After thus spending two years with the new archbishop, the Abbot Benedict, instead of revisiting his native district, went for the fourth time to Rome. He was then in the prime of life; but when it is considered what were the difficulties and dangers of such a journey at such a time — when we remember that a journey from London to ⁷⁷ Wilfrid's historian informs us that his true name was Baducing: we have no information why he took the name of Benedict, under which he is generally known, nor whence came his surname of Biscop, since he was never a bishop.

⁷⁸ "Nobili stirpe gentis Anglorum progenitus . . . cum esset minister Oswii regis, et possessionem terræ suo gradui competentem, illo donante, perciperet." — BEDE, Vitæ Abbatum in Wiramutha et Girrum, c. 1.

⁷⁹ See above, p. 308.

⁸⁰ St. Peter's, since called St. Augustin's.

Rome was then twice as long as and a hundred times more dangerous than a journey from London to Australia is now — we are amazed at the resolution and energy which then, as ever since, has induced so many Christians, and especially so many Anglo-Saxon monks, not once only, but many times in their life, to cross the sea and the Alps on their way to Rome. His fourth expedition was undertaken in the interests of literature. He brought back from it a rich cargo of books, partly sold, partly given to him; and in passing by Vienna, the ancient capital of the Gauls, on his return, he brought with him many more, which he had deposited there in the charge of his friends.⁸¹ When he returned at length to his native Northumbria he sought King Egfrid, the son of his former master, then the reigning monarch, and told him all he had done during the twenty years which had passed since he left his country and the royal service. Then, endeavoring to communicate to him the religious ardor with which his own heart was filled, he explained to the king all he had learned, at Rome and elsewhere, of ecclesiastical and monastic discipline, showing him the books and relics which he had brought back. Egfrid, who had not yet begun his unfortunate struggle with Wilfrid, allowed himself to be won by the stories of the pilgrim, for whom he conceived a great affection; and in order that he might apply his experience to the government of a new community, he detached from his own possessions, and presented to Benedict, an estate large enough to feed seventy families, and give occupation to seventy ploughs, according to the mode of calculating the value of land among the Anglo-Saxons.⁸²

He gains
the heart of King
Egfrid.

The estate was situated at the mouth of the Wear, a little stream which flows through Durham, and throws itself into the Northern Sea a little south of the Tyne. This gave the name of Wearmouth to the new monastery, which was consecrated to St. Peter, the prince of the apostles, according to the express wish of Egfrid, in

Foundation
of Wearmouth.
673-675.

⁸¹ "Libros omnis divinæ eruditionis non paucos, vel placito pretio emptos, vel amicorum dono largitos retulit. . . . Emptitios ibi quos apud amicos commendaverat, recepit." — Vita Abbatis, c. 4.

⁸² "Confestim ei terram LXX. familiarum de suo largitus." — Ibid. Commentators suppose that Bede intended to indicate under the word familia the space of ground otherwise called a hide or carrucata — that is to say, the portion of land which could be cultivated by one plough in the space of a year.

agreement with that of Benedict as an evidence of his leanings towards Rome.⁸³

This foundation was no sooner assured than the unwearied Benedict took ship again, to seek in France cementarii, like those whom Wilfrid brought about the same time from Canterbury. As soon as they arrived he set them to work in building a stone church, in the Roman style, for everything that came from Rome was dear to him. It was in honor of St. Peter that he undertook this work, and it was carried on with so much energy that, a year after the first stone was laid, the church was roofed in and mass celebrated under one of those stone arches which excited the surprise and admiration of the English of the seventh century. He brought glassmakers also from France, for there were none in England; and these foreign workmen, after having put glass into the windows of the church and new monastery, taught their art to the Anglo-Saxons.⁸⁴ Animated by a zeal which nothing could discourage, and inspired by intelligent patriotism, and a sort of passion for beauty in art, which shrank neither from fatigue nor care,⁸⁵ he sent to seek beyond the seas all that he could not find in England — all that seemed

He brings
masons and glass-makers from France.

Renewed expeditions
to Rome.
678.

⁸³ There are two distinct ecclesiastical sites at the mouth of the Wear — on the north, Monk-Wearmouth, where Benedict Biscop's monastery was situated; and Bishop-Wearmouth, on the south, which owes its origin to the bishops of Durham. Both are swallowed up in the town of Sunderland, situated on the east of Bishop-Wearmouth, on the sea, which is now one of the principal seaports in England.

Wearmouth has become at the present time one of the chief centres of the collieries, and also of those hideous evils which lately excited, thanks to the zeal of Lord Shaftesbury, the consternation and horror of England. See the Parliamentary discussions of 1842. There are no more lazy monks to feed the poor population; but there existed up to 1842 a crowd of women and girls, almost naked, who worked among the men, for fourteen hours successively, sixteen hundred feet below the surface of the earth, and at a temperature of about ninety degrees. — Report from the Select Committee, 1841, p. 4. Let us add with pleasure, that a humane legislation has since then applied remedies to the revolting abuses thus brought to a salutary publicity.

⁸⁴ "Cementarios qui lapideam sibi ecclesiam juxta Romanorum quem semper amabat morem facerent, postulavit, accepit, attulit. . . . Misit legatarios Galliam, qui vitri factores, artifices videlicet Britannii eatenus ignotos, ad cancellandas ecclesiæ, porticumque et cænaculorum ejus fenestras adducerent. . . . Anglorum ex eo gentem hujusmodi artificium nosse ac discere fecerunt." — Vitæ Abbat., c. 5. I believe that this, and the instance before quoted of Wilfrid, are the first known examples of the use of glass windows. There is, however, no evidence that these windows were colored.

⁸⁵ "Quippe studio advehendi cognatis aliquod insolitum amor patriæ, et voluptas elegantiae asperos fallebat labores." — WILL. MALMESB., De Gest. Reg., i. 54.

necessary to him for the ornamentation of his church; and not finding even in France all he wanted, he went for the fifth time to Rome. Even this was not his last visit, for some years later he made a sixth pilgrimage.⁸⁶ On both occasions he brought treasures back with him, chiefly books in countless quantities and of every kind. He was a passionate collector, as has been seen, from his youth. He desired each of his monasteries to possess a great library, which he considered indispensable to the instruction, discipline, and good organization of the community; and reckoned upon the books as the best means of retaining his monks in their cloisters; for much as he loved travelling himself, he did not approve of other monks passing their time on the highways and byways, even under pretext of pilgrimages.⁸⁷

Along with the books he brought relics, not alone for his own community, but for other churches in England, and a great number of pictures and colored images. By introducing these images from Rome into Northumberland, Benedict Biscop has written one of the most curious, and, at the same time, forgotten pages in the history of art. It is apparent that Rome was then the grand reservoir not only of tradition, but also of graphic or symbolic representations for the instruction and edification

Important paintings in his new monasteries.

⁸⁶ In speaking of these two last journeys, Bede says quarta and quinta vice, because he counts only the departures from England — De Britannia ad Romam accurrens." But he himself explains that during the second absence of Benedict Biscop, from 665 to 667, he made two pilgrimages to Rome — the one before, the other after his visit to Lerins. We add a chronological summary of the life of Benedict Biscop:—

628. Birth.

653. He gives up secular life, and goes to Rome for the first time.

665. His second journey to Rome: he becomes a monk at Lerins.

667. Third journey to Rome.

669. He returns with the Archbishop Theodore, and becomes Abbot of St. Peter's, at Canterbury.

671. Fourth journey to Rome.

672. Return by Vienna, where he recovers his books.

674. Foundation of Wearmouth.

676. Journey to France in search of artists.

678. Fifth journey to Rome.

682. Foundation of Yarrow. He takes Easterwine as his coadjutor.

684. Sixth journey to Rome.

686. Death of Easterwine. Return of Benedict.

690. His death.

⁸⁷ "Innumerabilem librorum omnis generis copiam. . . Bibliothecam quam de Roma nobilissimam et copiosissimam advexerat ad instructionem ecclesiæ necessariam. . . Bibliothecam utriusque monasterii quam magna instantia cepit." — Vita, c. 6, 9, 14. Cf. Homil. in Natale Benedicti Abbatis, t. vii. col. 465, and LINGARD, Antiquities, t. ii. p. 129.

of the faithful, the first outlines of which, traced in the Catacombs by the tombs of the martyrs, began to reappear in the great mosaics which still decorate the apses of the primitive churches in Rome. The Venerable Bede, who speaks with enthusiasm of the expeditions of his master and friend, leads us to suppose that these were portable pictures, which could only have been painted on wood; but it may be supposed that the Abbot of Wearmouth brought back with him both painters and mosaic-workers, to work on the spot at the decoration of his churches. How can it be otherwise explained how pictures on wood, brought even by water from Rome to England, should have been large enough to cover the walls and arches of the two or three churches of which Bede speaks?

However this may be, the result was that the most ignorant of the Christians of Northumbria found on entering these new monastic churches, under a material form, the attractive image of the instructions which the monastic missionaries lavished on them. Learned and unlearned could contemplate and study with delight, here the sweet and attractive figure of the new-born Saviour, there the twelve apostles surrounding the Blessed Virgin; upon the northern wall all the parables of the Gospels, upon the southern the visions of the Apocalypse; elsewhere a series of pictures which marked the harmony between the Old and New Testaments; Isaac carrying the wood for his sacrifice opposite to Jesus bearing His cross; the brazen serpent opposite Jesus crucified, and so on.⁸⁸ When we discover these details in the decoration of the Northumbrian monasteries twelve hundred years ago, we cannot but bethink ourselves that our own century, in two memorable instances, has reproduced this sublime thought: at Spire, in the vast cathedral which the munificence of the King of Bavaria has raised out of its ruins; and at Paris in the venerable Basilica of St. Germain des Prés, where our attention was attracted for the last time by the pencil of Flandrin, and from which a last lustre has been thrown upon talent so pure, so elevated, so serene, so naturally devoted to the service of the eternal truth. His name, though modern, like that of Ozanam, does not seem displaced amid the recollections of the saints and monuments of Christian antiquity!

⁸⁸ This passage, so important for decorative art, is as follows: "Picturas imaginum sanctarum quas ad ornandam ecclesiam quam construxerat, detulit; magnam videlicet B. M. V., etc., . . . quibus medium ejusdem ecclesiæ testudinem, ducto a pariete ad parietem tabulato præingeret; imagines evangelicæ historiæ quibus australem ecclesiæ parietem decoraret; imagines . . . quibus septentrionalem æque parietem ornaret, quatenus intrantes ecclesiam omnes etiam literarum ignari, quæque versum intenderent, vel semper amabilem Christi sanctorumque ejus . . . contemplarentur aspectum." — C. 6. Further on, when speaking of the fruits of his sixth and last journey to Rome: "Nam et tunc (attulit) dominicæ historiæ picturas quibus totam B. Dei Genitricis, quam in monasterio majore fecerat, ecclesiam in gyro coronaret: imagines quoque ad ornandum monasterium ecclesiamque B. Pauli Apostoli de concordia Veteris et Novi Testamenti summa ratione compositas exhibuit, etc." These last words apply to the second monastery founded at Yarrow, of which we have yet to speak. Thus it is apparent that the abbot Benedict Biscop had undertaken to decorate these churches — that of St. Peter at Wearmouth, St. Paul at Yarrow, and a third dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, in majore monasterio, which may have been only the choir or apsis of the first.

After Latin and Greek books, after what was then called literature and philosophy, after architecture and art, it was the turn of music — of the art which above all others is liturgic and monastic. On his return from his fifth voyage, Benedict brought back with him from Rome an eminent monk called John, precentor of St. Peter's, and abbot of St. Martin's at Rome, to establish at Wearmouth the music and Roman ceremonies with entire exactitude, and according to the practice of the Basilica of St. Peter at Rome. As soon as he had arrived at Wearmouth, this learned abbot set out in writing the order of the celebration of feasts for all the year, of which he soon circulated numerous copies. Then he opened classes, at which he taught, viva voce, the liturgy and ecclesiastical chants. The best singers of the Northumbrian monasteries came to listen to him, and invited him to visit their communities.⁸⁹

It was thus that Benedict Biscop drew from Rome, and spread throughout the soil of his country, by many different channels, the instructions and traditions of art consecrated by religion. History, it seems to us, offers few pages better adapted to refresh and console the soul than that on which the mother and sovereign Church is thus seen to open her protecting bosom to nations scarcely yet issued from the night of paganism, and to reveal to them, by the hands of her monastic ministers and missionaries, not only the mysteries of faith and the laws of morality, but also the pleasures of the mind and the beauties of art.

⁸⁹ "Ritum canendi ac legendi viva voce præfati monasterii cantores edocendo. . . . De omnibus pene ejusdem provincie monasteriis ad audiendum eum, qui cantandi erant periti, confluebant." — Hist. Eccles., iv. 18.

He brings with him a Roman abbot, who teaches liturgical music to all the Northumbrian monasteries.

The passionate zeal of our abbot for the building and decoration of his monastic houses did not make him forget the more essential interests of his foundations. Before leaving Rome, he took care to constitute his community upon the immovable basis of the rule of St. Benedict.⁹⁰ He obtained from Pope Agathon a charter which guaranteed the liberty and security of the new Monastery of Wearmouth, as Wilfrid did for his favorite Abbey of Hexham, and perhaps at an even earlier date. But far from requiring this guarantee against the King of Northumbria, as his old friend did, Bede takes care to prove that the pontifical grant was asked and obtained with the consent, and even at the desire, of Egfrid, and was confirmed in a public assembly by the king and bishops.⁹¹ From the time of their first separation at Lyons, Benedict seems always to have kept at a distance from Wilfrid, and no appearance of sympathy for the trials of the great persecuted bishop appears to him. Notwithstanding, they served the same cause, and inspired the Pope at least with equal confidence. Agathon gave a wonderful mark of this confidence to Benedict Biscop, by making his monastery the centre of the mission with which he had charged the precentor of St. Peter's, the object of which was to establish the orthodoxy of the English bishops and clergy in respect to the heresy of the Monothelites.⁹²

⁹⁰ "Post compositum juxta regulam monasterium, protectione completa."
— C. 6.

⁹¹ "Non vile munus attulit . . . epistolam privilegii . . . cum licentia, consensu, desiderio et hortatu Egfridi regis . . . qua monasterium ab omni prorsus extrinseca irruptione tutum perpetuo redderetur ac liberum . . . quod Britannias perlatum et coram synodo patefactum." — Vitæ Abbat., c. 6, 12, and Hist. Eccles., iv. 18.

⁹² This mission seems to indicate on the part of the Pontiff a certain distrust of Theodore. As has been already seen, Pope Vitalianus, in conferring on him the dignity of Metropolitan of England, joined to him the Abbot Adrian and Benedict Biscop himself, lest his nationality as a Greek might make him accessible to the errors of the Monothelites who then desolated the Church. At a later period, Agathon charged Abbot John, precentor of St. Peter's, to examine exactly into the faith of the Church of England, and to make his report at Rome. The pontifical envoy was present at the Council of Heathfield, called by the Archbishop Theodore (17th September, 680), where the Church of England made her confession of orthodox faith, and declared her acceptance of the five general councils, and that of St. Martin. Abbot John carried with him a copy of the acts of this council, to submit it to the Pope, and on the other hand gave the acts of the council of the Pope St. Martin to St. Benedict Biscop's monastery to be copied. He died before he could return to Rome, and his body was carried to St.-Martin-de-Tours, which he had visited on his way to England, on account of his great devotion to that saint, of whom his monastery in Rome bore the name.

King Egfrid, who was then at the height of his struggle with Wilfrid, seems to have been anxious to make up, to his own conscience and that of his Catholic people, for his violence towards the Bishop of York, by the intimacy of his relations with the two other great monks of his kingdom, the anchorite Cuthbert and the abbot Benedict. In order to give the latter a new mark of sympathy and protection, he assigned to him another estate, not so great as that of Wearmouth, for it could support only forty families, but so near to the first that it seemed possible to unite the two gifts, and make of them one vast patrimony. This was the cradle of the Monastery of Yarrow, the name of which is inseparably linked with that of the Venerable Bede. Yarrow was situated a little to the north of the Monastery of Wearmouth, in a similar position, at the mouth of a river, the Tyne, which there falls into the Northern Sea, after following a course parallel to that of the Wear, and was dedicated to the Apostle St. Paul, as Wearmouth was to the Apostle St. Peter. The thought which inspired Biscop of establishing the spirit and image of Rome upon this Northumbrian shore, already sweet with the perfume of monastic flowers is everywhere apparent.⁹³ He wanted a reproduction of St. Paul's outside the Walls, at a certain distance from his Saxon copy of St. Peter of the Vatican. Although he had appointed one of his most intimate friends and fellow-pilgrims, Ceolfrid, abbot of the new foundation, Benedict's intention was to make only one community of the two houses, in sign of the fraternal union which he longed to see reigning among them, and which should be suggested to them by the example of the two glorious apostles whom he had given to them as patrons.

Foundation
of Yarrow.
682.

Fraternal union of the two houses after the example of their patrons
St.
Peter and
St. Paul.

In order to be more at liberty to devote his time to travel, as well as to be more at the disposal of the king, who continually sought his presence and counsels,⁹⁴ Benedict took a coadjutor in the government of his first Monastery of Wear-

He takes his nephew, Easterwine,
for his coadjutor.
682-686.

⁹³ "Plaga olim et suave halantibus monasteriorum floribus dulcis, et urbium a Romanis ædificatarum frequentia renidens."—GUILL. MALMESB., De Gest. Reg., i. 9, 54.

⁹⁴ I borrow this detail from another Life of Benedict and Ceolfrid, which, if not written by Bede, has evidently furnished him with information, which he has repeated literally; it is to be found in the Opera Minora, and has been reprinted by Dr. Giles in the Appendix of his excellent edition of Bede, vol. vi. pp. 416-42.

mouth. This new abbot was his nephew, and, like Ceolfrid, one of his most devoted companions.⁹⁵ His name was Easterwine. He was younger than Benedict by twenty-two years, and, like him, of high birth; for it was the descendants of the noblest races of Northumbria who filled the monasteries, giving themselves up to occupations the most unlike those of their ancestors—to manual or literary work, to prayer and penitence. He had been, like Benedict, a soldier in the warlike household of King Egfrid. At twenty-one he had given up everything, to enter into the community formed by his uncle at Wearmouth; nor did the one dream of asking, nor the other of offering, any exemption from the charges and observances of religious life, on account of relationship or nobility. The noble youth took pride only in following minutely the rule and occupations of the house, like any other monk. Thanks to his illustrious biographer, we know what the occupations of a Saxon thane turned monk were in the seventh century. His duties were—to thrash and winnow the corn, to milk the goats and cows, to take his turn in the kitchen, the bakehouse, and the garden, always humble and joyous in his obedience. When he became coadjutor, and was invested, in Benedict's absence, with all his authority, the young abbot continued the course of communal life; and when his duties as superior led him out of doors to where the monks labored in the fields, he set to work along with them, taking the plough or the fan in his own hands, or forging iron upon the anvil. He was robust as well as young and handsome; but his look was infinitely gentle, and his conversation full of amiability.⁹⁶ When he was compelled to reprove a fault, it was done with such tender sadness that the culprit felt himself incapable of any new offence which should bring a cloud over the benign brightness of that beloved face. His table was served with the same provisions as that of the monks; and he slept in the general dormitory, which he left only five days before his death, being then hopelessly ill, to prepare himself, in a more solitary place for the last struggle. When he felt his end approaching, he had still strength enough left to go down to the garden, and seating himself there, called to him all his brethren, who wept the anticipated loss of such a father. Then, with the tenderness which was natural to him, he gave to each of them a last kiss.⁹⁷ The following night he died, aged thirty-six, while the monks were singing matins. Such happy deaths, which are common in the history of the time, seem to have been at once the privilege and the seal of all those generous vocations which filled the numerous monasteries of converted England.

⁹⁵ "Ut quem solus non poterat laborem, socia dilectissimi commilitonis virtute levius ferret."—Vitæ Abbat., c. 6.

⁹⁶ "Vir nobilis, sed insigne nobilitatis non ad jactantiæ materiem, ut quidam, despectumque aliorum, sed ad majorem, ut Dei servum decet, animi nobilitatem convertens. . . . Minister Egfridi regis . . . depositis armis . . . tantum mansit humilis, fratrumque simillimus aliorum, ut ventilare cum eis et triturare, oves vitulasque mulgere, in pistrino, in horto, in cunctis monasterii operibus jocundus et obediens gauderet exerceri. . . . Nequi vellet limpidissimam vultus ejus lucem nubilo sibi suæ inquietudinis abscondere. . . . Vel aratri gressum stiva regendo, vel ferrum malleo domando, vel ventilabrum manu concutiendo."—Vitæ Abbatum, c. 7.

Death of Easterwine.
7th March,
686.

When Benedict returned from his last expedition to Rome, he found his benefactor and protector, King Egfrid, and his nephew and coadjutor, Easterwine, both dead, along with a great number of his monks, carried off by one of the epidemics then so frequent. The only survivors at Yarrow were the abbot, and one little scholar whom we shall find again further on, and whose fame was destined to eclipse that of all the Saxon saints and kings, who are scarcely known to posterity except by his pen.⁹⁸ Benedict did not lose courage, but promptly collected new subjects under his sway, recommencing and pursuing, with his habitual energy, the decoration of his two Churches of St. Peter and St. Paul.⁹⁹ The monks had already chosen as successor to Easterwine a deacon named Sigfried, a learned and virtuous man, but affected by pulmonary disease, and the first of the English, I think, in whom history indicates a malady so general and so fatal to their race.¹⁰⁰

⁹⁷ "Sub divo residens, accitis ad se fratribus cunctis, more naturæ misericordis osculum pacis eis flentibus et de abscessu tanti patris et pastoris morientibus dedit."

⁹⁸ This pupil is generally thought to be no other than the Venerable Bede, who relates the touching incident in the following words: "Omnes qui legere, vel prædicare, vel antiphonas ac responsaria dicere possunt ablati sunt, excepto ipso abbate et uno puerulo, qui ab ipso nutritus ac eruditus, nunc usque in eo monasterio presbyterii gradum tenens, jure actus ejus laudabiles cunctis scire volentibus et scripto commandat et fatis." — Append., p. 421. He describes further on how the abbot and his pupil celebrated, alone and in great sadness, the whole psalms of the monastic service, non parvo cum labore, until new monks arrived.

⁹⁹ A fine engraving by Hollar, republished in Mr. Jamieson's Monastic Legends, represents him standing, dressed in pontifical robes; in the background are the two beautiful monasteries of St. Peter and St. Paul, and the Tyne flowing between them — an arrangement not geographically exact, but which answers to the intention of reproducing on the Northumbrian coast the Basilicas of St. Peter and St. Paul on the two opposite banks of the Tiber at Rome.

His last illness and exhortations.

Benedict's own turn was, however, soon to come. God preserved his life to purify him, and put his patience to a long and cruel trial, before calling him to his eternal recompense. After having devoted the first thirteen years of his abbatiato to the laborious and wandering life that was so dear to him, and to those distant expeditions that produced so many fruits for his order and his country, he was stricken by a cruel disease, which lasted for three years, and paralyzed all his members one after the other. Though kept to his bed by this infirmity, and unable to follow his brethren to the choir, he notwithstanding continued to celebrate each service, both day and night, with certain of the monks, mingling his feeble voice with theirs. At night his sleepless hours were consoled by the reading of the Gospels, which was kept up without interruption by a succession of priests. Often, too, he collected the monks and novices round his couch, addressing to them urgent and solemn counsels, and among other things begging them to preserve the great library which he had brought from Rome, and not to allow it to be spoiled or dispersed; but above all to keep faithfully the rules which, after a careful study of the seventeen principal monasteries which he had visited during his numerous journeys beyond seas, he had given to them.¹⁰¹ He also dwelt much upon the injunction he had already often repeated, that they should pay no regard to high birth in their choice of an abbot, but look simply to his life and doctrine. He prayed them to elect to this office the most worthy among themselves, in conformity to the rules of St. Benedict and the charter he had obtained for them. "If ¹⁰⁰ "Nocivo et irremediabili pulmonum vitio laborantem." — Vitæ Abbat., c. 8.

¹⁰¹ "Evangelium tota nocte pro doloris levamine, quod et aliis noctibus fieri consueverat. . . . Ex decem quippe et septem monasteriis quæ inter longos meæ crebræ peregrinationis discursus optima comperi, hæc universa didici, et vobis salubriter observanda contradidi." — BEDE, Vitæ Abbat., c. 8. Lingard (i. 208) believes from this passage that the rule of St. Benedict was only partially followed at Wearmouth; but it evidently refers only to those special regulations and laws which have been always made use of in all abbeys or congregations of abbeys, to develop and complete the fundamental rule. That this rule was known and followed in the Northumbrian monasteries, is plain from the exhortation of Benedict Biscop to his monks regarding their choice of a successor, in which he enjoins them to proceed "juxta quod regula magni quondam abbatis Benedicti, juxta quod privilegii nostri continent decreta." — Cf. MABILLON, Prefatio in Saculum Benedictinum, n. 88, 89.

I had to choose between two evils, I should prefer," he said to them, "to see the spot on which I have established our dear monastery fall back into eternal solitude, rather than to be succeeded here by my own brother; who, we all know, is not in the good way."¹⁰² Thus Benedict shows himself to have been moved by a presentiment of one of the most cruel dangers and fatal weaknesses with which the future of the monastic order could be threatened.

The strength of the holy abbot, and, at the same time, that of his poor coadjutor, was by this time so exhausted by their respective diseases, that they both perceived they were about to die, and desired to see each other for the last time before departing from this world. In order that the wish of these two tender friends should be accomplished, it was necessary to bring the dying coadjutor to the bed of the abbot. His head was placed on the same pillow; but they were both so feeble that they could not even embrace each other, and the help of brotherly hands was necessary to aid them.¹⁰³ All the monks assembled in chapter round this bed of suffering and love; and the two aged saints, having pointed out among them a successor approved by all, breathed together, with a short interval between, their last breath. Thus died, at the age of sixty-two, St. Benedict of England, a worthy rival of the great patriarch of the monks of the West, whose robe and name he bore, being, like him, a victor over sin and master of all virtue.¹⁰⁴

Death of
Benedict
Biscop.
12th Jan.,
690.

The monk proposed by the two dying saints to the choice of their brethren, to replace them as abbot of the two monasteries, was the same Ceolfrid who had accompanied Benedict to Rome and to Canterbury, and who was already Abbot of Yarrow. Like all the chiefs of the great Northumbrian com-

The government of the two monasteries, Wearmouth and Yarrow, goes to Ceolfrid,

¹⁰² "Vere dico vobis quod . . . tolerabilius mihi multo est totum hunc locum in quo monasterium feci . . . in solitudinem sempiternam redigi quam ut frater meus carnalis . . . in eo regendo pro me abbatis nomine succedat."

¹⁰³ "Egfridus in feretro deportaretur ad cubiculum ubi Benedictus et ipse suo jacebat in grabato . . . caput utriusque in eodem cervicali locaretur . . . vel tantum habuere virium, ut propius posita ora ad osculandum se alterutrum conjungere possent, sed et hoc fraterno compleverunt officio." — Vitæ Abbat., c. 10.

¹⁰⁴ "Vitiorum victor Benedictus et virtutum patrator egregius victus infirmitate carnis ad extrema pervenit. . . . Anima illa sancta longis flagellorum feliciū excocta atque examinata flammis luteam carnis fornacem deserit." Ibid., c. 11. He died January 12, 690, at the age of sixty-two.

munities, with the exception of Cuthbert, he proceeded from the highest rank of Anglo-Saxon nobility. His father bore the dignity of ealdorman, the highest rank after the blood-royal, and was famed for his magnificence. On one occasion, when he expected a visit from the king, the news of the sudden incursion of some enemy obliged the prince to depart before beginning the magnificently prepared repast, upon which the earl assembled all the poor of the quarter, put them in the place of the king and his attendants, and, when they were all seated, served the men with his own hands, while his countess performed the same office for the women.

A disciple of Wilfrid, Ceolfrid, who became a monk at eighteen, had been trained at Ripon, in the school of Wilfrid, who ordained him priest after ten years of study.¹⁰⁵ After this, in order to understand better the traditions and obligations of his profession, he visited the monastic metropolis of Canterbury, and on his way back spent some time with an old abbot named Botulph, whose virtues and knowledge were much renowned.¹⁰⁶ Botulph, too, was of a noble family of East Anglia;¹⁰⁷ his parents were among the oldest Christians of England, and had sent him while quite young across the sea into a monastery in Gaul, to learn, says his biographer, the glories of the faith, and to train himself to apostolical life. When he returned some years after, furnished with recommendations from two young East Anglian princesses whom he had met in his Gaulish monastery, he gained the heart of the kings of his tribe. These princes offered him lands which were already under cultivation, and were even allotted, according to feudal law, ¹⁰⁵ The elder brother of Ceolfrid had been Abbot of Gilling, the monastery founded by Queen Eanfleda to expiate her husband's crime in murdering the holy King Oswin; afterwards preferring contemplation to an active life, he exiled himself to Ireland, and there spent the rest of his life in the study of Holy Scripture. He died, together with several other English nobles, of the plague. This is a fresh example of the frequent relations of the Anglo-Saxons with monastic Ireland. Ceolfrid commenced his career at Gilling, from whence he was summoned to Ripon with the whole community, by Wilfrid.

¹⁰⁶ "Ut videret instituta Botulfi abbatis quem . . . fama circumquaque vulgaverat." — Histor. Abbatum in Append. BEDE, p. 417.

¹⁰⁷ Ad Anglos Orientales, says the Life of Ceolfrid just cited; and this designation does not contradict that of Angli Australes, used by the contemporary author of the Life of St. Botulph, published by Mabillon (Act. SS. O. S. B., sæc. iii. pars i. p. 3). The Angles of Mercia and East Anglia were in fact southerners in the eyes of the Angles of Northumbria. Besides, two of the kings named in the biography as sovereigns of Botulph's country, Adelher and Adelwold, figure among the East Anglian kings. — See LAPPENBERG, Genealogical Table E at the end of his first volume.

to other proprietors ; but Botulph refused to have any one impoverished for his advantage, and preferred an uncultivated estate, situated on a little river not far from the Northern Sea,¹⁰⁸ where he founded the great About 654. Monastery of Icanhoe, which has since grown into a town, and has borrowed its modern name, Boston, from that of its founder (Botulph's town).¹⁰⁹ Botulph's chief aim was to build and regulate his monastery on the model of the communities where he had lived, or which he had visited on the Continent — that is to say, in strict conformity with the rule of St. Benedict. He lived there for more than half a century, surrounded by the veneration and love of his countrymen, and working steadily to secure the complete observance of Benedictine laws in his community — a procedure which in the district where he had established himself did not fail to appear a grave innovation. The care which his biographer, a contemporary of his own, takes to set forth this distinctive feature, which ran through his whole life, makes it apparent that he had to contend with the resistance of his monks, and that he only succeeded by sometimes sacrificing his natural humility and his popularity to the austere duties of his abbatial charge. He repeated daily to his disciples the laws and lessons which he had brought from beyond sea ; and even on his death-bed, during the attacks of sickness which consumed his old age, he never ceased to recall the recollections of his monastic journeys, and to boast the gentleness and beauty of the true rule.¹¹⁰

Imbued with the teaching of this great doctor of monastic life, Ceolfrid returned to Ripon, to redouble his zeal and fervor in the practice of his profession. When he became master of the novices at Ripon, the son of the ealdorman distinguished himself by his energy in all those manual labors, which must have been so repugnant to the pride and habits of the Anglo-Saxon nobles. Without giving up his priestly functions he took charge of the bake-house, and was daily to be found at the furnace occupied in cleaning or heating it, and in baking bread for the use of the house.¹¹¹ His fame reached the ears of Benedict Biscop, who, as soon as he began his enterprise, asked him from Wilfrid. His request was granted; and this is the sole evidence which exists in history of any link whatever between the celebrated Bishop of York and the great monasteries founded by the friend of his youth. After his transfer to Wearmouth, Ceolfrid was soon made the deputy, as prior, of Abbot Benedict, during his journeys. But he found among the new monks certain sons of nobles like himself, who refused to be controlled by the severe discipline which he enforced upon them both by precept and example, and who pursued him with their murmurs and calumnies.¹¹² The effect of this upon him was such that, taking advantage of the absence of Benedict, he gave up his charge and returned to Ripon, to resume his former life there. Benedict hastened after him, and brought him back by dint of entreaties. After this he never relaxed his hold upon Ceolfrid, taking him with him in all his journeys up to the day when, as has been seen, he confided the government of the new Monastery of Yarrow to him whom he wished to make his inseparable companion and fellow-laborer.¹¹³

¹⁰⁸ “ Ut ubi plenius addiscerent et Sanctæ Fidei gloriam, et sanctæ conversationis in apostolicis institutionibus disciplinam. . . . Petit simpliciter, non ut aliquem regia violentia de hereditario jure caussa sui depellat, sed potius ut de incultis terris . . . sibi tantum concedat.” — Vita S. Botulfi, c. 2 and 5.

¹⁰⁹ Situated on the Witham, in Lincolnshire: the English town of Boston gave its name to the celebrated capital of Massachusetts, the fame and influence of which, in North America, have been always so considerable.

¹¹⁰ “ Imperitis vitæ regularis attulit normam, et in monasticis observationibus magnus legislator antea incognitam docuit viam. . . . Ad instar monasteriorum ubi conversatus fuerat in partibus Galliæ captum opus perfecit. . . . Quod transmarinis partibus didicerat de monachorum districtiori vitæ et regulari consuetudine, memoriter repetendo quotidianis inculcationibus subditos consuevit. . . . Appropinquante vitæ termino de observandis regulis monasteriorum quæ peregrinus petierat, loqui et sæpius repetere dulce ac delectabiliter ducebat.” — Vita S. Botulfi, c. 4, 7, 9, 10.

Ceolfrid took with him twenty-two monks from Wearmouth, to fill up the new foundation; but among these there were several who could not yet sing or even read aloud the service in the choir according to the requirements of the monastic ritual. Ceolfrid had to complete their musical and liturgical education, at the same time as he began that of the new-comers who soon thronged to Yarrow. By dint of entering himself into all the studies and exercises of his community, even in their minutest details, until the Benedictine observances took permanent root among them, he succeeded in his task. And he had to wield the trowel as well as the crosier, in order to direct and complete in less than two years the construction of the new abbey church, in which King Egfrid himself fixed the situation of the great altar.¹¹⁴

¹¹¹ "Pistorii officium tenens, inter cribrandum clibanumque accendendum mundandumque, et panes in eo coquendos, presbyteratus ceremonias sedulus discere simul et exercere non omisit." — Append., p. 417.

¹¹² "Invidias quorundam nobilium, qui regularem ejus disciplinam ferre nequibant, insecutionesque patiebatur acerrimas." — Append., p. 418.

¹¹³ "Ipse illi comes individuus, cooperatore et doctor regularis et monasticæ institutionis aderat." — Vita, c. 16.

Ceolfrid, when placed by the death of his friend at the head of the two Monasteries of Wearmouth and Yarrow, which then formed one community of six hundred monks,¹¹⁵ displayed for twenty-seven years an unwearying activity and superior intelligence, as well as all the virtues of ascetic life. He was in every respect a worthy successor of Benedict: he took pains to enrich the two libraries, which were so great an object of care to his predecessor; and on occasion made use of his books for other purposes than the instruction of his monks. It is true that he had to deal with a learned king, trained at Iona, the enemy of Wilfrid and his Roman predilections, but as much a lover of books as any saint or monk, either Irish like Columba, or Anglo-Saxon like Biscop. The latter had brought from Rome a curious system of cosmography, which King Aldfrid burned to possess, and which he obtained from the Abbot Ceolfrid in exchange for land supporting eight families. The abbot afterwards found means of exchanging this estate, with the addition of a sum of money, for another estate twice or three times as large, situated opposite the Monastery of Yarrow, to which belonged the precious book which was the occasion of a traffic so lucrative.¹¹⁶ It must not be supposed from this that the great abbot was interested or mercenary; he had, on the contrary, retained in the cloister the generous habits of his noble race; and Bede expressly tells that he never received a present or donation from neighboring lords without giving them, as soon as possible, an equivalent.¹¹⁷

The exchange of a book for an estate.

¹¹⁴ "Sed juvet amor religionis et studiosi rectoris exemplum atque instantia sollers, qui donec illum observantiæ regularis radicem fieret, horis omnibus canonicis cum fratribus ecclesiam frequentare, refici et quiescere solebat." — Append., p. 420.

¹¹⁵ "Utrique monasterio, vel sicut rectius dicere possumus, in duobus locis posito uni monasterio. . . . Relictis in suis monasteriis fratribus numero ferme sexcentis." — Vitæ Abbatum, c. 12, 13.

¹¹⁶ "Bibliothecam utriusque monasterii . . . non minori germinavit industria. . . . Dato Cosmographorum codice mirandi operis . . . terram octo familiarum . . . ab Alfrido regi in Scripturis doctissimo . . . comparavit, quem comparandi ordinem ipse dum adhuc viveret, Benedictus . . . taxaverat, sed prius quam complere potuisset, obiit. . . . Verum pro hac terra postmodum, Osredo regnante, addito pretio digno, terram xx. familiarum . . . accepit." — Vita, c. 12.

¹¹⁷ "A viris principalibus quibus cunctis erat honorabilis . . . hanc habens

Let us add, while speaking of books, that he had two complete copies made of the Bible, according to the version of St. Jerome, which he had brought from Rome, and placed them in his two churches, that they might be read and consulted by all who wished to do so¹¹⁸ — a new refutation, among so many others, of the stupid calumny which represents the Church as having in former times interdicted to her children the knowledge of the Sacred Scriptures.

Ceolfrid's anxiety for the intellectual and material interests of his community did nowise diminish his zeal for the regular discipline and spiritual independence of his brethren.^{700.} He took pains to have the charter of immunity obtained from Agathon renewed by the Pope St. Sergius, and confirmed in full synod by King Aldfrid. He devoted a considerable portion of each day, and his unwearying attention, to the prayers and sacred song of the choir; neither age nor sickness, nor even travel, seemed to him sufficient reasons for dispensing with this. Severe as it was his duty to be against the least irregularity, he lavished on the weak encouragements and consolations, and was hard only to himself, his living and clothing being of a temperance which seemed at that time surprising in the chief of so powerful an institution.¹¹⁹

When he had passed his seventieth year, he no longer found himself strong enough to give to his monks an example of life conformed to the rule; and he was anxious, besides, to return before he died to Rome, where he had in his youth accompanied his friend and master, there to prepare himself for death in silence. In vain the monks, when informed of his design, threw themselves on their knees to keep him back. Nothing could change his purpose. As soon as he had formed his resolution he put it in practice, fearing that if it were known he might be disturbed from without by entreaties, or even

He desires to die at Rome.

semper consuetudinem, ut si quis ei aliquid muneris offerret, hoc illi vel statim vel post intervallum competens, non minore gratia rependeret." — C. 13. It is evident that they were already, even in the most fervent and exemplary communities, far from a state of primitive poverty.

¹¹⁸ "Todiem per duo sua monasteria posuit in ecclesiis, ut cunctis, qui aliquod capitulum de utrolibet Testamento legere voluissent, in promptu esset invenire quod cuperent." — Vita Ceolfridi, in Append. BEDÆ, Op. Min., a. 325.

¹¹⁹ "Acutus ingenio, actis impiger . . . per incomparabilem orandi psallendique sollertiam, qua ipse quotidianus exerceri non desiit . . . post insolitam rectoribus et escæ potusque parcitatem."

by the presents¹²⁰ of the friends he had among the nobility of the neighborhood, and indeed of all Northumbria. 4th June, 716. Three days after having declared his decision to the afflicted community, he said mass in the morning very early, gave the communion to all present, and, standing on the steps of the altar with the censer in his hand, blessed all his children. They began to sing litanies, which were interrupted by tears and sobs; Ceolfrid then led them to an oratory, which he had dedicated to the martyr St. Lawrence, near the dormitory, and there addressed to them, as Benedict had done on his deathbed, a last exhortation. Its special subject was charity and mutual brotherly correction; and he entreated all those who might have found him too hard to pardon him and pray for him. From thence he descended to the bank of the river which bathes the walls of the monastery, followed by the six hundred monks of the two communities; after having received from their father a last kiss moistened with tears, they all knelt down. The old abbot then entered the ship that was to carry him away; and from the deck, on which the cross had been reared between two torches, he gave them his last benediction and disappeared from their sight.

Ceolfrid himself could not contain his grief at this parting; at the distant sound of the chants of his monks, broken by their sobs, his tears flowed. Again and again he was heard to say, "Christ, my Lord and my God, have pity on this worthy and numerous company. Protect these dear children. I am sure that better or more obedient are nowhere to be found."¹²¹

When they re-entered the monastery, the monks proceeded on the spot to the election of the new abbot. At the end of three days the universal suffrage of the two communities fixed upon a young man, trained at Wearmouth from his infancy, and worthy of his illustrious predecessors, in his zeal for study, song, and teaching, as their united chief. As soon as he was elected, the new abbot rushed after Ceolfrid, and found him in the port waiting a favorable wind for crossing to the Continent. He gave him a letter to the Pope, from which we quote the following passages :—

¹²⁰ "Ne pecunia daretur ei a quibusdam, quibus retribuere pro tempore nequiret."

¹²¹ "Omnibus in lacrymas singultusque genua cum obsecratione crebra flectentibus. . . . Cantata ergo primo mane missa . . . conveniunt omnes . . . pacem dat omnibus, thuribulum habens in manu: tunc fletibus universorum inter Letanias resonantibus, exeunt . . . veniunt ad littus, rursum osculo pacis inter lacrymas omnibus dato, genua flectunt . . . ascendit navem . . . transit flumen, adorat crucem, ascendit equum et abiit." — C. 13. "Audiensque sonum mixti cum luctu carminis, nullatenus valuit ipse a singultu et lacrymis temperare. Hoc autem solum crebra voce repetiit: Christe Deus, miserere illi cœtui . . . protege illam cohortem . . . scio certissime quia nullos unquam meliores illis et promptiores ad obedientiam novi." — Append., p. 425.

“To the blessed Pope Gregory II., our dear lord in the Lord of lords, Huetberct, your humble servant, Abbot of the Monastery of St. Peter, prince of the apostles, among the Saxons, everlasting greeting. — In the name of all my brethren, united in this place with me to find rest for their souls and to bear the sweet yoke of Christ, we recommend to your dear and holy kindness the hoary hairs of our venerable and beloved father, the Abbot Ceolfrid, who has ruled, trained, fed, and defended us in monastic peace and freedom. He has torn himself from us in the midst of our lamentations, tears, and sorrow ; but we thank the holy and invisible Trinity that it has been given him to attain to the blessed joy of rest which he has so long desired. He returns in his extreme old age to the tombs of the apostles, his visits to which in youth he has always remembered with enthusiasm. After forty years of work and care in his monastic government, he shows himself as much inspired by the love of virtue as though he were still in the first freshness of his conversion ; and on the threshold of death, bent under the weight of age, he again becomes a pilgrim for Christ. We conjure your Paternity, render to this beloved father those last duties of filial piety which it will not be permitted to us to accomplish. Afterwards you will keep his body ; but his soul will remain with us both—with us and with you ; and after his death, as during his life, we shall find in him a friend, a protector, and intercessor with God.”¹²²

The wishes of the double community of Wearmouth and Yarrow, thus expressed with so much filial affection, were not fulfilled. Ceolfrid never reached Rome ; the fatigues of the journey aggravated the weakness of his old age. He took three months to travel from Northumbria to the frontiers of Burgundy. During these three months he did not cease for a single day to celebrate mass and sing the entire monastic service, even when his weakness prevented him from moving except in a litter.¹²³ He was able to travel only as far as Langres, where he died at the age of seventy-four ^{25th Sept.,} — forty-three years of his age having been conse- ^{711.} crated to the work of training or governing souls in the cloister. He was buried in a monastery, afterwards known by the name of St. Geosmes, and which took that name from the twins, who, along with their grandmother, St. Leonilla, were martyred there under the Cæsars.¹²⁴ His austere life did not prevent him from travelling with all the retinue of a great personage, as indeed the abbot of the greatest community of the Anglo-Saxons of the North already was. Of the eighty English who composed his suit some continued their pilgrimage to Rome, others returned to England, and some preferred to pass the rest of their lives in the midst of a people whose language they did not understand, rather than separate themselves from the tomb of a father to whom they clung with an unchangeable love.¹²⁵

¹²² “Eligitur Huætherctus . . . scribendi, cantandi, legendi ac docendi non parva exercitatus industria . . . electus abbas ab omnibus utriusque monasterii fratribus. . . . Una cum sanctis fratribus qui mecum in his locis ad inveniendam requiem animabus suis suavissimum Christi jugum portare desiderant. . . . Commendamus . . . venerabiles patris nostri dilectissimi canos . . . nutritoris tutorisque nostræ spiritualis in monastica quiete libertatis et pacis. . . . Ad suæ tamen diu desideratæ quietis gaudia sancta pervenit . . . dum ea quæ juvenem se adisse atque adorasse semper recordans exultabat . . . repetiit . . . prope jam moriturus, rursus incipit peregrinari pro Christo. . . . Supplicamus ut quod nos facere non meruimus, vos erga illum ultimæ pietatis munus seduli expleatis.”— Vitæ Abbatum, c. 14.

I beg my readers to make an effort to represent to themselves who these eighty companions of old Ceolfrid were, and who also were, and from whence came, the six hundred Anglo-Saxons whom we have just seen kneeling on the sandy beach, on the shore of the Northern Sea, to receive the blessing of our aged abbot, going forth to brave the danger and fatigues of a laborious journey, with the hope of dying near the tomb of St. Peter and St. Paul. I would fain see the coldest and most bitter of sceptics transported for an instant in thought to that far distant shore. I should accompany him willingly, with no intermediary between him and me except simple good faith.

¹²³ "Per dies exiv., exceptis canonicis horis quotidie bis psalterium ex ordine decantare curavit, etiam cum ad hoc per infirmitatem deveniret, ut equitare non valens feretro caballario veheretur, quotidie missa cantata salutaris hostiæ Deo munus offerret, excepto uno, quo oceanum navigabat, et tribus ante exitum diebus."

¹²⁴ Their names were Speusippus, Eleusippus, and Meleusippus. The mention of these martyrs leads me to point out in passing the singularly instructive and conclusive examination given to this history by M. l'Abbé Bougaud in his learned Etude sur la Mission, les Actes, et le Culte de Saint Bénigne, Apôtre de la Bourgogne. Dijon, 1859, pp. 171, 172.

¹²⁵ "Partim ad tumbam defuncti inter eos quorum nec linguam noverant, pro inextinguibili patris affectus redere." — Vitæ Abbatum, c. 15.

We should then find ourselves in the eighth century, in all its darkness, in all its barbarism, in an island destined to become again and again the prey of bloody and atrocious invasions. These are the sons of pirates, of incendiaries, of ravagers and murderers, who surround us. Yet see what they have become! Not all, certainly, but the first and most powerful, those in whom the abuse of strength, victory, and wealth would have produced most scandal and excess. See what the Christian religion has made of those wild hearts; look at the flowers which have blossomed by its means in that soil watered with blood and horror. Behold its fruits, its victories, its conquests, its chief spoil. Religion has established herself on that desolated land, amid these pitiless conquerors. She has shown them peace, gentleness, labor, virtue, truth, light, heaven; and after having thus lavished upon them a treasury of new thoughts, beliefs, and strength, new food for their intelligence, and unknown resources for their social order, she has taught them to love, to love one another, to love souls—and to imprint the recollection of that love upon scenes and words which cannot deceive and will not be forgotten.

CHAPTER III.

END OF THE CELTIC HERESY.—ADAMNAN, EGBERT, ST. ALDHELM.

The King of the Picts requests Ceolfrid to send him architects, and arguments in favor of Roman unity. — Answer of Ceolfrid, in which he quotes from Plato. — The Picts abandon the Celtic peculiarities. — The monks of Iona leave their monasteries rather than adopt the Roman ritual. — Their abbot, Adamnan, biographer of Columba, and the last great personage of the Celtic Church. — His relations with King Aldfrid and the Abbot Ceolfrid. — He attempts in vain to lead the monks of Iona back to Roman rule, but has more success in Ireland, where he dies. — Iona is brought back to Catholic unity by the Anglo-Saxon Egbert, the head of a colony of Saxon monks in Ireland. — His austere and holy life. — He loses his most intimate friend, who reproaches him for desiring to survive him. — He uses his influence with the Anglo-Saxons to send them as missionaries to Germany. — After thirteen years' struggle, he overcomes the resistance of Iona, and dies on the very day when the feast of Easter is celebrated by both parties together. — Ireland and Caledonia having been thus brought back to Catholic unity, only the Britons of Cambria and Cornwall remain outside its pale, by reason of their national antipathy for the Saxon conquerors. — Note upon Bede's injustice to them. — Attempt of St. Aldhelm to bring them in. — His royal birth, and education — half Celtic, half Roman — at Malmesbury and Canterbury. — He becomes Abbot of Malmesbury. — His literary fame greater than his merit; his vernacular songs; intellectual development of Anglo-Saxon cloisters. — Extent and variety of his studies. — His continual solicitude for souls. — His great monastic character. — His zeal for preaching. — He interferes in favor of Wilfrid. — He goes to Rome to obtain the privilege of exemption for Malmesbury, the monks of which persist in retaining him as abbot, even after his promotion to the episcopate. — Anecdote about the importation of Bibles. — Death of Aldhelm. — His exertions for bringing back Celtic dissenters. — His letter to the King of Cornwall. — The Britons of Cambria, who had resisted all the efforts of Roman and Saxon missionaries, adopt the Roman ritual by the influence of one of their own bishops. — Their pilgrimages to Rome. — End of the struggle. — Opinion of Mabillon. — Resistance proportioned to the dangers which beset the special nationality. — Union the work of Benedictines. — In the Britannic Isles, as among the Gauls, Celtic monasticism conquered and eclipsed by the Benedictine order.

THE memory of Ceolfrid, along with that of his faithful English, has faded out of the country in which he died. But he belongs nevertheless to the general history of the Church by the direct influence which he exercised upon the conclusion of that great struggle between Celtic Christianity and Roman unity which had agitated the British Isles for more than a century, and which had caused so many holy monks, from Augustin to Wilfrid, so much anxious thought and effort. Ceolfrid, trained in the school of Wilfrid, had the glory of giving the last blow to that species of schism which Wilfrid to his cost had conquered; and this supreme victory was won at the very time when Wilfrid concluded in obscurity his long and laborious career.

A year after the death of Wilfrid, Nechtan, the king of those Picts who occupied the north of Caledonia, the successor of that Bruith who received the great Celtic apostle Columba, wrote to Abbot Ceolfrid a memorable letter. This tributary king was not only a Christian, but greatly occupied by religious questions. He meditated much on the Holy Scriptures, and was thus led to understand, and to regret, the advantages of Catholic unity, from which his nation was to a certain extent separate by the paschal question. He resolved to lead back his people to the Roman rule, notwithstanding the obstinate resistance of the monks of Iona, the sons of St. Columba, who continued the apostolical work of their patriarch. To overcome their opposition, he determined, in one of the singular revolutions of mortal affairs, to address himself to that Northumbria which had been evangelized by Celtic missionaries from Iona, imbued with the traditional error of their race, but which he knew to have already conformed to the rules of the Roman Church. At the same time, in seeking the aid of the Anglo-Saxon Church, he did not apply either to the bishops who had divided among themselves Wilfrid's spoil, nor even to the great Monastery of Lindisfarne, which had been so long the point of junction between the two races. Instead, he knocked at the door of the new sanctuaries on the banks of the Wear and Tyne, to which Benedict Biscop had given the highest place in public veneration; he asked the aid of Abbot Ceolfrid, who for twenty years had worthily occupied the place of the holy traveller. He sent to him a special embassy to ask of him good arguments, set forth in writing, with which to refute the partisans of Celtic ritualism in respect to Easter and the tonsure;¹²⁶ and at the same time prayed the abbot to send him architects to build him a church of stone, like the Romans, promising to dedicate the church, when built, to the honor of St. Peter, and to follow with all his people the observances of the Roman Church as much as the distance and difference of language permitted them to do.¹²⁷

Ceolfrid sent him architects, who were, without doubt, monks of his community, and whose mission thus gives us the exact date of the introduction of Christian architecture into Scotland, where up to that moment the churches were made of wood, or osiers, in the Irish fashion. He wrote at the same time to the Pictish king a

The King of the Picts requests Ceolfrid to send him architects, and arguments in favor of Roman unity.
710.

Answer of Ceolfrid, in ¹²⁶ "Naiton . . . admonitus ecclesiasticarum frequenti meditatione scripturarum. . . . Quæsit auxilium de gente Anglorum quos jamdudum ad exemplum S. Romanæ et Apostolicæ Ecclesiæ suam religionem instituisse cognovit. . . . Postulans ut exhortatorias sibi litteras mitteret, quibus potentius confortare posset eos qui Pascha non suo tempore observare præsumerent. . . . Sed et architectos . . . qui juxta morem Romanorum ecclesiam de lapide in gente ipsius facerent." — BEDE, Hist. Eccles., v. 21.

¹²⁷ "In quantum dumtaxat tam longe a Romanorum loquela et natione segregati nunc ediscere potuissent."

long letter which Bede has preserved to us, and in which he begins by quoting, not the Scriptures or the Fathers, but Plato, in that well-known passage in the Republic where it is said that, for the happiness of the world, it is necessary that kings should be philosophers, or philosophers kings. In the legitimate glory of the greatest thinker of antiquity there is, perhaps, no ray purer or more precious than that invocation of his name and authority, more than a thousand years after his death, by a Saxon prelate to a Celtic king, both sprung from races totally unknown to Greece and her great men. "But," adds Ceolfrid, "if a man of the world was right in thinking and speaking thus, in what concerns the philosophy of this world, how much more ought the citizens of the celestial country, exiled here below, to desire that the great ones of this earth should apply themselves to know the laws of the Supreme Judge, and, by their example and authority, to make these laws observed. Thus we take it as a mark of heavenly favor bestowed on the Church each time that the masters of the world apply themselves to know, to teach, or to keep the truth."¹²⁸ Thereupon he enters into a theological and astronomical discussion, in which, passing in review the text of the Pentateuch, and the various cycles used from the time of Eusebius to that of Denis the Little, he proves that Easter ought to be celebrated, according to the usage of the Catholic Church, in the third week of the first lunar month, and always on Sunday. As for the tonsure, he admits that it is, in itself, an indifferent matter; but he insists upon the fabulous tradition, which all the orthodox then held as an article of faith, by which the Roman tonsure, in the form of a crown, was attributed to St. Peter, and the Irish tonsure, in which the front of the head was shaven, to Simon the Magician.

which he quotes
Plato.

The letter of the Northumbrian abbot, which appears to modern readers long and wearisome, was completely successful. It was read publicly to the Pictish king, in presence of all the wise men of the country, translated verbally into their language. As soon as he had heard it, he rose, and, in the midst of the nobles by whom he was surrounded, knelt down and thanked God to have been so fortunate as to have received such a present

The Picts
and their king abandon the Celtic
ritual.

¹²⁸ "Vere omnino dixit quidam secularium scriptorum. . . . Quod si de philosophia hujus mundi vere intelligere et de statu hujus mundi merito dicere potuit homo hujus mundi, quanto magis cœlestis patriæ civibus." — BEDE, ibid.

from England. "I knew well," he said, "that this was the true way of celebrating Easter. But now I see the reason so clearly that I seem to have understood nothing about it before. For this cause, I take you all to witness, all you who sit with me here, that I will henceforward keep Easter thus, with all my people, and I ordain that all the clerks in my kingdom assume this tonsure.¹²⁹ The ordinance was immediately put in operation, and the messengers of the king carried into all the provinces copies of the paschal calculation, with orders to efface the ancient tables. The monks and other ecclesiastics had also to receive the tonsure according to the Roman custom. Bede affirms that the change was received with universal joy in the Pictish nation. Nevertheless, the monks who had come from Iona — those of the family of Columb-kill, the Columbites, as Ceolfrið calls them — acted as their brethren at Ripon and Lindisfarne had acted fifty years before. They preferred to leave their establishments, colonies founded more than a century before by their patriarch and his disciples, rather than to give up their insular tradition. A single line, short but expressive, in the annals of Ireland, bears witness to their fate. It is thus summed up — "King Nechtan expels the family of Iona from the country beyond the dorsum Britannie."¹³⁰

The monks of Iona leave their monasteries rather than adopt the Roman ritual.

The country now called Scotland was then divided, as has been seen, between the Picts in the north and east, the Scots in the west, the Britons in Strathclyde, and the Northumbrians in the south. The supremacy of the Northumbrian kings, up to the downfall of Egfrid, over all the districts south of the Clyde and Forth, had been sufficient to secure in that part of the country, the observance of the Roman ritual, represented by such men as Wilfrid and Cuthbert. The conversion of the Picts, under King Nechtan, to the Roman rule, in respect to Easter, established liturgical and theological unity throughout the northern part of Great Britain, with the exception of the isle of Iona and the little kingdom of the Dalriadan Scots, which probably to the last extremity remained faithful to the ritual and traditions of their national sanctuary.

¹²⁹ "Epistola, præsentē rege Naitono, multisque viris doctioribus lecta ac diligenter ab his qui intelligere potuerant in linguam ejus propriam interpretata . . . exurgens de medio optimatum sacro in consessu. . . . In tantum modo rationem hujus temporis observandi cognosco, ut parum mihi omnino videar de his antea intellexisse." — BEDE, Hist. Eccles., v. 21.

¹³⁰ "Expulsio familiæ Ie trans dorsum Britanniae a Nectano rege," — Annales Tigernachii, ad ann. 717. See above, p. 50, for the description of the mountain-range called dorsum Britanniae.

Yet, notwithstanding, a very eminent Irish monk — Adamnan, himself Abbot of Iona, and the most illustrious of Columba's successors — had long attempted to lead back the mother community, mistress of all the Caledonian Church, and always influential in the Church of Ireland, to the unity of Rome. If our readers have retained in their recollection our narrative of St. Columba, they will pardon us for dwelling a little upon his biographer, of all the Irish monks the one to whom posterity is most indebted, for his revelation to us, not only of that great man, the immortal honor of the Celtic Church — but also of the spirit, general and individual, and the private and local life of that whole Church. He was the countryman and near relative of his holy predecessor, sprung, like him, from the sovereign race of the Nialls. When he was but a scholar, having been dedicated from his childhood to monastic life, he had, according to the legend, gained the favor of a powerful chief — Finnachta the Feaster or Banqueter. While begging, according to the usage of the time, for himself and his five companions, each of whom took it in turn to seek the daily nourishment, he met the cavalcade of the chief, and in running out of the way struck against a stone, fell, and broke the milk-jar which he carried on his back, and which contained all he had collected.¹³¹ "Be not sad," said the chief, "I will protect thee." When Finnachta became monarch of all Ireland, Adamnan was his Anmachara or spiritual counsellor; and this fact explains the important part he played in Ireland during his whole life. After having been a monk at Iona under three abbots, he was himself elected abbot in 679. Aldfrid, the Northumbrian prince, brother and successor of Egfrid, then an exile in Ireland, had taken refuge in Iona, and had become the friend and the disciple of Adamnan: and when, after Egfrid's downfall, the exile became King of Northumberland, the abbot went to his former guest to reclaim the captives, men and women, whom the soldiers of Egfrid had carried away in the previous year, after their cruel and bloody invasion of Ireland.¹³² His mission was not entirely

Adamnan, Abbot of Iona, and biographer of St.
Columba.
624-703.

His relations with King Ald-
frid.
685.

¹³¹ REEVES, Append. ad Pref., p. xlii.

¹³² See p. 400.

without success; for he obtained from his friend the restitution of sixty prisoners, whom he himself accompanied back to Ireland. He returned on more than one occasion to visit King Aldfrid, whose literary tastes resembled his own. He dedicated to him his description of the holy places, which he compiled from the narratives of a Gallo-Frankish bishop called Arculfe, who, returning from Palestine by sea, had been shipwrecked on the coast of Ireland, from whence he had gone to visit the still celebrated sanctuary of Iona. Thanks to the liberality of the learned King Aldfrid, whose taste for geographical studies we have already remarked, a great number of copies were made of this treatise, that it might be largely distributed and read even by the lower classes.¹³³

It was during these journeys to and fro that the cultivated and fervent abbot,¹³⁴ learned to understand the new customs introduced into the Anglo-Saxon Church by the efforts of Wilfrid, and although there is no trace in his life of any actual encounter between him and the great champion of Roman unity, it is certain that Adamnan, while in Northumbria, was so thoroughly moved by the spirit there diffused by Wilfrid, that he left the country with the resolution of henceforward preferring the rites of the universal Church to those of a little nation at the end of the world.¹³⁵ Ceolfrid did much to enlighten him on this point; in his letter to the King of the Picts he relates the visit of Adamnan to Wearmouth, and their conferences on the subject of the tonsure. "Holy brother," said the Northumbrian abbot to the Irish prelate, "you aspire to an immortal crown, why do you wear on your head so imperfect an image of it? and if you desire the society of St. Peter, why do you bear the tonsure of him who anathematized St. Peter?" "Beloved brother," answered Adamnan, "if I bear the tonsure of Simon the Magician, according to the custom of my country, do not think that I detest the less the Simoniacal heresy. I desire to follow with my best powers the footsteps of the Prince of Apostles."

¹³³ "Per ejus eis largitionem etiam minoribus ad legendum contraditus." — BEDE, v. 15. Bede has inserted many extracts of this description in his History; Mabillon publishes it entire at the end of vol. iv. of his Acta Sanctorum.

¹³⁴ "Erat vir bonus et sapiens et scientia scripturarum nobilissime instructus . . . abbas et sacerdos Columbiensium egregius." — Ibid., v. 16, 21.

¹³⁵ "Cum videret ritus ecclesiæ canonicos . . . in ecclesiis Anglorum . . . cum suis paucissimis et in extremo mundi angulo positus . . . mutatus mente est." — Ibid., c. 15.

"I believe it," said Ceolfred, "but in that case it would be best to wear openly the mark of the Apostle Peter which you have in your heart."¹³⁶ It is apparent by this that the leader of the Irish Church did not even dispute the imputed origin, at once fabulous and injurious, of his national custom.

But when, on his return to Iona, he attempted to lead the children of St. Columba to his new conviction and to the Roman rule, he encountered an unconquerable resistance. To be treated as barbarians and rustics¹³⁷ by the Northumbrian monks and doctors troubled them little; they were aware that their spiritual ancestors had been initiated into the Christian faith two centuries before the Anglo-Saxons, who for the most part had been drawn out of the darkness of paganism only by the apostolic self-devotion of those whom their descendants disdained. The Celts, accordingly, adhered obstinately to the traditional rites of their glorious ancestors. When they saw their chief return with the Roman tonsure, the surprise and indignation of the monks of Iona were such that they have found form in an Irish legend.¹³⁸ The difference between the superior and the community became so painful that Adarnan, who was of a humble and peaceable character, could not hold head against it. Without abdicating, he yet ceased to live in his monastery, and passed a great part of the remainder of his life in Ireland.¹³⁹ He dedicated himself with ardor to the work of reunion, meeting there with much greater success than in his own community. Southern Ireland, as has been seen, had already returned to Roman unity, even before Wilfrid undertook his great work

He attempts in vain to lead back the monks of Iona to Roman usage.

¹³⁶ "Scias pro certo . . . quia etsi Simonis tonsuram ex consuetudine patria habeam, simoniacam tamen perfidiam tota mente detestor ac respuo." — BEDE, v. 21.

¹³⁷ Ibid., iii. 4.

¹³⁸ MAC FIRBIS OR FORBES. — Irish Annals, MS. quoted by Reeves, p. xli.

¹³⁹ The annals of Ireland give his presence there in 692 and 697. At the latter date he gave forth the Law of Innocents, or of Adarnan (see above, p. 128). His books were written in the midst of his journeys and pastoral cares, as he says in the preamble of his treatise De Locis Sanctis: "Quæ et ego, quamlibet inter laboriosas et prope insustentabiles tota die undique conglobatas ecclesiasticas sollicitudines constitutus, vili quamvis sermone descripsim declaravi." He wrote his Life of St. Columba between his two journeys from Ireland, from 692 to 697. He says nothing in it of his difference with his own monks in respect to Easter, but he mentions the prophecy of Columba at Clonmacnoise upon discord: "Quæ post dies multos o, diversitatem Paschalis festi orta est inter Scotiæ ecclesias." He remained in Ireland probably from 697 to 703, a period at which, according to Bede, he was still there. It was not too much for the difficult task he had to fulfil.

in England. Adamnan was the means of bringing back central and northern Ireland to the same rule. He procured the triumph specially of the Roman Easter and the orthodox tonsure, except in the communities directly under the sway of his own monastery at Iona. This victory was not won without great difficulty, but his gentleness and modesty triumphed over all.¹⁴⁰ He died the same year as his friend, the wise King Aldfrid. Before his death, and after having celebrated in Ireland the canonical Easter, he made a last attempt to win over the family of Columba, which he had governed for thirty years. It was in vain; all his entreaties were repulsed; but God graciously granted, says Bede, that this man, who loved unity and peace above everything, should attain to eternal life before the return of the paschal solemnity made the discord between himself and his disobedient monks notorious.¹⁴¹

Iona is, however, brought back to unity by the Anglo-Saxon, Egbert. 716-729.

The victory which Adamnan, the countryman and successor of St. Columba, could not gain, was reserved for a man of another race but equal holiness — the Anglo-Saxon Egbert. The life of this monk is an example of the numerous and salutary relations which existed between the Irish Celts and the Anglo-Saxons, and which had been so odiously disturbed by the inexcusable invasion of the Northumbrian king Egfrid. It is in connection with this invasion that the name of Egbert has already appeared in this narrative.¹⁴² He was one of the many English who crossed the sea in numbers so considerable as to fill entire fleets, and who threw themselves upon the Irish shore like flights of bees, to enjoy the hospitality, both intellectual and material, of the Irish monasteries; while, on the other hand, the Greek Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury and Primate of England, lived, by a happy exchange of brotherly kindness, surrounded by a crowd of young Irish monks. Some of the Anglo-Saxons, who sought a superior ascetic education in the Irish monasteries, returned to England, frequently filling places of the highest dignity there, and edifying their countrymen by their knowledge and virtue;¹⁴³ while others remained, casting in their lot forever with the monastic ranks of Ireland.

¹⁴⁰ "Prædicans eis modesta exhortatione . . . pene omnes qui ab Hiensim dominio erant liberi, ab errore avito correctos ad unitatem reduxit catholicam." — BEDE, v. 15.

¹⁴¹ Adamnan has always been venerated as a saint. See the article upon him, BOLLAND., vol. vii. Sept., 24th, and the Breviary of Aberdeen. It is asserted that he ate only twice in the week — Sunday and Thursday. — Ann. des Quatre Maîtres, ap. Reeves, p. lvii.

¹⁴² See p. 401.

Egbert stood in the first rank of those numerous scions of the Anglo-Saxon nobility who in their youth became voluntary exiles for Christ, in order to devote themselves in Ireland, far from their relations and their possessions, to a life of penitence, and, above all, to the study of the Holy Scriptures.¹⁴⁴ He was only twenty-five when the terrible pestilence broke out which, immediately after the first triumph of Wilfrid at the conference of Whitby, made such cruel ravages in the British Isles. He was then with several of his countrymen, in a monastery, the site of which is at present represented by the picturesque ruins of Mellifont; he saw his companions dying around him daily, and when at last he was himself affected by the contagion, he had strength enough to leave the infirmary, and withdraw to a solitary place to review his life and weep over his sins. He had even the courage to pray God to spare his life until he had expiated the faults of his youth by good works, and made a vow if his prayer was granted to remain an exile forever and return to England no more. He then went in and lay down again, beside another young man, his closest and most intimate friend, who was mortally stricken, and lay in a sleep that was almost death. All at once the young sufferer awoke. "Ah, brother Egbert, what have you done?" he said. "I hoped so that we should have entered eternal life together; and now you let me die without you: know at least that your prayer is granted." The young man died that night; but Egbert survived for sixty-five years, and became a model of all monastic virtues. Not only did he call forth the affectionate admiration of his Anglo-Saxon countrymen, but even in Ireland, so fertile in marvels of holiness, he appeared an eminent saint. He emulated the most illustrious in his zeal for knowledge, in his eagerness to distribute to

Austere and holy life of Egbert in Ireland.
635-735.

He loses his most intimate friend, who reproaches him for wishing to live without him.

¹⁴³ Among others, Ceadda, the first rival of Wilfrid at York, and Ædilwin, of whom Bede says: "Ipse Hiberniam gratia legendi adiit, et bene instructus patriam rediit, atque episcopus in provincia Lindissi factus, multo ecclesiam tempore nobilissime rexit." — Hist. Eccles., iii. 27. See what has been already said (p. 506, note) of the elder brother of Abbot Ceolfrid of Yar-row.

¹⁴⁴ "In Hibernia diutius exulaverat pro Christo . . . doctissimus in scripturis et longæ vitæ perfectione eximius. . . De nobilibus Anglorum. . . Quem peregrinam ducere vitam pro adipiscenda in cœlis patria retulimus." — Hist. Eccles., v. 9.

the poor the gifts lavished upon him by the rich, and in the austerities of his life. The great historian of the Christian glories of the Anglo-Saxon race has not disdained to inform us that during Lent, and even for forty days after Christmas, and fifty days after Whitsuntide, his entire nourishment consisted of a little bread, with milk from which the cream had been carefully removed. It was at this price that the right of speaking with authority to the nations, and of walking before them in the way of salvation, was purchased.¹⁴⁵

He uses his influence over the Anglo-Saxons to send them as missionaries into Germany. He employed his influence over the two races which rivalled each other in honoring his holiness, only for their good, their honor, and the general welfare of the Church. Though he did not succeed, notwithstanding his entreaties, in turning Egfrid, the king of his native Northumbria, from the crime of his abominable invasion of Ireland, he was more fortunate with others of his countrymen, whom he transformed into missionaries of the faith to the Germans. In his ascetic exile in Ireland he was the first of the Anglo-Saxons to conceive the generous, the divine idea of sending to the help of the mother-country, to Germany, which still belonged to Satan, the sons of her Britannic colony to show her the path of virtue and of life.¹⁴⁶ He knew well whence it was that his Anglo-Saxon ancestors had come, and that they had left behind them in darkness a crowd of other tribes, of the same stock and language, whose image stole upon his imagination, as did that of the little Irish children whose plaintive voices St. Patrick heard in his dreams, and whose visionary appeals decided that saint, once a slave, to become the apostle of their country.¹⁴⁷

¹⁴⁵ "Egressus est tempore matutino de cubiculo in quo infirmi quiescebant . . . finitis lacrymis, precibus et votis. . . . Expergetactus sodalis respexit eum. . . . O frater Egbert, O quid fecisti? Sperabam quia pariter ad vitam æternam intraremus. . . . Unde et genti suæ et illis in quibus exulabat nationibus Scottorum sive Pictorum exemplo vivendi . . . multum profuit. . . . Quod lac pridie novum in phialia ponere solebat, et post noctem ablata superficie crassiore, ipse residuum cum modico pane bibebat." — BEDE, iii. 27. Bede, who is always careful to cite his authorities, informs us that he gathered all these particulars from a priest, "veracissimus et venerandæ canitiei," to whom Egbert had narrated his life. Bede, who was born in 673, was more than fifty when Egbert died.

¹⁴⁶ "In Germania plurimas noverat esse nationes, a quibus Angli vel Saxones qui nunc Britanniam incolunt, genus et originem duxisse noscuntur. . . . Sunt autem Fresones, Rugini, Dani, Huni, antiqui Saxones, Boructuarii. . . . Christi miles circumnavigata Britannia disposuit si quos forte ex illis ereptos Satanæ ad Christum transferre valeret." — BEDE, v. 9.

¹⁴⁷ See vol. i. p. 544.

Faithful to the vow which forbade him to land, even in passing, upon the soil of his native island, Egbert chartered a ship to take him direct from Ireland to Friesland, on the northern coast of Germany. But as he was about to embark, one of his travelling companions, who had been a monk at Melrose, lying down to sleep after matins, saw in a dream the prior Boswell, the tender friend of Cuthbert,¹⁴⁸ and beloved master of the novices at Melrose, one of the great saints of the Celtic Church in Northumbria, who charged him to warn Egbert that the will of God ordained him to give up his Germanic mission, and to devote himself, willingly or unwillingly, to the instruction and conversion of the Columbite monasteries. "Their ploughs do not go straight," said the prior to his former pupil; "they must be put back into the right furrow."¹⁴⁹ This dream, though twice repeated, made no impression upon Egbert; but his ship having been cast ashore, he acknowledged the will of God, and gave up his cherished project, so far as related to himself. As many, however, of the fervent and zealous monks among his own countrymen whom he could move to such a determination he sent in his place; when any returned discouraged by their want of success, he sought and found others more capable or more fortunate; and it was thus the beginning made by Egbert that gave to Germany Vicbert, Willibrord, Swidbert, the two Ewalds, and other holy bishops or abbots, whose names are justly venerated by Germany as her apostles, and whom we shall find again in the history of that country if it is permitted to us to pursue our task so far.

It was in the year of Ceolfrid's death, eleven years after the death of Adamnan, and seven years after that of Wilfrid, that the Anglo-Saxon Egbert succeeded in overcoming the most obstinate stronghold of Celtic dissidence, and procured the triumph of Roman unity in the monastic metropolis which had been founded by the most illustrious saint of the Celtic Church. A stranger of an alien and often hostile race thus accomplished the task in which Adamnan had failed. He was from the first received by the monks of Iona with the leads back the monks of Iona to the unity

Egbert
of the Roman ritual.

¹⁴⁸ See pp. 459 and 469.

¹⁴⁹ "Cum expletis hymnis matutinalibus in lectulo membra posuissem . . . apparuit magister quondam meus et nutritor amantissimus. . . . Vade et dic illis quia, velit nolit, debet ad monasteria Columbæ venire, quia aratra eorum non recte incedunt." — BEDE, v. 9.

greatest respect; and, employing no means but those afforded him by the delightful suavity of his disposition, the soft and persevering influence of his conversation, and, above all, the example of a life so perfectly conformed to his doctrine, he triumphed over the inveterate dislike of the sons of St. Columba for that innovation which was to reunite them to the rest of Christendom. It is not probable that he succeeded at once, since he lived for the thirteen last years of his life at Iona, in the long famous island which he hoped to crown with a new glory by bringing it back into the orbit of Catholic unity. But his victory was complete and final.

He dies
there on Easter-day,
24th April,
729.

He died at the age of ninety on Easter-day, the regular celebration of which had preoccupied, excited, and agitated so many saints before him. It fell, in the year of his death, on the 24th April — that is to say, on a day when it had never been and never could be observed, according to the computation followed by the Irish. After having commenced, along with his brethren whom he had the joy to lead back to Catholic unity, to celebrate on earth the greatest solemnity of the liturgical year, he went to complete it in heaven with our Lord, the holy Apostles, and all the citizens of the celestial country, where the eternal celebration ceases no more.¹⁵⁰

All the monasteries subordinate to Iona followed the example of their metropolitan community in the adoption of the Roman Easter and the orthodox tonsure. There is ground for believing that they accepted at the same time the Benedictine rule, since none of the numerous monks and missionaries sent forth by them into France, and specially into Germany, carried any other rules with them than those of the order of St. Benedict.¹⁵¹

Ireland thus found itself entirely brought under the laws of Roman discipline. It was by her action, and in her southern provinces, that the first movement of return to unity¹⁵² — a movement carried out by Adamnan with, except in Iona and its dependencies, universal success — had been begun by the Council of 634. The country most distant and least accessible to Roman influence, withdrawn behind Wales and the sea, which made a double rampart for her, was thus the first conquest of the principle of unity.¹⁵³ Caledonia, the modern Scotland, represented by the Picts, the farthest north and most untamable of all the populations of the British Isles, soon followed. And, finally, Iona herself yielded, increasing, by all the numerous family of Columb-kill, the crowded ranks of faithful and obedient children in the Roman Church.¹⁵⁴

¹⁵⁰ "Doctor suavissimus . . . libenter auditus ab universis, immutavit piis ac sedulis exhortationibus inveteratam illam traditionem parentum eorum. . . . In insula quam ipse velut nova quadam relucente gratia ecclesiasticæ societatis et pacis Christi consecraverat . . . gaudium summæ festivitatis quod cum fratribus quos ad unitatis gratiam converterat, inchoavit, cum Domino et apostolis cæterisque cæli civibus complevit, immo idipsum celebrare sine fine non desinit." — BEDE, v. 22.

¹⁵¹ MABILLON, in Præfat. III. Sec. Bened., No. 16.

¹⁵² See p. 316.

The Britons of Cambria alone resisted; they, the nearest of all, exposed every day to the example, efforts, and persuasions of the orthodox, alone persisted in the customs which they had refused to sacrifice to Augustin. Bede, the illustrious contemporary of those last struggles, grows indignant over this insurmountable obstinacy. He contrasts it with the docility of the Irish and Scotch, and attempts to explain the causes of the difference.¹⁵⁵ "The Scottish nation," he says, "communicated frankly and generously to the Anglo-Saxons, by the ministrations of Aïdan and other missionaries, the truth as far as she knew it; in return, she owes to the Anglo-Saxons the perfect order and regularity which were wanting to her. But the Britons, who had never wished to reveal the Christian religion to the Anglo-Saxons, bury themselves deeper and deeper in their error, now that the English are initiated into all the verities of the Catholic faith. They hold high their tonsured heads, but not in the form of a crown; and they profess to celebrate the Christian solemnities while separating themselves from the Church of Christ."¹⁵⁶

The Britons of Cambria alone remain obstinately dissident in respect to Easter.

¹⁵³ VARIN, Memoir already quoted.

¹⁵⁴ It must be acknowledged that from this moment the influence of this celebrated sanctuary went on diminishing, though it still remained much beyond that of the rest of the Celtic Church.

¹⁵⁵ He admits, however, that in the time of Adamnan the example of Ireland was contagious for a certain number of Britons, v. 17: "Plurima pars Scottorum in Hibernia, et nonnulla etiam de Britonibus in Britannia, ecclesiasticum paschalis observantiæ tempus suscepit." The Britons of Cumberland and of Strathclyde, who were more directly under the influence and authority of Northumbrian kings and pontiffs, are probably referred to in this passage.

¹⁵⁶ "Ipsi adhuc inveterati et claudicantes in semitis suis, et capita sine corona prætendunt et solemnia Christi sine Ecclesiæ Christi societate venerantur." — BEDE, v. 22.

Real motive for their resistance.

A little reflection ought to have been sufficient to convince the honest Bede that some other motive than prejudice or religious passion had to do with the infatuated resistance of the Britons; it was the patriotic sentiment which the Anglo-Saxons had mortally wounded, and which Bede himself, like a true Englishman, does not seem to have been able to comprehend as existing in the victims of Saxon invasion. The Anglo-Saxons had never attacked Ireland before the passing incursion of Egfrid. They fought only by intervals, or held themselves upon the defensive against the Picts and Scots of Scotland; while against the Britons war and conflict were perpetual. This war dated from the first landing of the Saxons. It had begun long before the mission of Augustin, and had lasted for three centuries when Bede wrote.¹⁵⁷ It was not then the doctrines or usages of Rome, it was the ecclesiastical supremacy and moral invasion of the Saxons, which the remnant of the British nation, withdrawn within its inaccessible stronghold of Cambria, repelled with the energy of desperation. For a century and a half, up to the moment of Augustin's arrival, religion and patriotism had borne an equal part in their horror for the pagan barbarians who had come first to waste, and then to take possession of their native island. They had seen, with equal distrust and repugnance, these savage invaders, whose eternal damnation seemed to them a sort of consolatory justice, gradually introduced into the fold of the Church. By maintaining their ancient customs, by celebrating Easter at a different date, by seeing on the shaven brows of their clergy the distinctive sign of their independent origin and tradition, they testified their incredulity of the Christianity of their enemies, and raised a supreme protest in favor of their own vanquished but not extirpated nationality, before God and man.¹⁵⁸

¹⁵⁷ VARIN, Memoir already quoted.

¹⁵⁸ This is called by Bede, in language too like that which Muscovite writers of our own day employ in respect to the Poles, a domestic and immoral hatred: "Britones maxima ex parte domestico sibi odio gentem Anglorum et totius Ecclesiæ catholicæ statum Pascha, minus recte moribusque improbis pugnant." There is no just reason for imputing to the British Christians a lower rate of morals than those of the Saxon converts; but our venerable historian, blinded by his passions and prejudices, goes still further, and yields, as so many have done after him, to the hateful temptation of identifying the work of God with a human conquest: "Tamen et divina sibi et humana prorsus resistente virtute, in neutro cupitum possunt obtinere propositum: quippe qui quamvis ex parte sui sunt juris, nonnulla tamen ex parte Anglorum sunt servitio mancipati." — v. 23. He says elsewhere (v. 18) that

While Wilfrid consumed his life, in the north of England, in a struggle against the enmities which probably fomented and aggravated the opposition of the Celts to his innovations, a celebrated monk named Aldhelm, about his own age, and who died in the same year, distinguished himself by his efforts to lead back the Britons who were subjects of the kingdom of Wessex, or lived on its borders, to Roman unity, as well as to extend and consolidate the Christian faith among the Western Saxons. His fame was too great in the middle ages, and he has been too often quoted in our own day among the pioneers of literature, to be passed over by us without remark.¹⁵⁹ He was descended from that powerful race of Cerdic which traced its genealogy up to the god Woden or Odin,¹⁶⁰ and which reigned over the Saxons of the West until the moment came when it united all the kingdoms of the Heptarchy under its dominion. Aldhelm, who had been devoted from his youth to religious and literary studies, was soon attracted by a school which had just risen in his native kingdom, and of which he was destined to become the principal glory. A Scottish monk named Maïdulf, moved by the same impulse which led so many Anglo-Saxons to the cloisters and hermitages of Ireland, had come to England to seek a solitude where he could pray and study in peace. He established himself in an immense forest upon the borders of Wessex and Mercia, and lived there as a hermit, sheltered by a hut which he had been allowed to build under the walls of an old castle, a place which had come into the possession of the Saxon kings after having been the dwelling of British chiefs, and was the sole Attempts of St. Aldhelm to bring back the Britons to unity.

709.

His royal birth and education, half Roman half Celtic, 645 (?)–675.

St. Aldhelm wrote: “Librum egregium adversus errorem Britonum, quo vel Pascha non suo tempore celebrant, vel alia perplura ecclesiasticæ castitati et paci contraria gerunt.” In all Aldhelm’s writings that have been preserved to us there is not the least allusion to the irregular morals of the Celtic clergy.

¹⁵⁹ Except certain lines in Bede (v. 18), and the biographical details which have been found in Aldhelm’s works, we have no contemporary information as to his life. But William of Malmesbury, in the twelfth century, and before him another monk, Faricius, a member of the great monastery of which Aldhelm had been abbot, compiled two separate biographies of the saint, from the traditions of their community. The work of William, which is very curious, has been published by Mabillon and the Bollandists in an abridged form, which was all they themselves knew of it. The complete text is to be found only in the Anglia Sacra of Wharton, vol. ii. The literary position of Aldhelm has been ably examined by Lingard (Anglo-Saxon Church, vol. ii.) and Ozanam (Etudes Germaniques, vol. ii. 489).

¹⁶⁰ Chron. Saxon., ad. ann. 552.

remnant of a British town which the Teutonic conquerors had destroyed.¹⁶¹ The Celtic solitary, to provide himself with the means of living, opened a school. Any man in our day, in any country in the world except the Far West of America, who should open a school in a wood, would run great risk of dying there of hunger. But at that time such a thirst for instruction had arisen among the Anglo-Saxons, and the fountains at which they could satisfy it were so rare, that the speculation of Maïdulf succeeded perfectly. Scholars came to him in sufficient numbers to enable him shortly to form a community, and among the rest came Aldhelm, first as a pupil and afterwards as a monk.¹⁶² He remained there for fifteen

He becomes Abbot of Malmes-
bury.

years, was elected abbot on the death of Maïdulf, and by his exertions the foundation of the Celtic anchorite became one of the principal monasteries in England, still, however, bearing the name of the old and saintly stranger whom the Celts were always proud to remember they had given as a master to the great Aldhelm.¹⁶³

His studies at Canterbury.

Before, however, he was called to rule his co-disciples, Aldhelm desired to have the advantage of other instructions than those of his Celtic master.

He went repeatedly to Canterbury,¹⁶⁴ where the great monastic schools had taken new life under that Abbot Adrian whom we have already so often referred to, and who had come from Africa with the Asiatic Archbishop Theodore, to preside over the Catholic education of the Anglo-Saxons. This eminent man, described by a monastic historian four centuries after his death as the master of masters, the fountain-head and centre of letters and arts, gained the heart of Aldhelm by developing the fulness of his intelligence. The young West Saxon came out of the hands of his African preceptor furnished with all which then constituted

609.

¹⁶¹ Liber Antiquitatum Meldunensis Canobii, ap. DUGDALE, Monasticon. The remembrance of this catastrophe appears to survive in the modern name of Broken-borough, not far from Malmesbury.

¹⁶² "Deficientibus necessariis scholares in discipulatum accepit ut eorum liberalitate victus tenuitate corrigeret. Illi procedenti tempore magistri sequaces ex scholaribus monachi effecti, in conventum non exiguum coaluere." — GUILL. MALMESB., Vita Aldhelmi, ap. WHARTON, page 3.

¹⁶³ Maildulf's burgh, whence Malmesbury. "Abbas monasterii quod Maildulf urbem nuncupavit." — BEDE, v. 18. "A quodam sancto viro de nostro genere nutritus es." — Epist. Scoti Anonym., ap. GILES, p. 98.

¹⁶⁴ It is difficult to conceive how William of Malmesbury could attribute the first training of Aldhelm to the Abbot Adrian. Aldhelm, who died a septuagenarian in 709, must have been at least twenty in 669, the year in which Adrian landed in England. Besides, it is proved that Aldhelm made two distinct visits to Canterbury.

a course of literary and religious instruction.¹⁶⁵ During his entire life he retained a grateful recollection of his teacher, and took pleasure in dating the true birth of his mind from his residence at Canterbury. "It is you, my beloved," he wrote to Adrian, "who have been the venerable teacher of my rude infancy, it is you whom I embrace with the effusion of a pure tenderness, longing much to return to you."¹⁶⁶

It was thus at Canterbury that Aldhelm acquired that profound knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, that love of Greek, Latin and Hebrew, these literary tastes and habits, which gained him the first place in the universal admiration of his countrymen. Not only contemporaries, such as Bede,¹⁶⁷ but their distant descendants, offered him a homage which has attracted the unaccustomed attention of several modern writers. I am aware that he is the first Saxon whose writings have been preserved,¹⁶⁸ the first man of Teutonic race who cultivated the Latin muse, as he boasts in applying to himself while still very young these lines of Virgil:—

His great literary reputation.

"Primus ego in patriam mecum, modo vita supersit,
Aonio rediens deducam vertice Musas.
Primus Idumæas referam tibi, Mantua, palmas."

But I cannot but think that his literary importance has been singularly exaggerated. Of all the Fathers of the Church, or even of ecclesiastical writers generally, I know none whose productions are more wearisome. He has neither the fiery originality of Cædmon nor the eloquent and elegant simplicity of Bede. He is certainly well-informed for his time, and is not without a certain warmth of feeling when his mind is not frozen by pedantic formalism. Sometimes he applies happily texts from the Bible, and in his famous essays in prose and verse upon virgins and virginity he shows himself thoroughly instructed in sacred and ecclesiastical history. His verses, rhymed and unrhymed, are a little better than his ¹⁶⁵ "Quem in arcem scientiæ stetisse qui Anglorum gesta perleget, intel-liget. . . . Fons liberarum vivus artium." — GUILL. MALMESB., p. 3.

¹⁶⁶ "Reverendissimo patri meæque rudis infantia venerando præceptori.
. . . . Mi charissime, quem gratia puræ dilectionis amplector." — ALDHELM Opera, p. 330, ed. Giles.

¹⁶⁷ "Vir undecumque doctissimus: nam et sermone nitidus, et scriptura-rum tam liberalium quam ecclesiasticarum erat eruditione mirandus." — BEDE, v. 18.

¹⁶⁸ "Constat neminem nostræ stirpis prosapia genitum, et Germanicæ gen-tis cunabulis confotum, in hujusmodi negotio ante nostram mediocritatem tantopere desudasse." — Epist. ad Acircium, ed. Giles, p. 327.

prose, but still are destitute of any special charm or brilliancy, notwithstanding the pompous affectation of his images and metaphors. But in verse and in prose, this Teuton, in whom it would be pleasant to find something wild and primitive, delights in literary sleight-of-hand, in acrostics, in enigmas, in alliterations, in a play upon words, and a childish and grotesque redundancy of expression¹⁶⁹ — in short, in all the paltry refinements of the Greek and Latin decadence.

We should judge him no doubt more leniently if we were acquainted with his Anglo-Saxon works, which must have contributed largely to his popular reputation. But of these there remains to us only a vague recollection, associated with the most curious and touching feature of his youth. What would not one give to have the actual text of those canticles and ballads which he sang upon the bridges and at the wayside corners, lying in wait for the Saxon peasants who left church in haste as soon as mass was over to avoid the sermon? Appearing before them as a musician, one of their ordinary bards, he attempted no doubt to teach them, under that popular and fascinating form of utterance, the same truths of religion which it wearied them to hear from the pulpit.¹⁷⁰ These songs in the vernacular tongue retained their popularity for several centuries, and gained for Aldhelm the honor of being proclaimed prince of Anglo-Saxon poetry by the great King Alfred.

His Anglo-Saxon songs intended to take the place of sermons.

Literary life in the Saxon cloisters in the seventh century.

The most striking particular in the history and writings of Aldhelm is the view they afford us of the literary and intellectual life, developed as it were in a moment, in the Saxon cloisters, almost before their completion, by an inspiring breath, at once Catholic and classic, from Italy and the East. The same phenomenon had been apparent two centuries earlier in the Irish monasteries under an inspiration more original but less easy to ¹⁶⁹ I refer those who may think me too severe, and who may not have at hand the convenient volume published by Dr. Giles, to the extracts from St. Aldhelm given by Lingard and Ozanam.

¹⁷⁰ "Litteris ad plenum instructus, nativæ quoque linguæ non negligebat carmina, adeo ut, teste libro Ælfredi . . . nulla unquam ætate par fuerit quisquam, poesim Anglicam posse facere vel canere. . . . Carmen triviale quod adhuc vulgo cantitatur fecisse. . . . Populum eo tempore semi-barbarum, parum divinis sermonibus intentum statim cantatis missis domos cursitare solitum; ideo sanctum virum super pontem qui rura et urbem continuat, abeuntibus se opposuisse obicem, quasi artem canendi professum. . . . Hoc commento sensim inter ludicra verbis scripturarum insertis, cives ad sanitatem reduxisse." — GUILL. MALMESB., p. 4.

study. This literary life had its clouds and its pettinesses, its pretentious and affected aspect. But such a blossoming of human thought, of study and knowledge, of poetry and eloquence, in the bosom of a barbarous and warlike race, still apparently absorbed by war, invasions, dynastic and domestic revolutions, and all the storms and blunders which characterize the childhood of society, is not the less a great and wonderful sight.

The good and evil sides of this development could not be better manifested than in the person of St. Aldhelm, and especially in the extent and variety of his information. He was an excellent musician, and studied eagerly all the instruments known in his day.¹⁷¹ What was still more rare, he had studied Roman law,¹⁷² happily ignored by all the other Anglo-Saxon monks and men of letters, even including the Venerable Bede, whose learning seemed universal. He was acquainted, as has been seen, with the three sacred languages, and knew enough of Hebrew to read the Bible in the original. He not only read Greek, but spoke and pronounced it like an ancient Greek, according to the two professors whom King Ina, cousin of Aldhelm, brought from Greece to aid him in his studies. As for Latin, it occupied him only too much. He makes wearisome dissertations upon the minute details of grammar, prosody, and metrical rules, and quotes to extremity Virgil and Lucan, Persius and Terence, Horace and Juvenal: he even quotes Juvencus and the Priapeia!

At the same time, his literary or classical occupations never made him lose sight of the exigencies or perils of the soul. In a letter which has been often quoted, he warns one of his countrymen who was going to study in Ireland against the dangers of pagan philosophy, and, above all, of mythology. "What fruit," he asks, "can orthodox truth derive from the studies of a man who spends his strength in examining into the incests of the impure Proserpine, the adventures of the petulant Hermione, the bacchanals of Lupercus, or the parasites of Priapus? All that Extent and variety of Aldhelm's knowledge.

His constant solicitude for souls.

¹⁷¹ "Omnia instrumenta quæ fidibus vel fistulis aut aliis varietatibus melodiæ fieri possunt . . . in quotidiano usu habuit." — FARICIUS, Vita Aldhelm., ap. BOLLAND., t. vi. Maii, p. 83.

¹⁷² He himself states this in a letter to his predecessor Hedda, ed. Giles, p. 96. Compare LAPPENBERG, i. 196. I do not know how Palgrave discovered the existence somewhere of a manuscript treatise of Aldhelm upon Roman law, which, in 1832, he hoped soon to publish.

has vanished; it has become as nothing before the Cross, victorious over death." ¹⁷³

This anxiety for the salvation of souls, which he gives as the motive of all his works, reveals itself especially in his correspondence. For example, here are certain expressions in a letter which might have been addressed yesterday to the youth, half clerical, half noble, of the Universities of Oxford or Cambridge — so unchanging is the Anglo-Saxon nature in its vices as in its virtues: "Dear Ethelwald, who are at once my son and my disciple, you are still very young; but, I entreat you, do not let yourself be too much in bondage to the vain pleasures of this world. Avoid carefully daily excesses in drinking, long and endless repasts, even riding-parties too much prolonged, and every other miserable sensual delight."¹⁷⁴ I implore you also not to let yourself be overcome by the love of money or of vain glory, or by that secular boasting which is odious to God. Consecrate rather your time, my beloved, to the study of the Scriptures and to prayer; and if you wish, in addition, to study secular literature, do it with the special intention of understanding better the sacred text, the meaning of which depends almost everywhere on the understanding of the rules of grammar. Put this letter among your other books, that you may read it over and over again."

In dedicating his voluminous treatise on Latin versification, after twenty years' absence, to the chief ¹⁷⁵ of a Northumbrian or Scottish tribe who had been his companion in his studies, and had become his spiritual son, he insists warmly that the poor prince, whom he calls his "very reverend son," should consider it a duty to read the wearisome volume from beginning to end. He expatiates at length upon the trouble which his production had cost him in the midst of his pastoral cares, and the convulsions of the age. "It would be absurd," he says, "if you did not take the trouble to eat what I have taken so much pains to grind and make into bread." ¹⁷⁶ Then he invokes the example of the great Emperor Theodosius, who, while ruling the world, found time to copy the eighteen books of the grammarian Priscian. But he adds: "Let not the sound of the trumpet of the last judgment depart from your ears; let it recall to you day and night the book of the law, which ought to be meditated day and night. You will never sin if you think always of your last end. What is our prosperity here below? a dream, a vapor, the foam on the sea. God grant that the possession of present good may not hold to us the place of future recompense, and that the abundance of that which perishes may not be followed by the dearth of that which endures. I ask this for you and for myself, from Him who for us has hung upon the cross." ¹⁷⁷

¹⁷³ "Quidnam, rogatum quæso, orthodoxæ fidei sacramento commodi affert circa temeratum spurcæ Proserpinæ incestum . . . enucleate legendo scrutendoque sordescere . . . quæ . . . alma mortis morte stipite patibuli affixa, solo tenuis diruta evanueret." — Epist. ad Wilfrid., ed. Giles, p. 337.

¹⁷⁴ "Sive in quotidianis potationibus et conviviis usu frequentiore ac prolixiore inhoneste superfluis, sive in equitandi vagatione culpabili. . . . Seu in quibuslibet corporeæ delectationis voluptatibus execrandis. . . . Multo magis, mi amantissime, vel lectionibus divinis, vel orationibus sacris semper invigila." — P. 332, ed. Giles.

¹⁷⁵ It is not known who this Acircius was, whom he describes pompously as "Aquilonalis imperii scepra gubernanti," but whom he reminds that they contracted in their youth "inextricabile conglutinati fœderis pignus."

The rare fragments of his correspondence are at the same time the only evidence by which the heart of Aldhelm can be estimated; and his heart seems to us to have been much superior to his intelligence. A tenderness and kindness are here visible, which, in the person of a monk of barbarous race, are much more touching and attractive than all his rhetoric and learning. We perceive with pleasure that his soul was neither inflated nor disturbed by his great and increasing reputation, nor by the crowd of disciples and admirers who came to him, not only from the Britannic Isles, but also from Greece and Spain. He continued always the same mild and affectionate spirit which, while passionately studying prosody, astronomy, and Roman law, at Canterbury, wrote to his bishop lamenting that he could not celebrate Christmas in the joyous company of his brethren of Malmesbury, and charging him to salute tenderly in his name all the brethren, from the first to the last. ¹⁷⁸

These features of his character explain the great popularity which he enjoyed in his own country. ^{His popularity.} It was such that when he returned from his journeys, he was met not only by a long procession of monks with chants and ¹⁷⁶ "Absurdum nempe arbitror si . . . illud te pigeat velut insolescentem ac delicatum paulatim masticare ac ruminare, quod me non piguit, utpote pistoris pinsentis officio functum, commolere et tollere." — P. 328, ed. Giles.

¹⁷⁷ "Propterea cœlestis tubæ clangor. . . . Utinam caducarum copia, secutarum non sit inopia . . . quod præstare dignetur, qui pro nobis in patibulo pendit." — Ibid.

¹⁷⁸ "Fateor me decrevisse. . . . Natalis Domini solemnitatem in consortio fratrum tripudians celebrare. . . . Salutate in Christo omnem sodalium meorum catervam a minimo usque ad maximum."

incense, but also by a crowd of laymen, who formed themselves into a kind of rhythmic dance in his honor.¹⁷⁹

After this prolonged discussion of the literary position held by Aldhelm, it is necessary to recall to our readers that the great point of interest for us is his monastic life, and his connection with the Celtic dissidents.

His great monastic
life.

This indifferent writer was a great monk. He divided his life between study and prayer, but study was for him only a succession of conversations with God. "When I read," he said, "it is God who speaks to me; when I pray, it is to God that I speak."¹⁸⁰ Like his contemporaries, Wilfrid and the holy abbots of the Northumbrian coast, he professed and extended the rule of St. Benedict, whose praises he has written in his poem in honor of Virgins, and whom he does not hesitate to regard as the first author of the conversion of England, his disciples having been its earliest missionaries.¹⁸¹ He thus substituted the teachings and traditions of Canterbury for the influence of his first Celtic master. This, however, was not prompted by self-indulgence, for he continued, as did Wilfrid himself, faithful to the great austerities which characterized Irish monastic life. Aldhelm imposed upon himself the same extraordinary penances as were habitual to the Celtic monks. To subdue the impulses of the flesh he would plunge during the night into a fountain near the monastery, and there re-¹⁷⁹ "Venienti occursum est ubique magna pompa, longo apparatu salutantium. . . . Laicorum pars pedibus plaudunt choreas; pars diversis corporum gestibus internas pandunt lætitiis." — GUILL. MALMESB., p. 19.

¹⁸⁰ "Lectionibus frequenter, orationibus instanter incumbibat, ut sicut ipse in quadam epistola dicebat, legens Deum alloquentem audiret, orans Deum alloqueretur." — Ibid., p. 13.

¹⁸¹ We quote the lines for the satisfaction of our readers. They contain the first homage ever offered by a Teutonic pen to St. Benedict and his institution: —

"Temporibus faustus Benedictus claruit isdem, Quem Deus Ausoniæ clemens indulserat auctor. . . .
Primo qui statuit nostræ certamina vitæ,
Qualiter optatam teneant cœnobia normam,
Quoque modo properet directo tramite sanctus,
Ad supera scandens cœlorum culmina cultor;
Cujus præclaram pandens ab origine vitam
Grægorius præsul chartis descripserat olim,
Donec æthralem felix migraret in arcem.
Hujus alumnorum numero glomeramus ovantes,
Quos gerit in gremio fœcunda Britannia cives,
A quo jam nobis baptismi gratia fluxit,
Atque magistrorum veneranda caterva cucurrit."

De Laudibus Virginum, p. 159.

main immersed to the neck, till he had said the Psalter, and this in winter as in summer. The fountain long retained his name, and the memory of his wonderful austerities.¹⁸² I suppose he is the sole poet, the sole philosopher, of whom such recollections have been preserved.

But he was far from concentrating his zeal within the narrow enclosure of his monastery. It was he who by his preaching, completed the conquest of Wessex, the kingdom which, a hundred years after his death, was to absorb the other seven kingdoms of the Hephtharchy. This work was long and laborious. The people seem to have been Christian only in name: they neither listened to the priests nor attended the churches. Aldhelm employed all the resources of his eloquence to attract them. He even went to the fairs and market-places, mingled with the groups of buyers and sellers, and succeeded, by his persuasive addresses, in making them leave their merchandise for the moment, and follow him to the church, where he fed them with the bread of the divine Word.¹⁸³

His zeal
for preaching.

His anxiety for the good of souls and the honor of the Church extended even beyond his native province. He was not indifferent, as were so many other holy bishops and abbots of his time, to the noble struggles of Wilfrid. One of his letters still exists, addressed to the numerous members of Wilfrid's clergy who had abandoned their pontiff in the midst of his trials, and who, during his exile, sought the favor of his persecutors. "I entreat you on my knees," wrote Aldhelm, "not to allow yourselves to be disturbed by the hurricane which has just shaken the foundations of your Church, the sound of which has echoed even to us. If it is needful, take courage to leave the country of your fathers with your bishop, and follow him into exile. What pain, what labor should ever be allowed to separate you from him who has fed you, trained you, carried you in his arms and on his breast, with so tender a charity? . . .

He interferes in favor of
Wilfrid.

¹⁸² "Ut vim rebelli corpori conscinderet, fonti se humero tenus inmergebatur. Ibi nec glaciale in hyeme frigorem, nec æstate nebulas ex locis palustribus halantes, curans. . . . Fons ille . . . in valle cœnobii lenibus scatebris fluens." — GUILL. MALMESB., p. 13.

¹⁸³ "Illius provinciæ populus, perversus opere, quamvis subditus fidei nostræ, ecclesiam non frequentabat, nec sacerdotum curabat imperium: quem vir blandus verbis monens suavis. . . . Mercatorum ex diversis patribus multitudo congregabatur maxima: cui pater iste extra urbem veniebat obviando. . . . Quidam eorum . . . pro quibus venerant relinquentes ad tempus mercimonia . . . post hæc . . . repedabant ad propria, animabus suis divino prius officio saginatis." — BOLLAND., t. vi. Maii, p. 85.

Look at the men of the world, who are strangers to all knowledge of divine things. What would be said of laymen, who, after having loved and served their lord in his prosperity, should abandon him when he fell into misfortune and poverty? What would be said of those who should prefer the repose of their own hearths, instead of joining themselves to the misery and exile of their prince? By what a universal explosion of laughter, of contempt, and execration, would not they be overwhelmed? And you too, you priests, what will not be said of you if you allow the bishop who ordained you to go alone into banishment?"¹⁸⁴ We are not informed what was the effect of this letter; but it is not the less curious to behold our Anglo-Saxon abbot, worthy descendant of Odin, invoking to the aid of episcopal authority, and endeavoring to awake in the breasts of his priestly brethren, that tradition of personal devotion, that passionate sentiment of fealty to prince and lord, of which the Anglo-Saxons have left us so many touching examples.

Aldhelm was the true founder of Malmesbury, of which he was abbot for thirty years. It was to him it owed the powerful and popular existence which lasted till an advanced period in the middle ages; and he attracted to it an immense crowd of monks and students.¹⁸⁵ By the grandeur and variety of his buildings, he made it the most magnificent edifice which then existed in England. The sympathy which existed between him and the kings and nobles of Wessex and Mercia procured vast territorial gifts to the monastery situated on the borders of the two kingdoms. The abbatial demesne, which contained only thirty dairies,¹⁸⁶ when he became abbot, included more than four hundred at his death. In order to protect the liberty and property of the community as much as possible from lay or ecclesiastical cupidity, he went to Rome, with the consent of the kings of Mercia and Wessex, and obtained from Pope Sergius I. an act of privilege which placed

He goes to Rome to obtain the privilege of exemption. 687-701.

¹⁸⁴ "Vos viscerales contribulos, flexis genuum poplitibus, subnixa exposco prece. . . . Ecce seculares divinæ scientiæ extorres, si devotum dominum quem in prosperitate dilexerunt . . . deseruerint. . . . Nonne execrabiles cachinni ridiculo et gannaturæ strepitu ab omnibus ducuntur? Quid ergo de vobis dicetur?" etc. — Epistola ad Clerum Wulfridi Episcopi, p. 335.

¹⁸⁵ "Currebatur ad Aldhelmum totis semitis: his vitæ sanctimoniam, illis litterarum scientiam desiderantibus. . . . Tunc res monasterii in immensum augeri." — GUILL. MALMESB., p. 10.

¹⁸⁶ I translate thus the cassatos of William, which I suppose to be equivalent to the more usual term casata.

the Monastery of Malmesbury and its dependencies under the special protection of the Holy See, and guaranteed to them an absolute independence of all secular or episcopal authority.¹⁸⁷ When he became a bishop, Aldhelm took pains to have this exemption confirmed, with all requisite solemnity, by his cousin, King Ina.

For he too became a bishop towards the end of his life, and in spite of all his efforts to be delivered from this burden. On the death of the bishop of the West Saxons, Hedda, the plan of Archbishop Theodore was brought into operation to divide his vast diocese into two. A new bishopric was created at Sherburne, which still, however, was of much too vast extent, since it included almost all the south-west of England to the point of Cornwall, which the West Saxons had not yet completely conquered.¹⁸⁸ Aldhelm was called to this new diocese. After his promotion it was his desire that the monks of his different communities¹⁸⁹ — or, as he said, his families — should proceed, in all freedom, to the election of a new abbot; but they obstinately refused to give him a successor. To his reiterated requests they answered, “As long as you live, we will live with you and under you. But one thing we ask of you unanimously. It is, to guarantee to us, by the Holy Scriptures and the consent of the powerful, that after your death neither king, nor bishop, nor any man whatsoever, ecclesiastic or layman, may exercise over us an authority which we are not willing to accept.”¹⁹⁰ Aldhelm procured an

He becomes a bishop.
705.

¹⁸⁷ The authenticity of the Act given by William has been contested, but the fact of the exemption does not seem doubtful. On this subject the Bollandists say, “Tales exemptiones (from episcopal jurisdiction), licet eo tempore rariores, non omnino inusitatas fuisse ostendit eruditissimus Mabilio, de Re diplomatica, l. i. c. 3, ex quibus corrigas quæ alibi forte in contrarium diximus.” Our readers will not wish us to enter into the coarse fables, little to the honor of the Papacy, which the biographers of Aldhelm have mingled with the narrative of his journey to Rome, nor to the extraordinary trial which the holy author of the Eulogy of Virginity, like Robert d’Arbrissel at a later period, imposed upon himself to prove his victory over his senses. “Quomodo,” says Henschenius, with reason, “monacho id credam fuisse permissum?” And it is well to add, as Malmesbury says on another occasion, “Non enim eget Aldhelmus ut mendaciis asseratur.”

¹⁸⁸ The seat of the ancient diocese continued at Winchester. That of Sherburne was shortly afterwards transferred to Sarum or Salisbury. It comprehended the six existing counties of Wilts, Berks, Somerset, Dorset, Devonshire, and Cornwall. It was afterwards subdivided, and the two additional dioceses of Bath and Exeter taken from it.

¹⁸⁹ There were three of these — Malmesbury, Frome, and Bradford, the two latter having sprung from the former.

¹⁹⁰ “Abbatem quem sibi spontanea voce familiarum mearum optio, con-

But nevertheless continues
Abbot of Malmes-
bury.

acknowledgment of the perpetual freedom of the monastery, which he continued to rule, from his consin King Ina, from his colleague the Bishop of Winchester, and from all the clergy of Wessex assembled in synod. He then went to Canterbury to be consecrated by the former companion of his studies, the Archbishop Brithwald, successor of the great Theodore.

A curious incident is associated with this journey. When Aldhelm was at Canterbury he learned that ships from France, from the land of the Morins, had touched at Dover. On receiving this news he went to Dover, hoping to find among their cargoes books or other articles of use to his church. And, in fact, he did discover among the merchandise displayed upon the shore many books, and one in particular, of which, after having carefully examined it, he asked the price. The sailors, seeing him so poorly clad, laughed at him, and pushed him roughly away. Soon after a storm broke out, endangering the anchored ship. Aldhelm threw himself into a boat (like the generous sailors in the life-boats at the present day), to aid the crew of the threatened vessel. At his prayer the waves calmed down, and their lives were saved; the sailors, confused and deeply touched, then gave him the book he desired. It was a complete Bible, the Old and New Testaments, which he carried with him as a precious treasure to Malmesbury.¹⁹¹ This anecdote is not without interest in connection with the history of material and intellectual commerce in England; it shows, too, that so far from interdicting the study of the Bible, as the modern English so blindly accuse her of doing, the Church, from the most primitive times, has neglected no occasion of spreading the knowledge of it.

sona voce elegisset. . . . Ut nullus post obitum tuum nec regalis audacitas, nec pontificalis auctoritas, vel aliquid ecclesiasticæ seu secularis dignitatis vir, sine nostro voluntatis arbitrio, in nobis sibi vindicet principatum." — Epist. Aldhelmi de Libertate Propriæ Electionis, ap. GUILL. MALMESB., BOLLAND., and GILES, p. 350.

¹⁹¹ "Spatiabatur sanctus juxta mare, intentosque oculos mercimoniis infigebat, si quid forte commodum ecclesiastico usui attulissent nautæ qui e Gallico sinu in Angliam proVecti librorum copiam apportassent. Conspicatus librum totius Testamenti Veteris et Novi seriem continentem. . . . Cum gnarus folia volveret, pretium effringeret, barbari eum nautica lascivia conviciis aggrediuntur. . . . Mox ipse in scapha ascensa virtute remigum periclitantes adisset, mutata in bonum." — GUILL. MALMESB., p. 20. Cf. BOLLAND., loco cit., p. 8. This Bible was still in existence at Malmesbury in the time of the historian — more than four centuries after the death of Aldhelm.

The episcopate of Aldhelm lasted only four years, which he passed in continual journeys through his vast diocese, preaching day and night. He died in the same year as his master, the famous African abbot, Adrian of Canterbury, and his illustrious contemporary, Wilfrid of York. Death surprised him, as it did the holy apostle of Northumberland,¹⁹² in a village,¹⁹³ during one of his apostolic journeys. According to his own desire, he drew his last breath in the little wooden church to which he had come to preach the word of God; the stone on which he laid his dying head was shown long afterwards.

Death of Aldhelm.
25th May,
709.

Such was the man to whom all agree in attributing the principal part in putting down what has been called the schism in the west and south of Great Britain. It is interesting to search out in his writings, as in his life, all the traces of his connection with the Celts. They are, however, few in number, and seem all connected either with his first education under the Celtic Maïdulf, or his consequent literary studies. He receives pompous compliments from several Irishmen, one of whom requests from him the loan of a book, and afterwards that he would receive him as a disciple, sending him a specimen of Latin verses, and announcing that he could easily find horses and a servant for the journey, if Aldhelm's answer was favorable.¹⁹⁴ Another, exiled, as he describes it, in the most distant corner of the Frankish kingdom, beside the tomb of his holy countryman Fursy (at Lagny-sur-Marne), begs him, whom he calls the Archimandrite of the Saxons, to send him his Latin panegyrics.¹⁹⁵ At another time, it is the son

What he did to bring back the Celtic dissidents.

¹⁹² See p. 251.

¹⁹³ At Dulting in Somersetshire. "In prædicationibus noctes perinde ac dies continuans, diœceses non segniter circumiens. . . . Ligna erat ecclesia, in qua se ultimum spirans afferre jussit." — GUILL. MALMESB., p. 23. Eight centuries after his death his feast was still celebrated at Malmesbury by such a crowd of worshippers that, according to Camden, the presence of a troop of soldiers, cohors militum, was necessary to prevent disorder. Then came the Reformation of Henry VIII., with its usual train of devastations. The magnificent church of Malmesbury would have been razed to the ground had not a weaver bought it from the king to establish his looms there. The monastery was sacked. The precious MSS. of his library were long employed to fill up broken windows in the neighboring houses, or to light the bakers' fires. — MAITLAND'S Dark Ages, p. 281.

¹⁹⁴ "Domino sancto, sapientissimo, Christo quidem carissimo Aldhelmo Scotus ignoti nominis in Deo æterno salutem," etc. — P. 98, ed. Giles.

¹⁹⁵ "Domino lectricebus ditato studiis mellifluisque ornato lucubratiunculis, Aldhelmo Archimandritæ Saxonum. . . . Cellanus in Hibernensi insula natus, in extremo Francorum limitis latens angulo exul." Aldhelm answers:

of a Scottish king, learned in the literature of his time, who sends all his works to Aldhelm, in order that the file of so accomplished a genius may rub off the Scottish rust from them.¹⁹⁶ Then we find him, in his own person, congratulating one of his Anglo-Saxon friends on his return from foggy Ireland, after having studied there for six years. On this occasion he gives us an emphatic picture of the constant journeys of English students, who filled whole fleets going and coming to Ireland, in order to examine deeply, not only into the secrets of grammar, geometry, and physical science, but also into all the different interpretations of Scripture, "as if," he says, "there was a failure of Greek and Latin masters in green and fertile England to explain the obscurities of the celestial library to all who desire to know them." Then he instances his dear master Adrian, of ineffable urbanity, and the metropolitan Theodore, whom he represents surrounded by a troop of Irish disciples, like a wild boar surrounded by a crowd of furious dogs, holding them back, as by strokes of his tusks, by the nervous vigor of his dialectics, and the close ranks of his syllogisms.¹⁹⁷

In all this there is no allusion to the religious differences which separated the Celts from the Anglo-Saxons, an omission which is of itself a new proof of the reconciliation already effected between the Irish Celts and the Anglo-Saxon clergy, while the British Celts remained obstinate in their distinct and even hostile observances. Since the great victories of the Northumbrian kings it was specially the West Saxons who carried on the struggle against the Britons who had taken refuge in the mountainous peninsulas of Cambria and Cornwall, and whose unwearied resistance was no doubt seconded in an unforeseen and often dangerous way by the other Britons scattered through the districts already conquered by the Saxons. After one of these wars or insurrections, more cruel than usual, the national assembly of the West Saxons deliberated long over the measures it would be best to take by way of getting rid of one of the principal obstacles to the fusion of the two races, by leading back the vanquished Britons to unity in respect to paschal observances. The discussion lasted several days. At last, starting from the principle that no force must be employed, but solely reason and persuasion, it was resolved that Abbot Aldhelm, who was as blameless in life as in doctrine, should be charged to teach them the true laws of the Church, and to end the schism, for the honor of his country, as well as for the common salvation.¹⁹⁸ A national council (probably that of Becancelde), at which almost all the Anglo-Saxon clergy were represented, confirmed the mission which the Abbot of Malmesbury had received from his countrymen. He accepted the task with his usual charity. Without adventuring his person in the midst of these refractory tribes, he addressed himself to their chiefs and clergy in writing. An unexpected success attended his efforts. Of all that he wrote on this subject there remains to us only one letter, addressed to a petty British king who still maintained his independence in Cornwall, at the extreme point of southern England. He draws in it a striking picture of the religious separation, of the moral repulsion, which still at the end of the seventh century rose like a wall between the two races — between the victors and the vanquished. “Beyond the mouth of the Severn,” he says, “the priests of Cambria, proud of the purity of their morals, have such a horror of communication with us that they refuse to pray with us in the churches, or to seat themselves at the same table; more than this, what is left from our meals is thrown to dogs and swine, the dishes and bottles we have used have to be rubbed with sand, or purified by fire, before they will condescend to touch them. The Britons give us neither the salutation nor the kiss of peace; and if one of us went to live in their country, the

"Miror quod me tantillum homunculum de famoso et florifero Francorum rure vestræ fraternitatis industria interpellat Saxonice prolis prosapia genitum." — P. 331, ed. Giles.

¹⁹⁶ "Arcivillum regis Scotiæ filium. . . . Ut perfecti ingenii lima eraderetur scabredo Scotica." — GUILL. MALMESB., p. 4.

¹⁹⁷ "Ex Hiberniæ brumosis insulæ climatibus. . . . Tam crêber meatus est (istinc illincque, istuc illucque) navigero æquoreas fretantium calle gurgites. . . . Cur Hibernia quo catervatim istinc lectores classibus advecti confluant . . . ac si istic, fœcunde Britannia in cespite, didascali Argivi Romanive quirites minime reperiri queant. . . . Etiansi Theodorus, Hibernensium globo discipulorum (seu aper truculentus Molossorum catasta ringente vallatus), stipetur; limato perneciter grammatico dente rebelles phalanges discutit," etc. — Pp. 92-94, ed. Giles; Cf. OZANAM, op. cit., 492. This letter must have been written before 690, the date of Theodore's death.

About 690.

Letter of Abbot Ald-helm to the British
king of Cornwall.
692 or 698.

¹⁹⁸ “Tunc rebellionem meditantes Kentuinus rex tam anxia cæde perdomnit, ut nihil ulterius sperarent. . . . Hinc frequenter West-Saxonum conventus, crebri cætus coacti . . . sententia per plures dies multo verborum agmine volutata, nunc finem habuit: non vi cogendos schismaticos sed rationibus ducendos. . . . Ambitur precibus B. vir, ut hunc laborem impendat . . . patriæ laudi et cunctorum in commune saluti.” — GUILL. MALMESB., p. 14. Cf. BOLLAND, l. c., p. 87.

natives would hold no communication with him till after he had been made to endure a penance of forty days."

Aldhelm then enlarges upon the cruel scandal of such struggles and hatreds in the Church of Christ. He discusses in succession the question of the tonsure and that of paschal observance. "We entreat you on our knees," he says, "in view of our future and common country in heaven, and of the angels, our future fellow-countrymen — we adjure you not to persevere in your arrogant contempt of the decrees of St. Peter, and the traditions of the Roman Church, by a proud and tyrannical attachment to the statutes of your ancestors. . . . Whatever may be the perfection of good works, they are unprofitable out of the Catholic Church, alike to cenobites, however faithfully they may follow their rule, and to anchorites hidden in the wildest solitudes. To sum up everything in one word, it is vain for any man to take credit to himself for belonging to the Catholic faith so long as he rejects the doctrine and rule of St. Peter. For the foundation of the Church and the consolidation of the faith, placed first in Christ and secondly in St. Peter, wavers not before the assaults of any tempest. It is on Peter that the Truth himself conferred the privilege of the Church, saying, 'Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church.'"¹⁹⁹

It is generally admitted that the zeal and eloquence of Aldhelm led back to orthodox rule a great many Britons, especially those who lived under the daily extending sway of the kings of Wessex.²⁰⁰ But even the narratives most favorable to him make it apparent that all did not yield. The greater part of those who retained their independence beyond the Severn remained, according to all appearance, inaccessible to his efforts.

¹⁹⁹ "Geruntio regi, simulque cunctis Dei sacerdotibus per Domnonia conversantibus. . . . Nuper cum enim in concilio episcoporum ex tota pene Britannia innumerabilis Dei sacerdotum caterva confluit. . . . Demetarum sacerdotes de privata propriæ conversationis munditia gloriantes nostram communionem magnopere abominantur . . . reliquias epularum lurconum canum rictibus et immundis devorandos porcis projiciunt. Vascula quoque et phialas. . . . Propter communem cœlestis patriæ sortem et angelicæ sodalitatæ collegium . . . flexis poplitibus . . . suppliciter efflagitamus ut . . . traditionem Ecclesiæ Romanæ propter prisca priorum statuta vestrorum nequaquam tyrannica freti pertinacia arroganter aspernemini. . . . Petro autem veritas ita privilegium sanxit Ecclesiæ." — Pp. 83–89, ed. Giles. Two words little used in the seventh century — barones and katharos — the first applied to military chiefs, the second to heretics who thought themselves purer than their neighbors — will be remarked in this curious letter.

²⁰⁰ "Scripsit, jubente synodo suæ gentis, librum egregium adversus errorem Britonum . . . multosque eorum qui occidentalibus Saxonibus subditi erant Britones, ad catholicam Dominici Paschæ celebrationem hujus lectione perduxit." — BEDE, v. 18. It is difficult to believe with Mabillon that this librum egregium was nothing else than the letter to the King of Cornwall which has just been quoted. The monastic historians of Malmesbury attrib-

When at length they yielded, it was not to the preaching or influence of a stranger. The victory which neither the learned Saxon abbot nor the great Roman missionary could win, was the work of a native prelate. Elbod, Bishop of Bangor, a Briton by birth, succeeded, not without much resistance, in introducing the Roman computation, first in North Cambria, and afterward in the southern part of the province, towards the end of the eighth century.²⁰¹ From that date there is no longer any question of dissent between the two Churches. In everything belonging to worship and faith, the Cambrian Britons, while still defending their independence with jealous pride, were henceforward at one with the Anglo-Saxons.²⁰² Like them, they went in crowds to Rome, their kings at their head,²⁰³ swelling the armies of pilgrims who mingled at the foot of the chair of Peter their aspirations, their enmities, their diversities of race, but who returned with the lawful assurance that the supreme advantage of catholic unity exacted no sacrifice of truly national independence, right, or tradition.

The Britons of Cambria, who had resisted the efforts of Saxon missionaries, adopt the orthodox Easter in obedience to the voice of one of their own bishops.

770.

Thus the different centres of that Celtic dissidence which has been so unjustly called schism, were successively overcome; and thus finished, upon the ground of religion, though ute greater results to Aldhelm's work than does Bede. "Ad Dominicæ fidei regulam, et ipsos præsules et innumeram populi revocavit multitudinem." — BOLLAND., l. c., p. 85. "Debent usque hodie correctionem suam Aldhelmo; quamvis pro insita nequitia et virum non agnoscant et volumen pessumderint." — GUILL. MALMESB., ap. WHARTON, p. 15.

²⁰¹ "Anno DCCLXX. Pascha mutatur apud Britones, emendante Elbod, homine Dei." — Ann. Eccl. Mcnevensis, in Anglia Sacra, vol. ii. p. 648. Cf. AUGUSTIN THIERRY, Histoire de la Conquête d'Angleterre, t. i. p. 87.

²⁰² This has been perfectly demonstrated by F. Walter (Das alte Wales, p. 232), against the childishly absurd affirmations of Roberts, Gieseler, and even of Lappenberg. All that can be admitted is, that the Cambrian bishops, who had their own metropolitan see either at Mcnevia (St. David's) or at Llandaff, did not recognize the metropolitan rights conferred by St. Gregory upon Augustin. The question was definitely settled only by Innocent III., who placed the Cambrian bishops under the authority of Canterbury.

²⁰³ Cadwallader is noted as one of the Welsh kings who met the Anglo-Saxon kings at Rome in the year 680, but the assertion rests upon a doubtful tradition, while the pilgrimages of Howell and Cyngus in the ninth century, like that of Howell the Good in the tenth, rest upon more satisfactory authority.

only to begin over again and perpetuate itself elsewhere, the long struggle between the Celts and the Saxons. According to the common fate of human conflicts and passions, all this tumult died away into silence and forgetfulness, as the Rhine disappears obscurely in the sand and marshes of Holland after its majestic and sometimes stormy waters have swept through so many famous lands proud of, and blessed by, its presence.

In casting a last glance upon these prolonged contests, so insignificant at bottom, yet so seriously affecting national influences and interests, and animated by the passions, talents, and virtues of their principal champions,—the wisdom, I may even add, the grave beauty, of the language used by him who was the greatest monk of the greatest age, will be profoundly admired.

“This dispute regarding the date of a day,” says our Mabillon, “occupied the Church for six centuries, and it required three of these centuries to restore union. Human nature takes back in this kind of controversy its downward inclination. The heat of warfare and the passion of success take possession of the soul under the cover of religion; and as they know no limits, it often happens that the laws of Christian charity are sacrificed to questions of purely human invention. In such cases, no one is permitted to disobey the judgment of the Church; but it is important that the pastors of the Church should use their authority with so much moderation as not imprudently to provoke feeble spirits too much attached to their own opinions into revolt, thus producing the greatest evils from an insignificant cause.”²⁰⁴

At the same time, this generous son of St. Benedict congratulates himself with reason that the Benedictines had the honor of leading back to unity the Scots and Britons so long separated for so small a matter from the Roman Church.

It must be recollected at the same time that, during all the seventh century, the Celtic or British Church was much more extensive than the British nation. The nation was concentrated in Cambria and in the neighboring peninsulas;

²⁰⁴ “Sic unius diei quæstio Ecclesiam detinuit per annos fere sexcentos: et tria minimum sæcula vix fuerunt satis componendæ hominum rixosorum coronæ. . . . In his vero casibus, sicut ab Ecclesiæ catholicæ sententia recedere nemini licet; ita convenit Ecclesiæ pastores sic moderari auctoritatem suam, ut nec imbecilles animos, propriis sensibus nimirum addictos, incaute provocent ad secessionem, nec in levibus causis pariant grande malum.” — MABILLON, Præfatio in III. Secul. Benedict., No. 14, 15.

the Church embraced, besides the western coast of England, all Ireland and Scotland, without mentioning the Irish colonies in Gaul and Belgium. Let us repeat that the opposition which rose in that Church against conformity to Roman rights and usages was exactly proportioned to the degree of patriotic resistance excited by the invasion of the Saxons, behind whom appeared the Roman missionaries. This resistance was desperate among the British Christians, who retained the memory or daily felt the weight of the terrible excesses of the conquest. It was less violent and less prolonged in Caledonia, and came to a conclusion there as soon as the struggle ceased between the Celts and the Saxons. And it was almost non-existent in Ireland, where, except in the incursion of Egfrid, which was universally blamed by the Northumbrian saints, the Saxons never penetrated by the strong hand, and where the two races lived peaceably together. Nothing could give more satisfactory proof how little the fundamental truths of Christianity and the infallible authority of the Church had to do with the matter, and how much in it was national rather than religious.²⁰⁵

In all that concerns the special subject of these volumes, it will be remarked that the result of the struggle between the two great elements which disputed the empire of the monastic world was the same in the British Islands as in Gaul. This struggle was much longer and more serious in Great Britain, because it was complicated by national dislike, legitimate resistance, and an unappeasable resentment, which had no place in the influence exercised in France by Columbanus of Luxeuil and his Irish monks. The rule and order of St. Benedict were naturally associated, in the eyes of the vanquished and dispossessed Celts, with the ferocious foreigners who pursued them even to the mountain-glens and islands, in which they found a last asylum. Besides, the Columba of Iona, the great patriarch of the Celtic monks of Great Britain, was, it appears to us, a much more attractive personage than his illustrious namesake of Luxeuil; his sons, his heirs, Aïdan, Adamnan, and so many others, had a greater fascination, a much greater influence upon the masses and upon events than the successors of Columbanus among the Gallo-Franks. At the same time the sons of St. Benedict, the victors of the struggle, from St. Augustin to Celtic monachism is vanquished in the British Isles as in Gaul by the rule of St. Benedict.

²⁰⁵ VARIN, 2^e Mémoire.

Bede, were much more remarkable men than the greater part of the Gallo-Frankish Benedictines of their day. St. Eloysius and St. Leger, whose history we shall soon relate, was scarcely equal to Wilfrid, Cuthbert, Benedict Biscop, and the Venerable Bede. The latter, besides, are more entirely monks, more completely identified with the Benedictine institution. It is, however, evident on both sides of the Channel that the Celtic element fell, died away, and disappeared before the Roman element as personified in the order of St. Benedict. The Benedictine influence everywhere carried the day, and prepared for the Church those valiant legions which, after having edified and disciplined France, and conquered and civilized England, marched on to new victories, and extended beyond the Rhine and the Elbe the frontiers of Christendom.

CHAPTER IV.

THE VENERABLE BEDE.

The entire history of this period is summed up in the Venerable Bede. — His works. — Encyclopædical character of his genius. — His theological and scientific writings; his love for the classics. — His History of the English. — His scrupulous care to prove its truth. — His soul. — The love of virtue and truth evident in all his writings. — He is himself the type of the noble lives he records. — His life passed entirely in the cloister of Yarrow. — He is spared in his youth by the pestilence which carries off the whole community except himself and his abbot. — His different masters; his diligence in work. — His extensive connections. — His friendship with Abbot Acca. — His works on Holy Scripture. — His celebrated letter to Bishop Egbert of York upon the abuses of ecclesiastical government and monastic life. — His bold freedom does not diminish his authority. — He is accused of heresy in popular drinking-songs. — His intimacy with the monks of Lindisfarne. — Narrative of his death by an eye-witness. — His worship and his relics. — Contrast between the country he lived in and the actual condition of Northumberland.

“O venerable Bede!

The saint, the scholar, from a circle freed
Of toil stupendous, in a hallowed seat
Of learning, where thou heardest the billows beat
On a wild coast, rough monitors to feed
Perpetual industry. Sublime Recluse!
The recreant soul, that dares to shun the debt
Imposed on human kind, must first forget
Thy diligence, thy unrelaxing use
Of a long life; and in the hour of death
The last dear service of thy passing breath.”

— WORDSWORTH.

THE period of history which we have just recorded is crowned by one of those great figures which stand out above the sea of ages, and triumph over the forgetfulness as well as over the systematic contempt of frivolous generations. The name of Bede, after having been one of the greatest and most popular in Christendom, still remains invested with an unchangeable fame. He is the type of that studious and learned life which, in the eyes of many, sums up the entire mission of the monk. He was the most cultivated man, the greatest intellectual personage of his country and age; but he holds a still greater position in the eyes of those to whom he has been a guide and master throughout a laborious and bewildering task. By the student who has passed several years almost entirely in his company, he is venerated as a saint and loved as a friend, and, without absolving him of his patriotic prejudices and partialities, the spirit does reverence to his character still more than to his glory.

Let us then examine his works, his spirit, and his life.

We turn to his works in the first place, which His works, have made him the wonder and honor of his age, as well as a father and doctor of the Church. This Anglo-Saxon, born at the end of the Christian world, and of a race which half a century before his birth was still plunged in the darkness of idolatry, at once reveals himself clothed in the fulness of all enlightenment known to his time. Thanks to the unwearying activity of his mind, and the universal extension of his researches, his fame became European, and lasted through all the middle ages. It was not only the great historian whom, during his lifetime, and for long centuries after his death, men admired, as we ourselves admire him — it was, in addition to this, the master whose vast erudition embraced all that was then studied and known in the world. The universal character of his genius is that which most astonished his contemporaries, and has even excited surprise among our own.

He was for England what Cassiodorus was for The universal character of his genius. Italy and St. Isidore for Spain. But he had, in addition, an influence and echo beyond his own country which has been surpassed by none: his influence upon Christendom was as rapid as it was extensive, and his works, which soon found a place in all the monastic libraries of the West, brought down his fame to the period of the Renaissance. He wrote at his pleasure in prose or verse, in Anglo-Saxon and in Latin; and many of his writings prove that he was acquainted with Greek.²⁰⁶ The greater part of his works were devoted to theology and its cognate studies. In the list which he himself made out, three years before his death, of the forty-five works which he had written up to that time, he enumerates, in the first place, his commentaries and homilies upon Holy Scripture, specially drawn from the Fathers, so as to form a summary, for the use of his countrymen and of all Christians, of the traditional doctrines of the Church. These Biblical studies occupied him much during his whole life, and he professed a marked preference for that source of human knowledge which, to his eyes, surpassed all others, as much in its antiquity as by its divine origin and moral usefulness.²⁰⁷ He plunged into this study with an ardor so intelligent and persevering, that it won him, in the eyes of the most illustrious of his countrymen, St. Boniface, the reputation of being one of the most sagacious investigators of the Holy Scriptures.²⁰⁸ In his Martyrology, his historical summaries, and his biographies of the saints, he added a demonstration of the government of God by facts and the lives of men, to the theoretic exposition of the teachings of the faith.

His theological writings,

And scientific.

But, far from confining himself to theology, he wrote with success upon astronomy and meteorology, physics and music, philosophy and geography, arithmetic and rhetoric, grammar and versification, without omitting medicine, and without disdaining to descend even to orthography and numeration. His treatises have almost always the form of abridgments or catechisms adapted to the education of his monastic disciples. He thus penetrated, with a bold and unwearying step, into all the paths then open to the human intelligence, with a clearness and extent of vision truly surprising for the age and circumstances under which he lived. He thus won the name of Father of English learning, ²⁰⁶ The translation which he had made of the Gospel of St. John from Greek into Latin is unhappily lost. — GILES, Life of Bede, p. 51. M. Ozanam, in his Etudes Germaniques, quotes a paper from M. Renan, crowned by the Academy, but not published, which proves that the study of Greek was maintained among the Anglo-Saxon monks long after its introduction by the Archbishop St. Theodore.

²⁰⁷ "Sancta Scriptura cæteris omnibus scripturis, non solum auctoritate, quia divina; vel utilitate, quia ad vitam ducit æternam; sed et antiquitate et ipsa præeminet." — De Schematibus Scripturæ, ap. Act. SS. O. S. B., t. iii. p. 506.

²⁰⁸ "Sagacissimi investigatoris Scripturarum monachi Bedæ." — S. BONIFACII Epist. ad Huetbertum Abbatem.

given to him by the greatest of modern Englishmen.²⁰⁹ His scientific essays, De Rurum Natura, and De Temporum Ratione, contain a first essay towards a universal chronology, and afterwards sum up with method and precision the physical and astronomical sciences, which had, among our ancestors, survived the decay of the Roman empire. Good judges have even acknowledged that he had gathered more actual truths and fewer errors than are to be found in any Roman books upon similar subjects.²¹⁰ In this region, as elsewhere, our worthy Anglo-Saxon appeals with respectful confidence to the authority of Aristotle, Hippocrates, and Pliny. Like all the scholars and writers of Christian ages, he shows a certain satisfaction in exhibiting his familiarity with classic authors. He has left to us, or at least there have been attributed to him, collections of sentences drawn from Plato, Seneca, and, above all, Cicero, of whom he was an enthusiastic admirer. He often quotes Ovid and Lucan, Statius, Lucretius, and still oftener Virgil, whom he quotes even in the tales of the miracles of his Northumbrian saints.²¹¹ He has also attempted to imitate him in a pretty eclogue on the return of spring.²¹² He thus presents, in the eighth century, the type of that character of scholar — that is to say, of a man profoundly imbued with classic literature — which the English of the present day still prize so highly, and which the princes of public eloquence,²¹³ not less than the chiefs of the episcopate, esteem one of their highest distinctions. It does not seem, however, that his familiarity with these illustrious heathen weakened him either in Christian feeling or in the monastic spirit; and

His love
for the classics.

²⁰⁹ "Father of English learning" — this is the name given him by Burke, Essay on English History, p. 229.

²¹⁰ SHARON TURNER, History of the Anglo-Saxons, vol. iii. p. 403. According to this author, Bede's work is sufficient of itself to prove that the irruption of the Teutonic nations into the Roman empire was in no way the substitution of barbarism for knowledge.

²¹¹ Thus in relating the case of a demoniac at the tomb of the saint and King Oswald at Bardeney, he uses the well-known line —

"Conticuere omnes, intentique ora tenebant."

The illustrious Newman has fully established the absurdity of the supposition made by Milman, the learned Anglican Dean of St. Paul's, that Bede and other monastic doctors knew classical antiquity only at second-hand by extracts or isolated fragments. This idea is contradicted by all the monuments of the time, as well as by the very nature of the monastic spirit and studies. — Atlantis, 1859, n. 3, p. 31.

²¹² "Cuculus, sive Veris et Hiemis conflictus," vol. i. p. 35, ed. Giles. Compare p. clxix.

²¹³ Mr. Gladstone, commentator, and Lord Derby, translator, of Homer.

nothing in his life contradicts the touching prayer with which he ends the list of his literary labors: "Oh, good Jesus, who hast deigned to refresh my soul with the sweet streams of knowledge, grant to me that I may one day mount to Thee, who art the source of all wisdom, and remain forever in Thy divine presence."²¹⁴

History of the English.

This constant thought of God, of the soul, and of eternal salvation which is evident in all the works of his laborious life, and manly intelligence, shows itself at the beginning of the great work which still wins for him the attention and gratitude of all friends of the truth. "I entreat," he says in his Preface, "all those of our nation who read this History, or hear it read, to recommend often to the divine clemency the infirmities of my body and of my soul. Let each man in his province, seeing the care which I have taken to note down everything that is memorable or agreeable for the inhabitants of each district, pay me back by praying for me." "Dear and good father," he also writes when sending the first copy of his History to the friend who had suggested it to him, "beloved friend in Christ, remember, I beseech you, my weakness, you and all the servants of Christ who live with you; remember to intercede for me with the merciful Judge, and make all those who read my humble work do the same."²¹⁵

This humble work — this pamphlet, as it is called by the great and modest writer — was nothing less than that Ecclesiastical History of the English Nation, which has made Bede not only the father of English history, but the true founder of history in the middle ages. The most competent authorities have recognized in him a chronicler well-informed and systematic, an able and penetrating critic, on whom the rigorous precision of his language, and the scrupulous accuracy of his narrative, bestow the full right of being heard and having his testimony weighed, even upon facts which could not come under his personal observation.²¹⁶ Besides, all his narrative which is not founded upon what he himself saw or heard, is given on the authority of contemporaries always conscientiously quoted and carefully designated or described by him. "I have consulted individually," he says, "in all that refers to Northumbria, innumerable writers in addition to all that I could answer for myself. . . . But I pray my reader humbly, if he finds that I have written anything which is not the truth, not to blame me severely for it, since, according to the true law of history, I have sincerely labored to put into writing for the instruction of posterity all that I could gather from common report."²¹⁷ The rare prudence with which he records those miracles which occupy so exaggerated a place in the annals, or, more strictly, in the habits and necessities of his time, is especially remarkable. He gives none upon his own personal authority, but always names the persons from whom they come, stating whether he has received them at first or second hand.²¹⁸

²¹⁴ "Teque deprecor, bone Jesu, ut cui propitius donasti verba tuæ scientiæ dulciter haurire, dones etiam benignus, aliquando ad te fontem omnis sapientiæ pervenire et apparere semper ante faciem tuam."

²¹⁵ "Omnes . . . nostræ nationis legentes sive audientes, suppliciter precor ut pro meis infirmitatibus et mentis et corporis . . . sæpius intervenire meminerint: et in suis quique provinciis hanc mihi remunerationis vicem rependant, ut qui de singulis provinciis . . . quæ memoratu digna atque incolis grata credideram diligenter adnotare curavi." — Hist. Eccles., Præfatio gloriosissimo Regi Ceolwulfo. "Semper amantissime in Christo pater optime, . . . te supplex obsecro ut pro mea fragilitate cum his qui tecum sunt, apud pium judicem sedulus intercedere memineris: sed et eos quos eadem nostra opuscula pervenire feceris, hoc idem facere monueris." — Epist. ad Albinum Abbat., Op. Minora, p. 229.

Thus the most sceptical reader is unable to turn over the pages of Bede without being convinced at once of his sincerity and of his historical discrimination; while the Christian, eager to know and admire the works of God still more in the history of spiritual life than in the history of nations, can never feel sufficient gratitude to the unwearied worker who has endowed us with a book unrivalled among the historical works of Christianity, and who has given to England and its specially historic race the finest monument of national history which any modern people has yet received from its fathers.²¹⁹

²¹⁶ LAPPENBERG, OZANAM, VARIN.

²¹⁷ "Si qua in his quæ scripsimus aliter quam se veritas habet posita repererit, non hoc nobis imputet qui, quod vera lex historiæ est, simpliciter ea quæ fama vulgante collegimus ad instructionem posteritatis litteris mandare studuimus." — Præfatio.

²¹⁸ Not a single miracle is to be found in the biography of the five first abbots of his own monastery, all of whom he had personally known: while they abound in his narrative of the life of St. Cuthbert, which he had from the monks of Lindisfarne. This is remarked by the wise and pious Lingard. — Anglo-Saxon Church, ii. 102, 103.

²¹⁹ All who have had to make researches into medieval historians, and to whom it is of consequence to save their time and eyesight, know the inestimable value of a good, portable, and easily-read edition. Such persons will thank us for pointing out to them, among the numerous editions of the Venerable Bede, that published at Oxford in 1846, by Robert Hussey, bachelor in theology and professor of history. It contains in one volume all the Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum, with the lives of the Abbots of Wear-

His spiritual life.

This historian of souls begins by making us acquainted with his own; for who does not recognize, by the fashion in which a man tells the tale of the trials of virtue and truth here below, what he himself would have been capable of doing or suffering for them? The soul which thus betrays itself in his narrative is holy and full of grace. Not only in his beautiful narrations of ceaseless self-devotion, and of all the wonders of which man regenerated by faith is capable, but in the person of Bede himself, we find a complete type of that humility, serenity, and generous fervor which have won him throughout all Christendom the surname of Venerable. The Christian virtues were united naturally in him to that thirst for knowledge, that love of study, that vivifying thirst for work, that noble thoughtfulness of things divine and human, which make our monk-historian so interesting a personage in the history of the human mind. An esteemed writer²²⁰ reproaches him with having been more Roman than English. I consider this reproach quite unfounded; no trace is to be found of the least sacrifice of his patriotism to his orthodoxy. He certainly preferred the Roman to the Celtic spirit; but it was his Anglo-Saxon patriotism, and not his Roman predilections, which dictated to him certain judgments inspired by national prejudice against the vanquished Britons in spiritual as well as temporal affairs. He had, like all other men, his preferences, his weaknesses, his blindness—but never has he willingly disguised, mutilated, or betrayed the truth; on the contrary, he served and loved with his best powers not only truth but justice, and, as it has been well said by an upright historian²²¹ of our own day, impartiality consists in being just, not in being neuter.

His life.

His life may be regarded as a faithful mirror of the laborious and holy existence of those vast clois-mouth and Yarrow, and Bede's letter to Archbishop Egbert. It also contains all the divers readings and notes of the great edition of Smith (1722), rectified and completed with exemplary clearness and sobriety by the editor. If he had added to his volume Bede's life of St. Cuthbert, the letter of the other Cuthbert upon the death of the historian, and a map, this excellent publication would have left nothing to be desired. Justice obliges us to name here by the side of Bede a writer of our own day, M. W. B. Maccabe, who, in his Catholic History of England (London, 1847-49, 2 vols.), has devoted himself to a faithful reproduction of the narratives of Bede and other ancient historians, and, by giving a faithful and minute picture of the three first centuries of English history, deserves the gratitude of those who love to know the truth without being able to seek it at the fountain-head.

²²⁰ Lappenberg.

²²¹ FRANZ DE CHAMPAGNY, Correspondant, vol. xii. p. 785.

ters which continued to rise in England under the rule of St. Benedict, and which were not less numerous in the eighth than in the seventh century. It was entirely passed in the monastery which had sheltered his childhood. He was born in 673,²²² in one of the seventy detached manors of public property (Folc-lands), which King Egfrid bestowed on Abbot Benedict Biscop on his fourth return from Rome. The little Bede, whose name in Anglo-Saxon means prayer, was intrusted by his relatives at the age of seven to Benedict, who had just completed his monastery of Wearmouth. But the holy and learned abbot soon transferred the charge and education of his young pupil to his coadjutor Ceolfrid, when, with his twenty monks, old and young, the latter removed a short distance off, to found, at the mouth of the Tyne, the colony of Yarrow. They were no sooner installed in their new home than a cruel epidemic seized the colony. It carried off all the monks who could sing in the choir, except the abbot alone and the young Bede, still a child, who was his favorite pupil. These two continued to celebrate, as they best could, among their tears and regrets, the entire canonical service, with obstinate precision, until new brethren joined them.²²³ There are few who will not be touched by the thought of these two representatives of Northumbrian Christianity and Anglo-Saxon monachism, the one already mature and illustrious, the other an obscure child predestined to fame, singing all alone the praises of God in their cloister depopulated by death, and awaiting the future with resigned yet unconquerable faith!

At the death of Benedict Biscop, when Ceolfrid was called to the head of the reunited monasteries, which now formed but one community,²²⁴ the young Bede remained at Yarrow, which he never left. There he received deacon's orders at nineteen, and at the age of thirty the priesthood from the hands of St. John, called of Beverley, who then occupied ²²² According to Mabillon and Lingard; not in 674, as say Pagi and Stephenson.

²²³ "Abbas . . . multum tristris, præcepit ut, intermisso ritu priori, psalmodiam totam, præter Vesperam et Matutinas, sine antiphonis transigerent: quod cum unius hebdomadis spatio inter multas ejus lacrymas et querimonias esse actitatum, diutius hoc fieri non ferens rursus statuit: ut antiphonatæ psalmodiæ juxta morem instauraretur, cunctisque adnitentibus, per se et quem prædixi puerum, quæ statuerat, non parvo cum labore complebat."--BEDE, t. vi., App., p. 421. See note 98 in page 503.

²²⁴ See pp. 501 and 505.

the see of Wilfrid at Hexham. And there he passed all the rest of his life, which was dedicated to study and meditation on Holy Scripture, without other amusement than the daily songs of the choir — without other pleasure, as he has himself said, than to learn, to teach, and to write.²²⁵

At the same time, when Bede tells us that he passed all his life in the same monastery, it must not be supposed that he denied himself the expeditions which occupied so considerable a part in the lives of the principal monks. Notwithstanding the great authority which attached to Benedict Biscop's double foundation, and the number of monks who hastened to it, it is difficult to imagine how the young monk could follow, without leaving his monastery, the lessons of all those whom at various periods he calls his masters. For whether at Yarrow or elsewhere, he received an education both valuable and varied. Among those who introduced him into the study of the Bible, he indicates a monk trained by Ceadda, the humble and earnest rival of Wilfrid, and, in consequence, imbued with all that was purest and most irreproachable in Celtic tradition; ²²⁶ while Greek was taught by monks of the school founded by Theodore in his metropolis of Canterbury, ²²⁷ and ecclesiastical music by the precentor of St. Peter's in the Vatican, whom Pope Vitalianus sent to England with Benedict Biscop. ²²⁸

His different masters.

His industry.

From pupil he soon became master, and that of the highest rank. It is evident from various passages of his works that his days and nights, of which a very moderate part was given to sleep, were divided between the studies and researches which he pursued to his last hour, the instructions which he gave to the six hundred monks of his double community, without reckoning the foreign monks whom he admitted to his lessons, and the composition of the books which have immortalized him. An existence more completely occupied it would be difficult to imagine. Except ²²⁵ "Cum essem annorum septem, cura propinquorum datus sum educandus . . . cunctumque ex eo tempus vitæ in ejusdem monasterii habitatione peragens, omnem meditandis Scripturis operam dedi; atque inter observantiam disciplinæ regularis et quotidianam cantandi in ecclesia curam, semper aut discere, aut docere, aut scribere dulce habui." — BEDE, Hist. Eccles., v. 24.

²²⁶ "Frater quidam de eis qui me in Scripturis erudiebant et erat in monasterio ac magisterio illius (Ceaddæ) educatus, vocabulo Trumberct." — Hist. Eccles., iv. 3.

²²⁷ See p. 354.

²²⁸ See p. 499.

during the course of his last illness, he had no assistant in his work. "I am my own secretary," he said; "I dictate, I compose, I copy all myself." Though he was not unconscious of the obstacles which the yoke — or, as he himself says, the servitude of the rule — threw in the way of his work, he never withdrew himself from it;²²⁹ and long after his death his scrupulous exactness in fulfilling all its obligations, especially that of singing the common service, was told in his praise.²³⁰

The laborious severity of this life in the cloister did not, however, put any obstacle in the way of his extensive and important intercourse with the world outside. His friendships were almost all produced or occasioned by the composition of his great historical work. He was urged to undertake it by Albinus, whom we have already remarked as the principal disciple of the Archbishop Theodore and the African Abbot Adrian, the first Anglo-Saxon ever called to govern the great monastery of St. Augustin at Canterbury. Albinus furnished him with memoranda of all that had happened in Kent and the neighboring counties in the time of the missionaries sent by St. Gregory;²³¹ he even sent a priest of the adjoining diocese of London to Rome, to search in the archives of the Roman Church, with the permission of the reigning pope, Gregory II., for the letters of his predecessors and other documents relative to the mission to England.²³² All the bishops of England also assisted in the work by transmitting to the author what information they could collect concerning the origin of the faith in their dioceses, and the principal acts of the holy personages who had lived in them. The abbots and monks of the most important monasteries also furnished their contingent. The details given on this subject by Bede himself show that a constant communication was kept up between the principal centres of religious life, and that an amount of intellectual activity as surprising as admirable, when the difficulty of communication and the internal wars which ravaged England are taken into consideration, existed among their inhabitants.

His extended connection.

²²⁹ "Injuncti me operis labori supposui: in quo ut innumera monasticæ servitutis retinacula præteream ipse mihi dictator, simul notarius et librarius existerem." — Epistola ad Accam, Opera, i. 179.

²³⁰ ALCUINI Opera, i. p. 282.

²³¹ Bede describes him as "vir per omnia doctissimus."

²³² "Perscrutato sanctæ Ecclesiæ Romanæ scrinio." — Prolog.

In addition to his great historical work, his correspondence gives evidence of the number of visits he must have paid and received on the subjects of his studies and writings. There is no proof that he was ever at Rome, to which in his day so many Anglo-Saxon monks and princes crowded, though this was long believed.²³³ But it is known that he was on terms of friendship with the King of the Northumbrians, to whom he dedicated his History of England, and with the King of Kent, to whom he addressed a letter upon the celebration of Easter. Among the bishops of his time his most intimate friend was Acca, the companion and successor of Wilfrid at Hexham. This learned and magnificent prelate took the warmest interest in literature and the arts. After having ornamented with many great works the abbey church built by his master at Hexham, he added a very large and noble library, according to Bede, of which the latter made great use. They were in intimate and constant communication. Bede dedicated several of his works in prose and verse to the successor of Wilfrid; and Acca, who loved, like Bede, to quote from the classics, and who, like Gregory the Great, had a fancy for playing upon words, insisted that his laborious friend, who had given him a commentary upon the Gospel by St. Mark, should add to it a commentary on Luke.²³⁴ The correspondence between these two Anglo-Saxon monks, while doing no discredit to their ability, is specially honorable to their hearts, and shows to what a height prayer and study had developed in the Northumbrian cloisters the affectionate sentiments and tender feelings of friendship. In this correspondence Bede lavishes assurances of his regard on him, whom he calls the most loved and longed-for of all bishops.²³⁵ He shows himself to be, as he says, ruled and inspired by that trust and mutual tenderness which believes and hopes everything from the heart it loves.²³⁶ At the same time those pure and noble motives

²³³ From a letter written by Pope Sergius, given by William of Malmesbury, but which does not refer to our Bede, according to Mabillon. — Act. SS. O. S. B., t. iii. p. 509; and LINGARD, Antiquities, vol. ii. pp. 410, 415.

²³⁴ "Beatum Lucam luculento sermone exponere." — T. i. p. cliii., ed. Giles. See other editions, ap. RAINE, The Priory of Hexham, pp. 32, 33, 34.

²³⁵ "Dilectissime ac desideratissime omnium qui in terris morantur antistitum." And elsewhere: "Bene vale semper, amantissime antistes, nostri memor in Domino. . . . Domino beatissimo et omnium desideratissimo Accæ episcopo Beda humilis presbyter."

²³⁶ "Non hæc certa alia quam indubitata mutui fiducia facit amoris, quæ de amico pectore omnia duntaxat quæ fieri possunt, credit, omnia sperat." — P. 179, ed. Giles.

which guided him in his studies and commentaries on Holy Scripture, which held the greatest place in his life, and have so much contributed to the increase of his influence on Christendom, are fully apparent in his letters. Both here and elsewhere the reader perceives by what a pious and patriotic anxiety he was moved to combat the ignorance and lukewarmness of the new Catholics of England, by making them capable of reading and understanding the Bible.²³⁷ To bring to the level of all capacities the most approved explanations of obscure passages; to seek out with scrupulous care the mystic sense and spiritual use of Biblical narratives; at once to go deeply into and to simplify that study of the sacred words which is so dear and so necessary to real piety; to draw from it the lessons and especially the consolations pointed out by the apostle St. Paul,²³⁸ and of which we have so much need in the sharp anguish of this sombre life, and during the prolonged delays of divine justice; to give thus an answer to the anxiety which filled the minds of the great monks who were the apostles of England, and of other ancient nations; such was the task of our Bede. He gave himself up to it with a fervor which never relaxed; with a perseverance which consumed his nights and days; with touching and sincere modesty; with delicate precautions against the danger of being taken for a plagiarist;²³⁹ with a courage which sometimes failed him under the greatness of the task, and the multitude of obstacles in his way, but only to spring up again more unconquerable than ever; and, in short, with a solidity and assurance of doctrine which have kept for him, till the present time, a place among the best authorized interpreters of the Catholic faith.²⁴⁰

Another bishop with whom Bede had much intercourse was Egbert, Bishop of York, a brother of

His celebrated letter to ²³⁷ "Nostræ, id est Anglorum gentis, inertiae consulendum ratus." — Epist. ad Eusebium, p. 193, ed. Giles.

²³⁸ See especially Epistola ad Accam de Templo Salomonis, p. 171, ed. Giles.

²³⁹ "Sollicitus per omnia ne majorum dicta furari, et hæc quasi mea propria componere. . . . Qui in legis divinæ meditatione etsi non (ut ipse scripsisti) dies noctesque pervigiles ducere sufficio . . . operis immensitate perterritus et obstrepentium causarum (quas tu melius nosti) necessitate præpeditus. . . . Opusculum velocissime quantum tempus dederat, ne tua sacrosancta voluntas impediretur, emendatum membranulis indideram." — Epist. ad Accam, pp. 180, 184.

²⁴⁰ An idea of his spirit and style may be attained by reading in the Roman Breviary the service for All Saints' Day and the two days following, in which several of the lessons are taken from his De Sanctis.

Bishop Egbert of York, the King of Northumbria, and a disciple of Bede himself. Sometimes the prince-bishop would visit his former master at Yarrow; sometimes Bede, in return, went to the episcopal monastery of York, where he occupied himself in superintending the school established by Egbert, or sought out recollections of Paulinus and of Wilfrid, and all the details of that religious history of Northumbria which without him would have fallen into forgetfulness forever. The two friends studied together during these visits. A year before his death, not being able to accept an invitation from Egbert, Bede addressed to him a letter, which has been preserved, and which is a sort of treatise upon the spiritual and temporal government of Northumbria.²⁴¹ It displays, in the first place, the manly independence of Bede's judgment and language, and the great authority which this simple monk possessed even in the eyes of the princes and pontiffs of his country. It throws, at the same time, a fresh and full light upon the abuses which had glided into the Anglo-Saxon Church, and specially into the administration of monastic possessions.

He begins by recommending the bishop to study and meditate the Holy Scriptures, especially the epistles of St. Paul to Titus and Timothy, and the Pastoral of St. Gregory; and exhorts him to avoid idle and gossiping conversation and bad company — "for," he adds, "there are bishops who, instead of surrounding themselves with religious and chaste persons, are accompanied only by buffoons or drunkards, who take more thought how to fill their bellies than how to feed and sanctify their souls."²⁴²

Against the abuses of ecclesiastical government,

He then continues as follows: "Your diocese is too extensive to permit you to visit all the hamlets and out-of-the-way corners in it every year. You must then establish, as coadjutors in each village, priests who will preach the Word of God, celebrate the divine mysteries, and baptize. And, above all, let the priests teach all your diocesans to know the Apostles' Creed and the Lord's Prayer by heart. Those who do not understand Latin ought to be able to sing or say the Pater and the Credo in their own language; and I say this not only for the laity, but also for the clerks and monks who do not understand Latin. It is especially for the use of those uninstructed priests that I have translated the Creed and the Pater into English. When you thus stir up the people of God by frequent and common prayer to understand, love, hope for, and seek heavenly gifts, your paternal solicitude will receive from the Pastor of pastors a reward so much the more noble that it is seldom merited by bishops of our nation." ²⁴³ Bede entreats his friend, in continuation, to neglect no means of giving to the lay population pastors capable of teaching them the doctrines of salvation, the hatred of sins which are odious to the Lord, and the practice of good works; he insists upon frequent and even daily communion, according to the usage of the Church in Italy, Gaul, Africa, Greece, and throughout all the East. "Among us," says Bede, "thanks to the carelessness of the pastors, the most religious laymen dare not communicate except at Christmas, the Epiphany, and Easter, although there are numberless Christians, young and old, of pure life, who might without scruple approach these holy mysteries on the Sundays and feasts of the apostles and martyrs, as you have yourself seen in the holy apostolic Church of Rome." ²⁴⁴

²⁴¹ "Memini te hesterno dixisse anno, cum tecum aliquot diebus legendi gratia in monasterio tuo demorarer, quod hoc etiam anno velles, cum in eundem devenires locum, me quoque, ob commune legendi studium, ad tuum accire colloquium." This letter was written in 734 or 735. Egbert took possession of the see of Wilfrid in 732.

²⁴² "Quod non ita loquor, quasi te aliter facere sciam, sed quia de quibusdam episcopis fama vulgatum est, quod . . . nullos secum alicujus religionis aut continentiae viros habeant, sed potius illos qui risui, jocis, fabulis, comestationibus et ebrietatibus . . . subigantur, et magis quotidie ventrem dapibus quam mentem sacrificiis cœlestibus pascant."

Having said this, he does not hesitate to point out to the prelate an abuse which was destined to rise throughout all the Church to a lamentable height. "Beware, dear bishop, of the crime of those who think only of drawing earthly lucre from their ministry. It is said that there are many villages in our Northumberland, situated among inaccessible hills or woods, where the arrival of a bishop to baptize, and teach the faith, and the distinction between good and evil, has never been witnessed, yet where no one is exempt from payment of the bishop's dues. Thus there are bishops who, far from evangelizing their flock without reward, as our Lord wills, receive, without preaching, the money which He has forbidden them, even while preaching, to accept."²⁴⁵

²⁴³ "Et quia latiora sunt spatia . . . quam ut solus per omnia discurrere et in singulis viculis atque agellis verbum Dei prædicare . . . sufficiat . . . necessarium est ut plures tibi sacri ordinis adiutores adsciscas. . . . Idiotas, id est, eos qui propriæ tantum linguæ notitiam habent, hæc ipsa sua lingua discere ac sedulo decantare facito. . . . Propter quod et ipse multis sæpe sacerdotibus idiotis hæc utraque . . . in linguam Anglorum translatam obtuli. Quanto enim rariora hujus sacratissimi operis in episcopis nostræ gentis exempla reperis, tanto altiora . . . præmia recipies."

²⁴⁴ "Eorum quoque qui in populari adhuc vita continentur sollicitam te necesse est curam gerere, et sufficientes eis doctores vitæ salutaris adhibere memineris. . . . Cum sint innumeri innocentes et castissimæ conversationis pueri ac puellæ, juvenes et virgines, senes et anus. . . . Ipsi etiam conjugati, si quis sibi mensuram continentiae ostendat et virtutem castitatis insinuet, idem et licenter possint et libenter facere velint."

Bede's idea was, that with the help of the good and pious King Ceolwulf, it would be very easy for the Bishop of York, his relative and friend, to find a cure for these troubles by returning to the plan of St. Gregory the Great — re-establishing the metropolis of York, and dividing that diocese, which was still, notwithstanding the divisions which had been forced upon Wilfrid, much too large, among twelve suffragans. With his logical and practical spirit, our historian at once points out the means of arriving at this result without any fear of wounding the interests or exposing the infirmities of his order. "I know very well," he says, "that by the carelessness of the old kings, and their foolish liberality, it is difficult to find unappropriated lands to endow the new bishoprics. For this reason it appears to me that, after having deliberated on it in the great council, with the advice of the pontiff and the king, some existing monastery should be taken to be erected into a bishopric. And in order that the abbot and monks may not be tempted to opposition, they must be permitted to elect the future bishop among themselves, to be at once the head of the monastery and of the new diocese, or to choose one according to the canons outside their community, if no one suitable can be found within."²⁴⁶ It would be so much the more easy to increase, if there is room for it, the endowment of new dioceses, that there exist, as we all know, numberless places which bear the name of monasteries without keeping up a shadow of monastic observance. To appropriate their possessions, according to the authority of public assemblies, for the endowment of new bishoprics, would be to substitute purity for incontinence, temperance for gluttony, and piety for vanity. Yes, there are vast and numerous establishments which are of use for nothing, neither for the service of God nor man. No monastic rule is observed among them; no advantage is drawn from them by the earls and knights who have the burden of defending our nation from the barbarians. He, then, who should make them into new bishoprics would be neither a usurper nor a prevaricator: he would do a work of salvation and an act of virtue.”²⁴⁷

²⁴⁵ "Attende quid gravissimi sceleris . . . antistes dilectissime. . . . Audivimus et fama est, quia multæ villæ ac viculi nostræ gentis in montibus sint inaccessis ac saltibus dumosis positi, ubi numquam multis transeuntibus annis sit visus antistes . . . quorum tamen nec unus quidem a tributis antistiti reddendis esse possit immunis . . . sicque fit ut episcoporum quidam non solum gratis non evangelizent." Lingard (Anglo-Saxon Church, vol. i. p. 183) believes that we have in this passage the first mention of tithes, of which there is no further notice elsewhere in Bede, and which do not appear to have been regularly established in England before the close of the eighth century.

²⁴⁶ "Et quidem novimus quia per incuriam regum præcedentium, donationesque stultissimas factum est, ut non facile locus vacans ubi sedes episcopalis nova fieri debeat, inveniri valeat. . . . Quapropter commodum duxerim, habito majori concilio et consensu pontificali simul et regali edicto, prospiciatur locus aliquis monasteriorum ubi sedet episcopalis fiat. Et ne forte abbas et monachi resistere tentaverint, detur illis licentia, ut de suis ipsi eligant eum qui episcopus ordinetur et adjacentium locorum quotquos ad eandem diœcesim pertineant, una cum ipso monasterio curam gerat episcopalem: aut si forte in ipso monasterio qui episcopus ordinari debeat inveniri nequeat, in ipsorum tamen juxta statuta canorum pendeat examine qui de sua diœcesi ordinetur antistes."

Against
disorderly monasteries,

The abuse of territorial gifts.

He then proceeds to forestall the objection which might be drawn from the sanction given by kings and national assemblies to the gifts which had endowed these pseudo-monasteries. “Would it, then, be a sin to correct the unjust decisions of old chiefs by the revision of more enlightened men, and to abrogate the lying formulas of certain scribes by the authority of priests and sages, in imitation of these good kings of Judah of whom Scripture speaks, who repaired the evil done by their impious predecessors? Let their example encourage you, in concert with our religious king, to destroy the unjust and irreligious decrees made by the former chiefs of our nation. You will thus provide at once for the spiritual and temporal necessities of our country. Otherwise we shall see at the same time the love and fear of Him who reads the heart disappear from among us, and the number of warriors diminish who are charged with the defence of our frontiers against the incursions of the barbarians; for you know better than I do, there are so many lands occupied by false monks that nothing remains to be given to the sons of nobles and old warriors; by which they are reduced either to cross the sea—deserting the country which they ought to have defended with their swords — or to consume their manhood in debauchery and idleness, for want of a suitable establishment on which to found a family.”²⁴⁸

²⁴⁷ “Sunt loca innumera . . . in monasteriorum ascripta vocabulum, sed nihil prorsus monasticæ conversationis habentia; e quibus velim aliqua de luxuria ad castitatem . . . synodica auctoritate transferantur. . . . Maxima et plurima sunt quæ . . . neque Deo neque hominibus utilia sunt, quia neque regularis secundum Deum ibi vita servatur, neque illa milites sive comites secularium potestatum qui gentem nostram a barbaris defendant possident.”

To these considerations of political and general interest, which throw so much light upon the military and territorial constitution of the Anglo-Saxon countries, Bede adds others which reveal not less pernicious abuses in the spiritual order.

“A still more serious crime,” he says, “is committed when laymen, without either experience of or love for monastic life, give money to the kings as the price of certain lands, under pretence of building monasteries there — and then claim to themselves a hereditary right over these lands by royal edicts which are afterwards confirmed by the signatures of bishops, abbots, and the great people of this world. In the estates and villages thus usurped they live according to their own pleasure, exempt from all subjection either to God or man; sometimes, though laymen, ruling over monks, or rather gathering together under the guise of monks men who have been driven out of true monasteries for disobedience, or whom they can seduce out of such, or whom they have found wandering about the country; or even taking some of their vassals, whose heads they shave, and whom they bind to a kind of monastic obedience. What a monstrous spectacle is that of these pretended cells, filled with men having wives and children, who come from the conjugal bed to manage the internal affairs of a monastery! There are even some who have the effrontery to procure similar convents for their wives, where these secular women dare to undertake the government of the servants of Christ.”²⁴⁹ Is there not room to say in this case, as says our proverb, that when the wasps makes honeycombs it is to put poison inside instead of honey?"

²⁴⁸ “Injusta principum judicia recto meliorum principum examine corrigantur, ac mendax stilus scribarum iniquorum discreta prudentium et sacerdotum sententia deleatur. . . . Ea quæ provinciæ nostræ sive secundum Deum sive secundum seculum sint utilia, prospicere: ne . . . rarescente copia militiæ secularis, absint qui fines nostros a barbarica incursione tueantur. . . . Omnino deest locus ubi filii nobilium vel emeritorum militum possessionem accipere possunt . . . ideoque vacantes ac sine conjugio, exacto tempore pubertatis, vel patriam pro qua militare debuerunt, trans mare abeuntes, relinquunt; vel . . . luxuriæ ac fornicationi deserviant.”

²⁴⁹ “Usurpatis sibi agellulis sive vicis, liberi exinde a divino simul et humano servitio . . . laici monachis imperantes . . . quoscumque ob culpam inobedientiæ veris expulsos monasteriis alicubi forte oberrantes invenerint . . . vel quos ipsi de suis satellitibus ad suscipiendam tonsuram promissa sibi obedientiæ monachica invitare quieverint. . . . Modo conjugis ac liberorum procurandarum curam gerunt: modo exurgentes de cubilibus quid intra septa monasteriorum geri debeat . . . pertractant. . . . Quæ pari stultitia cum sint laicæ, famularum se Christi permittunt esse rectrices.”

He then proceeds to expose the disastrous consequences of these abuses, which, however, had begun only about thirty years before. Since the death of Aldfrid and the end of Wildfrid's pontificate, he continues, there was scarcely a great noble or ealdorman who had not taken advantage of his position to acquire such a monastery for himself, or even for his wife, and by degrees the officials and domestics of the kings had learned to do the same. They all professed to be abbots, while at the same time governors of provinces, or officers of the royal household, submitting to a kind of tonsure, in order, by their own authority, to raise themselves, though simple laymen, not only into monks but into abbots.²⁵⁰ "All these scandals," says the venerable historian, "might have been avoided or repressed had not the bishops themselves been the principal offenders or accomplices, confirming by their signatures the concessions and grants of monasteries, and selling their base indulgence for money to the false abbots."²⁵¹ . . . I entreat you by the Lord, dearest bishop, preserve your flock from the irruption of these dishonest wolves. Remember, that if you are a true and not a mercenary pastor, your duty is to examine carefully into all that is ill or well in every monastery of your diocese, in order that abbots and abbesses instructed in and subject to the holy rules may be found everywhere, worthy of presiding over a family of Christ's servants, and not an insolent and undisciplined crowd, disdainful of all spiritual rule. They must be taught resolutely that kings and great men, unless in cases of crimes against the princes themselves, have nothing to do with the monasteries, which remain under the sole authority of the bishops. It is your duty to prevent the devil from usurping those places consecrated to God, and substituting discord for peace, drunkenness for abstinence, debauchery and murder for chastity and charity. . . . I know well that my exhortations will meet many gainsayers, especially among those who are the authors or accomplices of the excesses I complain of. But you must treat with apostolic vigor those miserable successors of Ananias and Sapphira, who were cut off by sudden death from the society of the first monks, not even for usurping the possessions of others, but for having dishonestly retained what was their own.²⁵² When he describes avarice and cupidity as idolatry, the Apostle Paul manifestly justifies those who refuse their signature, even when exacted by the king, to these shameful bargains, and even those who strike through and erase all such fatal documents.²⁵³ Do not then allow yourself to be stopped by those who, to protect the work of their covetousness, present before you charters furnished with the signatures of great men and nobles.²⁵⁴ Answer them in the words of our Lord, 'All that my Father in heaven has not planted shall be rooted out.' In short, do not permit those who never attempt to struggle, even in the smallest particular, against bodily or spiritual carnality, to lull themselves to sleep by a vain confidence in their salvation; dissipate the senseless illusion of those who believe that others will redeem them after their death by the celebration of holy mysteries of which their lives have made them unworthy, or that they will be absolved from their sins for the sake of some alms thrown to the poor in the midst of their daily indulgences and passions. The hand which gives to God must be, like the conscience, pure from all crime and soil.²⁵⁵ This is my judgment against the venom of avarice. I should never come to an end had I to speak at equal length of other vices, from which God give you grace, my dearest bishop, to deliver your flock."

²⁵⁰ "Nullus pene exinde præfectorum existeret qui non hujusmodi sibi monasterium in diebus suæ præfecturæ, suamque simul conjugem pari reatu nocivi mercatus astrinxerit. . . . Se abbates pariter et præfectos sive ministros aut famulos regis appellant . . . etsi a professione illa . . . sunt funditus extorres."

²⁵¹ "Si non ipsi pontifices magis hujusmodis sceleribus opem ferre atque adstipulari probarentur: qui . . . hujusmodi decreta injusta . . . suis subscriptionibus confirmare satagunt, eadem ipsis phylargyria dictante, ad confirmandum male scripta, qua emptores comparandum hujusmodi monasteria coacti."

The whole of this admirable letter is thus occupied with the indignant protest of a true monk against the false monks, who already began to infect the life of the cloister, and against the greedy and feeble bishops who sanctioned or tolerated these unworthy abuses. If the example of the Venerable Bede had always and everywhere found imitators; if

²⁵² "Ananiam et Saphiram monachorum collegio indignos etiam corporis morte multavit . . . et quidem illi non aliena colligere, sed sua incongrue retinere maluerunt."

²⁵³ "Qui vel subscriptione avari mercatus, rege licet imperante, manum substraxerunt."

²⁵⁴ "Qui si chartas protulerunt in defensionem concupiscentiarum suarum ascriptas, ac nobilium personarum subscriptione confirmatas."

²⁵⁵ "Quum manus ipse et conscientia quæ munus offerat Deo, munda a peccatis debeat esse et absoluta."

pure and courageous voices like his had risen in the bosom of the Church, especially in recent ages, to warn her against the incoming of corruption, hypocrisy, and secular covetousness, it may well be believed that the homicidal hand of Protestant or revolutionary vandalism would never have succeeded in sweeping away from the entire surface of the Christian world the glorious establishments founded by the munificence and piety of our fathers.

One thing must be gladly admitted, which is, that the bold freedom and noble independence of Bede did him no harm, and lessened in no way the great and just reputation which he enjoyed throughout England, a fame which soon spread into all Europe, and went on increasing after his death to such a point, that the council of Aix-la-Chapelle, held a hundred years afterwards, described him as an "admirable doctor."²⁵⁶

This pleasant and glorious life was not, however, without a cloud. He excited the criticism of violent and narrow spirits, like all other superior men. They even went so far as to treat him as a heretic, because he had in his Chronology combated the then general opinion that the world was to last only six thousand years, and because, in his division of the six ages of the world, he had appeared a little uncertain about the date ordinarily fixed as that of the Incarnation. This accusation of heresy made so much noise, that it was discussed even among the peasants, who scoffed at it in their drinking songs; a fact which proves that if the great were then, as always, exposed to calumny, the popular masses of the day took a singular interest in their good fame. Bede, who took credit to himself for having always kept with scrupulous care within the limits of the strictest orthodoxy, was at once troubled and rendered indignant by this imputation. He grew pale with surprise and horror, as he says to one of his friends, a monk, in an apologetic letter — a letter full of pride and energy, which he charges his correspondent to read to Wilfrid, Bishop of York, who seems to have given a certain encouragement to the slander by suffering it to be uttered at table in his presence.²⁵⁷

He is accused of heresy in popular songs.

²⁵⁶ "Quid venerabilis et modernis temporibus doctor admirabilis, Beda presbyter sentiat, videamus." — Concil. Aquisgran., ii. præf., l. iii., ann. 836, ed. Coletti, ix. 875.

²⁵⁷ "Hæc tristi mox admistione confudit, addendo videlicet, quod me audires a lascivientibus rusticis inter hæreticos per pocula decantari. . . . Ex-

His intimacy with the monks of Lindisfarne.

If, however, he had some enemies, he had more friends. Among these, in the first rank, it is pleasant to find the monks of Lindisfarne. Their friendship with Bede maintains and proves the link which, notwithstanding certain differences of origin and opinion, attaches the island-cradle of the Christian faith in Northumbria to the last of the great monastic foundations, and the last of the great monks who illustrated that glorious coast. Bede asked that his name should be inscribed on the roll of monks in the monastery founded by St. Aidan. He specially desired this favor in order that his soul after death might have a share in the masses and prayers of that numerous community as if he had been one of themselves.²⁵⁸

His last moments.

This pious anxiety to assure himself of the help of prayer for his soul after his death is apparent at every step in his letters. It imprints the last seal of humble and true Christianity on the character of the great philosopher, whose life was so full of interest, and whose last days have been revealed to us in minute detail by an eye-witness. Although the narrative has been often republished,²⁵⁹ the reader does not tire of returning to it, and it must find a place here, for no historic document brings more clearly before our eyes the life, at once spiritual and literary, of the Anglo-Saxon cloisters. "You desire and expect of me," writes a monk of Yarrow to one of his absent brethren, "to tell you how Bede, our father and master, the beloved of God, departed from this world. . . . Nearly a fortnight before Easter he was seized by an extreme horruī, fateor, et pallens percunctabar, cujus hæreseos arguerer. . . . Quoniam illo præsente atque audiente insipientius sum prius appetitus conviciis, ipso etiam nunc audiente et dijudicante, . . . quam immeritus eadem convicia sum perpressus appareat. . . . Quod utique in cœna illa in qua poculo debrius culpâre studuit." — Epist. ad Plegwinum monachum, t. i. pp. 144–154. This Wilfrid is not the great St. Wilfrid, but Wilfrid II., who was Bishop of York from 717 to 732, after St. John of Beverley, and before Egbert.

17th April,
734.

²⁵⁸ "Me defuncto, pro redemptione animæ meæ, quasi familiaris et vernaculi vestri, orare et missas facere, et nomen meum inter vestra scribere dignemini . . . ut in albo vestræ sanctæ congregationis meum nunc quoque nomen appareat." — Præfatio ad Vit. S. Cuthberti.

²⁵⁹ In the last place by Ozanam, who has made a perfect picture of the life of Bede and the Anglo-Saxon Church of the eighth century. The name of the author of the narrative is Cuthbert; he was a disciple of Bede, and wrote from Yarrow to one of his fellow-pupils, named Cuthwine, who was established in a distant monastery, probably one belonging to the Celtic ritualists, according to a passage quoted by Lingard, Anglo-Saxon Church, vol. ii. p. 197.

weakness, in consequence of his difficulty of breathing, but without great pain. He continued thus until Ascension, always joyous and happy, giving thanks to God day and night, and even every hour of the night and day. He gave us our lessons daily, and employed the rest of his time in chanting psalms; and passed every night, after a short sleep, in joy and thanksgiving, but without closing his eyes. From the moment of awaking he resumed his prayers and praises to God, with his arms in the form of a cross. O happy man! He sang sometimes texts from St. Paul and other scriptures, sometimes lines in our own language, for he was very able in English poetry.”²⁶⁰ Here the narrator interrupts himself to quote ten lines in Anglo-Saxon received from the lips of the dying Bede, and expressed in that short, sharp, and striking rhythm which characterizes the verses of the shepherd Ceadmon, with which Bede has made us acquainted. “Before our forced departure,” thus runs the song, “no man is more wise than he needs be; no man knows how much he ought to search, before leaving this world, what shall be the judgment of the soul for good or evil, after the day of death.”²⁶¹ “He also sang,” continues the witness, “anthems according to his liturgy and ours — among others, the following: ‘O King of Glory, who now hast mounted in triumph above the skies, leave us not like orphans, but send us the spirit of truth promised to our fathers.’ At these words, like orphans, he burst into tears. An hour after, he repeated the same anthem, and we mingled our tears with his. Sometimes we wept, and sometimes we read, but we never read without weeping. Thus passed the forty days from Easter to Ascension. He was always at the height of joy, thanking God for his sickness.”²⁶² He said with St. Paul, ‘The Lord scourgeth every one that he receiveth;’ and with St. Ambrose, ‘I have not lived so as to blush at the thought of living with you ; but I do not fear to die, because we have a good master.' ²⁶³

²⁶⁰ “Lætus et gaudens . . . immo horis omnibus . . . totam noctem in lætitia et gratiarum actione pervigil ducebat, nisi quantum modicus somnus impediret. . . . In nostra quoque lingua, quæ est Anglica, ut erat doctus in nostris carminibus, nonnulla dixit.”

²⁶¹ These lines, omitted by Mabillon in his edition of Cuthbert’s story, which is taken from Simeon of Durham, are found in a manuscript of St. Gall, almost a contemporary of Bede, and there is no doubt of their authenticity. Cf. LINGARD, p. 409.

²⁶² “Prorupit in lacrymas . . . luximus cum illo . . . altera vice legimus, altera ploravimus. Immo semper cum fletu legimus, ut tali lætitia dies usque ad diem deduximus, et ille multum gaudebat.”

" During all these days, in addition to the lessons he gave us and the psalms he sang with us, he undertook two pieces of work ; a translation of the Gospel according to John into our English tongue for the use of the Church of God, and some extracts from Isidore, Bishop of Seville. ' For,' said he, ' I would not have my children read lies, nor that after my death they should give themselves up to fruitless work.' On the Tuesday before Ascension he found himself much worse ; his breathing became difficult, and his feet were swollen. He continued, nevertheless, to dictate in good spirits, and sometimes added, ' Make haste to learn, for I know not how long I may remain with you, or if my Creator may call me shortly.' On the eve of the feast, at the first dawn of morning, he desired that what had been commenced should be quickly finished, and we worked till the hour of tierce. Then we went to the procession with the relics of the saints, as the solemn occasion required. But one of us remained by him and said to him, ' There is still a chapter wanting, beloved father ; would it fatigue you to speak any more ? ' Bede answered, ' I am still able to speak ; take your pen, make it, and write rapidly.' The other obeyed. At the hour of nones he sent for the priests of the monastery, and distributed to them incense, spices, and fine linen, which he had kept as precious things ; then bade them farewell, praying each of them to say masses for him. Thus passed his last day till the evening. Then the disciple of whom I have spoken said to him, ' Beloved master, there remains only one verse which is not written.' ' Write it then quickly,' he answered. And the young man having completed it in a few minutes, cried, ' Now it is finished.' ' You say truly, it is finished,' he said. ' Take my head in your arms and turn me, for I have great consolation in turning towards the holy place where I have prayed so much.' Thus, lying on the floor of his cell, he sang for the last time, ' Glory be to the Father, to the Son, and to the Holy Spirit,' and gave up the ghost as he pronounced the last of these divine names." ²⁶⁴

²⁶³ S. PAULINUS, in Vit. S. Ambrosii.

²⁶⁴ " Nolo ut discipuli mei mendacium legant. . . . Totum illum diem hilariter dictabat. . . . Diserte cum festinatione. . . . Adhuc magister dilectissime, capitulum unum deest ; videtur ne tibi difficile plus te interrogari ? Facile est, accipe tuum calamum et tempera, et festinanter scribe. . . . Curre velociter et presbyteros adhuc ad me. . . . Quædam pretiosa in mea

The monastic sanctuary towards which the dying look of Bede was turned still remains in part, if we may believe the best archæologists, and his memory has survived the changes of time. An old oaken chair is still shown which he is supposed to have used. It is the only existing relic of this great saint. For he was a saint by the same title and in the same rank as the most illustrious in the Anglo-Saxon calendar. The title of Venerable, which was given to him only in the ninth century by a kind of universal consent, did not then as now imply an inferior position to that of saint or blessed in the celestial hierarchy. Like all the other saints of the period, without exception, he was canonized by popular veneration, tacitly approved by the Church. Various miracles established or confirmed the fame of his sanctity: altars were consecrated to his memory; many pilgrims came to Yarrow to visit his tomb; his relics were stolen in the eleventh century, as so often happened, by a priest inspired by too ardent devotion, and carried to Durham, where they were placed with those of St. Cuthbert. They were an object of worship to the faithful up to the general profanation under Henry VIII., who pulled down the shrine and threw the bones on a dunghill along with those of all the other holy apostles and martyrs of Northumberland.²⁶⁵

It must, however, be admitted that his place in the worship of the faithful has not lasted so long as the glory attached to his name and the great fame which, rising in his native country, spread so rapidly over all Christendom.²⁶⁶ capsella habes, id est piperem, oraria et incensa. . . . Accipe caput meum in manus tuas, quia multum me delectat sedere ex adverso loco sancto meo, in quo orare solebam. . . . In pavimento casulæ suæ decantans."

²⁶⁵ If we may believe a competent judge, Mr. Jewitt (Gentleman's Magazine, Dec., 1864), the choir of the little church now standing at Yarrow is as old as the church built by Benedict Biscop, and inhabited, as we may say, by Venerable Bede. This is the remnant which was discovered roofless by the three monks who, according to Simeon of Durham, visited the ruins in 1075. The learned archæologist thinks that he recognizes, in the ornaments and in the primitive bays of this choir, the characteristics of Saxon architecture. We confess that it is difficult to conceive how this low and petty construction can represent any portion whatever of the edifice built and ornamented with so much magnificence by the founder of Yarrow, and described with such enthusiasm by the most illustrious of his guests. The tower, indeed, which is of fine Norman or Roman architecture, may very well date from the partial restoration in 1075. An inscription, evidently more modern than its date, fixes the dedication of the church on April 24, 681, in the 15th year of King Egfrid, and Ceolfridi abbatis ejusdem ecclesiæ Deo auctore conditoris, anno IV.

²⁶⁶ "Anglia te celebrat: te totus personat orbis."

— Ancient epitaph quoted by Leland, Collectanea, vol. iii. book iv. c. 23.

His fame did honor to monastic institutions in general. Bede appeared to the Catholic world a model of that virtue and knowledge which the cloister was to make the peculiar property of Christian society. In him the great Roman monachism which he had seen triumph over Celtic influences found its personification. The sword of his words, said his epitaph, was the safeguard of the fortresses occupied by his religious brethren.²⁶⁷

But it was especially the English nation, the last new-comer among Catholic nations, which had occasion to take pride in the great man given by her to Christendom. All the kingdoms of the Heptarchy claimed a share in the glory which could not be allowed to remain the exclusive possession of the Northumbrians — and the Anglo-Saxon missionaries, scattered through Germany, rivalled the monks who remained in their native island in the faithfulness of their devotion to his noble memory.²⁶⁸

The nations of Catholic Europe envied England the possession of so great a doctor, the first among the offspring of barbarous races who had won a place among the doctors of the Church. His illustrious successors, Boniface and Alcuin, emulated each other in celebrating his merits and services in the interest of souls, and in order to set him up as a permanent model to future generations.²⁶⁹ Alcuin insists specially upon this with a precision of details which gives us one proof the more how entirely the likings and manners of the Anglo-Saxon conquerors of England are reflected in the ²⁶⁷ "Crystallus patriæ, gregis astrum, lumen avorum,

Laus juris, bajulus legis, honorque jacet.
Beda datus sacris, gravitate senex, puer annis,
Devotæ mentis æthera thure replet. . . .
Ense pio verbi confratrum castra tuetur
Ne Christi miles, hoste ruente, ruat."

— Epitaph quoted by Mabillon from a MS. belonging to De Thou.

"Beda, Dei famulus, monachorum nobile sidus, Finibus e terræ profuit Ecclesiæ."

— Another epitaph quoted by Arnold Wion.

²⁶⁸ "Et rectum quidem mihi videtur ut tota gens Anglorum in omnibus provinciis, ubicumque reperti sunt, gratias Deo referant, quia tam mirabilem virum illis in sua natione donavit." — S. BONIFACII et LULLI Epist., ed. Jaffé, number 134. See the letter written by an abbot of Wearmouth to Lul, Archbishop of Mayence, thanking him for having sent from Germany a silken stuff intended to wrap the relics of Bede.

²⁶⁹ "Rogamus ut aliqua de opusculis sagacissimi investigatorius Scripturarum Bedan (sic) monachi, quem nuper in domo Dei apud vos, vice candelæ ecclesiasticæ, scientia, scripturarum fulsisse audivimus, conscripta nobis transmittere dignemini." — BONIFACII Epist., 672, ed. Jaffé.

tastes of the modern English. "Remember," he writes to the monks of the community of Yarrow which Bede had made famous — "remember the nobility of your fathers, and be not the unworthy sons of such great ancestors; look at your many books, at the beauty of your churches and monastic buildings. Let your young men learn to persevere in the praises of God, and not in driving foxes out of their holes, or wearing out their strength running after hares. What folly to leave the footsteps of Christ, and run after the trail of a fox! Look at the noblest doctor of our country, Bede; see what zeal he showed for knowledge from his youth, and the glory which he has received among men, though that is much less important and less dazzling than his reward before God. Stir up, then, the minds of your sleepers, by his example; study his works, and you will be able to draw from them, both for yourselves and others, the secret of eternal beauty."²⁷⁰

The fame of Bede has derived a special and increasing lustre from the fact that he was not only the first and most remarkable of Anglo-Saxons, but that, were he set aside, everything else concerning them would fall into obscurity; ²⁷¹ thus it is not without reason that he has been compared to Homer, who rose like a resplendent meteor amid the night which precedes and the night which follows his appearance upon the horizon of Greek history.

The dark night of idolatry which covered Northumbria before the holy predecessors and contemporaries of Bede, has been replaced by the dark night of industry. The working of the coal-mines has transformed the face of the country. The light of day is positively darkened by thick volumes and heavy clouds of smoke belched out without intermission by the manufactories and workshops which are fed by the inexhaustible mineral wealth of the country. Newcastle, North and South Shields, Sunderland, Stockton, Darlington, Hull, all the centres of the coal-trade, have replaced in the attention and regard of men the old monastic cradles of Christian faith and civilization, Lindisfarne and Yarrow, Tynningham and Coldingham, Tynemouth and Wearmouth, Hartlepool and Whitby. But what a contrast, even if we go no further than the surface, between the aspect of the country of old and that of to-day ! The much-prized coal has covered this fine country with a veil of mourning. The verdure of the woods and fields is discolored by it, the limpid waters soiled, the purity of the air infected, the light of the sun intercepted. Everything disposes us to believe that these are but material tokens of the internal and moral darkness, in the midst of which struggles the vast and formidable population which swarms in those craters of British commerce. The frightful density of these unknown and impenetrable masses conceals abysses of ignorance, vice, wretchedness, and resentment. There Paganism is restored. Notwithstanding many generous efforts, partial remedies, and honorable exceptions — notwithstanding the observance, still compulsory and respected, of the Sunday rest, — the love of lucre has created armies of slaves, tools without souls, but already longing, and with good reason, for a better fate, for a condition less painful than that, the duration and aggravation of which ought to fill with trembling every Christian and patriotic heart.

²⁷⁰ "Assuescant pueri laudibus astare superni Regis, non vulpium fodere cavernas, non leporum fugaces sequi cursus. Quam impium est Christi amittere obsequia et vulpium sequi vestigia! Discant pueri Scripturas saceras. . . . Recogitate nobilissimum hujus temporis magistrum Bedam presbyterum . . . qualem nunc habet inter homines laudem." — ALCUINI, Epist. 13, ed. Froben, vol. i. p. 22.

²⁷¹ Certain contemporary chronicles find nothing to describe in the history of England during the seventh and eighth centuries except the existence of Bede. "Beda presbyter et monachus claret in Anglia." — Chron. Hollandi Vetustiss., ad. an. 696, quoted by Mackintosh, vol. i. p. 83.

The light of faith and the moral law is still more wanting to them than daylight. Buried alive in their mines and manufactories, without pontiffs, without spiritual guides, a prey to all the disorders, excesses, and forgetfulnesses which ever accompany the labor of a crowd, strangers to the thought of God, to any hope in a future life, to habits of modesty,²⁷² victims and instruments of the worship of mammon, they stand there like a perpetual menace to the blind egotism and formalism of the materialists of our age.

No man can admire more than I do the marvels of human intelligence and activity realized by the free genius of the English race ; no man does more sincere homage to its natural and unconquerable instincts of religion. But who could behold without fear, in that district, once so fruitful in sanctuaries of prayer, virtue, and moral and intellectual life, the religious indifference and fierce thirst for gain which replace almost everywhere the tender and vigilant solicitude of the Church for souls ? Who could be other than alarmed at sight of the deserted condition, the spiritual nullity, in which so many millions of our fellow-creatures are living? How can we cease to regret the days when the obedient fervor of the people answered so well to the zeal, knowledge, and disinterestedness of the clergy? and when, like the lighthouses which we now see everywhere, on the headlands, at the river's mouth, at the edge of rocky reefs, and along all the course of that dangerous and much frequented coast, offering their tutelary light to the sailor, there rose upon those shores, then desert, unknown, and inhabited only by a few savages, the sparkling lights, increasing from year to year, of Lindisfarne, Yarrow, Whitby, Coldingham, Wearmouth, and Tynemouth — centres of intellectual and moral life, as laborious as it was pure!

²⁷² See p. 496, note 83, what has been said of the facts revealed by the Parliamentary Commission in the coal districts.

Perhaps the day may yet come — and may it not be far distant! — when, as of old, amid the wonders and perils of modern activity, new centres of charity, enlightenment, and peace may light up one after the other, like so many celestial beacons to guide and warn souls in their pilgrimage towards eternal life.

CHAPTER V.

THE ROYAL MONKS.

The star of Northumbria pales, notwithstanding the erection of the see of York into an archbishopric. — Sad end of the lineage of Oswy. — King Ceolfrid, to whom Bede dedicates his History, becomes a monk at Lindisfarne. — His successor Eadbert follows his example. — Other monk-kings. — Almost each dynasty of the Heptarchy furnishes its share: in East Anglia, Sigebert, who dies on the field of battle; in Essex, Sebbi, who leads back his people to the faith — his desire to die in solitude; and Offa, who dies at Rome; in Mercia, which inherited the preponderating power of Northumbria, Coenred, the travelling companion and fellow-novice of Offa; Ethelred, founder, monk, and abbot of Bardenev. — Another Mercian king, Ceolred, dies in a debauch. — Ethelbald, pursued by Ceolred, takes refuge in the marsh of Croyland with the hermit Guthlac, who predicts to him that he will be King of Mercia. — What Guthlac had been before he became an anchorite. — His solitary life resembles those of some of the most illustrious saints in the monastic order. — Death of Guthlac. — Foundation of the celebrated Abbey of Croyland upon the site of his cell. — Continuation and end of the reign of Ethelbald. — Remonstrances of the Anglo-Saxon missionaries in Germany. — The supremacy passes from Mercia to Wessex. — Three West Saxon kings abdicate to become monks or pilgrims to Rome: Centwin; Ceadwalla, the friend of Wilfrid, who lives just long enough to be baptized by the Pope; and Ina the friend of St. Aldhelm. — Reign of Ina, the legislator, victor, and pacificator of the Britons; restorer of the Celtic sanctuary of Glastonbury, the first protector of St. Boniface. — In consequence of a surprise prepared for him by his wife, he goes to Rome as a penitent to die, and founds the Schola Saxonum there. — Crowd of Anglo-Saxon pilgrims of both sexes to Rome. — Abuses and disorders. — False monks and false pilgrims. — The age of gold a chimera in the Church as elsewhere.

“ Must lose
The name of king? O’ God’s name, let it go.
I’ll give my jewels for a set of beads,
My gorgeous palace for a hermitage;
My gay apparel for an almsman’s gown;
My figured goblets for a dish of wood;
My sceptre for a palmer’s walking staff;
My subjects for a pair of carved saints;
And my large kingdom for a little grave,
A little, little grave, an obscure grave.”

— SHAKESPEARE, Richard II.

BEDE dedicated his History of the English to the king of his dear Northumbria, Ceolwulf, whose tender solicitude for monastic interests made him hope for an approaching reform of the abuses of ecclesiastical government in the north of England.²⁷³ But two years after the death of the great monastic historian, Ceolwulf himself became a monk. He was of the race of Ida the Burner, sprung, however, from another branch than that from which came all those descendants of Ethelfrid the Ravager, whose connection with Aïdan and Wilfrid, Hilda and Ebba, Lindisfarne and Melrose, has already occupied us so long.

Sad end of the line of Oswy,
705-716. The line of Ethelfrid had come to a sad conclusion in that young Osred, who came to the throne during the last struggles of Wilfrid, and whom the people had taken pleasure in regarding as the adopted son of the great bishop.²⁷⁴ Far from walking in the footsteps of his father Aldfrid and his grandfather Oswy, he has left no trace of sympathy with the institutions and ideas represented among the Anglo-Saxons by the monks. From an early age he manifested all the inclinations of a tyrant, abandoning himself to frequent explosions of wild passion, which show only too clearly how hard was the task of the doctors and ministers of Christian purity among the Teutonic races. It was the delight of his precocious and impetuous libertinism to outrage virgins consecrated to the Lord, and he went from monastery to monastery to seek his sacrilegious prey.²⁷⁵ On the other hand, he obliged the nobles whom he oppressed, when he deigned to spare their lives in his massacres, to be shaven, and to bury themselves against their will in the cloisters.²⁷⁶ A violent death put a stop to his evil ways.

²⁷³ “ Pro insita sibi dilectione pietatis, quicquid ad regulam pietatis pertinet, firma protinus intentione adjuvare curabit.” — Epist. ad Ecgbertum, c. 5.

²⁷⁴ See p. 430.

Licentiousness of the young king Osred.
716.

But already the star of Northumbria had paled beyond remedy. The final erection of the great northern bishopric of York into a metropolis, to which all the bishoprics north of the Humber were to be subject, was not sufficient to restore to Northumbria the power which she had exercised under kings like Oswald and Oswy and bishops like Aïdan and Wilfrid. Egbert, the Bishop of York, the correspondent of Bede, and a prince of the reigning dynasty, obtained from Pope Gregory II., after repeated requests, the re-establishment of the metropolitan dignity, which had been at first bestowed upon the see of York by St. Gregory the Great, but which, since the flight of Paulinus, had fallen into disuse, and which the later decrees of Popes Vitalianus and Agathon had seemed to sacrifice to the supremacy of Canterbury. This restoration, however, was of advantage only to the splendor of the new metropolis, and in no way to the kingdom of which it was the capital, as indeed the authority of Canterbury, so long universal and always undisputed, had not given the slightest

The fortunes of Northumbria begin to fail.

²⁷⁵ "Osredum spiritus luxuriæ fornicantem et per monasteria nonnarum sacratas virgines stuprantem et furem agitavit, usquequo ipse gloriosum regnum et juvenilem vitam et ipsam luxuriosam animam contemptibili et despecta morte perdidit."—S. BONIFACII Epist. 59 ad Ethelbaldum. "Turpem vitam sanctimonialium stupris exagitans."—GUILL. MALMESB., i. 53.

²⁷⁶ "Non proceres veneratus erat: non denique Christum.
Hic igitur multos miseranda morte peremit.
Ast alios cogit summo servire parenti,
Inque monasterii attonsos consistere septis. . . .
Anglorum proceres nimium trucidante tyranno Servitium Domini miles præfatus inibat."

—ETHELWOLFI Carmen de Abbatibus et Viris Piis Lindisfarnens., c. 2 and 4. Mabillon (Act. SS. O. S. B., t. iv. p. 317), in publishing this poem, proved that, notwithstanding its title, this was not the great Monastery of Lindisfarne of which we have so largely spoken, but another monastery of the same name, founded by Duke Eadmund, "dux nobilis natu et moribus," one of those whom King Osred forced to become monks.

supremacy over the rest of the Heptarchy to the kings of Kent.

King Ceolwulf becomes a monk at Lindisfarne.

After two obscure reigns, Ceolwulf attempted in vain to struggle against the disorder and decadence of his country. He was vanquished, and made captive by enemies whose names are not recorded, and had to submit, as happened to more than one Merovingian prince, to receive the tonsure by compulsion, and was shut up in a convent. He escaped, however, regained the crown, and reigned for some time in a manner which gained the applause of Bede, and weighed with the Pope in his decision in respect to the metropolis of York. But, after a reign of eight years, a regret, or an unconquerable desire, for that monastic life which had been formerly forced upon him against his will, seized him. He made the best provisions possible for the security of his country, and for a good understanding between the spiritual and temporal authorities, nominating as his successor a worthy prince of his race, the brother of Archbishop Egbert. Then giving up the cares of power, and showing himself truly the master of the wealth he resigned, he cut his long beard, had his head shaved in the form of a crown, and retired to bury himself anew at Lindisfarne, in the chief monastic sanctuary of his country.

He there passed the last thirty years of his life in study and happiness.²⁷⁷ He had, while king, enriched this monastery with many great gifts, and obtained permission for the use of wine and beer for monks who, up to that time, according to the rigid rule of ancient Catholic discipline, had been allowed no beverage but water and milk.

His successor, Eadbert, followed his example. After having, during a reign of twenty-one years, victoriously contended against the Picts, Scots, Mercians and Welsh — after having received presents and offers of alliance from the first of the Carolingians, Pepin the Short, — he became a monk at York, where he had already founded what was then called a very noble library, and where he enrolled himself among the monks who constituted the clergy of his brother the archbishop's metropolis. He lived there for two years, preferring, says an annalist, the service of God to all the kingdoms of the earth, and rapt by his violent love for the celestial country.²⁷⁸ Care has been taken to prove that he received the Roman tonsure, that of St. Peter, and not that of the Celts, which is the last mention in history of a difference which, a century earlier, had stirred up so many tempests.²⁷⁹

²⁷⁷ "Vere beatus et litterarum scientia sufficienter constitutus." — GUILL. MALMESB., i. 64. "Sponte divitiarum non servus, sed dominus, quasi magnus viles abjecit." — HENRI HUNTINGD., Hist., i. iv. p. 340. "Barbam deposuit, coronam accepit." — SIMEON DUNELM., De Gest. Reg., p. 69, and 139, ap. TWYSDEN, vol. i.

These two kings of Northumbria were not the first or only ones who embraced monastic life. Ead-^{Other monk-kings}bert, indeed, is the eighth pointed out by English chroniclers as having preferred the eight beatitudes of voluntary poverty to the grandeurs of this world.²⁸⁰ Certain annalists even go so far as to count more than thirty kings or queens of the different Anglo-Saxon kingdoms who entered the new cloisters during the seventh and eighth centuries.²⁸¹

What transformation had thus passed upon those heathens, savage descendants of Odin, impetuous and bloody chieftains of a race which breathed only war and pillage, and knew no greater shame than to die a peaceful death! We see them penetrated by the spirit of gentleness and concord, seeking union, fraternity, even equality, and that sometimes with the humblest of their subjects, under the Benedictine habit, in the nightly chant of psalms, in the peaceful labors of agriculture or of the monastic library. They sought, they aspired to that retreat, as the crown of their warlike exploits and their political and military career. But it was little to the satisfaction of the Anglo-Saxons to see themselves thus abandoned by their kings. The spirit of proud independence which made them, like all the other Teutonic nations, so often rebellious and intractable, did not expel from their minds a passionate affection, or rather a mysterious worship, for the old blood of the first chiefs of the conquest. They made vain efforts to keep their kings back from the cloister, and reserved to themselves the right of reclaiming them by their own will or against it, in order to put them at the head of the army, and march against the enemy under their orders. Such was the fate, as has been seen,²⁸² of King Sigebert of East

²⁷⁸ SIM. DUNELM., Hist. Dunelm. Eccles., l. ii. c. 3, ibid.

²⁷⁹ "Dei amoris causa et cœlestis patriæ violentia, accepta S. Petri tonsura." — App. ad Bedam, ann. 758.

²⁸⁰ "Qui pro regno temporali commutaverunt æternum, ut octo beatitudinum jucunditatem, quæ voluntariæ paupertati debetur, pro futuro haberent in cœlis." — RICH. CIRENC., p. 242. Mabillon counts eight before Eadbert, who is the ninth on his list. — Act. SS. O. S. B., vol. iii. p. 463.

²⁸¹ STEVENS, continuation of DUGDALE, vol. i. p. 19.

²⁸² See p. 280.

Anglia, the first of the Anglo-Saxons who entered the cloister, and who, torn from his cell by his desperate subjects to lead them against the pitiless Penda, ended his life, like so many of his heathen ancestors, on the field of battle.

Each dynasty furnished its contingent to the monastic order.

Sebbi, King of Essex.

665-695.

Each of the dynasties of the Heptarchy furnished in succession its contingent to the new army. Like the Uffings of East Anglia, and the descendants of the Man of Fire in Northumberland, the children of the god Saxnote, whom the baptized Saxons²⁸³ were made to abjure along with the gods Thor and Woden, had also their tonsured king. This race reigned over the Saxons of the East, whom King Sebbi had the happiness of bringing back to the faith, after their first defection.²⁸⁴ The same king, who had reigned for thirty years as a faithful soldier of the King of kings, obtained, not without difficulty, the consent of his wife to enable him to assume before he died the monastic dress for which he had long sighed. But though he thus believed himself to have become a monk indeed, this descendant of Scandinavian gods and heroes, with the heart of a king under his monastic robe, feared, according to Bede, that, dying in his bed, he might seem to be overcome by suffering.²⁸⁵ In the anguish of his last illness he trembled lest, while struggling against the terrors of death, pain might tear from him cries or gestures unworthy of him. For this reason he would have no spectator of his last moments except the Bishop of London. This prelate, who had invested him with the monk's black robe, had the consolation of seeing him give up his last sigh in perfect peace, and buried him in his own monastic cathedral of St. Paul, where for a thousand years, until the time of the great fire which consumed that famous edifice under Charles II., was to be seen the immense stone coffin which contained the body of the monk-king, whose frame must have been as gigantic as his heart was manful.²⁸⁶

1666.

²⁸³ LAPPENBERG, p. 114.

²⁸⁴ See p. 291.

²⁸⁵ "Vitam privatam et monachicam cunctis regni divitiis et honoribus præferens, quam et olim jam, si non obstinatus conjugis animus divortium negaret, subiisset. . . . Cumque annos triginta in regno miles regni cœlestis exegisset . . . habitum religionis, quem diu desiderabat, accepit. . . . Corruptus infirmitate maxima, timere cœpit homo animi regalis, ne ad mortem veniens, tanto affectus dolore, aliquid indignum suæ personæ vel ore proferret vel aliorum motu gereret membrorum." — BEDE, iv. 11.

²⁸⁶ Note by Smith in his edition of Bede. "This is the first example I know of the devout idea so general, in later ages, of dying in the dress of a monk." — FLEURY, l. xi. c. 3.

Fifteen years after the death of Sebbi, his successor and grandnephew, King Offa, imitated his example while still in the fulness of youth and all delights. Though a man beloved and sought after by all, he gave up his betrothed bride, his family, country, and crown, and, resisting the passionate remonstrances of his subjects, went away to embrace monastic life, not even in an English cloister, but at Rome. The young Offa was accompanied in his pilgrimage and sacrifice by Coenred, the King of the Mercians, detached on his side from the world by witnessing the last moments of one of his best knights,²⁸⁷ who died in despair from having voluntarily kept back from confession.²⁸⁸ Before leaving England they were both present at the last act of the great Wilfrid's apostolic life—the dedication of the new Monastery of Evesham, which they had endowed and freed from all temporal jurisdiction.²⁸⁹ When they arrived at Rome, both these kings received the tonsure and cowl from the hands of Pope Constantinus, before the Confession of St. Peter, and, after some years of penitent life, they passed from the tomb of the apostles to celestial blessedness, to enjoy the society of the saints forever.²⁹⁰

Offa, King of Essex.
709.

Coenred,
King of Mercia.

Since the death of the last Northumbrian Bretwalda, Oswy, and especially since the overthrow of his son Egfrid in his struggle with the Picts, Mercia had acquired the ascendancy which was departing from Northumbria. The Mercians, under the warlike descendants of the terrible Penda, and thanks to the military spirit which inspired its people and race, swayed the Anglo-Saxon Heptarchy for nearly a century.

Mercia becomes the most important nation of the Heptarchy.
670-685.

²⁸⁷ "Vir in laico habitu atque officio militari positus."—BEDE, v. 13. William of Malmesbury calls him "miles."—Gest. Reg. Angl., l. i. c. 78. Turner proves that the order of knighthood existed among the Anglo-Saxons long before the Norman conquest.—Hist. of Anglo-Saxons, book viii. c. 12.

²⁸⁸ The vision of this knight may be read in Bede, l. c. Two other passages in Bede (iii. 22 and v. 10) seem to prove that in his time the word "miles" was applied not only to all fighting men, but to nobles or patricians.

²⁸⁹ See p. 439.

²⁹⁰ "Coenred qui regno Merciorum nobilissime tempore aliquanto præfuit, nobilius multo sceptrum regni reliquit . . . monachus factus ad limina Apostolorum, in precibus, jejuniis, et eleemosynis, usque ad diem permansit ultimum. . . . Offa juvenis amantissimæ ætatis et venustatis, totæque suæ genti ad tenenda servandaque regni sceptrum exoptatissimus . . . reliquit uxorem, agros, cognatos et patriam, attonsus et in monachico vitam habitu complens, ad visionem beatorum apostolorum in cælis diu desideratam pervenit."—BEDA, Hist. Eccles., v. 19.

Coenred, who died a monk at Rome after having fought valiantly against the Britons, was Penda's grandson; and he was far from being the only recruit which the family of the dauntless champion of old Paganism was to furnish to the monastic order.²⁹¹ His own son, and second successor, Ethelred, the predecessor of Coenred upon the throne of Mercia, touched by divine grace, after a long and warlike reign, entered as a simple monk into the Monastery of Bardeney which he had founded, and ruled it for ten years as abbot before he died the death of a saint.²⁹² This is the Ethelred with whom we have already made acquaintance, first as the enemy and then as the devoted friend of Wilfrid,²⁹³ whose cause he sustained with all the authority conferred on him by his double rank as monk and monarch.

Excesses of King Coelred. 709-771. These two kings, however, who were so entirely devoted to the Benedictine institution as to enroll themselves in it till the end of their worthy existence, were succeeded on the throne of Mercia by a prince of a very different stamp. Coelred, like the young Northumbrian king of whom we recently spoke, did not content himself with despising the rights and liberties guaranteed to the monasteries by the charters of his predecessors; he took from them the young and beautiful virgins there consecrated to the Lord, for the gratification of his own passions. He died in one of his orgies among his earls, not only unrepentant, but calling upon the devil, and cursing the Christian priests with their Gospel.²⁹⁴ It was perhaps the last out-

²⁹¹ See in the Appendix the table of his monastic descendants. The line of Mercian kings after Penda is as follows:—

626-655. Penda.

656-675. Wulphere, son of Penda.

675-704. Ethelred, brother of Wulphere.

704-709. Coenred, son of Wulphere.

709-716. Coelred, son of Ethelred.

716-757. Ethelbald, called Clito, grandson of a brother of Penda.

757-797. Offa, great-grandson of the same.

It is well known that among the Merovingians it was often the eldest or most popular prince of the reigning dynasty who succeeded to the crown to the injury of the direct heir, who might regain his rights at a later period if he lived long enough to see the question of his succession once more opened.

²⁹² "Omnipotentis benignitate visitatus fit monachus." — HENRIC. HUNTINGD., Hist., l. iv. p. 337.

²⁹³ See p. 430.

²⁹⁴ "In stupratione et adulterio nonnarum commorans . . . nam Coelredum prædecessorem tuum stupratorem sanctimonialium et ecclesiasticorum privilegiorum fractorum splendide cum suis comitibus epulantem spiritus break of conquered heathenism: not certainly that heathen morals and lusts were forever extirpated from the bosom of these wild races, but since that time their ascendancy has never been so great as to lead an Anglo-Saxon prince to the point of making a public denial of the Gospel.

After this worthy grandson of the savage Penda, the Mercian throne fell to a collateral scion of the race, Ethelbald, known under the name of Clito or Childe, which was then used among the Anglo-Saxons, as that of Infanto in Spain at a later period, to designate the princes of the reigning dynasty. Ethelbald, who was savagely pursued by Ceolred, had a stormy and hard youth. He was not himself a monk, but his history is connected with that of one of the most holy and popular monks of the eighth century.²⁹⁵ In the course of his wanderings from province to province and from stronghold to stronghold, while flying with some devoted companions from the persecution of his pitiless enemy, he learned that a young and warlike chief called Guthlac, sprung, like himself, from the royal race of Mercia, had retired from the world to consecrate himself to study and prayer, in an island surrounded by the marshes which then covered a great district on the borders of Mercia and East Anglia. Ethelbald put himself under the guidance of a neighboring abbot, who knew the country sufficiently to find his way through the black and stagnant waters and muddy soil of these inaccessible marshes, and the two reached Croyland in a fisher's boat. In this watery retreat abode the good and pious Guthlac, and there the fugitive found a hospitable welcome and a safe shelter. He did not continue long there: when rest had given him renewed confidence, he left the refuge in which Ceolred neither could nor dared reach him, to resume his life of adventure. But new dangers led

The Clito Ethelbald, pursued by Ceolred.

Takes refuge with the solitary, Guthlac.

malignus invasit . . . sine pœnitentia et confessione, furibundus et cum diabolo sermocinans, et sacerdotes Dei abominans . . . ad tormenta inferni migravit." — S. BONIFACII Epist. ad Ethelbaldum Regem Mercionum, n. 62, ed. Giles; 17, ed. Serrar.

²⁹⁵ The learned and accurate Philippe Jaffé, the last editor of the Epistles of St. Boniface, believes King Ethelbald to have been in his youth a pupil of St. Aldhelm. He attributes to him the letter addressed to that holy abbot, which is published with those of St. Boniface (ed. Jaffé, No. 5) and those of Aldhelm (ed. Giles, p. 100). But the letter itself seems to prove that it is the work of a young ecclesiastic, and not of a prince unacquainted, as Ethelbald must have been, with the life of the cloister. It was very probably the same student to whom Aldhelm addressed the answer, a fragment of which we have quoted above at page 534 of this volume.

him again and again to Croyland, where Guthlac always received him with the same affection, and lavished upon him, in their long and frequent conversations, the spiritual consolations and varied instruction which he needed. He had a cell beside that of Guthlac, his sole friend and consoler.²⁹⁶

One day, returning from one of his dangerous journeys, during which he had found himself separated from all his followers, closely surrounded by enemies, and at the end of his strength and resources, he arrived exhausted and desperate, and threw himself into the arms of his protector and friend. "Dear child," said Guthlac, "I know all your troubles and misfortunes; I have followed your laborious career from its beginning; for this reason I have prayed God much for you, and he has granted my prayer. I announce to you in His name that you shall one day reign over your native country. You shall see the defeat of your enemies; you shall overcome them sword in hand; you shall trample them under your feet, and become the master of all their possessions. Learn only to wait: the kingdom will come to you, not by rapine and violence, but from the hand of God, when that hand shall have demolished the wicked man who now reigns, and who shall pass away like a shadow."²⁹⁷ From that moment Ethelbald placed his hope in God alone, and waited with trust and patience. The prophecy was accomplished two years after: Ceolred perished in his orgies,²⁹⁸ and the Childe was immediately recognized as king by all the Mercians.

Who predicts that he will be King of Mercia.

Guthlac; his life as an adventurer and

The hermit who with so much confidence prophesied to the future King of Mercia, sprang himself from the dynasty which reigned over the ²⁹⁶ "In quadam casula . . . Guthlaci qui solus refugium et consolatio laborum ipsius erat." — Vita S. Guthl., c. 39.

²⁹⁷ "Est in mediterraneorum Anglorum partibus immensæ magnitudinis sacerrima palus, nunc stagnis, nunc flactris, interdum nigris vaporibus et laticibus, necnon crebris insularum nemoribus intervenientibus, et flexuosis rivigarum anfractibus . . . protenditur. . . . Arrepta piscatoria scaphula. . . . Cum huc illucque . . . in diversis nationibus jactaretur . . . usque ad præfatam insulam pervenit. . . . Alio die, deficiente virium ipsius validudine, suorumque inter dubia pericula, postquam inanitiæ vires defecere, tandem ad colloquium sancti viri Guthlaci, ut assolebat, pervenit. . . . O mi puer, laborum tuorum non sum expertus, miseriarum tuarum ab exordio vitæ non sum inscius . . . misertus calamitatis tuæ rogavi Dominum ut subveniret tibi. . . . Tribuet tibi denominationem gentis tuæ. . . . Terga eorum videbis et gladius tuus vincet adversarios tuos." — Vita S. Guthlaci, auctore FELICE monacho ejus æquali, ap. Acta SS. O. S. B., sæc. iii. pars. I, ad. ann. 714.

²⁹⁸ See above, p. 583.

greater part of the Heptarchy.²⁹⁹ His youth had been spent in fight and pillage, like that of all the princes and lords of his time. Excited by the recollection of the exploits of his ancestors, he dreamed only of battles and devastation, and at the head of a numerous band of friends and dependants he vanquished his enemies, sacked many towns and castles, and collected immense booty. But his companions observed with surprise that he had so much pity left as to restore to those whom he robbed a third part of their goods. He led this bandit life, which was supposed among his countrymen to be heroic, from the age of fifteen to that of twenty-four. But one night, while he camped with all his followers in a forest, his imagination suddenly presented before him the crimes, excesses, and miserable end of the kings of his race, then his own inevitable and perhaps approaching death, and the nothingness of the wealth and fame which he had sought. He felt himself as if burnt up by an internal flame — the flame of celestial desires. His decision was made on the spot. As soon as the first song of the birds announced the dawn he awoke his comrades, and told them to choose another chief, as he had just devoted himself, for his own part, to the service of Jesus Christ. Then, in spite of their remonstrances, cries, and lamentations, he instantly set out, carrying with him only a broad and short sword, such as was worn by laborers.³⁰⁰ Doubtless this was to defend himself during the long and solitary journey which he had before him, for he went alone, and far from his native district and his friends, to knock at the door of one of those double monasteries, governed by abbesses, several of which already existed in England, and where the humility of the monk was so much the more tried that he was subject to a woman as superior.³⁰¹ He there assumed ²⁹⁹ "Hujus viri progenies, per nobilissima illustrium regum nomina, antiqua ab origine Icles digesto ordine cucurrit." — Vita, c. 4. This Icles was the fifth ancestor of the terrible Penda.

³⁰⁰ "Cum juvenili in pectore egregius dominandi amor fevesceret, valida priscorum heroum facta reminiscens. . . . Cum adversantium sibi urbes et villas, vicos et castella igne ferroque vastaret . . . tertiam partem agregatæ gazæ possidentibus remittebat. . . . Post tot prædas, cædes, rapinas . . . lassi quieverunt. . . . Quadam nocte . . . extemplo spiritualis flamma omnia præcordia viri incendere cœpit. . . . Antiquorum regum stirpis suæ per transacta sæcula miserabiles exitus et flagitiosum vitæ terminum contemplan . . . ecce subito . . . cum sol demoverat ortum, in quo matutinæ volucres avido forcipe pipant." — Vita, c. 10, 11.

³⁰¹ At Ripadun, or Repton, situated on the Trent. The name of the abbess was Elfrida. This abbey, where the kings of Mercia were buried, was the monastic habit, having his long hair cut, according to the form of the Roman, not the Celtic, tonsure, as his biographer takes pains to tell us. There he passed two years, dedicated to the study of the Holy Scriptures, of cenobitic customs, and of liturgical music.³⁰² At twenty-six his soul was illuminated by a new light while reading the life of the Fathers in the desert; he determined to plunge into a deeper and more austere solitude, and it was then that he betook himself to the marshy forests of Croyland. He found there an ancient tumulus, already excavated by the greed of the neighboring population, who expected to find treasure there. They had dug it into a sort of pit. The fierce young Mercian prince fitted it with a penthouse of straw, made it his home, and there ended his life.

There are various features in this life which are to be found in those of the most illustrious saints of the monastic order. Like St. Benedict, Guthlac excited by his austerities the ill-will of his brethren. With true Anglo-Saxon spirit, they reproached him specially for his unalterable resolution never to drink either beer or hydromel, nor wine, except in the communion.³⁰³ Like St. Columba, his solitude was continually disturbed by crowds of the faithful attracted by the increasing fame of his holiness, and who surmounted all the obstacles which Nature had heaped around his island retreat to seek light, consolation, and the healing of their infirmities; he was sought by all conditions of men from all quarters, abbots and earls, rich and poor, monks and laymen; and these not only from all parts of Mercia, but from the most distant corners of England.³⁰⁴

Like the Fathers of the desert, he was exposed to a thousand temptations, a thousand diabolical visions, the most curious of which, in a historical point of view, is that which makes it apparent that the Cambrian or British marauders destroyed by the Danes, and replaced under the Normans by a priory of regular canons.

³⁰² "Mysticam S. Petri apostolorum principis tonsuram accepit. . . . Sacris litteris et monasticis disciplinis erudiebatur . . . psalmis, canticis, orationibus precibusque ecclesiasticis per biennium imbutus." — Vita, c. 13.

³⁰³ "Non ullius inebriantis liquoris aut alienj libaminis haustum. . . . Hac ex causa omnibus fratribus illic cohabitantibus aspero odio habebatur." — Vita, c. 12.

³⁰⁴ "Inter densas arundinum compages . . . abbates, fratres, comites, divites, vexati, pauperes . . . confluebant. . . . Loca spinosa sine callo agresti rura gradiendo, inruit (quidam comes exsulis Ethelbaldi) in spinulam sub incultæ telluris herbis latentem." — Vita, c. 24, 31.

were not afraid of crossing the whole breadth of the island to disturb their conquerors even in East Anglia. It is told that Guthlac was much comforted by discovering that the enemies by whom he had felt his cell to be surrounded and threatened all the night through, were demons and not Welsh, as he had supposed them to be by their hoarse voices and guttural accents.³⁰⁵

Like many holy monks of Celtic countries and of Merovingian Gaul, he lived in a close and touching familiarity with all living creatures, and especially with the birds who inhabited the trees and great reeds of his island. The crows served him with docility as messengers, the swallows came twittering to seat themselves on his shoulders or knees, on his head or breast; and he, on his side, built them nests with his own hands, little baskets made of rushes and bits of straw, which he placed under the thatch of his cell, and to which his gentle guests returned yearly, seeking their accustomed dwelling-places. "My father," said an astonished visitor, "how have you managed to give those daughters of solitude so much trust in you?" "Know you not," answered Guthlac, "that he who is united to God in purity of heart, sees in his turn all created things unite themselves to him? The birds of heaven, like the angels, seek those who do not seek the society of men."³⁰⁶

Like St. Romuald, he inspired the surrounding population with so much reverence for him, that speculations began to be made during his life on the price of his relics; the monk who came to him every twenty days to renew his tonsure thought seriously of using his razor to cut his throat, with the conviction that the place in which so great a saint perished would be enriched by the veneration of kings and princes.³⁰⁷

³⁰⁵ "Cum Britones, infesti hostes Saxonici generis, bellis, prædis publicisque vastationibus Anglorum gentem deturbarent. . . . Quadam nocte . . . extra cellulam egressus, et erectis auribus adstans verba loquentis vulgi Britannicæ agmina tectis succedere agnoscit: nam ille . . . inter illos exsulabat, quoadusque eorum stridulentas loquelas intelligere valuit." — Vita, c. 20.

³⁰⁶ "Velut magna lætitia avino forcipe flexuosi gutturis carmen canentes, veluti ad assuetas sedes . . . sese humeris viri Dei imposuerunt, ac deinde cantulis vocibus garrulentes. . . . Utquid incultæ solitudinis volucres. . . . Nonne legisti quia qui Deo puro spiritu copulabitur, omnia sibi in Deo conjunguntur, et qui ab hominibus cognosci denegat, agnoscere a feris et frequentari ab angelis quærit?" — Vita, c. 25.

³⁰⁷ "Quidam clericus, nomine Beccelinus. . . . Cum, ut adsolebat, post bis denos dierum cursus tonderare devenisset . . . proponens ut si ipsum

And finally, like St. Cuthbert, he had a friend, a noble and pious abbess, daughter of the King of the East Anglians, who offered to him, in testimony of their mutual affection, a leaden coffin and a shroud.³⁰⁸ He accepted these presents; and although he had vowed to wear neither woollen nor linen, but to dress himself entirely in the skins of beasts, he consented, for the love of Edburga, that his body should be buried in the linen which she had woven for him.³⁰⁹ He died after a week of severe suffering, but having still strength enough to rise and say mass on the day of his death, and afterwards to take the holy viaticum himself from the altar. He was still young; and during the fifteen years which he had passed in these marshes, had yet retained, in the midst of his austere solitude, that grave kindness and light-heartedness which are the inalienable inheritance of true monks and saints.³¹⁰

On receiving news of the death of his friend, Ethelbald hastened to the body of him who so long protected his misfortune and consoled his misery. He threw himself, bathed in tears, on his knees before the coffin. "My father," he cried, "thou who hast known all my sufferings, and who hast sustained me in all dangers, as long as thou livedst I could never despair. Thanks to thee, I know how to call upon the Lord, who has saved me up to this day. But if thou forsakest me, to whom can I have recourse? who will help, who will comfort me?"

The following night, in the midst of his tears and prayers, Guthlac appeared to him, resplendent with light, to confirm his ancient prediction, and to announce the end of his trials.³¹¹ interimere potuisset, locum ipsius postea cum magna regum principumque veneratione habiturus foret."—Ibid., c. 21.

³⁰⁸ See p. 479.

³⁰⁹ "Reverentissima virgo virginum Christi et sponsarum Egburga abbatisa, Aldulfi regis filia. . . . Nolui quidem juvenis ullo lineo tegmine corpus meum tegere, sed pro amore dilectæ Christi virginis, quæ hæc munera mihi mittebat."—Ibid., c. 33, 35. Egburga or Edburga then governed the same Monastery of Repton from which Guthlac had issued to shut himself up in Croyland.

³¹⁰ "Ut adsolebat hilari vultu secessit; nam semper gratia eximie charitatis in ore ipsius et vultu fulgebat."—Vita, c. 25.

³¹¹ "Pater mi, tu scis miseriae meas, tu semper adjutor mei fuisti, te vivente non desperabam in angustiis. . . . Hæc proloquens, se solo sternebat, et supplex orans crebris lacrymarum fluentis totum vultum rigavit. . . . Totam cellulam immensi luminis splendore circumfulgescere vidit. . . . Noli tristari, dies enim miserie tue præterierunt. . . . Nec illum fides fefellit: ex illo enim tempore usque in hodiernum diem infulata regni ipsius felicitas per tempora consequentia de die in diem crescebat."—Ibid., c. 39.

And in fact, two years after, Ethelbald succeeded to the throne of Mercia, which he occupied for forty years. The first use which he made of his power was to found a monastery at Croyland, in honor of him whom he continued to call his friend and consoler. Notwithstanding the difficulties involved in such a building, an immense abbey, richly endowed, and inhabited by a colony of monks brought from the new Abbey of Evesham,³¹² rose upon the site of his cell. Ethelbald built in the midst of these stagnant waters, upon piles driven into a little heap of earth which was brought from a distance in boats, to solidify the marsh which the industry of the monks was soon to render wholesome, and transform into fertile meadows. Croyland was specially distinguished for the knowledge of its monks, and occupied for several centuries the first rank among English monasteries. The coffin of Guthlac, taken from the earth in which it was to have been buried, by the tenderness of Ethelbald, and richly decorated, formed the principal ornament of the great church, built in stone, which replaced the modest wooden oratory where Ethelbald and Guthlac had prayed together. This church, often destroyed, was always rebuilt with increased magnificence; and its great bell, known as the largest and most harmonious in England, retained to its last day the name and recollection of the hermit whom its royal founder had so much loved.³¹³

It would be pleasant to believe that Ethelbald showed himself always worthy of the tender sympathy with which his holy friend had honored him in his youth. But this confidence is scarcely possible in presence of the famous and eloquent letter addressed to him by six English bishops, who were occupied during his whole reign in the work of evangelizing Germany, Continuation and end of the reign of Ethelbald in Mercia.

³¹² See, p. 439, the foundation of this abbey by Bishop Egwin, and its consecration by Wilfrid.

³¹³ "Sarcophagum non humo terræ condidit, immo in memoriale quod nunc ab Ethelbaldo rege miris ornamentorum structuris . . . ædificatum conspicimus. . . . Quia palustris humus lapideam molem sustinere non poterat, ingentes ex quercis palos innumeræ multitudinis homo infigi fecit, duramque terram . . . scaphis deferri et paludibus commisceri . . . ad honorem Dei et sancti anchorætæ quem valde dilexerat, pro dulci consolatione quam eo dam exulabat multoties perceperat." — Vita, c. 37, 41. Some remains of the abbey church of Croyland still exist, but these are of the church built in the twelfth or fourteenth century. In the tympanum of the portal, in the western front, five medallions in bas-relief represent the principal incidents in the life of Guthlac — his arrival in the marsh of Croyland in a boat, his first interview with Ethelbald, his death, &c.

and who had at their head the great Boniface. The holy apostle of the Germans went from England to the Continent the same year in which Ethelbald became king, and two years before the end of his reign he died the death of a martyr. The letter of the bishops informs us that the private conduct of the king awakened a religious and patriotic sorrow in those noble missionaries of Anglo-Saxon faith and glory. They accuse him, according to public report, of having sought in celibacy, not Christian mortification, but the satisfaction of his sensual instincts, and in the effervescence of his passions of respecting neither the domestic hearths of his fellow-citizens, nor even the sanctuaries of virgins consecrated to God.³¹⁴ They remind him in this respect of the honor paid to chastity by their heathen ancestors, the Saxons of Germany, and the cruel penalties which were exacted for adultery. They entreat him not to dishonor his old age, not to encourage the English nation by his example to descend by debauchery to the level of the degenerate nations of Spain and the south of Europe, of whom the Saxons had already made a prey. They reproach him besides with having violated the charters and stolen the possessions of several monasteries, and with authorizing the Mercian lords, by his example, to subject the monks and priests to violence and servitude, till then unknown in Christian England.³¹⁵

716-755.

On the other hand, these witnesses of imposing authority congratulate him highly on his charity to the poor, as well as on his zeal for the administration of justice, the protection of the weak, and the repression of local quarrels and disorders.

Other testimony informs us that he was a just, generous, and brave king; that, by his frequent and fortunate wars, the friend of Guthlac raised Mercia to a degree of power which it had never before reached, and that he was regarded as the 'supreme monarch of England up to the day on which, after a long and prosperous reign, he fell fighting against the ³¹⁴ "Quando aliqua injuria de statu regni vestri, vel eventu bellorum facta, aut quod majus est, de salute animæ periculosum dampnum perpetratum per auditum usque ad nos pervenerit, mœrore et tristitia cruciamur. . . . Qui nobis narrant, adjiciunt quod hoc scelus maxime cum sanctimonialibus et sacratis Deo virginibus per monasteria commissum sit. Audivimus præterea quod optimates pæne omnis gentis Merciorum tuo exemplo legitimas uxores deserant, et adulteras et sanctimoniales constuprent." — S. BONIFACII Epistolæ, 59, ed. Jaffé.

³¹⁵ "Et dicitur quod præfecti et comites tui majorem violentiam et servitutem monachis et sacerdotibus irrogent, quam cæteri ante Christiani reges fecissent." — Ibid.

West Saxons, in a struggle, the picturesque and impassioned narrative of which has been enshrined by popular poetry amid the historic annals of the period.³¹⁶

The kingdom of the West Saxons, which was to inherit the power of the Mercians, as the latter had inherited that of the Northumbrians, was destined to absorb all the kingdoms of the Heptarchy, and thus to create that English unity which no dismemberment has ever broken up. The dynasty of the sons of Cerdic, reputed by tradition to be himself the ninth in descent from the god Odin, was to produce Egbert and the great Alfred. It prefaced these generous lives by giving three kings, one after another, to the monastic order, which already owed to it the holy and learned Abbot Aldhelm. He who opened the march in a career which was so novel to the sons of Odin, was Centwin, son of the first Christian King of Wessex,³¹⁷ who, after a brilliant and warlike reign of nine years, interspersed with battles between the Mercians and Britons, determined to end his days in one of the monasteries which he had founded and endowed.³¹⁸ After him it was the turn of Ceadwalla, the ferocious devastator of the Isle of Wight, and the kingdoms of Kent and Sussex, who remained obstinately heathen, notwithstanding the conversion of his neighbors and his country, but who, all at once, at the age of thirty, recalling to his memory the instructions which he had received when himself in exile from the great exile Wilfrid,³¹⁹ abdicated his Three kings of the West Saxons abdicate to become monks or pilgrims to Rome.

Centwin.
676-685.

Ceadwalla.
685-689.

³¹⁶ HENRICUS HUNTINGDON, Historia Anglorum, l. iv. p. 341. The friend of Guthlac describes himself in a charter of 736, "Rex non solum Merciorum sed et omnium provinciarum quæ generali nomine Sut-Angli dicuntur;" and elsewhere, "Rex Britanniaë."

³¹⁷ Cynegils, converted and presented for baptism by his son-in-law, Oswald of Northumbria. See above, p. 284.

³¹⁸ His history is scarcely known to us, except through the verses of Aldhelm addressed to his daughter Bugga, who is perhaps the same as the abbess of that name to whom Boniface addressed several of his epistles:—

"Hoc templum Bugge pulchro molimine structum,
Nobilis erexit Centwini filia regis,
Qui prius imperium Saxonum rite regebat,
Donec præsentis contemnens culmina regni,
Divitias mundi rerumque reliquit habenas;
Plurima basilicis impendens rura novellis
Quæ nunc chisticolæ servant monastica jura. . . .
Exin sacratam perrexit quærere vitam,
Dum proprium linquit Christi pro nomine regnum. . . .
Donec conversus cellam migravit in aliam."

— Ed. Giles, p. 117.

³¹⁹ See above, p. 398.

crown, crossed the sea, the Alps, and Lombardy, and appeared at Rome, the first of the Anglo-Saxon kings, as Wilfrid, thirty years before, had been the first monastic pilgrim of the same race who had visited the Eternal City. He asked baptism from Pope Sergius, who conferred upon him the name of Peter, in memory of the great devotion which had brought him from so great a distance to the tomb of the prince of the apostles. Ten days later, before he had even laid aside the white robe of the catechumens, he died. The Pope gave orders that he should be buried in St. Peter's, and inscribed upon his tomb an epitaph in tolerable verse, intended to stir up the zeal of future generations by the example of the young and formidable victor, who had given up everything that he and his father had conquered or hoarded up, and abjured his barbarous religion to become the humble godson of St. Peter, and who had gone clothed with the whiteness of baptism to increase in heaven the flock of Christ.³²⁰

Ina, King
of Wessex,
688-725,

The crown of the West Saxons passed after him to Ina, the friend of St. Aldhelm, as Ceadwalla had been the friend of Wilfrid. His long and prosperous reign laid the foundations of the future ascendancy of his race over all England. Though very warlike and very fortunate in war, the conqueror of the Southern and Eastern Saxons, he owes his fame specially to the code of laws which he gave to his people, and which has been preserved in its integrity, like the laws given a century before by Ethelbert of Kent, with the help of the Roman missionaries.³²¹ Ina drew out his under the inspiration, and with the aid, of the two monk-bishops of Winchester and of ³²⁰ "Culmen, opes, sobolem, pollentia regna, triumphos,

Exuvias, proceres, mœnia, castra, lares :
Quæque patrum virtus, et quæ congresserat ipse,
Cædival armipotens, liquit amore Dei,
Ut Petrum sedemque Petri rex cerneret hospes. . . .
Barbaricam rabiem, nomen et inde suum
Conversus convertit ovans. . . .

Urbem Romuleam vidit, templumque verendum
Aspexit, Petri mystica dona gerens.
Candidus inter oves Christi sociabilis ibit :
Corpore nam tumulum, mente superna tenet :
Commutasse magis sceptrorum insignia credas,
Quem regnum Christi promeruisse vides."

— Apud BEDE, v. 7.

³²¹ Dooms of Ina, ap. THORPE, Ancient Laws and Institutes of England, p. 45.

London,³²² of his earls, and all the wise men (witan) who composed the parliament of his three kingdoms, and besides, according to his own declaration, with the help of many monks or servants of God, in order to provide for the salvation of souls and the prosperity of his people. Among these laws may be remarked some which guarantee the inviolability of marriage, and the sanctity of betrothal; consecrate the right of asylum in churches; improve the condition of the peasants, while maintaining their feudal thralldom to the soil of their lords; provide for the support of their widows and orphans; forbid the exportation of slaves, and declare free of all bondage the slave who should be compelled by his master to work on Sunday.³²³

He pursued with energy the struggle with the Britons of Wales, and finally succeeded in incorporating into his kingdom those of Cornwall, dethroning the king of that province, to whom Aldhelm had addressed his famous letter upon the Celtic Easter.³²⁴ But Ina, who was himself born of a Celtic mother, consulting at once the precepts of Christian morality and the well-understood interests of his nation, completed the pacification of the conquered population by guaranteeing the validity of marriages contracted between Saxons and Britons, and entered into relations with the Celts of Armorica.³²⁵ He rebuilt and endowed magnificently the national sanctuary of the Britons at Glastonbury,³²⁵ consecrating to this work of conciliation the thirty thousand pounds of silver which he had torn, sword in hand, from the Jutes of Kent, on account of were, or compensation for the life of a West Saxon prince whom they had burned

Victor, and pacificator
of the Britons,

³²² Hedda, the friend and predecessor of Aldhelm and Erconwald.

³²³ "Ego Ine Dei gratia West-Saxonum rex, exhortatione et doctrina. . . Heddæ episcopi mei . . . et omnium Aldermannorum micorum et seniorum et sapientum regni mei, multaque congregatione servorem Dei, sollicitus de salute animarum nostrarum et de statu regni mei, constituti rectum conjugium et justa judicia pro stabilitate et confirmatione populi mei benigna sedulitate celebrari. . . Si servus operetur dominica die per præceptum domini sui, sit liber: si liber operetur illa die sine jussu domini sui, perdat libertatem suam." — Latin text in the Chronicle of John of Brompton, ap. TWYSDEN, Script. Ang., i. 761.

³²⁴ See above, p. 543.

³²⁵ Judicial tradition noticed by LAPPENBERG, p. 258.

³²⁶ See vol. i. p. 657. Henschen, the learned and conscientious Bollandist, after having quoted two apocryphal charters of Ina in favor of Glastonbury, in vol. i. of February, pp. 907, 908, has acknowledged and proclaimed the falsehood of the articles in vol. ii. of April, p. 31. He adds modestly: "Si eadem, quæ nunc Aprillem absolvantibus, adfuisse scientia Februarium tractantibus, explodi ista potuissent."

alive.³²⁷ He thus testified the veneration of the Saxon conquerors for the celebrated monastery which, after having been the cradle of Celtic Christianity,³²⁸ and the tomb of King Arthur, was about to become one of the principal centres of Anglo-Saxon monachism, and one of the burying-places of English royalty. It is the sole example in Great Britain of a religious foundation which has become equally dear and sacred to the two races — to the victors as to the vanquished.

With the help of the princes and patricians of his own country, Ina founded or enriched many other monasteries,³²⁹ being specially guided in his good works by the most illustrious abbot in Wessex, his friend and cousin Aldhelm, whom he had drawn from the cloister of Malmesbury to make him a bishop, and whose counsels he followed with affectionate docility.³³⁰

And, finally, thanks to Ina, at the moment when Aldhelm disappeared from the scene, one of the most illustrious of the saints whom England has given to the Church rises on our sight, the great Winefred, whose youth was spent in a monastery in Wessex, from which Ina took him to intrust him with certain delicate negotiations with the Archbishop of Canterbury.³³¹ This is the first appearance in history of him who was to be the victor over Teutonic heathenism, the true Christian conqueror of Germany, and whose name, Latinized into Boniface, is inscribed in ineffaceable characters in history along with those of Charles Martel and of Charlemagne.

While Ina was still in full possession of his power and popularity,³³² after thirty-seven years of a prosperous and glorious reign, his wife, Ethelburga, in whose veins, as in his own, ran the warlike blood of Cerdic, and who had shared all the cares of his life even to the point of victoriously leading his people to battle in his absence, persuaded him to give

³²⁷ Chron. Anglo-Sax., ad. ann. 687 and 694. LINGARD, History, p. 161.

³²⁸ See vol. i. pp. 658 and 674.

³²⁹ See details on the part he took in the foundation of Abingdon, given in the Chronicon Monasterii de Abingdon, c. 12, 13, newly published by J. Stevens in the Rerum Britannic Scriptores. In an assembly held in 704, he confirmed the monasteries of Wessex in their charters and possessions, by a deed signed by all the principes, senatores, judices, et patricii. — KEMBLE, Cod. Diplomat., n. 50 and 51.

³³⁰ "Adfuit pater Aldhelmus cujus ille præcepta audiebat humiliter suscipiebat granditer, adimplebat hilariter." — De Regib., lib. i. c. 2.

³³¹ S. WILLEBALDI Vita S. Bonifacii, c. 4.

³³² "Sine alto insidiarum metu securus incanuit, sanctissimus amoris publici lenocinatur." — GUILL. MALMESB., l. c.

up his throne and the world. According to narratives which unfortunately are not given us by contemporaries, but which are in conformity with the characteristic conditions of Anglo-Saxon nature, the queen's device for deciding Ina to the sacrifice which she meant to make along with him, was after the following fashion:—A great banquet, accompanied by all the refinements of lordly luxury in these days, had been given in one of the royal villas. Next morning the princely pair set out on their journey, but after riding for an hour or two, the queen begged her husband to return whence they came. He consented, and on returning to the castle, he was struck with consternation to find the scene of the recent rejoicings not only silent and desert, but destroyed and desecrated. It was covered with ruins and filth, and the very bed on which they had slept was occupied by a sow with her litter. The astonished king looked at the queen, who had given secret orders to this effect to the steward of the villa, for an explanation. "Yes, my lord husband," said Ethelburga, "where are now our yesterday's pleasures? where are our purple hangings, our gay parasites, our heavy silver dishes and delicate meats? All has passed away like smoke, and those who prize such pleasures shall pass away like them. Behold, then, I pray you, into what misery falls this flesh which we feed so delicately; and we who are fed still more daintily than other men, shall not we fall into a still more miserable corruption?"³³³

This was enough, according to the legend, to determine the king to think only for the future of his soul. Authentic history proves his abdication, which was given in the midst of a Parliament of Witan, to whom he announced his resolution to pass the rest of his days in penitence.³³⁴ Then, accompanied by Ethelburga, he went to Rome. He arrived there after a long and painful journey, to end his life in penitence and obscurity. According to some accounts, he embraced monastic life according to the rule of St. Benedict;³³⁵ according to others,

Ina abdicates, and dies in obscurity at Rome. 726-728.

³³³ "Villicus ex reginæ conscientia . . . in lecto ubi cubuerant porcam noviter enixam collocat. . . . Regis oculi ad mulierem rediere. Et ubi sunt, ait, domine conjux, hesterni strepitus! . . . Nonne nos qui ingurgitamur uberius, putrescimus miserius? . . . Maritum compulit in sententiam exemplo, quam multis annis frustra insusurraverat verbo." — GUILL. MALMESB., l. c.

³³⁴ LINGARD, i. 162.

³³⁵ Act. SS. Bolland., t. i. Febr., p. 913. MABILLON, Act. SS. O. S. B., t. iii. p. 465.

he preferred, for humility's sake, to remain lost in the crowds of poor pilgrims, with neither tonsure nor cowl, gaining his livelihood by the work of his hands.³³⁶

Upon the left bank of the Tiber, then almost desert, and not far from the Vatican, the lawgiver and king founded under the name of Schola Saxonum, an establishment for the orthodox education of young princes, and for the priests and clerks of his country who desired to complete their religious and literary education in the shadow of the basilica of St. Peter.³³⁷ He added to this a church and burying-ground specially intended for his countrymen, and in which he was himself buried, for he died in Rome in the obscurity he had voluntarily sought. His faithful Ethelburga remained with him till his death, and then returning, became a nun in England.

The great Benedictine Wilfrid had set the example of these pilgrimages to Rome, which nobody had thought of before his time.³³⁸ Some years after his death it became a kind of epidemic. During the seventh and eighth centuries Rome was the meeting-place of innumerable pilgrims, who came from all quarters of the West to see the holy city, and pray by the tombs of the saints and martyrs. By no nation was this pious duty accomplished with greater zeal and fervor than by the Anglo-Saxons. Their kings set them the example,³³⁹ differing in that point from the Merovingians, not a single individual of whom ever crossed the Alps to go to Rome.

An irresistible attraction to the Eternal City soon became apparent among Saxons of all ranks; princes and bishops, rich and poor, priests and laity, men and women, undertook the pilgrimage with eagerness, often going so far as to repeat ³³⁶ GUILL. MALMESB., l. c. "Dux fœmina facti," adds the monastic historian, steeped, like all his fellows, in the recollections of classical antiquity.

³³⁷ It was transformed by Innocent III. into a hospital, which has become, under the title of S. Spirito in vico de Sassia, the most celebrated in Rome. Other traditions attribute this important foundation to young Offa of Essex, who also died a monk at Rome (RICHARD DE CIRENCESTER, p. 229, ed. Mayor), or, again, to the powerful Offa, King of Mercia, who died in 796, and will be referred to further on. In any case, the latter was a great benefactor of the national foundation in Rome, the doors of which he opened to students of all countries. "Ut ibidem peregrini . . . ex diversis mundi partibus barbari . . . linguas quas non noverint, addiscerent." — MATH. PARIS, in Vitis Abbatum S. Albani, c. 1.

³³⁸ See p. 306.

³³⁹ Lingard counts as many as eight kings, including, however, Ethelwulf and Canute, who belong to a later period. — Antiquities, i. 116.

the journey notwithstanding its difficulties and dangers.³⁴⁰ They were so numerous that, collecting round the foundation of King Ina, they gave their name to an entire quarter of the city, the Vicus Saxonum,³⁴¹ situated in the immediate neighborhood of St. Peter's, and inhabited exclusively by them. They came, says their historian, to make acquaintance in their lifetime with the saints, by whom they hoped to be well received in heaven.

But as there were false monks who introduced even into the cloister the indolence and vices of worldly life, so there were also false pilgrims whom frivolous or guilty motives carried abroad; and the monastic writers have remarked the one as well as the other. The wandering inclination of the Teutonic races may well have contributed, after the first impulse of fervent and sincere piety, to increase the number of those undevout pilgrims who often scandalized by their conduct the Christian countries through which they travelled. Women especially, and even virgins consecrated to God, excited the just indignation of the priests and the faithful in France and Italy, by their license and lamentable downfalls, during their journeys to Rome. The melancholy revelations transmitted by the great apostle of Germany on this point to his colleague and countryman, Bishop Cuthbert of Canterbury, which led the latter to request the English assemblies and princes to forbid absolutely the pilgrimages of women and nuns to Rome, will not bear repetition.³⁴²

Their disorderly behavior.

I shall have succeeded poorly in expounding the history of these times, and ill served the truth, if the reader has not been struck by the singular mixture of good and evil, peace and war, freedom and slavery, which, from the beginning of Anglo-Saxon Christianity, shows itself in all the relations between society and the Church. It is evident that goodness

³⁴⁰ "Cupiens in vicinia sanctorum locorum ad tempus peregrinari in erris, quo familiarius a sanctis recipi mereretur in cœlis; quod his temporibus plures de gente Anglorum, nobiles, ignobiles, laici, clerici, viri ac feminae certatim facere consueverunt." — BEDE, v. 7.

³⁴¹ From whence comes the name Sassia, still preserved in this part of Rome.

³⁴² "Aliquod levamentum turpitudinis esset, si prohiberent synodus et principes vestri mulieribus et velatis feminis illud iter et frequentiam, quam ad Romanum civitatem veniendo et redeundo faciunt; quia magna ex parte pereunt, paucis remanentibus integris. Perpaucæ enim sunt civitates in Longobardia, vel in Francia, vel in Gallia, in qua non sit adultera vel meretrix generis Anglorum: quod scandalum est et turpitudine totius Ecclesiæ." — S. BONIFACII Epist. ad Cuthbertum archiepiscopum.

had the advantage over evil, but that the evil was formidable, the dangers continual and flagrant, the deceivers and ill-doers more numerous than the saints. This, notwithstanding, has been called the Golden Age of religion in England ; not without reason, if the name has been given by comparison with later periods, but wrongly if attributed solely to its real merits. The fact is, that in true history there is no golden age. All ages, without exception, are infected by the evil which proceeds from man's natural corruption. All bear witness to his incurable weakness, but at the same time all proclaim his greatness and freedom, as well as the justice and mercy of God, his Maker and Redeemer.

BOOK XIV.

SOCIAL AND POLITICAL INFLUENCE OF THE MONKS AMONG THE ANGLO-SAXONS.

“ Record we too, with just and faithful pen,
That many hooded cenobites there are,
Who in their private cells have yet a care
Of public quiet; unambitious Men,
Counsellors for the world, of piercing ken;
Whose fervent exhortations from afar
Move Princes to their duty, peace or war;
And oft-times in the most forbidding den
Of solitude, with love of science strong,
How patiently the yoke of thought they bear. . . .
By such examples moved to unbought pains
The people work like congregated bees;
Eager to build the quiet fortresses,
Where piety, as they believe, obtains
From heaven a general blessing; timely rains
And sunshine; prosperous enterprise, and peace and equity.”
WORDSWORTH.

The conversion and religious organization of England entirely the work of monks. — Their patience and perseverance; letter of Bishop Daniel to the missionary Boniface; no violence; mildness and toleration. — Their influence over the nature they had converted; evil survives, but the good outweighs it. — Alliance between the Church and secular society, without the exclusive preponderance of either. — These apostolic monks were no longer fathers of the desert, but the creators of a Church and nation. — Towns grow up around the great communities. — The monasteries give rise to cathedrals and parishes. — Propagation of the Benedictine order. — Protection assured to the monastic order by the Councils of Beccanelde and Cloveshove. — Religious instruction in the national tongue. — Musical liturgy. — Crosses in the open air. — Services rendered to education by monasteries and monastic bishops. — St. John of Beverley. — Fondness of the Anglo-Saxon students for horsemanship. — Services rendered to agriculture. — Position of the monks as landlords. — Close alliance between the monastic order and the Anglo-Saxon aristocracy. — Intervention in political matters. — Their place in the national councils. — Authority, composition, and powers of these councils. — The distinction between the temporal and spiritual is not forgotten. — Influence of monks in these assemblies, and through them on laws and manners. — They contribute to the formation of that national unity which, since the ninth century, has never been disturbed. — Their devotion to the cause of the poor: expiation for the sins of the rich gives rise to public almsgiving. — Their zeal for the liberation of slaves; contest between an archbishop and an abbot for a young captive. — The rights of man as well as those of God vindicated by the monks throughout the history of their conquest of England. — Religion is too often left defenceless, but her ministers respect honor and the freedom of thought in regard to the things of God. — The monastic missionaries perfect the national character without changing it; the spirit of the Saxons still lives in modern England; modern liberty, self-government, and parliamentary rule are rooted in the Saxon times. — Conformity of monastic rules with the tone of Anglo-Saxon institutions. — Splendor and prodigality of the aristocracy. — Motives of their gifts. — Abuse of their grants of land. — Folk-land and boc-land. — Monastic possessions exempt from military service and from taxes. — Public danger remarked by Bede. — Repression of many abuses by the Council of Cloveshove; it decrees against monastic luxury and wealth, and against the false ideas prevalent as to almsgiving. — The monastic riches arising from the munificence of kings and nobles soon excite envy; fluctuations and oppressions noticed by St. Boniface; necessity of a limit which might be imposed by the Church herself on the increase of monastic possessions. — Their value forms a pretext for spoliation and heresy. — Lacordaire and Mabillon. — A Spanish Benedictine martyred in 1608. — Before reaching this point England becomes the home of Christian propagandism and the instructress of the Teutonic races. — At the death of Bede, Boniface is already the apostle of Germany.

I.

597. A CENTURY and a half passed between the establishment of St. Augustin at Canterbury and the
735. final erection of a second metropolitan see at York — between the first written laws of the first Christian king of Kent, and those decrees of the Council of Cloveshove which established a sort of confederation among the
747. Anglo-Saxon bishops, and at the same time sanctioned and made general¹ the parochial system, which is still the foundation of temporal and spiritual life in the country districts of England.²

¹ "Ut una fit omnium concordia . . . in sermone, in opere, in iudicio, sine cuiusquam adulatione personæ. . . . Ut licet sedibus sint divisi per diversa loca, tamen mentibus conjuncti in uno spiritu Deo deserviant." — Cap. 2. For all the details of this famous council, which was held in the presence of the Mercian King Ethelbald, the friend of the holy monk Guthlac, see the excellent narrative of Lingard, Antiquities, vol. i. p. 124, and Note G.

² Cap. 9, 10, 14. Cf. LE PLAY, La Réforme Sociale déduite de l'Observation Comparée des Peuples Européens, t. ii. ch. 7, § 55.

During this interval all the inhabitants of Great Britain had become Christian; and all Britons and Saxons had acknowledged the supremacy of the Holy See, substituting everywhere the observances of Rome in place of the ancient customs of Celtic Christianity.

This great victory was the exclusive work of the monks.

With no human aid — with at the most the protecting sympathy of a woman³ to help them — they entered all the kingdoms of the Heptarchy, one by one, as missionaries, and remained there as bishops, as pastors, as permanent preachers. Little by little they thus conquered the British soil, and covered it with their establishments. Their work had been slow and difficult. Stormy incidents and melancholy changes had not been wanting in it. Sons did not always allow themselves to be led by the example of their fathers, nor nations by that of their neighbors. Let us recall the first defection of the Jutes in Kent immediately after the death of Ethelbert, the double apostasy of the Saxons of the East, the rage of the old British Christians against the Teutonic converts, the destruction by fire and sword of the new-born Christianity in Northumbria, the horrible ravages of the heathen Penda among all his Christian neighbors!

All these difficulties and trials they met only with an unconquerable perseverance and gentleness. A hundred and fifty years after the arrival of Augustin, a holy abbot, friend of St. Aldhelm, and, like him, trained at Malmesbury, revealed the secret of their power to his illustrious countryman St. Boniface, who was then occupied in carrying the light of the Gospel from England to Germany. "To overcome," he said, "the obstinacy of heathen savages — to fertilize the stony and barren soil of their hearts — pains must be taken not to insult or irritate them, but to set our doctrines before them with unfailing moderation and gentleness, so as to make them blush at their foolish superstitious without exasperating them."⁴

Thus armed the monks finally triumphed everywhere; and everywhere, with the free consent of

The conversion and religious organization of England accomplished solely by monks.

To effect this conquest they

³ Bertha the Merovingian in Kent; her daughter Ethelburga in Northumbria; the heathen bride of the holy King Oswald in Wessex; and the Christian bride of the son of Penda in Mercia.

⁴ "Non quasi insultando vel irritando eos, sed placide ac magna objicere moderatione debes." — Epist. 15 inter Bonifacianas, ed. Jaffé.

used only
the arms of patience and toleration.

the people, proved by the public deliberations of the national assemblies of each kingdom, where each had the freedom of giving an answer in his turn.⁵

Let us repeat, to the immortal glory of the monastic conquerors of England, that neither they, their disciples, nor their protectors, used violence or persecution for the aid of evangelical truth.⁶ The faith as preached by the monks was nowhere enforced by a master; nowhere was it admitted without examination and discussion; nowhere was it propagated or defended among our insular Saxons by the sanguinary means used by Charlemagne among the Saxons on the other side of the Rhine.

At a later period, it is true, in conformity with the general spirit of Christian nations, and in proportion as the ties between religion and society became closer, penal legislation often transformed itself into a helper of Christian morality and ecclesiastical discipline. The assemblies in which bishops and abbots had a place beside kings and landowners, often decreed severe or shameful penalties for apostasy,⁷ for the violation of Sunday rest or the fasts of Lent,⁸ and especially for drunkenness and incontinence, which were the most common vices among the Anglo-Saxons. But these penalties never went the length of torture or bloodshed, as often happened where the Byzantine laws had infected Catholic nations with its poison. Up to the present moment, thanks to God, in these distant centuries, in the midst of gross immorality, beside scandals which we have not attempted to conceal or deny, we have not met with one single bloody or cruel act which can be attributed to any Anglo-Saxon bishop, priest, or monk. Faithful to the precepts and example of their first and glorious master St. Gregory the Great, they gained hearts and governed souls by the irresistible might of kindness; and though not above the reach of human infirmity, remained long strangers and superior to the bitterness, covetousness, and violence which are too often to be met with in the his-

⁵ "Habito cum sapientibus consilio, sciscitabatur singillatim ab omnibus, qualis sibi doctrina hæc . . . videretur. . . . Cateri majores natu ac regis consilarii." — BEDE, ii. 13.

⁶ We have quoted the only exception to this rule in Sussex, p. 396.

⁷ The most severe penalty pronounced against apostasy was that of healsfang, which interpreters translate as stocks or pillory — a penalty, however, which might be evaded by the contributions of friends. — THORPE, i. 45; LINGARD, i. 112.

⁸ BEDE, iii. 8.

tory of the Church, and which she has always had to pay for by a loss of souls.

Such apostles found neophytes worthy of them. "No nation," says with justice Edmund Burke, the most illustrious of their descendants, "has embraced Christianity with more fervor and simplicity than the Anglo-Saxons."⁹ The permanent and generous struggle, which shows itself everywhere from the moment of their conversion, between their new principles and their old instincts, their savage traditions of murder, vengeance, and debauchery, demonstrate at once the sincerity of their faith and the merit of their submission. For a long time they alternate between atrocious crimes and unbounded penances, between audacious rapine and a giving up of all earthly goods, between odious outrages upon modesty and vows of perpetual chastity. They were capable of every sin to satisfy their passions, and were not less capable of every sacrifice to expiate their excesses. But in the long run, and sometimes very speedily, goodness carried the day, and, except for some terrible backslidings which were inevitable, remained master of the field, thanks to the generous and unwearied efforts of the monastic apostles. Wherever the hand, the words, the spirit of the monk, bishop, or missionary can reach, a uniform tendency is evident, both in morals and laws, in word and deed, towards justice, humanity, the love of goodness, and neighborly charity; subduing the native fierceness of their countrymen; struggling against the most popular vices and excesses; introducing intellectual culture; creating and maintaining social peace from religious motives. The great mission which devolved upon the Church after the ruin of the Empire, that of restraining and ennobling the barbarians, of purifying and transforming their souls, was never more completely fulfilled.

And perhaps also the alliance between the two societies temporal and spiritual, between Church and State, was never more completely and happily realized. It was the climax of this union, at least in England, a moment which had its stains and miseries like everything here below, but which was free on both sides from permanent and systematic excesses. No king of the period attempted to govern or use the Church for his own advantage; no pontiff, in these exclusively monastic times, claimed that deceitful ascendancy which precedes or produces decadence and rebellion.

⁹ BURKE, Essay towards an Abridgment of English History, c. iii.

Certainly the Anglo-Saxon monks, instruments of a revolution so fruitful, and creators of an organization so brilliant and lasting, had nothing, except their name, their celibate condition, their faith in Jesus Christ and His Church, in common with the Fathers of the desert, or even with the rare and austere companions of St. Benedict. Far from flying the company of other Christians, they impersonated or created Christian society around them. Far from thinking of their own salvation alone, they labored without intermission, first for the salvation of infidels, and afterwards for the maintenance of faith and morality in the new Christian communities formed by their instructions. Far from confining themselves to prayer or manual labor, they cultivated and extended with enthusiasm all the knowledge and literature possessed by the world in their days. The distant places to which they had been first led by a love of solitude changed rapidly, and as if by force of circumstances, into cathedrals, cities, towns, or rural colonies, and served as centres, schools, libraries, workshops, and citadels to the scarcely converted families, parties, and tribes. Around the monastic cathedrals and the principal communities, towns which are still in existence formed rapidly, and municipal liberties soon dawned into life among them, the vital guarantees of which still exist along with the very names of the magistrates charged with their defence and maintenance.¹⁰

All the bishops of the Heptarchy, as our narrative must have proved, issued from monasteries; the clergy of the cathedrals were exclusively monks who lived in community with their diocesan prelate at their head. For a century at least they held the place of the secular or parochial clergy. The monasteries were centres from which missionaries went forth to the rural stations to baptize, preach, and celebrate all the ceremonies of worship, and into which they returned to revive themselves by study and prayer. Rural parishes were formed but slowly under the influence of Archbishop Theodore in the south, and of archbishop Egbert and Bede in the north. The monasteries thus long supplied in Christian England the place not only of cathedrals but of parish churches. Most of the cathedrals preserved their monastic character until long after the Norman Con-

The monasteries answer the purpose of cathedrals or parishes.

670.

730.

¹⁰ KEMBLE, vol. ii. pp. 330, 338.

quest. The decrees of the council of Cloveshove, in 747, are the first authentic documents which treat as a general fact the distribution of lay lands into districts administered by priests under the control of bishops, in distinction from churches situated in the lands belonging to the monasteries and served by priests under the control of their abbots. The latter churches, in which the priest was always assisted by a deacon and several clerks, were sometimes called monasteriuncula.

When parishes were thus organized, most of the priests placed at the head of the new divisions of the country were naturally brought from the monasteries.¹¹ All was to make or to make anew in that great work, for it must be repeated that every trace of ancient British Christianity had disappeared before the Saxons. Except at Glastonbury, which had been at all times one of the great centres of Celtic devotion,¹² in the little Roman church at Canterbury, where Queen Bertha was wont to pray,¹³ and at Evesham where the ruins of a little British church were found in the thicket which had to be cleared away for the foundation of the new abbey,¹⁴ no vestige of the Christianity of the Britons or Romans is to be found in the history of the conquest of England by the monks.

This extension of their office and influence had not been attained in any other Christian nation; but it did not banish from the mind of the Anglo-Saxon monks the necessity of maintaining and guaranteeing the fundamental conditions of their institution. The rule of St. Benedict, which had been brought into England along with the Gospel by the first envoys of the Benedictine pope, St. Gregory the Great, had followed step by step the progress of evangelization and Roman supremacy, and finally supplanted all the monastic regulations of Celtic countries or times. From Wilfrid to Bede, all the popular saints, Cuthbert, Egwin, Benedict Biscop, Botolph, and Aldhelm, distinguished themselves by their zeal for the Benedictine rule, although giving to it slight modifications and additions such as suited the country and age. There existed, however, no hierarchical connection among the different monasteries, no

Extension
of the Benedictine order.

¹¹ Lingard (Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church, vol. i. p. 457) perfectly explains all that concerns the organization of the parochial clergy. See what has been said above, p. 351.

¹² See p. 657.

¹³ See p. 155.

¹⁴ See p. 439.

chapter general, and, except the tie formed by Wilfrid between the nine or ten houses founded by himself,¹⁵ no general congregation of different communities, such as has been so general since. The only link between the continually increasing monasteries which covered the British soil was in the code, already a thing of antiquity, which had come from Rome with the Christian faith, and which the second council of Cloveshove names simply the Rule, as if it had become the sole rule recognized and put in practice.¹⁶

The monastic order guaranteed by the councils

Most of the councils held in England from the end of the seventh century gave a place to monastic interests in their decrees which was in keeping with the preponderance of monastic prelates in the assemblies where these decrees were discussed or promulgated. Let us note the council of Beccancelde,¹⁷ called, in 694, by Withred, King of Kent, the fifth descendant of Ethelbert, which was presided over by Archbishop Brithwald, and at which the learned Grecian, Tobie, Bishop of Rochester, many abbots, priests, lords, and five abbesses, were present.¹⁸

Of Beccancelde, 694;

The king summed up the deliberations of the assembly. "I desire," said he, "that the monasteries and churches which have been given or bequeathed for the glory of God, in the time of the faithful kings, my relatives and predecessors, may remain dedicated to Him forever. I, Withred, earthly king, moved by the celestial King, and inspired by the love of justice, have learned from our ancestors that no layman has a right to take possession of any church whatsoever, nor of anything that belongs to that church. For this reason we interdict all kings, our successors, all eorls, or other laymen, from exercising authority over churches or their possessions which I and my predecessors have given as a perpetual inheritance to Christ, to the Holy Virgin, and to the apostles. When an abbot or abbess dies, let notice be given to the archbishop, and let his successor be chosen only after the purity of his life has been acknowledged by the bishop. It ¹⁵ See p. 447.

¹⁶ Cap. 24. Cf. MABILLON, præf. in 1 sæcul., § 87.

¹⁷ This is supposed to be Beckenham, or, according to Hook, Bapchild, near Sittingbourne.

¹⁸ "Cæteris abbatibus, abbatissis, presbyteris, diaconibus, ducibus, satrapis, in unum glomeratis; pariter tractantes, anxie examinantes de statu ecclesiarum Dei vel monasteriorum intra Cantiam."—Proëm. ms. Cantuar., ap. COLETTI Concil., vol. viii. p. 77. We will speak of these abbesses further on.

is the king's duty to choose the eorls and ealdormen, the sheriffs and judges: but it is the office of the archbishop to rule the church of God, to elect and constitute bishops, abbots, abbesses, priests and deacons, and to confirm them by his good example."¹⁹

Another decree of the same council exempts the monasteries of Kent from all secular bondage, and notably from maintaining the king and lords during their journeys, which is an evidence that monastic hospitality, always so generous and spontaneous, had been cruelly abused by the greed and rapacity of powerful laymen.²⁰ Three years after, in a new assembly held at Berkhamstead, presided over by the same king and archbishop, and entitled a council, though many warriors occupied seats in it along with the clergy, the freedom of the Church was again guaranteed along with that of its jurisdiction, its property, and its prayers.²¹ The decrees of these councils held in the kingdom of Kent, under the presidency of the metropolitan, were soon adopted over all England. They were solemnly confirmed at the first council of Cloveshove in 742 by Ethelbald, King of the Mercians, who was then the most powerful prince of the Heptarchy, and who, from his youthful friendship with the hermit Guthlac, had always been well disposed towards the monks.²² It

Of Berkhamstead.
697;

And of Cloveshove
742.

¹⁹ "Volo ut omnes monasteria et ecclesiæ quæ fuerint datæ et legatæ Dei in gloriam, regum fidelium meorum prædecessorum diebus . . . ita supersint Dei in honorem et firmiter remaneant in sæcula sæculorum. Cum ego Wihtrædus, terrestris rex, a cœlesti Rege incitatus et spiritu justitiæ accensus, a nostris avis illud didicerim quod nullus laicus jure debet seipsum immittere in quamvis ecclesiam." — Chron. Saxon., ed. Gibson, p. 48. Neither Bede nor Malmesbury mentions this council. Spelman, however, has found its decrees in five different MSS. The double report of these decrees given after his account in Coletti, vol. viii. p. 77, is much longer than that of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, but contains no essential addition.

²⁰ "Ex hac die donamus ecclesiis regni nostri liberas esse perpetua libertate ab omnibus difficultatibus secularis servitutis a pastu regis, principum, comitum . . . ab omni debito vel pulsione regalium tributorum, ut possint, pro nobis Deo omnipotenti hostias dignas offerre, nostraque peccata abluere immaculatis numeribus . . . nisi sua spontanea voluntate, ex largitate beneficiorum quid facere velint." — Concilia, vol. viii. pp. 78, 80.

²¹ "Libera sit ecclesia, fruaturque suis judiciis, et redditibus seu pensionibus. Pro rege preces fiant, mandatisque ejus, non cogente necessitate, sed ex sponte obediunt." — Concilia, vol. viii. p. 99. This Latin is a much more recent translation of the Saxon text of the twenty-eight articles intituled Judicia (Dooms) of Wihtræd.

²² "Studiose requirentes qualiter in primordio nascentis ecclesiæ hic in Anglia jubebatur haberi honor cœnobiorum secundum normam aequitatis . . . tandem pervenit ad manus libertas ecclesiarum et institutio Wihtrædi regis de electione et auctoritate cœnobiorum in regno Cantix." — Concilia, was at the same time decided that the exemption from all contributions to the public treasury granted to the monks did not extend to the taxes levied for the three principal necessities of the time (trinoda necessitas), the preservation of roads and bridges (brycegbote), of national fortresses (burghbote), and of military expeditions (fyrð).

The second council of Cloveshove — which was the most important of the Anglo-Saxon assemblies of the eighth century,²³ and was called in consequence of a celebrated letter from St. Boniface to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and specially because of the severe orders of Pope Zacharius — added new guarantees and also new obligations to the already important mission of the monks, taking effectual measures against the abuses and oppressions which had been pointed out almost at the same moment by Boniface in his letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and by Bede to the Archbishop of York.

II.

Religious instruction in the national language. It is then to the monks scattered as missionaries and preachers over the country, or united in the numerous communities of episcopal cities and other great monastic centres, that must be in justice attributed the initiation of the Anglo-Saxons into the truths of religion as well as into the consoling and readily-adopted observances of Catholic worship. They were expressly commanded to teach and explain to their flocks, in the vernacular tongue, the Decalogue, the Lord's Prayer, the Apostles' Creed, and the sacred words which were used in the celebration of mass and the administration of baptism; to expound to them every Sunday, in English, the epistle and gospel of the day, and to preach, or, instead of preaching, to read them something useful to their souls.²⁴

The zeal of the Angle-Saxon kings²⁵ and people for reli-

vol. viii. p. 267. Cloveshove or Cliff'shoo, where these famous councils were held, is placed by the best authorities at Cliff, near Rochester, in the part of Kent between the Thames and Medway. Others suppose that these councils were held at Abingdon or Tewkesbury, which was then one of the great abbeys of Gloucestershire.

²³ See above, p. 600, note 1.

²⁴ "Ut symbolum fidei ac dominicam orationem, sed et sacrosancta quoque verba quæ in missæ celebratione et officio baptismi solemniter dicuntur, interpretari atque exponere posse propria lingua qui nesciant, discant." — Concil. Clovesh., can. 16. Cf. THORPE, op. cit., p. 159, and LINGARD, Antiquities, vol. i. p. 167.

²⁵ See p. 285.

gious instruction in their own language has been already pointed out. From this spring those homilies in Anglo-Saxon which are so often to be met with among the manuscripts in our libraries, and which are by several centuries of an earlier date than the earliest religious documents of any other modern language. Thence also came those translations of Holy Scripture which abounded in the cloisters from the seventh century, and which probably were circulated outside their boundaries, — translations ascribed by certain historians to the pens of the most illustrious monks — to Aldhelm and the Venerable Bede, who are said to have completely translated, the one the Psalter, and the other the Old and New Testaments.²⁶

The Sunday rest, still more scrupulously observed in England than in any other Christian country, was, from the beginning of the monastic mission, the object of special precautions. The Penitentiary of Theodore records the most minute regulations for preserving laborers, vine-dressers, and gardeners, as well as needle-women, spinners, and washer-women, from any infringement of that essential guarantee of freedom for both body and soul.²⁷

The solemn beauty of the worship celebrated in the monastic churches was increased by the liturgical uniformity in accordance with Roman rites which had been everywhere substituted for the Celtic, and were formally decreed by the council of Cloveshove.²⁸ And it must have had a still greater effect upon the people, from the gradual introduction of organs, the powerful melody of which our Aldhelm had already celebrated.²⁹ The first mention of them in England is connected with the abbey of Malmesbury, which, being situated

²⁶ LAPPENBERG, vol. i. p. 197.

²⁷ "Nec viri ruralia opera exerceant, nec in vinea colenda, nec in campos arando, metundo, vel fœnum secando, vel sæpem ponendo. . . . Nec in horto laborent, nec ad placita convenient, nec venationes exerceant. Item feminae opera textilia non faciant, nec abluant vestimenta, nec consuunt nec lanam carpere, nec linum batere (sic), nec vestimenta lavare, nec vervecos tondere. . . . Et ad missarum solemnias ad ecclesias undique convenient, et laudent Deum pro omnibus bonis, quæ nobis in illa die fecit." — C. 38, § 8.

²⁸ "Ut eandem monasterialis psalmodiæ puritatem ubique sectentur, nihilque quod communis usus non admittit, præsumant cantare aut legere, sed tantum quod ex sacrarum scripturarum auctoritate descendit, et quod Romanæ Ecclesiæ consuetudo permittit." — Can. 15.

²⁹ "Maxima millenis auscultans organa flabris,
Mulceat auditum ventosis follibus iste,
Quamlibet auratis fulgescant cætera capsis."

— De Laudibus Virginum, ed. Giles, p. 138.

not far from Cambria, and founded by a Celt, might offer a new attraction by means of that touching and majestic harmony to the essentially musical Welsh.³⁰

The cross planted throughout the country.

In addition to the ceremonies celebrated within the churches, which were still too distant from each other to provide for all spiritual necessities, the solicitude of the monastic missionaries had extended the worship of the cross, for the instruction and consolation of the uncultured country people. The mysterious symbol of the redemption of the human race by the sufferings of the Son of God was raised from point to point on the hillsides and in the valleys of England now ransomed from the heathen yoke. The crucifix which St. Augustin had presented for the first time to Ethelbert, on the morning after he landed on the banks of the Thames, and which the holy and pious Oswald had planted for the first time as a sign of hope and deliverance upon the soil of Northumbria on the eve of his first battle, stood in the place of an oratory and sanctuary in many districts scarcely yet cleared from the forest. A cross raised in the middle of a field was enough to satisfy the devotions of the thane, his ploughmen, and shepherds. They gathered around it for public and daily prayer,³¹ and were inspired by it with a veneration not less affectionate than that which attached to the sanctuaries, daily increasing in number, which were almost all dedicated to the mother of Christ or St. Peter; for the prince of the apostles was then the saint most universally and frequently invoked by the Christians of England.³²

Services rendered to public instruction by the monasteries.

The unrivalled benefit of the faith was not the only service which the Benedictines lavished on converted England. It is at the risk of falling into repetition and commonplace that we dwell upon the immense services they rendered, there as everywhere, if not more there than anywhere else, to public instruction and to agriculture. We flatter ourselves that we have furnished, almost at every page of these volumes, evidence of what they have done for the intellectual nourishment of England. It has been seen, that among the Anglo-

³⁰ Cf. LAPPENBERG, i. 198.

³¹ "Sic mos est Saxonice gentis, quod in nonnullis nobilium bonorumque hominum prædiis, non ecclesiam sed Sancta Crucis signum Deo dicatum, cum magno honore alium, in alto erectum, ad commodam diurnæ orationis sedulitatem solent habere." — Vita S. Willibaldi, ap. MABILLON, Act. SS. O. S. B., t. iv.

³² LINGARD, op. cit., ii. 87-107.

Saxons, as well as among the Celts of Ireland, Caledonia, and Cambria, monasteries were the sole centres of a religious and liberal education, and that knowledge was there at once much sought, very varied, and very literary. This was not the case solely in the isolated cloisters which were devoted to monastic education. The bishops, all of whom came out of monasteries, changed the cloisters of their cathedrals into schools, and collected around them a numerous band of youths eager for work and for study.

And by the monk-
bishops.

One of those public benefactors who distinguished himself the most in this respect, was John, whose name we have already met as one of the intruders who repeatedly divided between them the diocese of Wilfrid.³³ We may justly be blamed for not dwelling longer on him, so great was his popularity among the English of his own day, and until the end of the middle ages.³⁴ Though he was best known under the name of St. John of Beverley, from the place where he passed the last four years of his life in solitude, and which afterwards became one of the greatest monastic establishments of the north of England,³⁵ he was in the first place a monk at Whitby under the great Abbess Hilda, and afterwards bishop, in succession, of Hexham and York. He was a disciple of Archbishop Theodore, and it was he who had the honor of conferring the orders of deacon and priest upon the Venerable Bede. Between these two great luminaries of the Anglo-Saxon Church, he himself shone during his thirty-two years' episcopate with a pure and gentle light, thanks to his tender anxiety for all the spiritual and temporal necessities of his flock, and the supernatural help which he

John of Beverley, monk,
bishop,
and one of the most popular saints in England.

686-718.

³³ See p. 409, note 240, and p. 432.

³⁴ The banner of St. John of Beverley was placed with those of St. Wilfrid and St. Cuthbert on the sacred cart at the battle of the Standard in 1138 (see p. 445). The same banner was the oriflamme of Edward I. in one of his great expeditions. Two centuries later the popularity of the holy abbot of Beverley was renewed by the coincidence of the feast of his translation, celebrated in 1037 on the 25th October, falling on the day of the victory of Agincourt. Shakespeare (as also the Roman Breviary) speaks only of St. Crispin and Crispianus as patrons of that day. But in August, 1421, Henry V. gave thanks for his victory before the shrine of the Anglo-Saxon saint at Beverley.

³⁵ It included a monastery of Benedictines, a college of canons, and a nunnery. The church, built at first by St. John, was destroyed by the Danes, re-established by Athelstane, respected by William the Conqueror, and rebuilt magnificently in the thirteenth century. It is one of the finest monuments of English architecture.

brought to them in their sicknesses and troubles. Bede has devoted several chapters full of interest to his history. He exhibits him to us employing the most minute and affectionate pains to heal a poor young cripple, who was dumb and afflicted with scurvy, of all his infirmities, but especially of his dumbness, teaching him by the aid of heaven to speak and read, and beginning with the alphabet like the humblest of teachers.³⁶

But another scene, which touches our subject more immediately, is that in which we behold him surrounded by a group of youths, some ecclesiastics, but the greater part laymen, whom the monk-bishop trained to the study of letters and music, without extinguishing in them the taste for athletic exercises, which was then, as now, inherent in the English race. These students followed their master on horseback through his pastoral visitations, and when they found themselves on level ground took advantage of the occasion to ride races with each other at the risk of breaking their heads, as happened to a young monk, afterwards Abbot of Tynemouth, who related all these details to the Venerable Bede. The joyous impetuosity of the young horsemen, their entreaties to the bishop for permission to ride their races under his eyes, the consent which was finally wrested from him under the condition that his favorite among them should remain by his side, the impossibility which this favorite experienced of resisting the impulse and example of his comrades, his wild gallop to rejoin the others, his accident, his swoon, the tender anxiety of the good prelate, the cares which he lavished on the imprudent youth, passing the entire night in prayer by his side, until the dying young man opened his eyes, and said, "I know you; you are my bishop, whom I love;" all this makes up one of the most complete and attractive pictures in the abundant stores of the great monastic historian.³⁷

³⁶ "Jussit ad se intrare pauperem, ingresso eo, linguam proferre ex ore ac sibi ostendere jussit. . . . Dicito, inquires, aliquid verbum, dicito Gæ. . . . Addidit episcopus nomina litterarum: Dicito A: dixit ille A. Dicito B: dixit ille et hoc. . . . Neque ultra cessavit tota die ac nocte sequente, quantum viligare potuit . . . loqui aliquid, et arcana, suæ cogitationis ac voluntatis, quod nunquam antea potuit, aliis ostendere." — Hist. Eccles., v. 2.

³⁷ "Cum in primævo adolescentiæ tempore in clero illius degerem legendi canendique studiis traditus . . . contigit nos iter agentes cum illo devenisse in viam planam et amplam aptamque cursui equorum: cœperuntque juvenes, maxime laici, postulare episcopum ut cursu majore equos suos invicem probare liceret. At ille primo negavit . . . sed ad ultimum multorum unanima

We must stop short here in order not to begin over again, as we should be too often tempted to do, the edifying but monotonous tale which proves the studious fervor of both masters and pupils in the monastic schools.

But it is impossible to avoid a brief notice of what has been done by the monks in England for ^{Services to} agriculture. the improvement of agriculture. It is impossible to forget the use they made of so many vast districts, uncultivated and uninhabited, covered with forests or surrounded with marshes. Such was, it must not be forgotten, the true nature of the vast estates given to the monks, and which had thus the double advantage of offering to communities the most inaccessible retreat that could be found, and of imposing the least possible sacrifice upon the munificence of the givers. They surmounted all the difficulties which stared them in the face, of beginning the cultivation of a new country; the forests were cleared, the marshes made wholesome or dried up, the soil irrigated or drained according to the requirements of each locality; and bridges, roads, dikes, havens, and light-houses were erected wherever their possessions or influence extended, in evidence of their unwearied and watchful fervor. The half at least of broad Northumberland was lost in sandy plains and barren heaths; the half of East Anglia and a considerable part of Mercia were covered with marshes difficult of access, in the midst of which the future king, Ethelbald, found refuge with the hermit Guthlac: yet in both regions the monks substituted for these uninhabited deserts fat pasturage and abundant harvests.³⁸

The latter district, the present name of which (the Fens) alone recalls the marshy and unwholesome nature of the original soil, became the principal theatre of the triumphs of agricultural industry performed by the monks. Medehamstede,³⁹ Ely, Croyland, Thorney, Ramsey, were the first battle-fields of these conquerors of nature, these monks who intentione devictus: Facite, inquit, ut vultis. . . . Ipse diligentius obsecrans, ut et mihi certandi cum illis copia daretur. . . . Cum sæpius, spectante me et episcopo, concitatis in cursum equis reverterentur, ipse lascivio animo non me potui cohibere, sed, prohibente licet illo, ludentibus me miscui. . . . Audivi illum post tergum mihi cum gemitu dicentem: O quam magnam vœ facis mihi sic equitando. . . . Dum fervens equus quoddam itineris concavum valentiore impetu transiliret, lapsus decidi, sensum peridi. . . . Evenit ut . . . infracto pollice capitis quoque junctura solveretur. . . . Vomebam sanguinem. . . . At ego aperiens oculos aio: Etiam; tu es antistes amatus." — BEDE, v. 6.

³⁸ Cf. LINGARD, i. 267.

³⁹ The original name of Peterborough; see p. 331.

made of themselves ploughmen, breeders and keepers of stock, and who were the true fathers of English agriculture, which, thanks to their traditions and example, has become the first agriculture in the world.

The English word improvement, so frequently used, and so expressive in relation to everything that concerns bodily and mental labor, seems to have been invented expressly for their use. As much might be said for another word, more ancient still but not less used — the word landlord, which expresses not only the sentiment of dominion and territorial possession, but also that kind of tutelary and almost paternal solicitude which so happily combines the obligations and the rights of property. They were the best of landlords; such is the testimony given, by all attentive and conscientious observers of the past history of England, to the monks who were the originators of ecclesiastical property in that country, and who long remained its sole guardians. It was not only by their gifts, by their able and generous indulgence towards their direct dependants, that they exercised upon the inferior classes an influence always benevolent, and always gratefully acknowledged. It was by the effectual, enlightened, and unwearied protection which they extended to the poor and weak, who were under other laws and served other masters. "They were," according to one of the great masters of modern learning, "permanent mediators between the rich and poor, between the strong and the weak; and it must be said to their eternal honor that they understood and fulfilled in a marvellous way the duties of this noble mission. They alone had the right and the means of arresting the rough hand of power, of mitigating the just severity of the law, of showing a gleam of hope to the eye of the slave, and of finding, even in this world, a place and means of existence for all those forsaken ones whose existence was ignored by the State."⁴⁰

Thus, then, thanks to the Anglo-Saxon Benedictines, the maternal authority of the Church began to extend over all weakness and suffering. It grew visibly, interposing whenever it was necessary against all violence and tyranny.

⁴⁰ KEMBLE, Saxons in England, vol. ii. p. 375.

III.

How, then, was this office, so godlike and glorious, given, from the very beginning of Christianity in England, to the abbots, the great monks, and the bishops, who were produced by the monastic order? The influence of Christian faith and morality, of which they were the interpreters and guardians, contributed to it more than any other reason. But it would be unjust to pass over another cause, almost as effectual — the close and lasting union between the monastic order and the Anglo-Saxon aristocracy. This aristocracy, converted by the monks, promptly and cordially opened its ranks to them. History has not preserved the memory of any race which adopted, not only the belief, but the precepts and counsels of the Gospel with more enthusiasm than did the high nobility, which was composed of the dynasties and ruling families of the Heptarchy. Never and nowhere have so many men of royal or patrician race devoted themselves to the hard discipline of the cloister, to the penitential life of anchorites, to the dangers inseparable from pilgrimages and missions in countries still pagan. This aristocracy, fond of fighting, of good cheer, of all sensual pleasures, and of pomp and magnificence which, both in their own persons and in those of their descendants, became proverbial,⁴¹ found itself all at once ripe for the noblest exploits of self-mortification, of Gospel humility, and chastity. After the first foreign masters, new apostles, issued from its own bosom, continued to show it the path of Christian virtue, marching resolutely at its head.

Intimate connection of the monastic order with the Anglo-Saxon aristocracy.

From thence sprang an alliance between the aristocracy and the clergy, between religion and the State, more characteristic, intimate, and cordial, as has been already said, than existed anywhere else in the Teutonic and Christian world. Anglo-Saxon princes and nobles became in rapid succession monks, abbots, and bishops; but these prelates and clergy, belonging to the sovereign races, retained, in their own country and among their neighbors, a place equal or superior to that which they occupied as laymen. They were instantly recognized or elevated to the most important rank in English society. On the other hand, this rank and those functions were often coveted by men inspired with passions very different from the sacred fire which burned in the heart of Wilfrid, Benedict Biscop, Guthlac, and the other saints who belonged to the highest ranks of Anglo-Saxon nobility.

⁴¹ "Ex pompa Anglum intelliges." — GUILL. MALMESB., Vita Aldhelm., p. 7.

In England, as elsewhere, and perhaps more than elsewhere, this intimate alliance between the heads of the two forms of society, spiritual and temporal, and the constant mutual action of the one on the other, produced results dear and salutary to the Church as well as to the State. The advantage, however, was almost always greater for the State than for the Church, and indeed sometimes became dangerous and compromised the latter. Abuses there, as everywhere, inevitably followed benefits. These will be evident but too soon. At the same time, before going on to consideration of the shadows which it is impossible to deny or suppress in a sincere historic picture, let us first contemplate the light which preceded them.

Their intervention in social government and organization.

It was not certainly by any encroachment either open or concealed on the rights of others, nor by any secret or violent means, that the heads of the monastic order rose to the highest rank in the Anglo-Saxon nation. They were called to it by the natural course of things and the unanimous voice of men. Representatives of the most elevated social offices, initiated into all the necessities of elective government, of communal life, and voluntary subordination, they took their place naturally in a government based, in the first place, upon a social hierarchy consecrated by mutual service and hereditary or freely offered devotion; and in the second, upon the sovereign and permanent action of public assemblies. These envoys of Christianity brought an essentially important and much desired sanction to the usages and institutions which substituted among those noble scions of the Teutonic race the proud independence of an often heroic, but sometimes exacting and troublesome, devotion, for the abject submission of the degraded serfs of the Roman Empire.

Their place in the national assemblies.

Not only the bishops, who all belonged to the monastic order, but abbots, and often abbesses, occupied the first place in those national or provincial assemblies which have been so often referred to in this narrative, and which, under the name of Witenagemot, or assembly of wise men, were the cradle of the English Parliament; guaranteeing to the Anglo-Saxon people the benefit of a government sustained and controlled by the lay and ecclesiastical nobility, and making decisions which could not be violated or despised with impunity by any monarch.

At the period which we have now arrived at, each kingdom of the Heptarchy, and even each of the tribes comprised in or absorbed by the greatest of those kingdoms,⁴² had its special assembly, an institution retained at a later period, when England was united under the sceptre of one monarch, by each shire or province. But there also existed assemblies more or less general, the authority of which was recognized in differing degrees by all the divisions of the conquering race. To these conferences especially, which ecclesiastical historians have honored with the name of councils, the presence of several monk-bishops, presided over by their metropolitan, a monk like themselves, had the power of giving a more august character. The council of Hertford, presided over by the Greek Theodore,⁴³ decreed 673. that a general synod should be held twice a year at Cloveshove. But, besides that this assembly appears to have been exclusively ecclesiastical, there is no evidence that its decree was obeyed. A century passed before England possessed one sole, permanent, and regular assembly. At the same time, from the introduction of Christianity, local or national assemblies became visible, constituting a great council of the whole country, and meeting periodically at Christmas and at Easter.

The monastic prelates held their seats in these assemblies, at once as the doctors and spiritual Their composition. guides of the nation and as great landed proprietors, whose importance was daily increased by the extent of the new gifts which were lavished upon them, and by the increasing agricultural value of their old possessions. They sat in the first rank with the principal lords, the great chiefs of the nobility, the governors of provinces, called earls or ealdormen; ⁴⁴ and above the other proprietors who, under the name of thanes, composed the greater part of the assembly. According to the theory most generally received by modern learning,⁴⁵ each thane or proprietor might reach the rank of ⁴² Such as the Hwiccas, the Middle Angles in Mercia, and the Gyrwas in East Anglia.

⁴³ See p. 353.

⁴⁴ Whom Bede entitles duces or comites, proving their rank to be equal to that of the bishop. Ealdor or elder answers to the Latin senior, from whence comes seigneur. This ancient title, once the first in the Saxon hierarchy, the bearers of which, either hereditary or for their lifetime, were almost the equals of the king, may be recognized to-day in the name of alderman, which has fallen exclusively, as we have already remarked, to elective municipal officials in London and the other great cities.

⁴⁵ See TURNER, History of the Anglo-Saxons, vol. iii. pp. 48, 115, 123, earl,⁴⁶ by the choice of the king or nomination of the assembly. Every eorl, or free man, whatever his origin might be, could be advanced to the rank of thane if he possessed lands of a certain extent. Every merchant who had made three journeys beyond seas rose into the same class. But no nobleman by birth could sit in the Witenagemot unless he were a landed proprietor.⁴⁷

Whatever uncertainty may exist as to the distinctive qualifications of the two principal elements of these assemblies, it is proved that, far from forming different castes, the eorls and *thanes*⁴⁸ were only the first among the free men, the 130, 135, 137 (Paris edition, 1840); PALGRAVE, Rise and Progress of the English Commonwealth, vol. ii. pp. 376, 385; and KEMBLE, The Saxons in England, vol. i. c. v.

⁴⁶ Kemble, however, believes that, like the kings, they could be taken only from certain principal families.

⁴⁷ It was necessary to possess five hydes, or mansi, for three generations, in order to be a thane, and forty to be an eorl or ealdorman. This distinction is principally founded on the evidence of a monastic historian of Ely (Liber Eliensis, ap. GALE, scriptores, vol. ii. c. 40), speaking of the brother-in-law of his abbot, who could not, for want of those forty hydes, obtain the hand of the daughter præpotentis viri. He adds, "Licet nobilis esset, inter procures tunc nominari non potuit." Let us state, at the same time, that Kemble disputes the necessity of a territorial qualification for admission to the Witan. And let us also remember that Abbot Benedict Biscop received eight of these mansi or lands for an illuminated volume. The real amount of the hyde (in German hof) remains to be discovered; the opinions of the learned are cruelly diverse on this respect, varying between a minimum of 30 acres and a maximum of 120. The acre, or day's measure, meant here, as everywhere, as much land as a pair of oxen could plough in a day. Cf. ELLIS, Introduction to Domesday Book, and KEMBLE, op. cit.

⁴⁸ The meaning of the word thane, or thegn, has evidently varied like that of fidelis, or leude among the Franks, but it answers most generally to the milites or barones of later times. — PALGRAVE, vol. ii. pp. 33, 376. The members of the Anglo-Saxon parliaments (conventus, synodus, concilium) received thus in public acts and in contemporary authors all sorts of different designations, of which the following are the principal: Proceres, sapientes, principes, senatores, primates, optimates, magnates, majores natu, procuratores patriæ (of this last title there are five examples in Kemble, vol. ii. 199). Many of the acts of these assemblies quoted in the Codex Diplomaticus Ævi Saxonici, are furnished with signatures which aid us in proving their composition. The most considerable number of signatures received in one assembly (that of Cloveshove in 825) is 121, of whom 95 were monks or clerks. A charter of 934 proves the presence at the gemot of the king, of—

- 4 Welsh princes.
- 2 archbishops.
- 17 bishops.
- 4 abbots.
- 12 dukes or ealdormen.
- 52 thanes.

91; described as "tota populi generalitate."

heads and representatives of a territorial aristocracy the ranks of which were open to all, like that which has constituted the strength, greatness, and freedom of England for so many centuries, and which, from the beginning, was a national force representing the vital strength of the people, and its interests, will, and immemorial liberties.⁴⁹ The popular element also appears and increases slowly as we advance in history. All the inhabitants of the neighborhood had a right to be present at the assemblies, which, for the most part, were held in the open air; they exercised at least the right of conclamation, which consisted in giving their public adherence to the decisions; they could also, according to Palgrave, make complaints and disclose their injuries.⁵⁰ Everything leads us to suppose that the crowd was swelled by a great number of monks, while their elective chiefs, bishops and abbots of the principal monasteries, took decisive part in the votes and deliberations.

In the temporal and spiritual government of the Anglo-Saxon nations, nothing escaped the action of these assemblies. They not only gave forth laws, they shared the actual government with the kings, and took part in all their acts, at least so far as to sanction them. No royal charter or document of state exists which does not prove at once the intervention of the assembly of wise men, and the presence of the monastic clergy in that assembly. The king could do nothing without their help or sanction.⁵¹

No important affair was treated, no sovereign decision taken, without this help or sanction, from the nomination of a bishop to the foundation or exemption from national burdens of a new monastery.⁵² The spirit of

Sovereignty of these assemblies.

Their attributes.

⁴⁹ The people, says Kemble, were the true aristocracy; the nobles were only its chiefs, as the English peers are at present the born chiefs of the aristocracy of freeholders and ten-pound householders. Vol. i. p. 258.

⁵⁰ Thus, in the gift given by Duke Ethelstane to the Monastery of Abingdon, the fixing of boundaries, and the excommunication pronounced against transgressors, is confirmed in this fashion: — “Et dixit omnis populus qui ibi aderat: Fiat, fiat. Amen.” In Saxon, “Sy hit swa.” — Codex Diplom., n. 1129. A charter of Ethelred in 931 declares that the act is confirmed, “Tota plebis generalitate ovante.”

⁵¹ PALGRAVE, vol. i. pp. 634 to 643; LAPPENBERG, vol. i. p. 577. Beside the great scholars who have in our time renewed the study of English origin, ought to be named a French writer, M. Albert du Boys, who, in his Histoire du Droit Criminel des Peuples Modernes, has conscientiously studied and estimated English institutions and legislation, not only in his third volume, which is exclusively devoted to Anglo-Norman feudal law, but also in the previous volumes, in which he has set forth the part taken by the Anglo-Saxon clergy in the social and judicial organization of society.

⁵² This is proved by the expressions of Bede: “Hæc in jus sibi heredi-association and the habits of independence which were the foundation of Teutonic liberties, absolutely excluded all idea of social or political abdication into the hands of a master, charged, along with his principal domestics, to think, speak, and act for the nation. Every Anglo-Saxon tribe, great or small, considered itself equal to the management of its own affairs, like the powerful and unconquerable England of our own day. We have seen these assemblies possessed not only of the consultive voice, but deciding with supreme authority as to the introduction of Christianity in the different kingdoms. No public act was valid, no new law could be established, except after discussion by them. Laws were issued by their authority, conjoined to that of the king, never by the crown alone. They decided alliances and treaties of peace, as well as the election and deposition of kings; for among the Anglo-Saxons, as among the Franks, the hereditary character of royalty was by no means absolute. The national assembly chose among the members of the national dynasty the candidate who suited them best. At each election the contract between the king and the people was renewed, often with new clauses, as has been seen in modern history in the capitulations of the Emperors of Germany and the Kings of Hungary. As for the deposition of kings, the assemblies made little difficulty about it, when their government was unjust or unfortunate; and the monastic clergy, like all the other members of the body political, acquiesced without scruple.⁵³ With still better reason they regulated everything that concerned the imposition of taxes for the public service, the levy of troops, the use to be made of fines or confiscations suffered by those who broke the penal law, the grants of territory made from the public lands either to monasteries⁵⁴ or great captains. In short, they exercised tarium edictis regalibus faciunt ascribi, ipsasque quoque litteras privilegiorum suorum . . . pontificum, abbatum et potestatum sæculi obtinent subscriptione confirmari." — Epist. ad Egberthum. Cf. LINGARD, vol. i. pp. 412, 413.

⁵³ See the deposition of Sigebert, King of Wessex, in 755 by the princes and the people of his kingdom ("Provida deliberatione et unanimo omnium consensu." — HENRI DE HUNTINGDON); and that of Beornred, King of Mercia in 757, to make room for Offa: "Convenerunt in unum omnes, tam nobiles quam ignobiles, et Offa duce . . . ipsum a regno expulerunt. . . . Quo facto unanimo omnium consensu Offam in regem, tam clerus quam populus coronarunt." — Flores Histor., ap. PALGRAVE, ii. 279.

⁵⁴ All the acts of this description bear the mention: "Cum licentia et consensu procerum" or "sapientium," &c.

the functions of a supreme court, both in cases civil and criminal.⁵⁵

No trace is to be found in the Anglo-Saxon historians of any distinction between the assemblies which treated ecclesiastical affairs and those which regulated secular life. Both were managed by the same body, and at the same sitting. It is, however, very probable that the clergy deliberated apart, at least in the first place, with the aid of the king alone,⁵⁶ reserving only a power of ratification to the general assembly. The distinction between temporal and spiritual matters was not the less clearly maintained, decrees touching doctrine or discipline made out by the bishops alone being published at the head of the acts of the national assemblies, and apart from the other decisions submitted for the sanction of public authority.⁵⁷

Danger of encroachment in spiritual matters.

There is, however, in the history of the first centuries of the Church in England, no trace of the conflict between the two powers which afterwards became so frequent, so bitter, and prolonged. As for the encroachments of spiritual authority in temporal matters in the sphere of national life of which these assemblies were the centre, nobody was tempted to complain of, or even to perceive its existence. Yet the public of these days was much less able to appreciate the salutary and wonderful results of the influence of monastic prelates and missionaries upon the institutions and character of the Anglo-Saxons than we are. At present the most prejudiced critics are compelled to avow that the influence of the monastic clergy in the public and social life of the English was of the most benevolent and effectual character. To them must be attributed, from the time of the first laws made by the parliament of Ethelbert, under the influence of the Roman missionaries,⁵⁸ the gradual progress of humanity and justice in the national legislation, which up to that period had been too feeble to struggle against the ferocious and covetous instincts of the barbarous conquerors.

Salutary and powerful influence of the monks upon the assemblies, and consequently upon laws and morals.

To them belongs also the honor of that transformation of morals and souls which, notwithstanding

They contributed to create

⁵⁵ BEDE, passim; Chron. Angl.-Saxon., and KEMBLE, vol. ii.

⁵⁶ This is the opinion of Kemble, who believes that there were two houses, as among the Franks, one composed of laymen and the other of ecclesiastics, but both under the presidency of the king.

⁵⁷ LINGARD, Antiquities, vol. ii. p. 33.

⁵⁸ "Juxta exemplum Romanorum." — BEDE, ii. 5. See p. 183.

national unity in England. a thousand backslidings and a thousand melancholy fallings back into ancient barbarism, showed itself in the generosity and piety of the laymen, in the obedience and fervor of a clergy drawn daily in greater numbers from the bosom of the native population. To them the credit of having introduced into the laws and customs a respect for property, and, above all, for human life, no trace of which had previously existed among the savage invaders of Great Britain. To them the honor of having contributed more than any other, by the uniformity of their wise counsels and good examples, by the unity of their doctrine and discipline to introduce into the Anglo-Saxon nations a unity of legislation and of government which gradually led to national unity. They strengthened the throne by teaching and enforcing the practice of Christian virtues; they sanctioned and regulated the ancient Teutonic principles of the responsibility of kings, of their subordination to law, to their sworn faith and social contracts; they placed those principles under the safeguard of religion by the solemnity of consecration; they thus imprinted an august and sacred, and at the same time a limited and conditional, character upon the throne. In addition to this, while forearming it against the excesses and usurpations of princes and lords, they labored energetically to give to it the force and authority necessary to triumph over the dismemberment of the Heptarchy, and to create that unity, not absolute and absorbing like that which has wasted or enervated other illustrious nations, but sufficient, and in conformity with the genius and necessities of the English race, and which, when once fully established in the ninth century, has never more run the risk of attack or alteration.⁵⁹

Their zeal
for the poor.
Public charity a work of expiation. To them above all belongs the honor of having introduced into morals and the laws that solicitude for the inferior classes which is too often absent from the hearts of the powerful. The discoveries of modern erudition have established without doubt the unexpected result that the material condition of the inferior and serf population was not universally a state of hardship. Their labors were not more severe nor their wages less than those of our own days.⁶⁰ At the same time it is impossible to doubt that the weak were often made victims of the violence and wickedness of the strong in the ancient English world, as everywhere else. How many oppressed innocents, how many violated rights, how many unknown or unpunished crimes existed in the midst of silence and isolation, in the vast regions still so sparsely inhabited? But in proportion as religion penetrated by the influence of the monks, light arose, and justice appeared. Little by little, voices which could not be stifled arose, powerful hands were elevated to protect and avenge the victims. The oppressor stopped trembling; he had to bow, to repent, to make restitution, to expiate; and expiation almost always took the form of an act of fraternal charity, a service rendered to the community. As religious and monastic influence increased in the nation, the habit and duty of soothing suffering and remedying injustice became general. In every powerful family frequent acts of voluntary renunciation took the place of the brigandage, the robberies, and violence which had been up to that time their daily bread.

⁵⁹ PALGRAVE, pp. 655, 656; LAPPENBERG, i. 203. Since the union of the Heptarchy under Egbert of Wessex in 800, England has never been dismembered as France was repeatedly under the Carolingians and Capets.

⁶⁰ Each serf received for himself and his family 720 loaves yearly, without counting the midday and evening meal. — KEMBLE, vol. i. p. 213.

Every crime that was expiated, every penance that was accomplished by the efforts of the monks, thus contributed to public utility and happiness.⁶¹ The long-unpunished culprits from whom the new faith wrested a tardy confession, an act of contrition or restitution, were often exempted from bodily penances, but were always constrained to pay the ransom of that exemption by acts of charity, which not only eased actual misery, but provided for the necessities of the future.

The penances imposed by the monks upon these great sinners and penitents, were not pious works and ecclesiastical foundations alone, but oftener still the deliverance of captives, the mending of a road, the rebuilding of a bridge or of cottages, the food and maintenance of peasants brought to want by intestine wars;⁶² they had a thousand devices, a thousand resources, all consecrated to the same charitable and sacred end.

The abundant gifts showered upon the churches and monasteries by the fervor of new Christians, and at the same time by the remorse of opulent sinners, were thus transformed into great and permanent benefits for the suffering members of society, for the poor and homeless, the sick, the widows, orphans, and poor travellers who were exposed to so many dangers and trials by the rudeness of the time. By this means an unfailing channel was established by which the munificence of the rich, the strong, and the happy of this world flowed forth upon the weak, the poor, and the unfortunate. It was a great public office which, without being regulated or imposed by law, took the place of all the complications with which modern legislation has invested public charity.⁶³ In short, it was the realization and application of that great law of mercy and brotherly compassion which is one of the most solid and necessary foundations of human society.

⁶¹ BURKE, Essay on English History, p. 223.

⁶² LINGARD, Antiquities, vol. i. p. 258.

Among the services rendered by the Anglo-Saxon monks to suffering humanity, none is more touching or more continual than their solicitude for those who stood on the lowest step of the social hierarchy—the slaves. The famous incident of the English captives bought in the Roman market by St. Gregory, shows us, at the beginning of this narrative, that even the sons of the conquering race were not safe from this climax of misery. But under the progressive power of the faith preached by the missionaries of Pope Gregory and their successors, the number of slaves gradually diminished.⁶⁴ Notwithstanding that the trade was forbidden by decrees and councils, a hundred times repeated, and too often evaded, it continued to be carried on as a matter of commerce,⁶⁵ but very few slaves were kept in the country itself. They did not, however, form a separate race, sprung either from the conquering Saxons or the vanquished Britons; they were recruited from the descendants of Roman slaves, from unransomed prisoners of war, and delinquents condemned to penal servitude. The monks devoted their most strenuous exertions to the still further reduction of the number. The example of the noble Wilfrid, whose first act was to free the 250 serfs who were given him by the King of the South Saxons, along with the lands intended for his episcopal monastery, proves that they were capable of seeking the freedom of their fellow-creatures at their own expense.

⁶³ KEMBLE, vol. ii. pp. 514–516.

⁶⁴ KEMBLE, i. 220; LAPPENBERG, i. 575; PALGRAVE, i. 29. At the end of the Anglo-Saxon period there were only 25,000 in England according to the census in Domesday Book, which reckons 275,000 proprietors.

⁶⁵ It was, however, forbidden to sell them to heathens; the laws of Ethelred and Canute contain formal prohibitions in this respect.

Stern truth compels us to confess that this was not the case everywhere. The honest pen of monastic annalists has preserved the letter of a monk of royal Mercian blood, Brithwald, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, in which he insists upon the deliverance of a young slave who was held in bondage by the Abbot of Glastonbury. "Since I have failed," he writes to the Bishop of Sherborne, "in the first entreaty I addressed to him by word of mouth in your presence, I think it my duty to send you this letter from the girl's brother, and beseech you to make the abbot accept the three hundred sols which the bearer will give you for her ransom, that she may be sent back to us, to pass the rest of her life among her own people, not in the sadness of slavery, but in the joy of freedom. He will thus lose nothing of the right he has over her."⁶⁶

This is the only example of monastic slave-holding which I have been able to discover, and fortunately the prompt and generous amendment of the evil is to be found by the side of the evil itself. If it had been otherwise, with what authority could the monks have labored for the extinction of this plague? They neglected no means besides of diminishing the number of cases in which slavery could be legalized or tolerated. The emancipation or redemption of slaves was the work of charity which they most recommended and insisted on. Thanks to their presence in the political assemblies, provisions were introduced into the laws freeing the slaves who had been overworked by their masters, or who had been obliged to work on Sunday.⁶⁷ And by their presence at the deathbed of so many penitent sinners, they were able to introduce clauses into wills which provided for the salvation of the soul of the dying, by giving freedom to the survivors. Nothing was more frequent in the Codex Diplomaticus of the Anglo-Saxon period than acts of manumission, and all, or almost all, stated the religious motives which produced these acts, and the religious guarantees which sanctioned them. The freed slave was offered to God before the altar of the nearest church, and then declared free in presence of the monks and the congregation of the faithful. It was upon the fly-leaf of the book of the Gospels, or some other church-book, that the charter of affranchisement was registered.⁶⁸ The first vindications of individual freedom have thus come down to us inscribed on the margin of monastic missals, as the first indications of parliamentary government appear in the gifts given to monasteries with the sanction of assembled Witan.

⁶⁶ "Quomodo petitio mea, qua precatum sum coram te venerabilem Beornwaldum abbatem de concedenda unius captivæ puellæ . . . redemptione, in irritum, contra quod credidi, cessit . . . obsecro ut ipse omnino obtineas a prædicto abbate, quatenus . . . tradas illam huc usque perducendam, quod possit reliquum vitæ suæ spatium cum consanguineis suis, non in servitutis tristitia, sed in libertatis transigere letitia. . . . Frater noster Beornwaldus nihil, ut æstimo, de eo quod in ea juste possedit, amittit." — Inter Epist. S. Bonifacii, n. 7, ed. Jaffé. It has been already seen that Archbishop Brithwald had been educated at Glastonbury before he was elected abbot of the royal monastery of Reculver. Cf. BEDE, v. 8, and Hook, Lives of the Archbishops, vol. i. pp. 178 and 188.

⁶⁷ See specially the law made by Ina by the advice of the two archbishops, Hedda and Erconwald: "Si servus operetur dominica die per præceptum domini sui, sit liber." The council of Berkhamstead condemned to a fine of eighty pence the master who compelled his serf to work on Sunday. From thence comes the name of Freolsday, or day of freedom, given to Sunday. — LINGARD, i. 310.

These glorious and persevering apostles of the laws of God neither despised nor neglected any of the rights of men. Honor and justice, humanity and pity, knowledge and reason, were placed along with the new faith and Christian morality under the safeguard of their precepts and their unwearied watchfulness. All things fair and lovely and of good report which man has a right to love and desire, after as well as before his conversion, and more warmly still, being a Christian, than when he was not so — all the natural virtues, all the legitimate aspirations of the sons of Adam — were appreciated, claimed, and defended under the forms accessible or possible in these far-distant days, with an energy, watchfulness, and courage of which there are few examples in history, by the monastic apostles of Great Britain.

I have sought out with laborious care, and related with scrupulous truthfulness, everything that could throw light on the influence of Christianity, as preached by the monks, upon the early history of the English people. I have acknowledged that here, as everywhere else, this divine religion has been too often powerless and ineffectual amid the coarse and perverse inclinations of fallen nature. But I have met at every step the brilliant victories of self-devotion and faith, of disinterestedness and purity, of true greatness, true courage, and the most magnanimous charity. And what is still more wonderful and more consoling is the total absence, not to be met with in the same degree in the most boasted ages and circumstances, of everything which degrades or compromises religion in those who teach and represent it. I assert joyfully that in the lives of so many apostles and ministers of celestial verity, I have not come upon a single evidence of fanaticism, of egotism, of baseness, severity, or stupid indifference to human sufferings. The student will search in vain in the records of those forgotten lives for traces of anything narrow, sombre, or pitiless; he will find there nothing that could enslave or enervate the human heart — nothing which could wound good sense, reason, or justice — nothing which savors of that arrogant and cruel Pharisaism with which all priesthoods are attacked or threatened — nothing, in short, which does not breathe respect for the freedom of souls, and the most exquisite sense of honor in all the things of God.

⁶⁸ KEMBLE, Saxons in England, vol i. p. 225.

IV.

But there is yet another result for which we owe them everlasting gratitude. The monastic missionaries, while they transformed the morals and faith of the Anglo-Saxon conquerors, did nothing to change the native genius of the Teutonic race.

They perfected the national character without changing it.

They made of it a nation of Christians more fervent, more liberal, more docile, and attached to the Church, more magnificent in its gifts to monasteries, more fruitful in saintly men and women,⁶⁹ than any other contemporary nation; but they deprived it of none of its public virtues, none of its bold and energetic instincts; they did not withdraw from it an atom of its manful nature, they diminished in nothing the boldness and independence which have remained up to our own day the distinguishing characteristics of the English people.

The influence of a new faith never respected more scrupulously the unity, independence, and powerful originality of the converted race, of its language, manners, institutions, its ancient laws, and its national spirit.⁷⁰

⁶⁹ Without speaking of holy bishops, abbots, hermits, &c., twenty-three kings and sixty queens, princes, or princesses, sprung from the different Anglo-Saxon dynasties, are reckoned from the seventh to the eleventh century among the saints recognized by the Church. No other nation has ever furnished such a contingent.

⁷⁰ This is loyally acknowledged by the German Protestant Lappenberg (vol. i. 132, 144, 629), in contradiction to the superannuated tirades of Hume, Henry, Soames, and the servum pecus of their copyists in England and France.

Augustin and Paulinus, Wilfrid and Theodore, emissaries of Rome, as they have been called by certain historians, and who were in reality the most direct agents, the most immediate envoys from the Holy See which had been yet seen in Christendom, neither introduced nor attempted to introduce any essential change in the political and social institutions, so different from those of the Roman world, which the Anglo-Saxon nation had brought from the shores of Germany, or found in the smoking ruins of Great Britain. Satisfied with having deposited in these brave hearts the secrets of eternity, the rules of moral life, and strength to struggle against the corruption natural to every man born of woman, they left intact the spirit of the race, so that underneath his Christian vestment the old Teuton still stood perfect and complete.

Many times already in this narrative, following the example of many other writers, we have remarked upon the singular unchangeableness of the Anglo-Saxon character. Manners, vices, virtues, laws, customs, rights, names, titles, tastes, language, spirit, even down to its sports and violent exercises, everything that the modern world admires or fears, is attracted or repelled by, in the England of to-day;⁷¹ all is to be found in germ or flower in the England of twelve centuries ago. No nation has been less changed by time or conquest.

All the towns and almost all the villages of modern England seem to have existed from the time of the Saxons; the names and actual boundaries of parishes, counties or shires, with their sub-divisions, their judicial and political machinery, their religious and civil life, all date back into the period between the seventh and tenth centuries.

But the names and external forms are far from being all that have endured — it is the soul, the glorious and manful soul, of the converted Saxon which reveals itself in the modern Englishman. Civil virtues altogether unknown to the enslaved Christians of Rome and Byzantium, and above all, that lofty sentiment of self-respect in certain men and certain classes which is the cradle of all liberty, developed themselves in the shadow of those wonders of humility, self-abnegation, charity, and piety, of which we have spoken at such length—and formed the foundation of that public spirit and those public rights which have never ceased to grow amid all the storms and eclipses. Self-government, that is to say, the proud independence of the free man among his fellows in the general commonwealth—and parliamentary government, that is, the unequal division of supreme power between the crown and the national assemblies—already existed in their essential elements. When it was needful, by a natural, though too often momentary, outburst, public freedom stepped forth, armed and invincible in the collective force of individual and local freedom. The common law of England, that traditional and unwritten code, “the sources of which are as unknown as those of the Nile,”⁷² plunges its roots into old Saxon customs, recognized, sanctioned, and published in those assemblies which were inspired and filled up by our monks; and all charters, as well as all ulterior revolutions, have served only to define and confirm that ancient and immovable foundation of English freedom.⁷³

⁷¹ "The modern Englishman is already to be found in the Saxon. Each man in his own house, master of himself, erect and complete, with nothing to control or encroach upon him." — TAINE, Histoire de la Littérature Anglaise. Any who read the most faithful and complete picture I know of the political and social organization of England — that given by M. Le Play in his admirable work, La Réforme Sociale — will be struck with the persistence of the distinctive features of British character and institutions as they appear among the Saxons.

To hearts thus tempered, and a race thus ruled, the monastic institution, under the form which it had adopted in England, must have been in sympathy and accord, even independently of the religion of which it was the fruit and ornament. The monasteries were types of those great existences, at once individual and collective, founded on a great moral idea, but supported by great landed property, which are still distinctive features of the social machinery of England; which have everywhere been one of the essential conditions of public freedom; and which seem as natural to the masculine and active genius of the ancient Teutonic races as they are alien to modern civilization and incompatible with Cæsarism. For this reason it was to be expected that a natural liking for monasteries, whose founders had brought from the heart of Roman slavery a system of common security, spontaneous freedom, and elective functions entirely in conformity with the instincts and habits of the Teutonic races, should have arisen among the Anglo-Saxons.

Hence no doubt sprang that inexhaustible munificence, that prodigality, so long displayed by the Agreement between the monastic order and the spirit of Anglo-Saxon institutions.

Munificence and prodigality

⁷² Expression used by the celebrated Lord Chief-Justice Hales.

⁷³ Cf. FISCHEL, Die Verfassung Englands, p. 25.

of the aristocracy. Anglo-Saxon royalty and nobility in its relations with the monastic orders. The possessions of the Church, which then meant, almost exclusively, the possessions of monasteries, were increased daily by new foundations, or by fresh gifts added to previously existing establishments. We have already more than once pointed out the motives of these gifts, as they are expressed in the acts of the times, or as they are made evident by study of the circumstances and arrangements which accompanied them.

• Motives of donations. A profound feeling of the instability and decay of everything human, and, above all, of material wealth; ⁷⁴ humble gratitude towards God, from whom every good gift is held, and to whom a portion of His own blessings are believed to be restored by improving the condition of His ministers; ⁷⁵ the desire and hope of expiating the faults of a troubled life, of redeeming the backslidings of human weakness, and of making restitution of ill-gotten wealth, either by guaranteeing the livelihood of a class of men exclusively devoted to the service of God and the practice of virtue, ⁷⁶ or by securing permanent help and supply for the poor, the sick, and the forsaken; in the lack of natural heirs, the hope of creating a kind of spiritual posterity, bound to pray always for the soul of their benefactor; sometimes, as in the case of the Childe Ethelbald, ⁷⁷ who was an exile before he was a king, the recollection of and gratitude for benefits received, and shelter given in the monastic sanctuary; oftener still the desire of securing for themselves and their friends a burial-place protected by holy places and holy men, and which should itself protect a religious community against the ingratitude and rapacity of the future; ⁷⁸ and, in short, and always, the certainty of disposing of their lands for the advantage of the most industrious, useful, and charitable of men.

⁷⁴ "Nihil intulimus in hunc mundum, veram nec auferre quid possumus: iccirco torrenis ac caducis aeterna cœlestis patriæ præmia mercanda sunt. Quapropter," &c. — Charter of Aldraed, prince of the Hwiccas, in 759, ap. Codex Diplomat. Ævi Saxonici, vol. i. "Universa quippe quæ hic in præsentia nisibus humanis corporaliter contemplantur, nihil esse nisi vana, caduca, transitoriaque, ex sacrorum voluminum testimoniis certissime verum patet; et tamen cum istis, æternaliter sine fine mansura alta polorum regna et viger florentis paradisi amœnitas mercari a fidelibus queunt. Quapropter," &c. — Charter of Offa, King of Mercia, in 779, ibid.

⁷⁵ "Quotiens sanctis ac venerabilibus locis vestris aliquid offere videmur, vestra nobis reddimus, non nostra largimur. Quapropter," &c. — Charter of Ethelred, King of Essex, 692, 693, ibid.

⁷⁶ LINGARD, vol. i. p. 251.

⁷⁸ BURKE, op. cit., p. 225.

⁷⁷ See the preceding chapter.

Such were the motives, legitimate and frankly confessed, which led so many Anglo-Saxon princes, lords, and rich men, to despoil themselves for the benefit of monasteries. They may be all summed up in that fine text which the Church still offers yearly to our meditation: "Concludemus eleemosynam in sinu pauperis et ipsa exorabit pro nobis."⁷⁹

But, as has happened everywhere and at all times, in the history of the Church as well as in that of the world, evil rose by the side of the good, and abuses came in with a strong hand under the shelter of the most salutary customs. It is undeniable that these territorial grants made to monasteries exceeded the limits of justice and reason. "Donationes stultissimæ," says Bede, speaking of the gifts of the kings of Northumbria.⁸⁰ Although made and sanctioned by royal authority, in concert with that of the parliaments or Witenagemot, they at last went so far as seriously to threaten the public peace.

This will be easily understood by recollecting the nature of landed property among the Anglo-Saxons. From the Conquest, or first establishment of laws of property, besides the hlot or allods,⁸¹ given to the first occupants, vast territories were reserved for the public service, or for future division, the life-rent of which alone could be given to free men under certain conditions. This was called folc-land, the land of the people, and has been justly compared to the ager publicus of the Romans.⁸² New allods were taken from this, on occasion, to reward or encourage new services. Thus Benedict Biscop, the young lord who afterwards became the founder of Wearmouth and Yarrow, received from the king lands suitable to his rank, which he did not hesitate to restore to the king when he became a monk.⁸³ These territorial grants, whether given to laymen by hereditary right, or to religious communities, could only be granted by the king with the consent of his witan, and in virtue of a charter or deed resembling a book — from whence came the name of boc-land, or land given by book. Everything which did not continue part of the folc-land was thus designated. All donations of land made to the Church —

Abuse of the territorial gifts.

Folc-land
and boc-land.

⁷⁹ Prayer Attende, taken from Eccli. xxix. 15.

⁸⁰ See above, p. 562.

⁸¹ Lots.

⁸² KEMBLE, vol. i. ch. ix. p. 289.

⁸³ "Cum esset Oswii regis minister, et possessionem terræ suo gradui competentem, illo donante perciperet, despexit militiam cum corruptibili donativo terrestrem." — BEDE, Vita S. Bened., § 1, ap. Op. Min., ii. 140.

that is to say, to monasteries — were made under this name and form. Subjects could make no other gifts, as the boc-land was the only thing in their power. Kings might detach a bit of their own boc-land to make a gift of it, as Egfrid did to Benedict Biscop;⁸⁴ but the consent of the witan was necessary in order to transform any portion of folc-land into a hereditary and perpetual patrimony.⁸⁵

Lands thus given to the monasteries were naturally withdrawn from those obligations relative to military service which weighed upon all landed proprietors, as is apparent from the expressions used by Bede in recording the donation made by King Oswy when he consecrated his daughter Elfleda to religious life. Besides his daughter, says the historian, he gave to the Church twelve estates of six families each, which were freed from earthly military service to furnish to the monks the means of devoting themselves to the celestial army, and praying for the eternal peace of the nation.⁸⁶

This substitution of the spiritual combats of the celestial army for the military obligations of other Anglo-Saxon land-owners was followed or accompanied by a still more important privilege conferred on the new monastic proprietors. The folc-land or public domain, when transformed into allods or boc-lands — that is to say, into individual property — remained subject to all the public or private burdens which weighed upon the domain, and at the same time became subject to ordinary imposts when the grant was given to laymen. But it was exempt from those burdens when given to monasteries; and when this exemption had not been duly stipulated for in the original donations, deeds were afterwards drawn out, establishing them in the possession of privileges which the pious munificence of after generations made it a duty and pleasure to confer upon the monastic churches.⁸⁷

⁸⁴ "Ut confestim ei terram septuaginta familiarum de suo largitus, monasterium inibi præciperet facere." — BEDE, Hist. Abbat., c. 4.

⁸⁵ LINGARD, vol. i. p. 250, and Note K, pp. 407-411.

⁸⁶ "Donatis insuper duodecim possessiunculis terrarum, in quibus ablato studio militiæ terrestris ad exercendam militiam cœlestem, supplicandumque pro pace gentis ejus æterna, devotioni sedulæ monachorum locus facultasque suppeteret." — BEDE, iii. 24. Kemble and Lingard do not hesitate to suppose that these twelve domains were taken from the folc-land and changed into boc-land for the advantage of the new monasteries. In the Anglo-Saxon translation, attributed to King Alfred, the word possessiuncula is translated boc-land.

⁸⁷ The Codex Diplomaticus contains numberless deeds which secure the land "liberam ab omnibus terrenis difficultatibus, sive a pastu regis, princi-

It has been seen above that from the end of the seventh century a council had recognized this assumed exemption of monasteries from burdens and taxes — excepting only the three tributes or obligations from which no one was excused,⁸⁸ and which regarded the expenses of military expeditions, and the keeping up of bridges and of fortresses — as a general law.

The increasing number of monastic foundations, and the vast extent of territorial gifts lavished upon them, produced, at the end of about a century, an alarming result — the diminution of the military resources of the country. It was not, as has been said, that the nation became less warlike, or that a too exclusive regard for religious things had turned the kings and people of the Heptarchy from their public duties. But the number of proprietors bound to personal military service went on diminishing, — on one side, because of the change of lay lands into privileged monastic possessions; and on the other hand, by the many religious vocations which arose among the warlike nobility. The prince of the Anglo-Saxon monks, the illustrious Bede, was the first to point out this danger, with the frankness which was habitual to him. "In the midst of the peace and security which we enjoy," he wrote in 731, "many Northumbrians, some noble, some humble, put aside their arms, cut their hair, and hasten to enroll themselves in the monastic ranks, instead of exercising themselves in their military duties. The future will tell what good will result from this."⁸⁹

Four years afterwards, in his famous letter to the Archbishop of York, which we have quoted at length,⁹⁰ he expresses a much more energetic disapproval. He unveils at the same time the true character of the evil; he declares without hesitation that the defence of the country is endangered by the want of soldiers, and also by the want of public lands disposable as fiefs to the nobles or veterans. Seduced by the exemption from taxes, and advantages of every kind pis, exactoris . . . a pastu et refectione omnium accipitrum et falconum in terra Mercensium," &c.

⁸⁸ This is called in the charters "trinoda necessitas, generalis incommoditas, communis labor." See above, p. 607.

⁸⁹ "Qua arridente pace et serenitate temporum, plures in gente Northanhumbroꝝ, tam nobiles quam privati, se suosque liberos, depositis armis, satagunt magis, accepta tonsura, monasterialibus ascribere votis, quam bellicis exercere studiis. Quæ res quem sit habitura finem, posterior ætas videbit." — Hist., v. 23.

⁹⁰ See above, pp. 559–566.

with which monastic property was privileged, many of the nobles had obtained from the kings and witan vast grants of land in order to found monasteries upon them. Sometimes foundations were actually made, but without any monastic or even Christian charter; the donors collected around them a handful of their own vassals, or of irregular monks who had been expelled from true cloisters; they then called themselves abbots, and lived, together with their wives and children, on the land extorted from the nation, with no care but that of their household and material interest. Sometimes when the grant was obtained it was made use of without any further thought of its pretended purpose, and no pretence of a monastery, even under the ludicrous conditions just described, was made. For this reason the Venerable Bede implored the king and bishops to proceed, with the aid of the national assemblies, to the complete abolition of all these fraudulent and scandalous grants.⁹¹

Ten years after the death of Bede the second Council of Cloveshove⁹² acknowledged the justice of the great monk's complaint, but without proposing any effectual remedy for the unfortunate state of affairs which he had pointed out.

This council enjoined the bishops to visit the monasteries, "if indeed such a name can be given to houses which the tyranny of avarice, to the scandal of the Christian religion, retains in the hands of worldly persons, invested with them not by divine ordinance, but by an invention of human presumption."⁹³ The object of these pastoral visits was to warn the inmates of the pretended communities of the risks run by their souls, and to provide for the presence of priests in case of any deadly sickness. But nothing indicates that vigorous measures were taken against the odious abuses which produced those so-called monasteries. Ill-considered grants of public lands, to false monks, or, as was much more frequent, to powerful laymen, continued with impunity to the end of the Anglo-Saxon period, causing serious disturbances in the development of the population and the condition of free men, by which the Danish and Norman invasions were facilitated.⁹⁴

⁹¹ The Codex Diplomaticus (No. 46) shows us how King Ina of Wessex took back the lands granted by Cissa to Abbot Hean and his sister the Abbess Cille — "Terram . . . reipublicæ restituit, nondum constructo monasterio in eo, nec ullo admodum oratorio erecto."

⁹² See above, p. 607.

⁹³ "Monasteria, si tamen est fas ea ita nominare, quæ temporibus istis propter vim tyrannicæ quædam avaritiæ ad religionis Christianæ statum multatenus immutari possent, id est a sæcularibus non divinæ legis ordinatione, sed humanæ adinventionis presumptione, utcumque tenentur." — Cap. 5.

But the Council of Cloveshove had other abuses to repress besides those of secular usurpation. The illustrious Boniface, then nearly at the end of his glorious career, and whose vehement remonstrances with King Ethelbald and the primate of England had specially procured the convocation of the Council, did not content himself with stigmatizing as sacrilegious persons and homicides, the laymen, were they kings or earls, who called themselves abbots of these usurped monasteries.⁹⁵ He pointed out to the bishops their own failings, amongst others the national vice of drunkenness, from which even their episcopal dignity did not always protect the Anglo-Saxon bishops; ⁹⁶ he also pointed out in the very cloisters themselves a culpable luxury and ridiculous abundance of ornament in the vestments of the monks; and represented to them that such childish trifles might be an introduction to excesses much more grave, to bad company, to the abandonment of reading and prayer, and even to debauchery, and the loss of their souls.⁹⁷

In accordance with the advice of their illustrious countryman, the twelve bishops assembled at Cloveshove, in council with the King of Mercia and his nobles, forbade monks, and ⁹⁴ At this period there scarcely remained perhaps an acre of folc-land that had not been changed into boc-land, under various pretexts. — KEMBLE, l. c.

⁹⁵ “Ille autem qui laicus homo vel imperator, vel rex, vel aliquis, præfectorum vel comitum sæculari potestate fultus, sibi per violentiam rapiat monasterium de potestate episcopi, vel abbatis, vel abbatisæ, et incipiat ipsi vice abbatis regere et habere sub se monachos et pecuniam possidere, quæ fuit Christi sanguine comparata, talem hominem nominant antiqui patres raptorem et sacrilegum et homicidam pauperum et lupum diabolum intrantem in ovile Christi et maximo anathematis vinculo damnandum ante tribunal Christi.” — Epistola ad Cuthbertum, p. 351, ed. Hussey. No. 70, ed. Jaffé.

⁹⁶ “Fertur quoque in parochiis vestris ebrietatis malum nimis aduetum esse, ut non solum episcopi quidam non prohibeant, sed etiam ipsi nimis bibentes inebrientur, et alios porrectis poculis majoribus cogant ut inebrientur.” — Ibid., p. 353.

⁹⁷ “Supervacuam et Deo odibilem vestimentorum superstitionem prohibere; quia illa ornamenta vestium . . . latissimis clavis, vermium imaginibus clavata adventum Antichristi . . . præcurrunt; illius calliditate, per ministros suos introducere intra claustra monasteriorum fornicationem et luxuriam clavatorum juvenum, et fœda consortia, et tædium lectionis et orationis, et perditionem animarum.” I give in these two latter notes the complete text as given by Spelman in his Concilia, p. 259, for the end of this letter, from the word luxuriam, is omitted in the editions of Serrarius and Giles. No editor has yet satisfactorily explained what were the clavi and vermes, the presence of which in the costume of the monks so scandalized Boniface.

especially nuns, to make any change in their dress, shoes, or headdress, which would assimilate their costume to that of the lay members of society.⁹⁸ The same Council forbade them to frequent the houses of secular persons, or to dwell in them; ⁹⁹ it commanded the abbots and abbesses to neglect no means of preserving in their communities, and the schools attached to them, the love of study and reading, as the best preservative against the vanities and lusts of the world,¹⁰⁰ and to make of their monasteries an asylum for silence, study, prayer, and work.¹⁰¹ It reprovcd and forbade the introduction of poets, minstrels, musicians, and clowns into the religious houses: the prolonged visits of secular persons, who were allowed to penetrate into and wander about the interior of the cloister; the prolonged and luxurious meals, mingled with buffooneries; ¹⁰² and especially that fatal leaning towards drunkenness, which led them not only themselves to drink to excess, but to force their lay companions to drink with them.¹⁰³

The Council concludes this humbling enumeration of the evils which luxury and wealth had introduced into the cloister by a sort of treatise, equally marked by its eloquence and its good sense, against the false ideas which began to be general on the subject of alms, or, in other words, on the moral value of those gifts which constituted the daily increasing wealth of the monasteries. An echo of the generous protest of Bede in his letter to the Archbishop of York is to be found in it.¹⁰⁴ Alms, say the Fathers of the council, when joined to the appointed penance, help in obtaining from God a more prompt remission of sin, and bestowal of grace to prevent backsliding; to those who are not great sinners, it

⁹⁸ "Ut vestibus consuetis, juxta formam priorum . . . deinceps utantur; nec imitentur sæculares in vestitu crurum per fasciolas, nec per coculas in circumdatione capitis modo pallii laicorum contra morem Ecclesiæ." — Cap. 28.

⁹⁹ Cap. 29.

¹⁰⁰ "Ut per familias suas lectionis studium indesinenter in plurimorum pectoribus versetur . . . coerceantur et exerceantur in scholis pueri dilectionem sacræ scientiæ." — Cap. 7.

¹⁰¹ "Ut sint juxta vocabulum nominis sui, honesta silentium, quietorum atque pro Deo laborantium habitacula . . . orantium, legentium, Deumque laudantium." — Cap. 20.

¹⁰² "Non sint ludierarum artium receptacula . . . poetarum, citharistarum, musicorum, scurrarum. . . . Non habeant sæculares quique vagandi licentiam . . . per interiora monasterii domuncula." — Cap. 20.

¹⁰³ "Ut monasteriales sive ecclesiastici ebrietatis malum non sectentur. . . . Neque alios cogant intemperanter bibere. . . . Sint convivia neque deliciis vel scurrilitatibus mixta . . . et ut . . . potationibus ebriosorum more non serviant." — Cap. 21.

¹⁰⁴ See above, p. 565.

answers the purpose of insuring in heaven the reward due to their innocence and charity. But alms are not given in order that those who receive them may give themselves up to excess in eating and drinking.¹⁰⁵ Nor can any alms which are given with the intention of purchasing greater license in the future be of any efficacy to redeem even the smallest of sins. Alms are a work of pity. He who has pity in his soul must do his alms at his own expense, and not by robbing his neighbor. To offer to God gifts stained with violence and cruelty, is to irritate instead of appeasing divine justice. For the wise man has said, "To give alms at the expense of the poor, is like killing the son in presence of his father."¹⁰⁶ Even to suppose that Divine justice is venal, is a means of provoking it to strike severely and promptly. The common saying, that certain persons give daily offerings to God in order that they may give themselves up to sin with impunity, is therefore a great mistake. Those who foolishly imagine that the celestial Judge will balance their gifts against their continued crimes are blind indeed. It will be of no use to them to give their goods to God, so long as they give themselves to the devil.¹⁰⁷

The Council insists at length upon the necessity of incessant preaching to all, that alms can never take the place of contrition, nor of the canonical penalties imposed for the expiation of sins. It energetically condemns those who hope to acquit themselves of their penances by the intervention of others who shall fast or sing psalms on their account — that is to say, the monks supported by their gifts. It is the flesh which has sinned which ought to be punished. To allow sinners to believe the contrary would be to ruin them by corrupt adulation. For if a man could redeem his faults by money, and satisfy the justice of God by the deeds of another, then justice would indeed be venal, and the rich would be saved more easily than the poor, in defiance of the ¹⁰⁵ "Non sit quoque eleemosyna illius ad hoc esurienti data, ut se ipsum comessionibus ebrietatibusque illicitis supra modum ingurgitet." — Cap. 26.

¹⁰⁶ "Eleemosyna quæ fit ex substantia pauperum, quasi qui mactat filium in conspectu patris sui." — Eccl. xxxiv. 24.

¹⁰⁷ "Non ad hoc sine dubio dandæ, ut quælibet vel minima saltem peccata eo licentius cuiquam agere liceat, quo vel ipse vel alius quilibet pro eo eleemosynas faciat. . . . Ne per hoc quod venalem Dei justitiâ ponat, ab eadem non solum acrius, sed citius juxta merita istius judicetur. Non sint, ut generaliter dicatur, eleemosynæ ad hoc datæ. . . . Frustra suas tantum eleemosynas et non internixta flagitia supernum pensare judicem cæco suo libitu volunt et optant . . . sua Deo dare videntur, sed se ipsos diabolo per flagitia dare non dubitantur." — Cap. 26.

express words of Scripture. Let no man deceive himself thus, for God deceives no man; and, as has been said by His Apostle, we shall all appear on the same level before the tribunal of Christ.¹⁰⁸

It is thus evident that the chiefs of the Anglo-Saxon Church, who all came from the monastic order, were the first to protest against false interpretations and evil applications of the doctrine of alms. They protested at the same moment, and before the event, against the calumnies and exaggerations heaped by an unjust and ungrateful posterity upon the avarice and greed of ecclesiastical corporations and the hypocrisies and evil influence of the cloister.

But the abuses which their watchful and paternal authority thus endeavored to assail and repress, were without one single exception to be attributed to the relaxation of rule which too much and too sudden wealth had introduced into the monasteries.

And all was not yet said. For this wealth brought with it other dangers besides that of internal laxity. It awakened universal covetousness. Sometimes the natural heirs of the lawful abbot of a monastery came after his death and violently seized the monastic lands, under pretence that the abbey had been the property of the deceased, and that they had a right to its inheritance, on the sole condition of supporting the monks.¹⁰⁹ Sometimes kings and princes installed themselves in a great monastery as in a place of rest and recreation, with all their surroundings, their train of officials, huntsmen, footmen, and grooms, who, along with horses, hawks, and dogs, had to be lodged, fed, and provided with vehicles, as is proved by the charters, which, while exempting certain monasteries from this charge, prove how habitual and burdensome it had become.¹¹⁰ Again there were other kings still more exacting and formidable, who revoked the ¹⁰⁸ "Ipsa illius caro quæ illicita ac nefanda contraxit desideria, ipsam hic in præsentî punire juxta modum reatus sui debet. . . . De hoc prolixius ideo disputandum est, quia nuper quidam dives, petens reconciliationem pro magno suo facinore . . . quod superni judicis quotidie justitiam inter se quasi venalem statuere. . . . Antequam plures vestra errabunda adulatione implcantur et deducantur ad perniciem."—Cap. 27.

¹⁰⁹ Something of a similar character has been seen in the Irish monasteries of the family of St. Columbkil, where there were two lines of abbots, the one secular and hereditary, the other ecclesiastical and according to the rule. See p. 119.

¹¹⁰ "Pastus regum et principum, ducum et præfectorum, exactorum, equorum et falconum, accipitrum et canum . . . et omnes difficultates regalis vel sæcularis serviitii."—Codex Diplom., n. 288.

gifts made by their predecessors, and reclaimed the lands given by them; setting forth their pretensions and the counter-plea of the monks before the Witenagemot, the decisions of which were not always in conformity with the rights of the weak. The nobles and great personages, too, often followed the example of the kings—they reclaimed the lands given to the monasteries by their fathers, or seized upon others which lay at hand, leaving traces of their depredations in the many acts which enforce restitution more or less tardy, but at the same time proving that violence and rapacity had too often the advantage over the pious munificence of former benefactors.

Sometimes the prelates themselves abused their authority by making over to their relatives a portion of the conventual patrimony. In short, the local and intestinal wars which were so frequent at this period were waged specially at the expense of the monastic lands,¹¹¹ which were always the best cultivated and the most populous, and consequently offered a richer and more attractive prey to the spoiler. This fact explains the singular fluctuations of prosperity to which the monasteries were subject, though their perseverance, their laborious and economical system, their paternal care of the agricultural population, were almost always sufficient to restore their impaired fortunes. The twice-repeated accusation of St. Boniface, when, in his letters to King Ethelbald and the Archbishop of Canterbury, he distinguishes England as the country in which the monks were subjected to the harshest bondage, on account of the exactions and forced labor required from them by the royal officials for public buildings, is much less comprehensible. He speaks of these oppressions as of a novelty unknown under the ancient kings, and in the other countries of Christendom; no trace of them is to be found in contemporary documents; but the evidence of the great Boniface, so attentive an observer of everything that concerned the Church in his native country, is too grave to be set altogether aside.¹¹²

¹¹¹ All these causes of the ruin or deterioration of monastic property are well explained by Lingard, Antiquities, vol. i. pp. 226 and 253–256.

¹¹² “Dicitur quod præfecti et comites tui majorem violentiam et servitutem monachis et sacerdotibus irrogent, quam ceteri ante Christiani reges fecissent.” — Epist. ad Ethelbaldum, No. 59. “De violenta quoque monachorum servitute, operibus et ædificiis regalibus, quæ in toto mundo Christianorum non auditur facta, nisi tantum in genere Anglorum: quod sacerdotibus Dei non tacendum nec consentiendum est, quod inauditum malum est præteritis seculis.” — Epist. ad Cuthbertum, No. 70, ed. Jaffé.

Property has been in England, as elsewhere, the condition and guarantee of freedom for the Church as well as for corporations and individuals. But the burdens, the abuses, the excesses, the privileges which property brings with it, have been in England more than anywhere else, and at all periods, the great danger of the Church, and it is upon this rock that the monastic ark has perished, drawing with it in its shipwreck the whole Catholic Church of England. In this lies a terrible mystery, a problem of which our fathers did not sufficiently understand the gravity and difficulty. To solve it would have demanded from the heads of the Church, and especially of the religious orders, an amount of discernment, moderation, and prudence, easier to dream of than to find. But the reaction which raised up the holy founders of mendicant orders, and which always burns in some souls, enamoured of the primitive but transitory simplicity of the great cenobitical foundations, is but too easily imaginable. "My brethren," said the greatest monk of our century, preaching at the inauguration of one of his new establishments — "my brethren, if I knew that our house would grow rich, even by your savings, I should rise to-night and set fire to it, at its four corners."

V.

Fatal wealth! let us repeat with this great man — fatal wealth, the daughter of charity, of faith, of a generous and spontaneous virtue, but the mother of covetousness, envy, robbery, and ruin! Scarcely a century had run since the modest and sober beginning of the Church and monastic order in England — and already the honorable and undisputed voices of saints, such as Boniface and Bede, are raised to indicate the danger, though without perceiving its cause. The leprosy was already there. In the fulness of youth, at the height of health, the germ of mortality appeared. The day was to come when the poisonous fruit should be gathered by greedy and bloody hands. The day was to come when a monster, who resembled at once Caligula and Heliogabalus, a Henry VIII., with his cowardly courtiers and debased people, should arm himself with the pretext of the exorbitant wealth of religious corporations in order to annihilate, and drown in blood and slavery, the work of Augustin, Wilfrid, and Bede.

I think I have a right to despise the insinuations of those who have dared to accuse me of desiring to absolve or mitigate the crime of those sacrilegious bandits—those cowardly spoilers who, in England as in all the rest of Europe, have made a prey of the patrimony of the Church. But who will not regret with me that the Church, which alone had the necessary discernment and authority, should not herself have set limits, at a suitable moment, to the unlimited increase of wealth in the monastic corporations? The increase was lawful, natural, often even involuntary, but dangerous and exorbitant. The Church could and ought to have understood this. The Church, with her supernatural insight, her divine authority, her maternal omnipotence, could and ought to have forestalled the danger by warning prohibitions, by a just division of the superfluities of great orders and rich communities, either to the advantage of the poor, of public beneficence, of the inferior and neglected clergy, or any other social service or necessity.

No man can say from what evils and crimes the world might have been spared if the Church, which was destined to be the chief victim, had been beforehand with the spoilers; had baffled their hatred and disarmed their treachery by taking from them this specious pretext; arresting with a prudent and steady hand the rising tide of ecclesiastical wealth, and saying, "Hitherto shalt thou come, but no farther; and here shall thy proud waves be stayed."¹¹³

Disinterestedness is, above all others, the virtue of a priest; voluntary poverty has always been the unfailing source of the influence and power of monks. In this they have always been able—they will always be able—to renew and revive their strength. It was this thought that comforted the great soul of Mabillon, the most illustrious of modern Benedictines, in those generous lamentations which dropped from his pen after the narrative of the conquest of England by the monks, and which may still be applied to so many other Catholic countries which the scythe of Vandalism had not yet assailed in his day:—

"Ah! if Gregory or Augustin could but live again, and see these lands to-day! What a sad glance would they throw upon the fruits of their wasted labors, the scattered stones of the sanctuary, the house of prayer changed into the abode of desolation! It is not that we weep the lost wealth of the Church; it is not our sacked and overthrown monasteries that the Benedictines regret. No; but we groan over the fate of our brethren, rent from the bosom of the Catholic Church and rooted in heresy. God grant that we might buy their return by the price of all that might once have been ours. What would not the Church give, what would not our order sacrifice, to gain the souls of our brethren, and enrich ourselves in the poverty of Christ!"¹¹⁴

¹¹³ JOB xxxviii. 11.

It was from the Benedictine ranks, purified by toil and a frugal life, or from the bosom of other orders given by God to the Church to defend and console her, that the new missionaries came who, in the age of Mabillon, returned upon English soil, a thousand years after the companions of Augustin and the disciples of Columba. Far from being received, as their predecessors had been by the Anglo-Saxon pagans, with magnanimous and intelligent tolerance, they had nothing to expect of the Protestant English but martyrdom, often preceded by the horrors of a lengthened captivity, and by tortures unknown to savages. Nevertheless, daily some monk crossed the sea, and landed disguised and by night upon the soil where Augustin and the monks of Mont Coelius had planted in broad day the cross of Jesus Christ, now banished and denied by Christian England. Not far from the old wasted and confiscated monasteries, he began, at the risk of his life, the clandestine practice of that worship which the envoys of Gregory the Great had openly celebrated; he distributed the bread of life and truth to some sheep of the little flock which had survived persecutions more atrocious and prolonged than those of Decius or Diocletian, to keep and transmit to our free and happier days the yet warm ashes of the truth. They came from France, they came from Belgium, Italy, and even from Spain, to gather these bloody laurels, striving for them with exiles of the English race. They were

A Spanish
Benedictine martyred by discovered, questioned, tortured, and then murdered, with all the refinements of infernal cruelty. Among many others, let us name a Spaniard, George ¹¹⁴ "Ah! si modo in illas terras redivivi venirent Gregorius et Augustinus! quibus oculis intuerentur laborum suorum fructus dissipatos, dispersos lapides sanctuarii, et domos orationis factas domos desolationis! Neque vero lugemus amissas illic Ecclesiæ amplissimas opes . . . neque nos Benedictini jam dolemus monasteria nostra direpta et eversa; sed ingemiscimus, quod fratres nostros a gremio Ecclesiæ Catholicæ avulsos et in schismate obfirmatos videamus. Utinam cessione omnium rerum, olimstrarum, eos ad nos redituros comparare nobis liceret! Quidni Ecclesia, quidni ordo noster ultro cederet bonis, olim suis, ad lucrandos fratres, cum Christus propter nos egenus factus sit, ut nos ejus inopia ditaremur!" — Ann. Bened., l. ix. c. 44.

Gervaise, who, captured and questioned by the judges of Mary Stuart's miserable son upon his profession, answered, "I am a Benedictine monk, of that order which of old converted England to the Christian faith." He renewed this profession at the foot of the gibbet on which he was hung, and from which he was taken down before he had yielded his last breath that his side might be opened, his heart torn out, and his feet cut off, in order to teach foreign monks who should venture to intrude on English soil, what sufferings should prevent their return to their native country.¹¹⁵ "But," says the Spanish Benedictine who has added this tale to the glorious annals of his order, "what heart among us does not feel itself inspired by this example to suffer for Christ, and to repeat the sacred text, 'How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of those who carry good tidings, who publish peace.' Besides," continues the Castilian annalist, "if there is any undertaking which belongs above others to the order of St. Benedict, it is the mission to England, for our fathers conquered that island to Christ by their preaching and by their blood. They possessed there a crowd of monasteries, illustrious among the most illustrious in Europe. When generals and captains in arms desire to animate their soldiers for the battle, they remind them of their past exploits, of their victories, of the glory of their nation, the safety and honor of their wives and children. It seems to me that our father Benedict, from the height of heaven, speaks thus to his monks. He reminds them that England was brought within the pale of the Church by St. Gregory and the monk-apostles of that island. He commands the monks of all his congregations to return there for the honor of religion, that the faith planted by the hands of his sons may not be brought to nothing; not to forget how many souls sigh after religious life; and to carry help to our mother, the holy Church, so cruelly persecuted by heresy."¹¹⁶

But let us turn our saddened eyes away from that terrible future, so different, and still so distant, from the time of which we have just spoken. Notwithstanding the dangers and abuses which, in the interests of truth, must be acknowledged to have existed from the beginning of monastic missions, long centuries of faith and fervor, of union with the Roman Church and Catholic Christendom, succeeded the beautiful beginning of converted England. Abundant harvests were produced during these centuries in the furrows ploughed by the disciples of Augustin and Bede. Before it settled into the great nation which the world admires and envies, furnished with the noblest and wisest institutions that men have ever known, with a literature rich in unrivalled genius, and power greater than that of ancient Rome, England had to become the great base of operation for the spiritual conquests of the Papacy, the great centre of Christian missions. By her the Roman Church moved, enlightened, and subdued the centre and north of Europe; and it was by her means that the German and Scandinavian peoples, still plunged in the darkness of heathenism, were brought into the Christian faith.

¹¹⁵ "Como amenazando a los monges de España que no passen a aquella isla; por que ellos padeceran los mismos tormentos y no tendran pies para bolver a su tierra." — YEPES, Coronica General de S. Benito, 1609, vol. i. p. 448.

¹¹⁶ YEPES, l. c.

The first-fruits of the monastic seed sown by the hand of the great monk Gregory in the bosom of the Anglo-Saxon race, was the great apostle and martyr Winifred, whose Latin name, Bonifacius, the benefactor, so exactly expressed his glorious career. It was he who was chosen by God to carry the light of truth, the flame of love, the spirit of martyrdom, into the cradle of his ancestors, the depths of those German forests, happily impenetrable by the enslaved Romans, from whence came the freedom, thought, and life of Catholic nations, and with these the Christian civilization of two worlds.

BOOK XV.

THE ANGLO-SAXON NUNS.

“Quali colombe dal disio chiamate
Con l’ali aperte e ferme al dolce nido
Volan, per l’aer dal voler portate.”
DANTE, Inferno, c. 5.

“Indi, como orologio che ne chiami
Nell’ora che la sposa di Dio surge
A mattinar lo sposo, perchè l’ami,
Che l’una parte e l’altra tira ed urge
Tin tin sonando con sì dolce nota
Che l’ben disposto spirto d’amor turge;
Così vid’io la gloriosa ruota
Moversi e render voce a voce in tempra
Ed in dolezza ch’esser non può nota
Se non colà dove l’gioir s’insempra.”
Paradiso, c. 10.

“Come, pensive nun, devout and pure,
Sober, steadfast, and demure.”
MILTON, Penseroso.

I.

Convents of women as numerous and important as the monasteries of men. — Important position of women among the Teutonic races. — Contrast with the Romans of the Empire. — Among the Anglo-Saxons, descendants of the Cimbri, the influence of women even greater and happier than in other nations. — Importance of dynastic alliances. — Anglo-Saxon queens. The Teutonic barbarians, though less corrupt than the Romans, nevertheless required an immense effort of the Christian apostles to conquer their sensual excesses. — The debt owed by women to Christianity. — The Church could only emancipate women by the ideal of Christian virginity. — This virginity nowhere more honored than among the Anglo-Saxons. — Influence and authority of abbesses. They appear in the national councils. — Ceremonial of the solemn benediction of a nun.

II.

Anglo-Saxon queens and princesses in the cloister. — The first nuns trained in France, at Faremoutier, Jouarre, and Chelles. — Saint Botolph and the two East Anglian princesses at Chelles.

Each dynasty of the Heptarchy supplies its share of virgins, wives, and widows.

The Northumbrian nuns already well known, except Bega. — Legend of this princess, an Irishwoman by birth. — Perpetual confusion of history and tradition.

The Ascings, or princesses of the Kentish dynasty. — Ethelburga, Queen of Northumbria, afterwards foundress of Lyminge. — Her sister Eadburga, and her niece Eanswida, foundress of Folkestone. — The legend of Domneva and her brothers. — The hind's run in the Isle of Thanet. — Great popularity of St. Mildred. — Legend of the box on the ear. — Mildred's sisters. — Milburga and the dead child.

The Mercian princesses. — The race of the cruel Penda furnished the greatest number of saints and nuns. — Three of his daughters nuns, and four of his granddaughters saints.

The Uffings of East Anglia. — The three daughters of King Anna who fell in battle. — Withburga and her community fed on hind's milk. — Three generations of saints of the race of Odin at Ely, which had for its three first abbesses a Queen of Northumbria, a Queen of Kent, and a Queen of Mercia. — Wereburga, the fourth sainted Abbess of Ely, and the shepherd of Weedon.

Nuns of the race of Cerdic in Wessex; the wife and sisters of King Ina. — St. Cuthburga, foundress of Winbourne. — The monastery of Frideswida, a West Saxon princess, is the cradle of the University of Oxford: the kiss of the leper.

III.

Literary, biblical, and classical studies among the Anglo-Saxon nuns — chiefly at Barking, under Abbess Hildelida. St. Aldhelm addresses to them his Eulogy of Virginity; his letters to other nuns. — Winbourne, another centre of intellectual activity. — Abbess Tetta and her five hundred nuns; the novices dance on the tomb of their mistress.

IV.

Winbourne, a double monastery. — Origin of these singular institutions. — They flourished chiefly in the Irish colonies in Gaul: from thence introduced into England. — A monastery of men joined to every great abbey of women, and always governed by the abbess. — Interdicted by Archbishop Theodore. — The double monasteries disappeared after the Danish invasion; resemblance to the boys' schools managed by young girls in the United States. — In the seventh and eighth centuries no disorders are remarked in them except at Coldingham. — What were the abuses of the Anglo-Saxon cloisters. — Splendor of dress; attempts upon the modesty of the nuns foreseen and punished by Anglo-Saxon legislation. — Decrees of Archbishop Theodore and Egbert against the criminal relations of the clergy with nuns; their importance should not be exaggerated.

V.

The letters of St. Boniface contain the surest accounts of the state of souls in the Anglo-Saxon cloisters. — All there was not calm and happiness. — Tender and impassioned character of the letters addressed by the nuns to Boniface and his companions. — The not less affectionate answers of the missionaries. — The three Buggas and the two Eadburgas. — Earnest desire to make pilgrimages to Rome. — Grievances of the Abbess Eangytha and her daughter. — How St. Lioba became connected with St. Boniface. — Other letters written to the saint by his friends: Cena, Egburga. — Lamentation of a nun for the absence of her brother.

VI.

Excesses of feeling vanish before death, but death itself does not put an end to the sweet friendships of the cloister. — St. Galla. — Hilda and her friend; Ethelburga and her friend; the daughters of Earl Puch. — Visions of light. — The daughter of the King of Kent and the lay sister at Faremoutier. — The shining shroud at Barking; the extinguished lamp.

VII.

History has preserved only these names, but many others have disappeared after glorifying the Church and their country. — Masculine character of these Anglo-Saxon nuns: their monastic ideal unites the types of man, woman, and child.

Conclusion. — The whole ancient Catholic world has perished except the army of sacrifice. — Number and endurance of contemporary vocations.

I.

“Hark how I'll bribe you: . . .
Ay, with such gifts that heaven shall share with you;
. . . With true prayers
That shall be up at heaven and enter there
Ere sunrise — prayers from preserved souls,
From fasting maids, whose minds are dedicate
To nothing temporal.”

SHAKESPEARE, Measure for Measure.

I HAD supposed my task at an end; but I hear the sound as of a choir of sweet and pure voices which seem to reproach me for having left in the shade one side of the great edifice which I have undertaken to reconstruct in thought. These voices have no plaintive sound. But they are full of a soft and overpowering harmony which has not been sufficiently celebrated before men. The souls whose sentiments they utter do not complain of being forgotten; it is their chosen condition and desire. They have made greater sacrifices than that of a place in the memory of men. Strength, veiled by gentleness, is in their very breath. Their appearance in history is characterized by something clear and firm, sober yet animated, as well as by that sacrifice of life in its flower, which is of all things in the world the most touching. These are the daughters of the Anglo-Saxon kings and lords, and with them, a true nation of virgins, voluntary prisoners of the love of God,¹ and consecrated to monastic life in cloisters which rival in number and influence the monasteries of men, the most important centres of Christian life.

We have already seen how, outside their communities, and mingled in the current of the historical events of their time, several of those vigorous women, those wise virgins and spiritual warriors, have left their trace in the history of their country. But such isolated figures do not suffice for an attentive study of the state of souls and things in times so distant. Account must be made of other personages of the same order, and above all as much as is possible of the feminine army which is arrayed by the side of those queens and princesses. The crowd must be penetrated in any attempt to trace this fruitful and powerful branch of the monastic family, and in default of exact and precise details, which are rarely to be found, an effort, at least, must be made to seize the salient points, and to bring out such features of their life as may touch or enlighten posterity.

And, in the first place, to give any exact representation of the Anglo-Saxon nuns as they appeared in their own consciousness and to the eyes of their countrymen, the important part played by women among the Teutonic races must be borne in mind. Nothing had more astonished the Romans than the austere chastity of the German women;² the religious respect of the men for the partners of their labors and dangers, in peace as well as in war; and the almost divine honors with which they surrounded the priestesses or prophetesses, who sometimes presided at their religious rites, and sometimes led them to combat against the violators of the national soil.³ When the Great part played by women among the Teutonic races.

¹ "That voluntary prison into which they threw themselves for the love of God." — BOSSUET, Exorde du Sermon sur Jesus Christ comme Sujet de Scandale.

² "Severa illic matrimonia: nec ullam morum partem magis laudaveris. . . . Ne se mulier extra virtutum cogitationes, extraque bellorum casus putet, ipsis incipientis matrimonii auspiciis admonetur, venire se laborum periculorumque sociam, idem in pace, idem in prælio passuram ausuramque. . . . Paucissima in tam numerosa gente adulteria." — TACIT., De Mor. German., c. 18, 19.

³ Ibid., c. 8. Cf. CÆSAR, De Bell. Gall., i. 50, 51.

Roman world, undermined by corruption and imperial despotism, fell to pieces like the arch of a cloaca, there is no better indication of the difference between the debased subjects of the empire and their conquerors, than that sanctity of conjugal and domestic ties, that energetic family feeling, that worship of pure blood, which are founded upon the dignity of woman, and respect for her modesty, no less than upon the proud independence of man and the consciousness of personal dignity. It is by this special quality that the barbarians showed themselves worthy of instilling a new life into the West, and becoming the forerunners of the new and Christian nations to which we all owe our birth.

Who does not recall those Cimbri whom Marius had so much trouble in conquering, and whose women rivalled the men in boldness and heroism? Those women, who had followed their husbands to the war, gave to the Romans a lesson in modesty and greatness of soul of which the future tools of the tyrants and the Cæsars were not worthy. They would surrender only on the promise of the consul that their honor should be protected, and that they should be given as slaves to the vestals, thus putting themselves under the protection of those whom they believed virgins and priestesses. The great beginner of democratic Dictatorship refused: upon which they killed themselves and their children, generously preferring death to shame.⁴ The Anglo-Saxons came from the same districts bathed by the waters of the Northern Sea, which had been inhabited by the Cimbri,⁵ and showed themselves worthy of descent from them, as much by the irresistible onslaught of their warriors, as by the indisputable power of their women. No trace of the old Roman spirit which put a wife in manu, in the hand of her husband, that is to say, under his feet, is to be found among them. Woman is a person and not a thing. She lives, she speaks, she acts for herself, guaranteed against the least outrage by severe penalties, and protected by universal respect. She inherits, she disposes of her possessions — sometimes even she deliberates, she fights, she governs, like the most proud and powerful of men.⁶ The influence of women has been nowhere more effectual, more fully recognized, or more enduring than among the Anglo-Saxons, and nowhere was it more legitimate or more happy.

Especially among the Anglo-Saxon descendants of the Cimbri.

⁴ FLORUS, l. iii. c. 3.

⁵ "Proximi Oceano Cimbri tenent, parva nunc civitas, sed gloria ingens." — De Moribus German., c. 37. Jutland, Schleswig, and Holstein, from whence came the Jutes, Angles, and Saxons, bore the name of the Cimbric Chersonese.

From the beginning of Christianity, women everywhere became, as has been seen at every page of this narrative, the active and persevering, as well as daring and unwearied assistants of the Christian apostles; and when the conversion of the race was complete, no Fredigond appeared, as among the Gallo-Franks, to renew the evil behavior of the Roman empresses. If there existed among these queens and princesses certain violent and cruel souls, there was not one who could be accused of loose morals or immodest inclinations. The national legend is here in perfect accord with the monastic, and popular tradition with history. From the beautiful Rowena, sister of the first conqueror Hengist, to the famous Countess Godiva — from the daughter of Ethelbert, who carried the faith into Northumbria, to the wife of Ina, who procured the conversion of her husband — we encounter, with few exceptions, only attractive and generous figures, in whom beauty and modesty meet together, and the gentleness natural to woman is allied with an energy which reaches heroism.

From this fact arises the extreme importance attached by the Anglo-Saxons to matrimonial alliances which united among themselves the various sovereign dynasties, and the nations or tribes whose local independence and glorious recollections were personified by them. These unions, by renewing periodically the ties of a common nationality, gave to the princesses of the race of Odin the office of mediatrix and peacemaker to a degree which justifies the touching surname given to woman in the primitive poetry of the Anglo-Saxons, where she is described as freodowebbe, she who weaves the links of peace.⁷

Thence, too, arose the great position held by the queens in all the states of the Anglo-Saxon confederation. Possessing a court, legal jurisdiction, and territorial revenue on her own account,⁸ surrounded with the same homage, sometimes invested with the same rights and authority as the sovereign, his wife took her place by his side in the political and religious assemblies, and her signature appeared in acts of foundation, in the decrees of the councils and in the charters, sometimes followed by those of the king's sisters, or other princesses of the royal house. Sometimes these royal ladies, associated, as they were among the Teutons of whom Tacitus speaks, in all their husbands' cares, labors, and dangers, gave all their efforts, like Ermenilda of Mercia, to the conversion of a still heathen kingdom;⁹ sometimes, like Sexburga in Wessex, they exercised the regency with full royal authority, and almost manly vigor.¹⁰ There is no instance of a woman reigning alone by hereditary right or by election. But the mysterious act which ended the days of the Northumbrian Osthryda,¹¹ Queen of the Mercians, reminds us that we are in the country where Mary Stuart, the first who ever lost a crowned head on a scaffold, was to prove that women were there destined to all the greatness and all the calamities of supreme power.

⁶ In this respect there was no difference between the victors and the vanquished. Women had always occupied an important place among the Britons, and often reigned and fought at their head; witness Boadicea immortalized by Tacitus. Free women, married and possessing five acres of land, voted in the public assemblies of the clans or tribes of Britain. — Ancient Laws of Cambria — ap. PALGRAVE and LAPPENBERG.

⁷ Beowulf, verse 3880.

At the same time it would be a strange delusion to suppose that the traditional respect shown by the Teutonic races to woman, or to certain women, was sufficiently strong or universal to restrain all the excesses of the most formidable passion and most imperious instinct of fallen humanity, among the Anglo-Saxons. Of all the victories of Christianity there is none more salutary and more necessary, and at the same time none more hardly and painfully won, than that which it has gained, gained alone and everywhere, though with a daily renewed struggle, over the unregulated inclinations which stain and poison the fountains of life. Its divinity here shows itself by a triumph which no rival philosophy,

⁸ LAPPENBERG, vol. i. p. 564.

⁹ See above, p. 340.

¹⁰ Sexburga, widow of the King of Wessex, Kinewalk, was made Queen-Regent by her husband at his death in 673. "Nec deerat mulieri spiritus ad obeunda regni munia. Ipsa novos exercitus moliri, veteres tenere in officio, ipsa subjectos elementer moderari, hostibus minaciter infremere, prorsus omnia facere, ut nihil præter sexum discerneres. Verumtamen plus quam femineos animos anhelantem vita destituit, vix annua potestate perfunctam."—GUILL. MALMESB., i. 32; RIC. CIRENC., ii. 40.

¹¹ "A suis, id est Merciorum primatibus, interempta."—BEDE, v. 24. "Crudeliter necaverunt."—MATTH. WESTMONAST., ad. ann. 696. See in pp. 299, 414, 420, what we have said of her, and her devotion to her uncle, St. Oswald, and her husband Ethelred, the friend of Wilfrid, who abdicated to become a monk at Bardeney.

no adverse doctrine, has ever equalled, or will ever aspire to equal. No doubt the barbarians, according to the testimony of the Fathers, were more chaste than the Romans of the Empire. To succeed in introducing a respect for modesty and priestly celibacy in the midst of the corruptions of imperial Rome — to raise in the midst of the universal debasement the type of virginity consecrated to God — religion needed an amount of strength, majesty, and constancy, which the terrible wrestle maintained for three centuries could alone have given to it.

Neither was it a brief or easy enterprise to offer and place the yoke of continence upon the shoulders of a barbarous race, in proportion as they seized their prey, and established themselves as masters of the future. It was a glorious and painful task to struggle day by day in that terrible confusion, in the desperate obscurity of the tempest, against an innumerable band of victors, inflamed by all the lusts of strength and conquest, and poisoned even by contact with their victims. The struggle was long, glorious, difficult, and triumphant. It was no longer the unnatural debauchery and monstrous orgies of the Roman empire which had to be denounced; but there remained the vile and gross inclinations, the brutally disordered appetites of human and savage nature. There are excesses and crimes which, though not set forth in the pages of Petronius and Suetonius, though seen only in glimpses through the articles of a penitentiary, the canons of a council, the mutilated text of a legend or chronicle, reveal no less gulfs of shame and sorrow. The Teutons were more respectful than the Orientals or Romans to those women whom they considered their own equals or superiors; but who shall say what was the fate of those of inferior condition, and especially of the unfortunates hidden in the dreary darkness of slavery or serfdom? Who shall say what were the sublime and forever unknown efforts which were made by the priests of a God of purity to wrest so many young captives, so many slave or serf girls, from the harems of princes, from the pitiless passion of victorious warriors, and the tyrannical caprices of their masters? God alone knows these efforts, God alone has rewarded them. Attentive and sincere history can but note the general result, which was immense and glorious.

Christian civilization has triumphed, and its triumph rests, above all, upon respect for the wife, virgin, and mother — that transfigured woman of whom the mother of God has become the type and guardian in Christian nations.¹²

It is Christianity which has armed woman with her own weakness, and made of it her strength—a strength more august and respected than any other: “when I am weak, then am I strong.” The Christian religion has been the true country of woman; the only one in which she has found her true freedom, her true destiny, coming out of Egyptian bondage, escaping from paganism, from savage life, or from the still more shameful debasement of civilized depravity. This also, and this alone, could give a free field to all the virtues which are characteristically her own, those which make her not only equal, but often superior to man—generosity, the heroism of patience and self-devotion, suffering accepted for the help of others, victory over selfishness, and the sacrifice of pride to love. This work of atonement and salvation, which is the only true emancipation of woman, and, by her, of virtue and the soul, has been the work of the Church with the aid of the Teutonic race.

And the Church has done this work only by elevating above and beyond the level of virtue, which women in general can reach, that ideal of moral virtue and beauty which can be realized only by virginity consecrated to God. She has raised this ideal above the virtues most admired and most worthy to be admired among the ancient nations, even among the Jews, where fruitfulness was a woman's supreme glory. She has given embodiment, discipline, law, a soul, an inextinguishable light, to the confused notions spread throughout antiquity; she has transformed into a splendid and immortal army those little groups of vestals, sibyls, and Druidesses, which were scattered through the heathen world. Respect for modesty, which among the most generous nations was the privilege of a small and chosen number, she has brought to be the inviolable inheritance of every human creature: at the same time she has made the privileged state of virginity consecrated to God to be the common dowry of Christendom, the lawful and supreme ambition of the poorest child of the people, as well as of the daughter of kings; and for eighteen centuries she has drawn from all countries and conditions, myriads of chaste and radiant creatures, who have rushed to her altars, bringing their heart and life to God who became man in order to redeem them.

¹² See L'Histoire de Sainte Elisabeth, Introduction, pp. 76, 134.

No people honors virginity more than the Anglo-
Saxons.

Our Anglo-Saxons were neither the last nor the least instruments of this glorious transformation. Amid all the overflowings of their natural intemperance, they had preserved the instinct and a sense of the necessity of veneration for things above: they could, at least, honor the virtues which they would not or could not practise. The spectator stands amazed at the crowd of neophytes of both sexes who came from all the races of the Heptarchy, to vow themselves to perpetual continence. None of the new Christian nations seem to have furnished so great a number; and among none does Christian virginity seem to have exercised so prompt and so supreme an influence. The young Anglo-Saxon women who gave themselves to God, though they were initiated into the life of the cloister in the Gallo-Frankish monasteries, which had the advantage of being sooner established than those of England, had to return to their own island to realize their own value in the eyes of their countrymen.

The Anglo-Saxon conquerors regarded with tender and astonished respect the noble daughters of their race, who appeared to them surrounded by an unknown, a supernatural grandeur, and power at once human and divine — victorious over all the passions, all the weaknesses and lusts, of which victory had but developed the germs. This respect soon became apparent in the national laws, which agreed in placing under the safeguard of severe penalties the honor and freedom of those upon whom Anglo-Saxon legislation bestowed the title of brides of the Lord and spouses of God.¹³

Influence
and authority
of the
abbesses.

When one of these holy maidens found herself invested, by the choice of her companions, or the nomination of a bishop, with the right of governing and representing a numerous community of her companions, the chiefs and people of the Heptarchy accorded her, without hesitation, all the liberties and attributes of the most elevated rank. The abbesses, as we have seen by the example of Hilda, Ebba, and Elflæda, had soon an influence and authority which rivalled that of the most venerated bishops and abbots. They had often the retinue and state of princesses, especially when they came of royal blood. They treated with kings, bishops, and the greatest lords on terms of perfect equality; and as the rule of the cloister does not seem to have existed for them, they are to be seen going where they please,¹⁴ present at all great religious and national solemnities, at the dedication of churches, and even, like the queens, taking part in the deliberations of the national assemblies, and affixing their signatures to the charters therein granted. The twenty-third article of the famous law or dooms of Ina sets, in certain points, not only abbots, but abbesses, on the same level with kings and the greatest personages of the country.¹⁵ In the Council of Beccancelde, held in 694 by the bishop and king of Kent, the signatures of five abbesses appear in the midst of those of the bishops, affixed to decrees intended to guarantee the inviolability of the property and freedom of the Church.¹⁶

¹³ "Godes bryde." — THORPE'S Ancient Laws of England, vol. ii. pp. 188, 206, 207.

How were the monasteries filled whose superiors occupied so elevated a rank in the spiritual and temporal hierarchy of the Anglo-Saxons, and what was their life? This question it will be both important and difficult to answer.

No contemporary writer has left us a complete authentic picture of the interior of the great Anglo-Saxon communities. No indisputable document is in existence which brings before us the system of rules and customs followed by thousands of nuns who wore the black robe and veil of the spouses of the Lord. We are reduced to the scanty incidents which are to ¹⁴ The reader may remember the meeting appointed by the Abbess Elfreda of Whitby with St. Cuthbert at Coquet Island, and also the festival to which she invited the same bishop on the dedication of a church built on one of her estates. See pp. 407, 477.

¹⁵ "Si homo alienigena occidatur, habeat rex duas partes were suæ et terciam partem habeant filii vel parentes sui. Si parentes non habeat, dimidium habeat rex, dimidium consocii. Si autem abbas vel abbatisa intersit, dividant eodem modo cum rege." — THORPE'S Ancient Laws and Institutes of England, pp. 471-500, fol. ed.

¹⁶ This is the council mentioned above, p. 314, and which is also known under the names of Bapchild and Beckenham: the king who presided at it, Withred, reigned thirty-three years. The decrees were given by the votes of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of Rochester, "cum abbatibus, abbatissis, presbyteris, diaconibus, ducibus, et satrapis." — WILKINS, Concilia, i. p. 47. In Coletti, vol. viii. p. 79, there are five signatures of abbesses: —

Signum manus :	Mildredæ,	abbatissæ.
"	"	Etheldridæ, abbatissæ.
"	"	Aetæ, abbatissæ.
"	"	Wilnodæ, abbatissæ.
"	"	Hereswidæ, abbatissæ.

The other signatures are those of the king and queen Werburga for their infant son, afterwards of two princes or lay lords, of the archbishop, the two bishops, and seven priests; there are no abbots. Kemble, vol. ii. p. 198, maintains that all signatures of women, other than queens, which are found attached to certain rare charters, must be those of abbesses summoned to attend assemblies where there might be question of the interests of their communities. Lingard (vol. i. p. 239) is more sceptical on this subject.

be found in the history of the time, in that of the reigning families from which came most of the principal abbesses, and specially from the biographies of the most holy or most celebrated among these illustrious women. But by contrasting these incidents with those which reveal to us the origin and result of similar vocations among all the other Christian nations, by lighting them up with the light which shines in history, from the commencement of Christianity, we arrive at a point of comprehension perhaps satisfactory enough, but with which at least we must content ourselves.

In the absence of any existing record of their special rules and customs, the liturgical remains of the Anglo-Saxon Church reveal to us the spirit which animated both the pontiffs, and the novices by whom these great and frequent sacrifices were made. There, as everywhere else, under the ancient discipline, it was the bishop, and he alone, who had the right of receiving the final vows of the virgin and of consecrating her solemnly to God. Although the Irish, with their habitual rashness, permitted girls to take the veil at the age of twelve,¹⁷ the Anglo-Saxon Church forbade the taking of the irrevocable vows until after the twenty-fifth year had been accomplished, in accordance with a custom which began to prevail in the whole Church, and which was a modification of the decrees of the Pope St. Leo and the Emperor Majorian, who had deferred to the age of forty the reception of the solemn benediction. On the day fixed for that ceremony, which took place only at the principal festivals of the year, and in presence of a numerous assemblage, the bishop began by blessing the black robe which was henceforward to be the sole adornment of the bride of God. The novice put it on in a private room,¹⁸ from which she came forth, thus clothed, and was led to the foot of the altar, after the reading of the Gospel; the officiating bishop having already begun to say mass. There she listened to his exhortation; after which he asked for two public engagements which were indispensable to the validity of the act: in the first place, the consent of the parents and other guardians of the novice; and in the second place, her own promise of obedience to himself and his successors. When this had been done he laid his hands upon her to bless her and consecrate her to the God whom she had chosen. The Pontifical

Ceremony
used at the solemn benediction of an Anglo-
Saxon nun.

¹⁷ MARTENE, De Antiquis Ecclesiæ Ritibus, lib. ii. c. 6, vol. iii. p. 109.

¹⁸ "De papillione aut loco ubi benedictas vestes inducrant, accersebantur per archipresbyterum virgines consecrandæ."

of Egbert, Archbishop of York, and an Anglo-Saxon manuscript found in the Norman abbey of Jumiéges, have preserved to us the prayers used by the bishop at this supreme moment. The maternal tenderness of the Church overflows in them with a fulness and majesty which recalls the Menées of the Greek Church to such a degree, that it might be supposed old Archbishop Theodore, the contemporary of Egbert's most illustrious predecessor, had brought from the depth of Asia Minor into the Northumbrian capital this ardent breath of Oriental inspiration.

"May God bless thee, God the creator of heaven and earth, the Father all-powerful, who has chosen thee as He chose St. Mary, the mother of our Lord Jesus Christ, to preserve thy virginity entire and spotless, as thou hast promised before God and the angels. Persevere then in thy resolutions and keep thy chastity with patience, that thou mayest be worthy of the virgin's crown.

"May God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit bless thee with all blessings, that thou mayest remain immaculate and perfect under the robe of St. Mary, the mother of Christ. May the Spirit of God, the Spirit of wisdom and strength, of knowledge and piety, rest upon thee and fill thee with the fear of God. May He deign to establish thy frailty, fortify thy weakness, confirm thy strength, govern thy soul, direct thy steps, inspire thy thoughts, approve thy acts, complete thy works; may He edify thee by His charity, illuminate thee by His knowledge, keep thee by His mercy, exalt thee by His holiness, strengthen thee by patience, bring thee to obedience, prostrate thee in humility, encourage thee in continence, teach thee frugality, visit thee in infirmity, relieve thee in sadness, reanimate thee in temptation, moderate thee in prosperity, soften thee in anger, protect thy modesty, correct thy sins, pardon thy backslidings, and teach the discipline which shall lead thee, strong in all virtue and resplendent in good works, to do everything in view of the eternal reward! Mayest thou always have for thy witness Him whom thou shalt one day have for thy judge, that when thou enterest into the bridal chamber with thy lamp lighted in thy hand, thy divine Spouse may find in thee nothing impure and sordid, a soul white as snow, and a body shining with purity; so that at the terrible day of judgment the avenging flame may find nothing to consume in thee, and divine mercy find everything to crown! Mayest thou, purified in this world by monastic life, rise to the tribunal of the eternal King to dwelt in his celestial presence with the hundred and forty-four thousand innocents who follow the Lamb wherever He goes, singing the new song, and receiving the reward of thy labors here below in the dwelling-place of those who live forever.¹⁹ Blessed be thou from the highest heaven by Him who came to die upon the cross to redeem the human race, Jesus Christ our Saviour, who lives and reigns forever with the Father and the Holy Spirit."

The bishop then placed the veil²⁰ on her head, saying, "Maiden, receive this veil,²¹ and mayest thou bear it stainless to the tribunal of Jesus Christ, before whom bends every knee that is in heaven and earth and hell."

Then he continued: "O God, who deignest to inhabit

¹⁹ "Fragilem solidet, invalidam roboret, validamque confirmet, pietate allevet, miseratione conservet, mentem regat, vias dirigat, cogitationes sanctas instituatur, actus probet, opera perficiat, caritate ædificet, sapientia illuminet, castitate muniatur, scientia instruat, fide confirmet, in virtute multiplicet, in sanctitate sublimet, ad patientiam præparet, ad obedientiam subdat, in humilitate prosternat, ad continentiam det fortitudinem, reddat sobriam, protegat pudicam, in infirmitate visitet, in dolore relevet, in tentatione erigat, in conversatione custodiat, in prosperitate temperet, in iracundia mitiget, iniquitatem emendet, infundat gratiam, remittat offensam, tribuat disciplinam, ut his et his similibus virtutibus fulta et sanctis operibus illustrata, illa semper studeas agere, quæ digna fiant in remuneratione. Illum habeas testem quem habitura es judicem; et aptare, ut præfulgentem gestans in manu lampadem, intratura sponsi thalamum occurras venienti cum gaudio, et nihil in te reperiat foetidum, nihil sordidum, nihil incultum, nihil corruptum, nihil inhonestum, sed niveam et candidam animam corpusque lucidum atque splendidum; ut cum dies ille tremendus, remuneratio justorum retributioque malorum advenerit, non inveniat in te ultrix flamma quod uret sed divina pietas quod coronet, quæ jam in hoc sæculo conversatio religiosa mundavit, ut tribunal æterni regis ascensura celsa palatia cum eisdem merearis portionem qui sequuntur Agnum, et cantant canticum novum sine cessatione, illic preceptura præmium post laborem, semperque maneat in viventium regione atque ipse benedicat te de cœlis, qui per crucis passionem humanum genus est dignatus venire in terris redimere Jesus Christus, Dominus noster, qui," &c. — MARTENE, op. cit., p. 116.

²⁰ The veil was sometimes white, as is apparent from the following service, De Virgine Vestienda, taken from an Irish manuscript, in the Library of Zurich, and quoted in the Missal of Arbuthnot of Dr. Forbes, p. xiv. (Burntisland, 1864):—

"Oremus, fratres carissimi, misericordiam ut cunctum bonum tribuere dignetur huic puellæ N. quæ Deo votum candidam vestem perferre cum integritate coronæ in resurrectione vitæ æternæ quam facturum est, orantibus nobis, prestat Deus.

"Conserve, Domine, istius devotæ pudorem castitatis, dilectionem continentiae in factis, in dictis, in cogitationibus. Per te, Christe Jesu, qui, etc.

"Accipe, puellam, pallium candidum, quod perferas ante tribunal Domini."

²¹ "Accipe, puella, vel vidua, pallium." — MARTENE, op. cit., p. 117. It is evident that these formulas were used at the consecration of widows as well as of virgins.

chaste forms, and lovest the virgin soul; God who hast renewed humanity corrupted by the fraud of the devil, and re-established it by the creating Word, so as not only to restore it to primitive innocence, but to procure it everlasting possessions, and to raise it from the bosom of creatures still bound with the chains of this life, to a level with the angels:

"Look upon Thy servant here present, who, placing in Thy hand the resolution to live forever in chastity, offers to Thee the devotion with which this vow has inspired her. Give to her, Lord, by thy Holy Spirit, a prudent modesty, a benevolent wisdom, a sweet gravity, a chaste freedom.²² How could a soul imprisoned in this mortal flesh have vanquished the law of nature, the liberty of license, the strength of habit, the pricks of youth, hadst Thou not lighted in her the flame of virginity, didst Thou not Thyself nourish the flame by the courage which Thou deignest to inspire her with? Thy grace is spread throughout all nations under the sun, which are as many as the stars in number; and among all the virtues which Thou hast taught to the heirs of Thy New Testament, one gift flows from the inexhaustible fountain of Thy generosity upon certain persons which, without diminishing in anything the honor of marriage, and the blessing which Thou hast promised on the conjugal tie, enables those higher souls to disdain all mortal union, to aspire to the sacrament which unites Jesus Christ to His Church, to prefer the supernatural union of which marriage is the emblem to the natural reality of marriage. This blessed virgin has known her Creator, and, emulating the purity of the angels, desires to belong only to Him who is the Spouse and the Son of perpetual virginity. Protect then, Lord, her who implores Thy help, and who comes here to be consecrated by Thy blessing. Let not the ancient enemy who is so skilful to turn aside the most excellent desires by the most insidious assaults, ever succeed in withering in her the palm of perfect maidenhood.

"Grant, Lord, by the gift of Thy Spirit, that she may keep the faith which she has sworn to Thee, that at the unknown day of Thy coming, far from being troubled, she may go forth to meet Thee in all security, and enter freely with the choir of wise virgins by the royal gates of Thy eternal dwelling-place.”²³

²² "Sit in ea . . . prudens modestia, sapiens benignitas, gravis lenitas, casta libertas." — Ibid., p. 119.

At the conclusion of the mass, the pontiff pronounced upon the new nun a new benediction, which was turned by the acclamations of the people into a kind of dialogue.

“Send, Lord, Thy heavenly blessing upon Thy servant here present, upon our sister, who humbles herself under Thy hand, and cover her with Thy divine protection.”

And all the people answered, Amen.

The Bishop.—May she ever flee from sin, know and desire what is good, and win the sacred treasures of heaven.

People.—Amen.

Bishop.—May she always obey the divine precepts, escape with their aid from the violent rebellions of the flesh, vanquish depraved voluptuousness by the love of chastity, keep always in her lamp the oil of holiness, and delight herself in the radiance of eternal light.

People.—Amen.

Bishop.—May she ever carry in her hand the sacred fire, and thus enter at the royal gate of heaven, in the footsteps of Christ, to live forever with wise and spotless souls.

People.—Amen.

Bishop.—May He whose empire is without end grant our prayers.

People.—Amen.

²³ “Deus castorum corporum benignus habitator. . . . Respice super hanc famulam tuam N. quæ in manu tua continentiae suæ propositum collocans, tibi devotionem suam offert, a quo et ipsa idem votum assumpsit. Quando enim animus mortali carne circumdatus, legem naturæ, libertatem licentiæ, vim consuetudinis, et stimulos ætatis evinceret, nisi tu hanc flammam virginitatis, vehementer accenderes tu hanc cupiditatem in ejus corde benignus aleres, ut fortitudinem ministrares? Effusa namque in omnes gentes gratia tua, ex omni natione, quæ est sub cælo, in stellarum innumerabilem numerum, novi Testamenti hæredibus adoptatis, inter cæteras virtutes, quas filiis tuis non ex sanguinibus, neque ex voluntate carnis, sed de tuo spiritu genitis indidisti, etiam hoc donum in quasdam mentes de largitatis tuæ fonte defluxit, ut cum honorem nuptiarum nulla interdicta minuissent, et super conjugalem copulam tua benedictione permaneret; existentes tamen sublimiores animæ, quæ non concupiscerent quod hæbet mortale connubium; sed hoc eligerent quod promisit divinum Christi Ecclesiæ sacramentum: nec imitarentur quod nuptiis agitur, sed diligerent quod nuptiis prænotatur. Agnovit auctorem suum beata virginitas, et æmula integritatis angelicæ, illius thalamo illius cubiculo se devovit, qui sic perpetuæ integritatis est sponsus, quemadmodum perpetuæ virginitatis est filius. Imploranti ergo auxilium tuum, Domine, et confirmari se benedictionis tuæ consecratione cupienti, da protectionis tuæ munimen et regimen, ne hostis antiquus qui excellentiora studia, subtilioribus infestat insidiis, ad obscurandam perfectæ continentie palmam per aliquam mentis serpat incuriam, et rapiat de proposito virginum quod etiam moribus decet inesse nuptiarum.” — Ibid., p. 118.

Bishop. — The blessing of God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, rest upon thee, my sister, hereafter and forever.

People. — Amen.²⁴

II.

The number of bishops being so small, and the ever-increasing multitude of nuns so great, it is doubtful whether these touching and solemn services could be used in the case of all the virgins consecrated to the Lord in the Anglo-Saxon cloisters.²⁵ But it may be believed that they were never omitted when a maiden or widow of one of the reigning dynasties of the blood and race of Odin sought the veil of the spouses of the Lord.

For in England as elsewhere, and perhaps more than elsewhere, the nuns were at the same time of the highest and of the humblest classes. Some were born of those conquering and sovereign races whose exploits have been reviewed, in which the blood of the Merovingians sometimes mingled with that of the offspring of the Norse Olympus, and which, by intermarrying always among themselves, maintained in all its native purity the character of the descendants of Odin, —

Anglo-Saxon
queens and princesses
in the cloister.

“Du sang de Jupiter issues des deux côtés,” — they summed up in themselves all that their countrymen held in highest esteem as greatness and majesty.

But beside them, and sometimes above, when placed there by the election of communities, appears the daughter of ²⁴ “Effunde, Domine, benedictionem cœlestem super hanc famulam, sororem nostram N. . . . quæ se humiliavit sub dextera tua.

“Protege eam protectione tua divina. Amen.

“Fugiat universa delicta, sciat sibi bona desideria præparata, ut regni cœlestis sancta conquirat lucra. Amen.

“Pareat semper divinis præceptis, ut te adjuvante vitet incendia carnis, omnemque libidinem pravæ voluptatis superet amore castitatis, habeat in se cœcum sanctitatis, et lætetur cum lampadibus sempiternis. Amen.

“Gestet in manibus faces sanctas, et apud sapientes et castissimas animas, duce Christo, introire mereatur januam regni cœlestis. Amen.

“Quod ipse præstare dignetur, cujus regnum et imperium sine fine permanet in sæcula sæculorum.” — MARTENE, op. cit., p. 121. Cf. LINGARD, Antiquities, vol. ii. p. 14.

²⁵ No. 92 of the Excerptiones of Archbishop Egbert renews the prohibition of Pope Gelasius to give the veil to nuns at any other time than the feasts of Epiphany, Easter, or the feasts of the Apostles, unless the novice was dying.

the obscure Saxon, of the ceorl, perhaps even of the conquered Briton; and others from a still greater distance and lower level, redeemed from slavery and withdrawn from outrage, from the stains which were the too frequent consequence of captivity. All marched under the same banner, that of sacrifice; all bore its glorious mark. Some gave up a crown, wealth, and greatness; others their family, their love, their freedom; all had to give up themselves. The meanest in birth were certainly not those to whom the sacrifice was the most costly. It is too probable that these Anglo-Saxon princesses and great ladies were naturally haughty and insolent, hard and unkindly to the rest of mankind—in some cases bloodthirsty and pitiless, like the heroines of the Teutonic epic, Criemhild and Bruneild; and of all the miracles wrought by Christianity in England, there is scarcely any more wonderful than the transformation of so great a number of such women, in the new communities, into docile daughters, cordial sisters, mothers truly tender and devoted to their inferiors in age and blood.

It must be acknowledged that the observation of the chroniclers of those distant centuries rarely goes beyond the queens and princesses, whose religious vocation must have specially edified and touched the souls of their contemporaries; and who, beautiful, young, and sought in marriage by princes of rank equal to their own, gave up the world to keep their love entire for God, and to consecrate so many places of refuge at once peaceful and magnificent for future generations of God's servants.

In respect to the maidens of humbler origin, but of life as pure and self-devotion as dauntless, who surround the greater personages of our tale, we can but follow the ancient authors, taking advantage of every indication which throws light upon the life and soul of so great a multitude.

The queens and princesses range themselves into three principal classes. They were, in the first place, virgins devoted to God, sometimes from the cradle, like the abbesses Ebba of Coldingham and Elfreda of Whitby, who were the devoted friends and protectresses of Wilfrid. Then followed wives who separated themselves from their husbands, during their lifetime, and often much against their will, to embrace a religious life: of this class St. Etheldreda is the most celebrated example. And, finally, widows who ended in the cloister a life mostly devoted on the throne to the active extension as well as the self-sacrificing practice of the new religion. We have seen more than one touching example of the last-named class—such as that of Queen Eanfleda, the first benefactress of Wilfrid, who, after the death of her husband King Oswy, found shelter for her widowhood at Whitby, and there ended her days under the crosier of her daughter.

By a privilege which does honor to France, it was among us, in the country of Queen Bertha, the first Christian queen of the Anglo-Saxons, that the first English nuns were trained. France was thus the cradle of the Anglo-Saxon communities. In the time of the first missionaries, when monasteries were few, many of the new Christians of England learned the rules of monastic life among the Gallo-Franks, to whom they had been taught, more than a century before, by the glorious St. Martin, and after him by St. Maur, the cherished disciple of St. Benedict, and by St. Columbanus, the illustrious propagator of Celtic monachism. The Anglo-Saxons sent or took their daughters into Gaul, and the first beginning, in particular, of the great Christianity which was about to burst the bud in Great Britain, seems to have been specially prepared and formed in the communities on the banks of the Marne and the Seine, at Jouarre, Faremoutier, les Andelys, and later at Chelles.²⁶

The first
nuns trained in France.

Jouarre, Faremoutier, and the neighboring monasteries formed a sort of monastic province, dependent on Luxeuil, and occupied by the disciples of St. Columbanus.²⁷ The pious and courageous Burgundofara, la noble baronne de Bourgogne, blessed from her infancy by the holy patriarch of Luxeuil, ruled at Faremoutier the great foundation which has made her name illustrious for twelve centuries. She had with her an entire colony of young Anglo-Saxons. It had been the intention of Hilda, the great Abbess of Whitby, from the time when she made up her mind to leave the world,²⁸ to lead a conventual life in one

Especially at Faremoutier.

²⁶ "Multi de Britannia monachicæ conversationis gratia, Francorum vel Gallicorum monasteria adire solebant; sed et filias suas eisdem erudiendas ac sponso celesti copulandas mittebant." — BEDE, I. iii. c. 8.

²⁷ See vol. i. pp. 608, 613.

²⁸ See p. 259. Bede says that it was at Chelles that Hereswida became a nun. Pagi, in his criticism on Baronius (ad ann. 680, c. 14 to 20), maintains by arguments too long to be quoted that Bede and Mabillon were both mistaken, one in supposing Hereswida to have been a nun at Chelles, and the other in thinking that Hilda joined her there. He proves that there was no trace of the two sisters either in the archives or calendars of Chelles before of the cloisters on the banks of the Marne, where her sister, Hereswida, the Queen of East Anglia, even before she became a widow, had sought an asylum, and where she ended her life in the practice of the monastic rule.²⁹

However, it was not the Northumbrians alone — as might have been expected from the connection which linked to the great Catholic apostles of converted France a country itself converted to Christianity by Celtic missionaries — who thus sought the spiritual daughters of St. Columbanus. The young princesses and daughters of the great lords belonging to the kingdom of Kent, which was exclusively converted by Roman missionaries, showed as much, or even greater eagerness. The great-granddaughter of the first Christian king of the Anglo-Saxons, Earcongotha, added a new lustre to the community of Faremoutier by the holiness of her life and death. She was, says Bede, a virgin of great virtue, worthy in everything of her illustrious origin.³⁰ East Anglia paid also its contribution to the powerful foundation of the noble Burgundofara. Two sisters of Etheldreda, whose strange story has been already recorded, governed in succession, notwithstanding their character of foreigners, the Gallo-Frankish Abbey of Faremoutier, while their sister founded the greatest convent of nuns which had yet been seen in England.³¹ Ten centuries later another foreign princess, who had been received at Faremoutier, and whose memory has been made immortal by the genius of Bossuet, gave him an occasion to sound the praises of this famous house in a language which was perhaps more applicable to the community of the seventh century than to that of the seventeenth. “In the solitude of Sainte-Fare — as much separated from all worldly ways as its blessed position now separates it from all traffic with the world; in that holy mountain where the spouses of Jesus 1672, the epoch when the community obtained from Harlay, Archbishop of Paris, by means of the famous casuist St. Beuve, authority to celebrate the feast of St. Hilda on the 27th of November, and to inscribe the name of St. Hereswida on the calendar of the sacristy at the date of December 9.

²⁹ “In eodem monasterio soror ipsius Hereswid, mater Aldulfi regis orientaliū Anglorum, regularibus subdita disciplinis, ipso tempore coronam expectabat æternam.” — BEDE, iv. 23. Pagi thinks she became a nun seven years before the death of her husband, but with his consent.

³⁰ “Ut condigna parenti soboles, magnarum fuit virgo virtutum, serviens Domino in monasterio quod . . . constructum est ab abbatissa nobilissima, vocabulo Fara.” — BEDE, iii. 8.

³¹ “Sæthryd, filia uxoris Annæ regis . . . et filia naturalis ejusdem regis Ædilberg, quæ utraque, cum esset peregrina, præ merito virtutum . . . est abbatissa constituta.” — Ibid. Cf. BOLLAND, vol. ii. July, p. 481.

Christ revive the beauty of ancient days, where the joys of earth are unknown, where the traces of worldly men, of the curious and wandering, appear not — under the guidance of the holy abbess, who gave milk to babes as well as bread to the strong, the beginning of the Princess Anne was very happy.”³²

The illustrious abbess whom Queen Bathilde, herself an Anglo-Saxon by birth, placed in the celebrated Monastery of Chelles when she re-established it, saw her community increased by a crowd of nuns whom the fame of her great qualities and tender kindness attracted from the other side of the Channel. Christians of both sexes felt the power of this attraction, for there were at Chelles as many Anglo-Saxon monks as nuns. Everything prospered so well, everything breathed a piety so active, fervent, and charitable, that the kings of the Heptarchy, moved by the perfume of virtue and good fame that rose from the double monastery peopled by their country-folks, emulated each other in praying the Abbess Bertile to send them colonies from her great bee-hive to occupy new foundations in England.³³

In this way probably came Botulph, whom we have already mentioned, and who was the one of Wilfrid’s contemporaries most actively engaged in the extension of monastic institutions.³⁴ Before he was restored to his native soil, he had inspired with a lively and deep affection for himself two young Anglo-Saxon princesses who had been sent to France, when scarcely more than infants, to learn monastic life. They loved in him, we are told, not only a great master in holy and chaste living, but still more their countryman, a teacher of their own country and race. When they knew that he was about to return to England, they were overwhelmed with sadness, their only consolation in which was to recommend him with all their might to their young brother, who was king, it is not known where, under the regency of his mother; after

Botulph
and the two East Anglian
princesses.

³² Oraison Funèbre de la Princesse Palatine, Anne de Gonzague.

³³ “Cujus conversatio sobria et benignissima advocavit plurimas fidelium animas feminarum immoque et virorum. Nec solummodo ex vicina provincia, sed etiam ex transmarinis partibus, sanctæ hujus feminae felici fama percurrente, ad eam relictis parentibus et patria cum summo amoris desiderio . . . festinabant. . . . Etiam a transmarinis partibus Saxoniae reges illi fideles ab ea permissos postulabant . . . qui virorum et sanctimonialium cœnobiaz in illa regione construerent.” — Vita S. Bertilæ, c. 5, 6, ap. MABILLON, Act. SS. O. S. B., see vol. iii. p. 20.

³⁴ See p. 507.

which there is no mention of them in history.³⁵ The touching image of these two young creatures appears in history only to bear witness to the faithfulness of their patriotism in the pious exile which was imposed upon them. It is a sentiment of which we shall find many traces among the Anglo-Saxon nuns.

Were there
Celtic nuns
among the Anglo-
Saxons?

But among the first nuns of the Heptarchy were there not, in the first place, virgins of Celtic origin, from Scotland or Ireland, like the monk-missionaries whose labors have been set forth? Nothing is more probable, though there is no positive proof of their existence. It would be impossible from this point of view to pass in silence a holy princess whose name is still popular in the north of England, and who has been long concluded by the annalists to be of Irish origin, while, at the same time, they recognize in her the instructress of the women and maidens of Northumbria in monastic life. To the west of this district, in the county which we now call Cumberland, upon a promontory bathed by the waves of the Irish Sea, and from which in clear weather the southern shore of Scotland and the distant peaks of the Isle of Man may be seen, a religious edifice still bears the name and preserves the recollection of St. Bega.³⁶ She was, according to the legend, the daughter of an Irish king, the most beautiful woman in the country, and already asked in marriage by the son of the King of Norway. But she had vowed herself, from her tenderest infancy, to the Spouse of virgins, and had received from an angel, as a seal of her celestial betrothal, a bracelet marked with the sign of the cross.³⁷ On the night

Legend of
St. Bega.

³⁵ "Erant in eodem monasterio . . . sorores duæ Edelmundi regis . . . diligebantque præcipuum patrem Botulfum sicut doctorem sanctitatis et castimoniam, et plurimum ob studium gentis suæ. Adhuc siquidem tenellulæ missæ fuerant ultra mare ad discendam in monasteriali gymnasio disciplinam celestis sophiæ. Videntes beatum ad dilectum Doctorem velle repatriare, mœrentes mandata imponunt præferenda regi et fratri."—Vita S. Botulfi, ap. Acta SS. O. S. B., sæc. iii. vol. iii. p. 3.

³⁶ In English, St. Bees. This is the name still borne by the promontory surmounted by a lighthouse, and situated a little south of Whitehaven. Below the southern slope of the promontory, and sheltered by its height from the sea breezes, in the midst of a group of fine trees, stands the Priory, built by Raoul de Meschines in 1120, and restored in 1817, to be used as an English Church college. There remain still some precious relics of the buildings of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, and even, according to some antiquaries, of the Saxon edifice destroyed by the Danes, which preceded the Norman foundation.

³⁷ "Accipe, inquit, eulogium istud a Domino tibi missum, quo te illi before her wedding day, while the guards of the king her father, instead of keeping watch, as usual, with sabres at their side and axes on their shoulders, were, like their guests, deep in the revel, she escaped alone, with nothing but the bracelet which the angel had given her, threw herself into a skiff, and landed on the opposite shore, in Northumbria, where she lived long in a cell in the midst of the wood, uniting the care of the sick poor around with her prayers.³⁸ Fear of the pirates who infested these coasts led her, after a while, farther inland. What then became of her? Here the confusion, which is so general in the debatable ground between legend and history, becomes nearly inextricable. Was it she who, under the name of Heïu, is pointed out to us by Bede as the woman to whom Bishop Aïdan, the apostle of Northumbria, gave the veil, and whom he placed at the head of the first nunnery which had been seen in the north of England?³⁹ Or was it she who, under the name of Begu, after having abdicated the dignity of abbess, lived for thirty years a humble and simple nun in one of the monasteries under the rule of the great Abbess of Whitby, Hilda, whose intimate friend she became, as well as her daughter in religion?⁴⁰ These are questions which have been long disputed by the learned, and which it seems impossible to bring to any satisfactory conclusion.⁴¹ What is certain, however, is, that a virgin of subaratam (sic) agnoscas. Pone ergo illud sicut signum super cor tuum et super brachium tuum, ut nullum admittas præter ipsum." — Cf. Cantic. viii. 6.

³⁸ "Erat speciosa forma præ cunctis filiabus regionis illius. . . . Virgo armillam super se fere indesinenter portavit. . . . Indulgebant calicibus epotandis potentes ad potandum et viri fortes ad miscendam ebrietatem. . . . Plures ex fortissimis Hybernæ ambiebant totum palatium et uniuscujusque sica super femur suum et bipennis super humerum et lancea in manu ejus. . . . Pater ejus . . . inventam reduceret, et reductam plagis vapularet multis. . . . Omnia claustra ad tactum armillæ clavis David virgini egregiæ egredienti aperuit. . . . In loco tunc temporis satis nemoroso secus litus maris posito cellam virgineam sibi construxit." — Vita S. Begæ et de Miraculis ejusdem, ed. Tomlinson (Carlisle, 1842), pp. 46-53.

³⁹ See p. 259.

⁴⁰ BEDE, Hist. Eccles., iv. 23.

⁴¹ Most ancient authors believed this. The Bollandists themselves (vol. ii. Sept., p. 694) seem to admit it, though they seem to have had no knowledge of the Life of the saint, written by the monks of St. Bees, and which is founded entirely on this belief. The Vita S. Begæ et de Miraculis ejusdem, which was published for the first time in 1842, from a MS. in the British Museum, by Mr. Tomlinson, in the collection called Carlisle Historical Tracts, should not, however, in our opinion, counterbalance the contemporary testimony of Bede. The latter, always so careful to notice the Scottish origin of the personages of his narrative, whenever there is occasion, remains silent as to that of the first Northumbrian nun; and the two passages the name of Bega figures among the most well known and long venerated saints of the north-west of England. She was celebrated during her lifetime for her austerity, her fervor, and an anxiety for the poor, which led her, during the building of her monastery, to prepare with her own hands the food of the masons, and to wait upon them in their workshops, hastening from place to place like a bee laden with honey.⁴² She remained down to the middle ages, the patroness of the laborious and often oppressed population of the district, in which tradition presents her to us as arriving alone and fearless on a foreign shore, flying from her royal bridegroom. In the twelfth century the famous bracelet which the angel had given her was regarded with tender veneration: the pious confidence of the faithful turned it into a relic upon which usurpers, prevaricators, and oppressors against whom there existed no other defence, were made to swear, with the certainty that a perjury committed on so dear and sacred a pledge would not pass unpunished. It was also to Bega and her bracelet that the cultivators of the soil had recourse against the new and unjust taxes with which their lords burdened them. In vain the Scottish rieviers, or the prepotents of the country, treading down under their horses' feet the harvests of the Cumbrians, made light of the complaints and threats of the votaries of St. Bega. "What is the good old woman to me, and what harm can she do me?" said one. "Let your Bega come!" said another — "let her come and do whatever she likes! She cannot make one of our horses cast their shoes."⁴³ Sooner or later of the same chapter (iv. 23), where he speaks of Hefu, foundress of Hartlepool, and of Begu, contemporary with the death of Hilda, seem in no way to point to the same person. The Rev. Father Faber, in his Life of St. Bega, published while he was still an Anglican, in 1844, seems to hold that there were at least two saints whose acts are confounded together, and takes care to declare that his narrative does not pretend to historical accuracy. Wordsworth dedicated, in 1833, some of his finest verses to the still popular memory of the Irish saint, and of the places which bear her name.

⁴² "In officinis monasterii construendis . . . manu sua cibos coquens parabat, artificibus apparebat, velut apes mellificans, currens et discurrens ministrabat." — Vita S. Begh., p. 55.

⁴³ "Protulerunt in medium S. Begæ virginis armillam, quia confidebant inultum non præterire perjurium super illam perpetratum. . . . Versabatur illo tempore controversia inter eos qui dominabantur terræ de Coupelandia, et homines subditos sibi, super quadam consuetudine qua boves solebant dominis pensari. . . . Impetebantur homines et cogebantur plus reddere quam arbitrabantur se solvere debere. . . .

"Quid mihi facere poterit vetula illa?' et manum ad secretiores partes natium admovens: 'Hic, hic, inquit, sagittabit me.' . . . Quidam autem

divine vengeance struck these culprits; and the fame of the chastisements sent upon them confirmed the faith of the people in the powerful intercession of her who, six hundred years after her death, still gave a protection so effectual and energetic against feudal rudeness, to the captive and to the oppressed, to the chastity of women, and the rights of the lowly, upon the western shore of Northumbria, as did St. Cuthbert throughout the rest of that privileged district.⁴⁴

In proportion, however, as the details of the lives of holy nuns in England are investigated, the difficulty of tracing the line of demarcation between history and legend becomes more and more evident. But after all let us not lament too much over this confusion. True history — “that which modifies souls, and forms opinions and manners”⁴⁵ — is not produced solely from dates and facts, but from the ideas and impressions which fill and sway the souls of contemporaries; translating into facts, anecdotes and scenes, the sentiments of admiration, gratitude, and love which inspire them for beings whom they believe to be of a superior nature to themselves, and whose benefits and example survive the ravages of time and human inconstancy.

Confusion between legend and history.

We must then make up our minds to meet with this confusion through the entire series of our narratives, which are intended to give a picture of the faith and passions, the virtues and vices, of the new Christians of England, rather than to trace in methodical and chronological succession the course of uncertain or insignificant events. Let our readers be contented with our assurance that we will never permit ourselves to present to them, under the guise of truth, acts or words which are not of undisputed certainty.

adolescentulus sagittam . . . jaciens . . . percussit illum in fonticulo fundamenti, quem ipse manu sua designaverat. . . . ‘Veniat Bega, veniat, et quod potest faciat.’” — De Miraculis, pp. 68, 69, 62, 66. There is a curious passage in this work, p. 63, as to the terror with which, in the twelfth century, the Scottish marauders were inspired by those English arrows which were afterwards so fatal to the French nobles in the great battles of the fourteenth century.

⁴⁴ See above, p. 486. The narrative of St. Bega’s miracles is clearly of the same period and conceived in the same spirit as the Libellus de Admirandis Beati Cuthberti Virtutibus. The most popular of these miracles, and that best remembered in the country, reminds us of the one commemorated at Rome on the festival of St. Mary of the Snow, the 15th of August. A fall of snow, in the midst of summer, marked exactly the disputed possessions of the monastery, the same which had been the original domain of the saint. Compare the text published by Tomlinson, p. 64, and the tradition preserved in the MSS. of the Chapter of Carlisle, ap. Notes on St. Bega, p. 15.

⁴⁵ LITRE, Journal des Savants, November, 1862.

Division of the nuns, whose biographies have been preserved, according to the dynasties from which they sprang.

To put some sort of order into the notes which we have gleaned on the subject of the Anglo-Saxon nuns, it will be well to arrange them according to the principal dynasties, or families and countries from which had issued all those noble women so devoted to God, St. Peter, and St. Benedict, who have gained a place on the altars of Catholic England.

The Northumbrians.

I do not think I have anything to add to what has already been said in respect to the Northumbrian princesses, descendants of Ella and Ida, the Man of Fire and the Ravager. The holy and powerful abbesses, Hilda of Whitby, Ebba of Coldingham, Elfreda, the daughter of Oswy, who was dedicated to God from her birth as a ransom for the liberation of her country, her mother Eanfleda, who on becoming a widow entered the abbey of her daughter — these often-repeated names cannot have escaped the memory of our readers. Let us add only, according to a tradition, ancient and widely spread,⁴⁶ though disputed by modern learning, that the three sons of Oswy who reigned over Northumberland in succession, and who have been so often mentioned in the life of Wilfrid, were all three forsaken by their wives, who determined to consecrate themselves to God; though doubtless the two princesses married to the elder and younger of these princes neither occasioned the same struggle nor won the same fame as their sister-in-law St. Etheldreda, the wife of King Egfrid.

Let us then pass to the princesses of the most ancient Anglo-Saxon dynasty, the first converted to Christianity, that of the Ascings who reigned over the Jutes in the kingdom of Kent.

The Ascings or dynasty of Kent.

The first and most historical figure which we meet in the cloister among the descendants of Hengist is that of the gentle and devoted Ethelburga, whose life is linked so closely with the history of the beginning of Northumbrian Christianity.⁴⁷ She was the daughter of the first Christian king of South Anglia, and married the first Christian king of the North, Edwin, whose conversion was so difficult, whose reign was so prosperous, and his end so glorious. After the rapid ruin of that first ⁴⁶ This tradition, accepted by Pagi (ubi supra) from William of Malmesbury, Alford, and many others, is disputed by the Bollandists as regards the two princesses married to the two brothers, Alchfrid the friend, and Aldfrid the enemy, of Wilfrid.

⁴⁷ See pp. 209, 221.

Northumbrian Christianity which she, along with Bishop Paulinus, had begun, Queen Ethelburga, received with tender sympathy by her brother, the King of Kent, cared for no other crown but that of holy poverty. She obtained from her brother the gift of an ancient Roman villa, situated between Canterbury and the sea, on the coast opposite France, and there founded a monastery, where she herself took the veil. She was thus the first widow of Saxon race who consecrated herself to monastic life. The old church of her monastery, called Lyminge, still exists. The burying-place of the foundress, who passed there the fourteen last years of her life, and who, daughter of the founder of Canterbury and widow of the founder of York, was thus the first link between the two great centres of Catholic life among the Anglo-Saxons, is still shown.⁴⁸

We shall add nothing to what has been already said in respect to the daughter of Ethelburga, first Queen of Northumberland, and then a nun like her mother,⁴⁹ nor of her granddaughter, the Abbess Elfleda, the amiable friend of St. Cuthbert, and generous protectress of St. Wilfrid.⁵⁰ But she had a sister, named Eadburga, who was a nun with her at Lyminge, and who, buried by her side in the monastery, was venerated along with her among the saints of England.⁵¹ Her brother, who, like his father, married a Frankish princess,⁵² the great-granddaughter of Clovis and St. Clothilde, peopled with his descendants the Anglo-Saxon, and even foreign monasteries. Without speaking of his granddaughters, Earcongotha, who became, as has been formerly said, Abbess of Faremoutier in France, and Ermenilda, Queen of Mercia, whom we have already seen, and shall meet again further on among the abbesses of Ely,⁵³ this second Christian king of the most ancient kingdom of the Heptarchy had a daughter called Eanswida, who, educated by the Roman ⁴⁸ It is believed that remains of the Roman buildings have been discovered in certain portions of the present church of Lyminge. The tomb of St. Ethelburga was situated under a buttress at the south-east of the choir. — Rev. R. C. JENKINS, Account of the Church of St. Mary and St. Eadburgh in Lyminge; London and Folkestone, 1859. Cf. Gentleman's Magazine, August, 1862.

⁴⁹ See pp. 253, 305, and genealogical tables, App., VI. and VII., pp. 752, 754.

⁵⁰ See pp. 406, 476.

⁵¹ BOLLAND., Act. SS., Feb., vol. ii. p. 383, and vol. iii. p. 690.

⁵² Emma, daughter of Clotaire II. — BOLL., vol. viii. Oct., p. 90.

⁵³ They were both daughters of King Ercombert and St. Sexburga, she who was Abbess of Ely after her sister Etheldreda. See genealogical table IX., p. 756.

Eanswida, founder of Folkestone.

missionaries at Canterbury, received from them the veil of the brides of God. She distinguished herself by the foundation of a monastery, which, with true Roman spirit, she dedicated to St. Peter, and of which she was the superior, at Folkestone, on the heights of those white cliffs crowned by green pasturage, which attract the first glance of the numberless travellers whom the rapid prows of our day deposit at that spot upon the English shore.

Legends of all kinds have accumulated round the name of this young and holy descendant of Hengist and Clovis; the gaps in her authentic history are filled by incidents which show the idea formed by the Anglo-Saxons of the supernatural power with which a monastic vocation invested a daughter of the sovereign race. Her father, it was told, proposed to marry her, like her aunt, to a Northumbrian prince, who was still a heathen. She obstinately refused. King Eadbald did not attempt to force her; but her suitor came with his train to urge his suit in person at a time when she was herself superintending the building of her future cloister. She sent him away without pity, defying him to lengthen, by the aid of his false gods, a rafter which was too short, which she herself succeeded in doing by praying with all her might to the true Saviour of the world. As soon as she was installed in her monastery she made it, after the fashion of all the religious foundations of the time, a great agricultural establishment as well as an ascetic sanctuary and a literary school. There, according to the popular tale, she tamed flocks of wild geese which spoiled her harvests, and which her servants stole from her poultry-yard and ate to her great displeasure; with the tip of her crosier she dug a canal to bring to the monastery a stream of fresh water which was wanting. She died young in 640: her abbey, which was built too near the sea on an overhanging rock, was swallowed up by the waves;⁵⁴ but the memory of this daughter of the conquering race, herself conquered by the love of God and her neighbor, long survived in the prayers of the faithful.⁵⁵ More than six hundred years after her death, a powerful Anglo-Norman baron renewed the Benedictine foundation of the Anglo-⁵⁴ "A Romanis monachis velatam esse, nullum dubium est, et monasticum institutum ab eisdem edoctam. . . . Oratorium suum rupibus suspensum, mari supereminens." — BOLL., vol iv. August, pp. 685, 686.

⁵⁵ The Bollandists have published a fragment of her office.

Saxon princess, dedicating the church to St. Peter and St. Eanswida.⁵⁶

Another branch of the posterity of Hengist, issued from a young brother of Eanswida, who died before his father,⁵⁷ has also been taken possession of by legendary lore. This prince left two sons and four daughters; the latter were all nuns, and reckoned among the saints.⁵⁸ His two sons⁵⁹ were venerated as martyrs, according to the general idea of the time, which regarded as martyrdom every kind of violent death endured by the innocent. They were assassinated by a thane named Thunnor, who thus attempted to do a pleasure to King Egbert, the fourth successor of St. Ethelbert, by freeing him of young cousins who might become dangerous competitors.⁶⁰ The legend here rises to the rank of true poetry, and at the same time embodies true morality, as is almost always the case. In a vain attempt to hide, it says, the bones of his victims, the assassin buried them in the palace of the king, and even under the throne on which he sat on festive occasions;⁶¹ but a supernatural light came to denounce the crime, shining upon the unknown tomb, and revealing it to the devotion of the faithful. The king, amazed and abashed, had to expiate the crime which was committed, if not by his orders at least to his advantage. Supported by the popular clamor, the two illustrious foreign monks, who were then the chief-justices and peace-makers of the country, Theodore, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the African Adrian, abbot of St. Augustin,⁶² intimated to him that he must pay the price of blood—that is to say, the compensation ordained by all Teutonic laws—to a sister of the victims, and that all the more that this sister, called Domneva, was married to a Mercian prince, son of

Legend of Domneva and her brothers.

⁵⁶ This baron's name was John de Segrave, and his wife's Juliana de Sandwich. — STEVENS, i. 399, ex. WEEVER, p. 270.

⁵⁷ He was called Ermenifred, and his death left the throne of Kent to his brother Ercombert, the third Christian king, father of King Egfrid, and of the saints Ermenilda and Earcongotha. See genealogical table B.

⁵⁸ Ermenberga or Domneva, Ermenburga, Etheldreda, and Ermengytha.

⁵⁹ Ethelbert and Ethelfred.

⁶⁰ Bede says nothing of all this; but it has been related with more or less of detail by all the more recent authorities, William of Malmesbury, Simeon of Durham, Matthew of Westminster, and above all Thorne, in his Chronicle of the Abbey of St. Augustin at Canterbury. Cf. LAPPENBERG, i. 239, and THOMAS of ELMHAM, who gives a very detailed version, pp. 209 to 239 of the new edition issued by Hardwicke.

⁶¹ "In aula regia, sub regia cathedra." — MATTH. WESTMONAST., p. 14.

⁶² See their part in the history of Wilfrid, p. 344.

the savage and unconquerable Penda.⁶³ This ransom of blood was to take the form of a territorial gift for the foundation of a monastery in which virgins consecrated to God should forever supplicate divine pardon. Domneva asked for as much land as a tame doe which belonged to her, could run round in one course. The spot was the island of Thanet, at the mouth of the Thames, where their ancestor Hengis, and, two centuries later, St. Augustin had landed; and which was doubly dear to the nation as the place at which the Saxon occupation began and Christianity first appeared among them. It was, besides, a very fertile spot, the flower and jewel of the country, a sort of terrestrial paradise.⁶⁴ King Egbert consented to this arrangement, and the parties met on the ground. The doe was let loose, and the king and his court followed it with their eyes, when the villain Thunnor arrived, crying out that Domneva was a witch, who had bewitched the king to make him give up his fair lands to the instinct of a brute. Then, being on horseback, he pursued the doe to stop her; but in his wild career he came to a well, in which he was drowned, and which has ever since been called Thunnor's leap.⁶⁵ The doe's course included forty-two plough-lands: she crossed the island in two different directions before returning to her mistress. The land thus marked out was given over to Domneva and her spiritual posterity. Archbishop Theodore immediately consecrated the new foundation, which took the name of Minster, as who should say The Monastery.⁶⁶

Domneva became a widow, and taking then the name of ⁶³ See genealogical tables, Appendix, VII. and VIII., pp. 754, 755.

⁶⁴ "Post sororem eorum Dompnenam misit, ut ipsa interfectionis pretium reciperet. . . . Venit rex tristis, veniam petiit. . . . Respondit Dompnena: Quantum cervam mea domestica uno impetu percurrere poterit. . . . Emissa cervam currit velociter, aspiciente rege cum suis hilari vultu cursum cervæ. . . . Insula arridens bona rerum copia, regni flos et thalamus . . . in qua tanquam quodam Elysio. . . . Clamavit Dompnenam incantatricem, et insipientem regem qui terram fertilem et nobilem bruti animalis indicio tradidit."

⁶⁵ The situation of the well and the whole direction of the doe's course may be found in the old and curious map of the Isle of Thanet, which has been republished in miniature in Dugdale's Monasticon (i. 84), and by the Bollandists (vol. iv. of July, p. 513), but the exact fac-simile of which is found in the new edition of Elmham.

⁶⁶ This monastery, like all the English ones, was destroyed by the Danes, and rebuilt under the Normans. There still remains a large and beautiful church, newly restored. It is supposed that some remains of Domneva's original building can be traced in a portion of the tower of this church, built of large stones and Roman tiles. — Gentleman's Magazine, July, 1862.

Ermenberga,⁶⁷ was the first abbess of the new community, which was soon occupied by seventy nuns. But she soon gave up the government to her daughter Mildred, whom she had sent into France, to Chelles, to receive a literary and religious education. The Abbess of Chelles, far from encouraging the young princess to embrace monastic life, employed every kind of threat and ill-usage to compel her to marry one of her relatives: thus at least says the legend, which is too singular, and too different in this point from all similar narratives, not to have a certain authenticity. But Mildred resisted the temptation victoriously. She returned to England to govern the abbey founded by her mother, and to give an example of all the monastic virtues to her seventy companions. Very few details of her life have been preserved: which makes the extraordinary and prolonged popularity which has attached to her name, her relics, and everything belonging to her, all the more wonderful. Her popularity eclipsed that of St. Augustin even in the district which he first won to the faith, and to such a point that the rock which had received the mark of his first footstep,⁶⁸ and which lies a little to the east of Minster, took and retained up to the eighteenth century the name of St. Mildred's Rock.

Great popularity of Mildred.

An entire chapter would be necessary to narrate the violent struggles, the visions, and other incidents which are connected with the history of her relics, and what hagiographers call her posthumous fame. Her name, like that of many other Anglo-Saxon nuns, has once more become fashionable in our days, but it recalls to our ungrateful contemporaries nothing but the vague poetry of the past. It was mixed up with the real history of the Danes and Normans, of Canute the Great, of Edward the Confessor, of Lanfranc, of Edward I., the terrible victor of the Scots and Welsh.⁶⁹ The worship of Mildred appears interspersed in the midst of all these personages with every kind of edifying and amusing anecdote, such as touch the most delicate and the most diverse chords of the human heart. By the side of the touching scene in which the persecuted wife of ⁶⁷ According to another version she was called Ermenberga before she became abbess, and only then assumed the name of Domna Ebba, or Domneva. — BOLLAND., vol. viii. Oct., p. 91.

⁶⁸ See above, p. 152. Cf. STANLEY, Historical Memorials of Canterbury.

⁶⁹ BOLLAND., loc. cit. Cf. OAKLEY, Life of St. Augustin, p. 134.

Edward the Confessor, forsaken by all, is consoled by the apparition of Mildred—and the story of the solemn translation of her relics by Archbishop Lanfranc—are found grotesque incidents, such as that of the bell-ringer who, while asleep before her shrine, was woken by a box on the ear administered by the holy princess, who said to him, "This is the oratory and not the dormitory."⁷⁰ In that wonderful efflorescence of imagination quickened by faith which for several centuries was interwoven with all Christian society, the legend had something for all—for crowned heads and common people, and could at the same time move its audience to laugh or to weep. Let us return to history by adding that William the Conqueror, when he became master of England, formally respected the right of asylum claimed by criminals at the place where the relics of Mildred lay; for, while destroying the Anglo-Saxon crown, he took great care to aim no blow at the persevering devotion shown by his new subjects for the saints of both sexes who had proceeded from their national dynasties.

The sisters of Mildred.

Mildred had two sisters, whose names are connected with hers by that eccentric taste for alliteration which characterizes the Anglo-Saxons. Their names were Milburga and Milgytha; they were both nuns like their sister, their mother, their three aunts, their grandaunt Eanswida, and their great-grandaunts Ethelburga and Eadburga.⁷¹ We are now at the fourth generation of the descendants of the first Christian king, and we may well say with Mabillon: *Puellarum regiarum, quibus idem animus fuit, numerus iniri vix potest.*⁷² The three daughters of the foundress of Minster were compared to Faith, Hope, and Charity.⁷³ Nothing is known of Milgytha except that she was a nun at Canterbury.⁷⁴ As for Milburga, she was consecrated by the Archbishop Theodore abbess of a monastery founded beyond the Severn, upon the borders of Anglo-Saxon territory and the land still held by the Celts of Cambria. Like Mildred, she has furnished

⁷⁰ "Inæstimabili decore fulgida . . . elata palma, alapam ei dedit, docens oratorium, non dormitorium, ibi esse."—BOLLAND., vol. iv. July, p. 518.

⁷¹ See genealogical table, Appendix, VII., p. 755.

⁷² Act. SS. O. S. B., sæc. iii. 1, p. 46.

⁷³ "Nomina simillima, par formarum gloria . . . mens at amor et sanctitas trium erat unica. Hinc Milburga, ut fides, inde Milgytha, ut spes, media coruscat Mildretha, ut caritas."—BOLLAND., loc. cit., p. 516.

⁷⁴ BOLLAND., vol. ii. January, p. 176.

more than one expressive incident to monastic legends. The young abbess was exposed, like so many of her fellows, to the pursuit of a neighboring prince, who, being determined to marry her, attempted to seize her person by force. As she fled before the sacrilegious band, a river which she had just crossed rose all at once into flood, so as to place an insurmountable barrier in the way of the too eager suitor, who thereupon gave up the pursuit. Another miracle, attributed to her, recalls the most touching of those which are mentioned in the life of Wilfrid. A poor widow came to her one day when she was alone in ^{And the} her oratory, and, throwing herself on her knees, besought her with tears to raise up her dead child, whose poor little body she had brought with her. Milburga asked if she were mad. "Go," she said, "bury your son, and prepare to die, in your turn, like him; for we are all born but to die." "No, no," said the widow, "I will not leave you till you have restored to me my son alive." The abbess then prayed by the little corpse, and all at once she appeared to the poor mother surrounded by a flame which descended from heaven, the living emblem of the fervor of her prayer. An instant after, life came back to the child. When Milburga had reached the end of her own days, which were fragrant with charity and purity, she gathered all her community around her deathbed. "Beloved sisters," she said, "I have always loved you as my own soul, and I have watched over you like a mother. I have now come to the end of my pilgrimage; I leave you to God and to the blessed Virgin Mary." With which words she died. Four hundred years ^{23d Feb.,} after her death her monastery, which had been ^{722.} destroyed by the Danes, was re-established by a colony of monks from Cluny. While they were building the church, a heavenly fragrance betrayed the place of Milburga's burial. Her relics were exposed to public veneration, and an innumerable crowd hastened to visit them — old and young, rich and poor, rivalling each other in the pilgrimage. All the surrounding country was covered by a tide of pilgrims: so great, notwithstanding the double invasion of Danes and Normans and the passage of centuries, was the fidelity of the English people to the memory of the first saints of their race.⁷⁵

⁷⁵ "Non a te recedam, nisi prolem meam restituas vivam. . . . Vos hactenus, dilectissimæ sorores, sicut animæ meæ viscera dilexi." — CAPGRAVE, ap. BOLLAND., vol. iii. February, p. 390. "Vix patuli campi capiebant ag-

These three sisters were grand-children of the savage Penda.

In order not to separate the three sisters from their mother, we have introduced them after the holy nuns of the dynasty of Hengist and Ethelbert, from whom they were descended by the mother's side. But by their father, who belonged to the reigning family of Mercia, they were the granddaughters of Penda, the most terrible enemy of the Christian name.⁷⁶

The Mercian dynasty, descended from Penda, furnishes most of the saints.

In fact, a transformation far more sudden and not less complete than that which turned the granddaughters of the Ravager and Man of Fire into abbesses and saints, was wrought upon the posterity of the ferocious Penda of Mercia, the warlike octogenarian, who had been the last and most formidable hero of Anglo-Saxon paganism.⁷⁷ Of all the races descended from Odin who shared among them the sway of England, no one has furnished a larger list of nuns and saints to be inscribed in the national calendar than the descendants of Penda, as if they thus meant to pay a generous ransom for the calamities inflicted upon the new Christians of England by their most cruel enemy.⁷⁸ We will not return again to speak of his firstborn son, whose love for the daughter of Oswy made him the firstborn son of the Church in Mercia, the first Christian baptized in that country;⁷⁹ nor of his first successor Wulphere, the generous founder of Peterborough; nor of his other successor Ethelred, the devoted friend of Wilfrid, who ended his thirty years' reign by ten years of life in a monastery. We treat only at this moment of the daughters and granddaughters of the sanguinary victor who had cut off so many Christian kings among the neighboring nations.

An obstinate tradition found in the ancient English chronicles asserts that two of his daughters, Kyneburga and Kyneswitha, both gave up the thought of marriage to consecrate themselves to God. The eldest, who was married to the intimate friend of her brother Peada, the eldest son of King Oswy of Northumbria, the friend and first protector of Wilfrid,⁸⁰ is said to have left him with his consent to end her life in the cloister. The youngest, sought in marriage by

mina viatorum . . . cunctos in commune præcipitante fide." — GUILL. MALMESB., De Gest. Reg., lib. ii. c. 13.

⁷⁶ See genealogical table, Appendix VIII., p. 755.

⁷⁷ See pp. 225-514.

⁷⁸ "Ita parens perpetuo in Deum rebellis sanctissimos celo fructus effudit." — THOMAS DE ELMHAM, p. 189.

⁷⁹ See p. 294.

⁸⁰ See p. 293.

Offa, King of the East Saxons, used her connection with him only to persuade the young prince to embrace monastic life as she herself wished to do.⁸¹ A more profound study, however, of the period has made the authenticity of this legend doubtful.⁸² But it has proved that the two daughters of the bloody Penda contributed, with their brothers, to the establishment of the great Abbey of Medehamptstede or Peterborough; that their names appear in the lists of the national assembly which sanctioned this foundation, and that they spent their retired and virginal lives in some retreat near the new sanctuary. After their death, they were buried at Peterborough; their relics, happily found after the burning of the monastery and the massacre of all the monks by the Danes, were carried back there on its restoration, and continued to be venerated there down to the twelfth century.

A third daughter of the terrible Penda, Eadburga, was also a nun, and became abbess at Dormuncester, according to the English martyrology. Her son Merwald, who did not reign, like his brothers, and never attained a higher rank than that of subregulus or ealdorman, married her who was afterwards Abbess of Minster, a union from which sprang the three holy sisters Milburga, Mildred, and Milgytha, whom we have just spoken of. Another son, Wulphere, who succeeded Penda on the throne of Mercia, had a saint for his wife, and of this marriage proceeded another holy saint, Wereburga, who was the fourth of the granddaughters of Penda whom grateful England placed upon her altars.

The wife of Wulphere, the son and successor of Penda, was Ermenilda, daughter of the King of Kent, and granddaughter, by her mother, of Anna, the King of East Anglia, who perished upon the battle-field defending his country and religion against the attacks of Penda.⁸³ This religion, henceforward triumphant, reconciled and united the posterity of the murderer and that of the victim. We thus come, through the essentially Christian and monastic dynasty of the Ascings of Kent to that of the Uffings of East Anglia, which was equally remarkable

The Uffings or dynasty of East Anglia.

⁸¹ GUILL. MALMESB., RICARD. CIRENCESTER, ALFORD, HARPSFELD, CAPGRAVE, &c. Pagi accepts this tradition: Crit. in Baronium, ad ann. 680.

⁸² Act. SS. Bolland., vol. i. March, p. 441. It is not known by what authority the author of the continuation of Dugdale makes Kyneburga the first abbess of the great monastery at Gloucester, the church of which, now a cathedral, is one of the most curious buildings in England. — STEVENS, i. 266.

⁸³ See above, p. 282.

for the crowd of saints which it produced. King Anna, who married the sister of Hilda, the celebrated Abbess of Whitby, had a natural daughter, who was a nun in France, along with the daughter, by a former marriage, of her father's wife ; both, as has been already said, were Abbesses of Faremoutier,⁸⁴ and both are reckoned among the saints.

The three daughters of King Anna, who died on the battle-field.

By his union with the sister of Hilda, King Anna had three daughters and a son. The son became in his turn the father of three daughters, two of whom were in succession Abbesses of the Monastery of Hackness, in Northumbria, founded by their grand-aunt St. Hilda, and the last, Eadburga, was that Abbess of Repton whom we have already encountered as the friend of the illustrious and generous hermit Guthlac.⁸⁵

The three daughters of Anna — Etheldreda, Sexburga, and Withburga — are all counted among the saints. Let us speak, in the first place, of the latter, though she was the youngest of the three. She was sent to the country to be nursed, and remained there until she heard, while still quite young, the news of her father's death on the battle-field. She resolved immediately to seek a refuge for the rest of her life in cloistral virginity. She chose for her asylum a modest remnant of her father's lands at Dereham in Norfolk, and there built a little monastery. But she was so poor that she, her companions, and the masons who built her future dwelling, had to live on dry bread alone. One day, after she had prayed long to the blessed Virgin, she saw two does come out of the neighboring forest to drink at a stream whose pure current watered the secluded spot. Their udders were heavy with milk, and they permitted themselves to be milked by the virginal hands of Withburga's companions, returning every day to the same place, and thus furnishing a sufficient supply for the nourishment of the little community and its workmen.⁸⁶ This lasted until the ranger of the royal domain,

⁸⁴ See above, p. 663, and the genealogical table, Appendix IX., p. 756.

⁸⁵ See above, p. 588.

⁸⁶ "Juxta mare cum sua nutrice in quodam vico paterni juris. Ad sanctimonialem confugit professionem, ubi in umbra alarum Dei sperans suaviter requievit. . . . In humilem locum paterni juris devenit. . . . Mittit ad fontem quo silva grato irrigatur fluvio. . . . Duæ assiliunt cervæ. . . . Has mulgebant manus virgineæ. . . . Præpositus ipsius villæ . . . adductis canibus nitebatur insontes feras captare." — BOLLAND., vol. ii. March, p. 606.

There still exists at East Dereham, a small parish in Norfolk, a well bearing the name of St. Withburga. It is fed by a spring rising in the very place where the saint's body was laid before its translation to Ely. — Notes and Queries, third series, vol. iii. p. 247.

a savage and wicked man, who regarded with an evil eye the rising house of God, undertook to hunt down the two helpful animals. He pursued them with his dogs across the country, but, in attempting to leap a high hedge, with that bold impetuosity which still characterizes English horsemen, his horse was impaled on a post, and the hunter broke his neck.⁸⁷

Withburga ended her life in this poor and humble solitude ; but the fragrance of her gentle virtues spread far and wide. The fame of her holiness went through all the surrounding country. The worship given to her by the people of Norfolk was maintained with the pertinacity common to the Anglo-Saxon race, and went so far that, two centuries after her death, they armed themselves to defend her relics from the monks of Ely, who came, by the king's command, to unite them to those of her sisters at Ely.

To Ely, also, the monastic metropolis of East Anglia, and queen of English abbeys, we must transport ourselves to contemplate three generations of princesses issued from the blood of the Uffings and Ascings, and crowned by the nimbus of saints. There were, in the first place, the two Queens of Mercia and Kent, Etheldreda, whom our readers already know,⁸⁸ and her elder sister, Sexburga. This accomplished princess had married one of the Kings of Kent, the one who, after Ethelbert, had showed himself most zealous for the extension of the Gospel. It was she especially who moved him to destroy the last idols which still remained in his kingdom. After twenty-four years of conjugal life she became a widow, and was regent for four years of the kingdom of her son. As soon as he was old enough to reign, she abdicated, not only the crown, but secular life, took the veil from the hands of Archbishop Theodore, and founded a monastery in the Isle of Sheppey, situated at the mouth of the Thames, and separated from the mainland by that arm of the sea in which Augustin, on Christmas-day 579, baptized at once ten thousand Saxons. This monastery took and kept the name of Minster, like that which was founded at the same time by her niece Domneva

Three generations of saints of the blood of Odin Abbesses at Ely.

Sexburga, Queen of Kent.

640-664.

⁸⁷ The monastic chronicler describes the accident with all the spirit of a steeplechaser: "Equus in obstantem sepe[m] urgentibus calcaribus incurrit, secusque acuta sude transfixus ilia, dum resiliendo tergiversaretur, sessor superbus supino capite excutitur, fractaque cervice exanimatur."

⁸⁸ See above, in the life of Wilfrid, p. 366.

in the neighboring Isle of Thanet. The church is still visible not far from the great roads of Sheerness, which has become one of the principal stations of the British navy. She there ruled a community of seventy-seven nuns, until she learned that her sister Etheldreda, having fled from the king her husband, according to the advice of Wilfrid, had taken refuge in the marshes of their native country, and had there formed a new asylum for souls resolute to serve God in solitude and virginity. Sexburga then resolved to return to her own country and become a simple nun under the crosier of her sister. "Farewell, my daughters," she said to her companions who were gathered round her. "I leave you Jesus for your protector, His holy angels for companions, and one of my daughters for your superior. . . . I go to East Anglia where I was born, in order to have my glorious sister Etheldreda for my mistress, and to take part immediately in her labors here below, that I may share her recompense above."

Abbess at Ely after her sister.

She was received with enthusiasm at Ely: the entire community came out to welcome her: and the two sister-queens wept with joy when they met. They lived together afterwards in the most sweet and tender union, rivalling each other in zeal for the service of God and the salvation of souls, Sexburga compelling herself always to take lessons of humility and fervor from her sister. When Etheldreda died, Sexburga replaced her as abbess, and ruled the great East Anglian monastery for twenty years before she too found her rest near the tomb which she had erected to her sister.⁸⁹

Besides her two sons, who reigned over Kent in succession, Sexburga had two daughters, one of whom, Earcongotha, lived and died, as has been already seen, in a French monastery; the other, Ermenilda, married to the son and successor of Penda, became, along with the illustrious exile Wilfrid, the principal instrument of the final conversion of Mercia, the greatest kingdom of the Heptarchy. Like her mother, she used all the

Ermenilda,
Queen of Mercia,
Abbess of Ely after her mother.

⁸⁹ "Vobis, O filiae, Jesum derelinquo tutorem, sanctosque angelos paranymphos. . . . Ego gloriosæ sororis meæ magisterio informanda. . . . Regina reginam excepit, soror sororem cum tripudio introducit, fundunt ubertim præ gaudio lacrymas, et ex vera caritate inter eas lætitia germinatur. Cœlesti namque dulcedine delectatæ alterna invicem consolatione proficiunt. Venit dives illa de prælatione ad subjectionem. . . . Federatæ invicem beatæ sorores in unitate fidei." — Historia Eliensis, l. i. c. 18, 35.

influence which the love of her husband gave her to extirpate the last vestiges of idolatry in the country which had been the centre and last bulwark of Anglo-Saxon heathenism.⁹⁰ The example of her virtues was the most effectual of sermons; and it was, above all, by her incomparable sweetness, her pity for all misfortune, her unwearied kindness, that she touched the hearts of her subjects most.⁹¹ Like her mother, too, it was her desire to offer herself entirely to God, to whom she had finally led back her people: as soon as she became a widow, she took the veil like her mother, and under her mother—for it was to Ely that she went to live in humility and chastity, under a doubly maternal rule. The mother and daughter contended which should give the finest examples of humility and charity.⁹² At last, and still following in her mother's steps, Ermenilda, on the death of Sexburga, became abbess, and was thus the third princess of the blood of the Uffings who ruled the flourishing community of Ely. The local chronicle affirms that it was not her birth but her virtues, and even her love of holy poverty, which made her preferred to all others by the unanimous suffrages of her numerous companions.⁹³ She showed herself worthy of their choice: she was less a superior than a mother. After a life full of holiness and justice, her soul went to receive its eternal reward in heaven, and her body was buried beside those of her mother and aunt in the church of the great abbey which had thus the singular privilege of having for its three first abbesses a Queen of Northumbria, a Queen of Kent, and a Queen of Mercia.

But this celebrated community was to be in addition the spiritual home of a fourth abbess and saint, in whom the blood of Penda and of Anna,⁹⁴ the victor

Wereburga, daughter of Ermenilda,
fourth Ab-

⁹⁰ "Nec quievit invicta, donec idola et ritus dæmoniacos extirparet. . . . Rex . . . sanctis uxoris desideriis, petitionibus ac monitis ultro se inclinans." — JOANN. BROMPTON, ap. BOLLAND., vol. ii. February, p. 687. See above, p. 631.

⁹¹ "Ad omnem pietatem, compassionem et omnium necessitudinum subventionem materna viscera ante omnia induebat. Eadem in omnibus benignitas, in Christo caritas erat." — Ibid., p. 691.

⁹² "Contendebant alterutra pietate mater et filia, quæ humilior, quæ posset esse subjeccioni: mater sibi præferebat ejus, quam genuerat, virginitatem; virgo matris auctoritatem: utrinque et vincere et vinci gaudebant." — GÖRSELINUS, Vita S. Wereburgæ, ap. BOLLAND., vol. i. February, p. 388.

⁹³ "Voto unanimi et consensu totius congregationis . . . successit: quæ totius dominationis ambitione neglecta . . . ad Christi paupertatem, quam optaverat, pauper ipsa devenit. . . . A cunctis digne suscepta, totius mater congregationis effecta est. Transivit autem plena sanctitate et justitia ad regna cælestia."

⁹⁴ See genealogical tables, Appendix VII., VIII., and IX., pp. 751, 755, 756.

bes of Ely, of the same stock.

and the vanquished, was blended. This was Wereburga, the only daughter of Ermenilda, who had not followed, but preceded, her mother in the cloister.

These crowned Christians had learned in their palaces to despise wealth, luxury, and worldly pomp. They considered themselves prisoners of vanity.⁹⁵ Notwithstanding her beauty, which, like that of Etheldreda, is boasted by the annalists, Wereburga repulsed all her suitors. A monastery seemed to her the most noble of palaces. Following this impulse she went to her grandaunt Etheldreda at Ely, with the consent of her father, who himself took her there in state, accompanied by his royal suite. When her grandmother, Queen Sexburga, and her mother, Queen Ermenilda, followed her, three generations of princesses of the blood of Hengist and Odin were thus seen together, the grandmother, mother, and daughter, wearing the same monastic dress, and bound by the same rule for the service of God and man. Wereburga lived long as a humble and simple nun, fulfilling in her turn all the offices in the monastery, until the time when, after the

699. death of her mother, she was called to take the place of abbess.

Her uncle Ethelred, who, after a reign of thirty years, was to end his days in the cloister, was so struck with the prudence and capacity that were apparent, combined with holiness, in the character of Wereburga, that he intrusted her with a sort of supremacy, or rather a general right of inspection over the various nunneries in his kingdom.⁹⁶ It was in exercise of this office that, before entering on the government of Ely, she had been at the head of the communities of Weedon, Trentham, and Hanbury in turn, leaving everywhere a fragrance of virtue and kindness, and recollections of her constant solicitude for the benefit of all, which made her memory dear to the people, and of which as usual legendary lore has taken possession. Of all the incidents that adorn her biography we will quote one only, which explains better than any other the popularity of her memory. It happened one day that a shepherd on the monastic lands of Weedon, a man distinguished by his holy life, was treated by the steward with that savage brutality which the modern English too often borrow from their Anglo-Saxon ancestors. At this sight the niece of the sovereign of Mercia, the granddaughter of the terrible Penda, threw herself at the feet of the cruel steward. "For the love of God," she said, "spare this innocent man; he is more pleasing in the eyes of God, who from the heights of heaven regards all our actions, than either you or I." The wretch paid no attention to her, and she began to pray, continuing until the steward, paralyzed and distorted by miraculous strength, had in his turn to appeal to the intervention of the saint that he might be restored to his natural condition.⁹⁷

⁹⁵ "Viluerant divitiæ tam matri quam filiæ: palatium habebant pro monasterio: aurum, gemmæ, vestes auro textæ, et quicquid fert pompatica mundi jactantia onerosa sibi magis erant quam gloriosa: et si forte his uti ad tempus regia compelleret dignitas, dolebant se potius vanitatis subjectas quam captivas." — Act. SS. Bolland., Febr., vol. i. p. 387.

⁹⁶ "Cum formæ pulchritudo insigniter responderet, generositati suæ, cæpit speciosa facie cum speciosissima mente ad eum . . . contendere. . . . Procos et amatores regifcos angelica pudicitia repulit. . . . Virginalis B. Wereburgæ pudicitia, mox ut valuit, hæc vincula exuit. . . . Tradidit ei monasteriorum sanctimonialium quæ in suo regno pollebant principatum." — BOLLAND., vol. i. February, pp. 387, 388.

At the death of Wereburga the population in the neighborhood of the monastery where she died and where she was to be buried, fought for the possession of her body, an event which began to be customary at the death of our holy nuns. Two centuries later, in order to save her dear remains from the Danes, the Ealdorman of Mercia had them carried to Chester, a city already celebrated in the times of the Britons and Romans, and where a great abbey, with a church which is now admired among the fine cathedrals of England, rose over her tomb.

To complete this list of Anglo-Saxon princesses whose cloistral education and vocation have been revealed to us by the worship of which they were the object, it now remains to say a few words of the nuns who proceeded from the race which a century later was to absorb all the kingdoms of the Heptarchy, and form the political unity of England. This race of Cerdic, the founder of the kingdom of Wessex, has already given us an essentially monastic figure in the person of the legislator King Ina,⁹⁸ who, in the midst of a prosperous and glorious reign, gave up his crown and went to Rome to become a monk. It was his wife Ethelburga, as may be remembered, who, by a scene cleverly arranged, prepared him to leave his kingdom, his

Nuns of the race of Cerdic in Wessex.

⁹⁷ "Amentarius, vir piæ conversationis et quantum licuit sub humana servitute sanctæ vitæ. . . . Nunc villicus dominæ cum forte laniaret cruentissimo verbere . . . proruit ad pedes indignos lanistæ. . . . Parce, pro Dei amore, quare excarnificas hominem innocentem. . . . Continuo dura cervix et torva facies in terga illi reflectitur." — Ibid., p. 389.

⁹⁸ See above, p. 592, and the genealogical table, Appendix X., p. 757.

country, and the world. She alone never left him; she accompanied him in his voluntary exile, and at his death returned to become a nun at Barking, in England.

St. Cuthburga, sister of
King Ina. Beside the wife of Ina, and, like her, of the blood of Cerdic,⁹⁹ the two sisters of the king, Coenburga¹⁰⁰ and Cuthburga, take their place in monastic annals, both devoted to religious life, and reckoned among the English saints. The latter is much the most celebrated of the two. She was married young to the learned and peaceful Aldfrid, King of Northumbria, whose important influence on the life of Wilfrid has been already seen, and was, like her sister-in-law Etheldreda, struck upon the throne by the thunderbolt of divine love, and in the lifetime of her husband desired to give up conjugal life and her royal state to consecrate herself to the service of God in the cloister. Less tender or less violent than his brother Egfrid, King Aldfrid consented to the separation,¹⁰¹ and Cuthburga took the veil in 700-705. the Monastery of Barking, on the Thames, in the kingdom of East Anglia. This house, which had been founded some time before by a holy bishop of London for his sister, in whom he had recognized a soul destined to govern those who gave themselves to God,¹⁰² was already celebrated, not only for the fervor of its nuns, but by the zeal they displayed for the study of the Holy Scriptures, the Fathers of the Church, and even the classic tongues. The sister of Ina remained there only a few years. Her brother Foundress of Winbourne. desired her to become the superior of a great foundation belonging to their race and country. He 705. established her at Winbourne, in a very fertile country,¹⁰³

⁹⁹ "Regii generis femina de Cerdici prosapia regis oriunda." — GUILL. MALMESB.

¹⁰⁰ Placed by the Bollandists (vol. iv. Sept., die 12) among the prætermissi, because her adoration does not appear to them certain, though she is named in a crowd of martyrologies. Cf. PAGI, Crit. in Annal. BARONII, ad ann. 705.

¹⁰¹ "Ante finem vitæ suæ connubio carnalis copulæ ambo pro Dei amore renunciavere." — FLORENT. WIGORNENSIS. Cf. BOLLAND., vol. vi. August, p. 696.

¹⁰² "In quo ipsa Deo devotarum mater ac nutrix posset existere feminarum, quæ suscepto monasterii regimine, condignam se in omnibus episcopo fratre, et ipsa recte vivendo et subjectis regulariter et pie consulendo præbuit." — BEDE, iv. 6. This bishop was called Earconwald, and his sister Edilberga or Ethelburga. She must not be confounded with the widow of King Ina, who afterwards was a nun, and even abbess at Barking. The bishop himself became a monk at Chertsey, another monastery also founded by him on the banks of the Thames.

¹⁰³ "Quod Latine interpretatur vini fons dici potest, quia propter nimiam near the royal residence of the kings of Wessex, and not far from the sea which washes the shores of the district now called Dorsetshire. The Queen of Northumbria, when she became abbess of the new community, carried with her the spirit and habits of her first monastic dwelling-place, and Winbourne soon became still more celebrated than Barking for the great development of its literary studies.

But before we discuss briefly the singular birth of ecclesiastical and classical literature among the Anglo-Saxon nuns, and before we leave the country of Wessex, which gave to the English their first monarch, Egbert, and to the Teutonic world its most illustrious apostle, Boniface, a place must be reserved for the touching and popular story of Frideswida, foundress and patron of Oxford — that is to say, of one of the most celebrated literary and intellectual centres of the universe. She was the daughter of one of the great chiefs of the country, to whom the legend gives the title of king, or at least of subregulus, and was, like all the heroines of Anglo-Saxon legend, sought in marriage by another king or chief called Algar, more powerful than her father, whose alliance she obstinately refused in order to consecrate herself to religious life. The prince, carried away by his passion, resolved to seize on her by force. To escape from his pursuit she threw herself, like Bega, into a boat, not to cross the sea, like the Irish princess, but to put the Thames between herself and her lover. After proceeding for ten miles on the river, she landed on the borders of a forest, where she hid herself in a sort of hut covered with ivy, but intended in the first place for the swine which, then as later, went to eat the acorns in the woods, and were one of the principal riches of the Anglo-Saxon proprietors.¹⁰⁴ It was not a secure refuge for her. Algar, growing more and more in earnest, tracked her everywhere, with the intention of sacrificing her to the brutality of his companions as well as to his own. But at the moment when, exhausted with weariness, she was about to fall into his hands, she bethought herself of the great saints who, from the earliest days of the Church, had defended and saved their virginity at the price of their life. She invoked Catherine, claritatem et saporem eximium quo cæteris terræ illius aquis præstare videbatur, hoc nomen accepit." — RODOLPHI, Vita S. Iiobæ, ap. Acta SS. O. S. B., sæc. iii. p. 2.

Frideswida, a West Saxon princess, becomes a nun in spite of the opposition of her friends; and her monastery is the cradle of the University of Oxford.

¹⁰⁴ See the first chapter of Ivanhoe.

the most illustrious martyr of the Eastern Church, and Cecilia, the sweet and heroic Roman whose name, inserted in the canon of the mass, was already familiar to all the new Christians. Her prayer was granted. God struck the savage Anglo-Saxon with sudden blindness, which put an end to his furious pursuit.

From this incident sprang a wild but obstinate tradition, according to which the kings of England for several centuries carefully avoided living or even passing by Oxford, for fear of losing their eyesight.¹⁰⁵ Frideswida, thus miraculously saved, obtained by her prayers the restoration of sight to her persecutor; then, with her father's consent, and after some years passed in solitude, she founded near Oxford, at the spot of her deliverance, a monastery where a crowd of Saxon virgins ranged themselves under her authority, and where she ended her life, dying in the same year as the Venerable Bede, and consoled during her last sufferings by the apparition of the two virgin martyrs, St. Catherine and St. Cecilia, to whom she had once so successfully appealed.

735.

The tomb of Frideswida, the chapel she erected in the depth of the wood where she had hidden herself, the fountain which sprang at her prayer, attracted up to the thirteenth century a crowd of pilgrims, who were led thither by the fame of the miraculous cures there performed. But of all the miracles collected after her death, none is so touching as that which, told during her lifetime, contributed above everything else to increase the fame of sanctity with which she

She kisses
a young leper.

was soon surrounded. It happened one day that an unfortunate young man, struck with leprosy, met her on the road: from the moment that he perceived her he cried, "I conjure you, virgin Frideswida, by the Almighty God, to kiss me in the name of Jesus Christ, His only Son." The maiden, overcoming the horror felt by all of this fearful disease, approached him, and after having made the sign of the cross, she touched his lips with a sisterly kiss.

¹⁰⁵ "In derelicto porcorum mapali hædera obducto delituit. . . . Nec latibulum latere potuit amantem, nec cordis desidia obfuit, quin persequeretur fugitantem. . . . Ille vi agere intendit. . . . Lenonum ludibrio polluenda. . . . Puella jam de fuga desperans simulque pro lassitudine nusquam progredi potens. . . . Hinc innatus est horror regibus Angliæ, ut nec unus profecto successorum ejus Oxenfordiam præsumatur intrare." — LELAND, Collectanea, ap. DUGDALE, vol. i. p. 173. Cf. BOLLAND., vol. viii. Oct., pp. 533–568. Henry III. was the first English king who disregarded this prejudice, and the misfortunes of his reign have been attributed to this presumption.

Soon after the scales of his leprosy fell off, and his body became fresh and wholesome like that of a little child.¹⁰⁶

The church in which the body of Frideswida rests, and the monastery which she had founded, were the objects of public veneration and the gifts of many kings during the middle ages. It would occupy too much of our space to tell how this monastery passed into the hands of regular canons, and became one of the cradles of the celebrated University of Oxford. Unquestionably the first school which is proved to have existed on this spot, destined to so much literary fame, was attached to the sanctuary of our Anglo-Saxon princess.¹⁰⁷ Oxford and Westminster,¹⁰⁸ the two greatest names in the intellectual and social history of England, thus both date from the monastic origin in which is rooted everything which was dear and sacred to old England.

The monastery of St. Frideswida, transformed into a college by Cardinal Wolsey, is still, under the name of Christ-Church, the most considerable college in the University of Oxford. Her church, rebuilt in the twelfth century, is the cathedral of that city.¹⁰⁹ Her body, according to the common opinion, still rests there, and her shrine is shown; but it must be added that, under Elizabeth, and after the final triumph of Anglican reform, a commissioner of the Queen, who has himself related the fact in an official report, believed himself entitled to place beside the relics of Frideswida the body of a disveiled nun married to an apostate priest called Pietro Vermigli, who had been called to Oxford as a reformer and professor of the new doctrine. The commissioner mixed the bones of the saint and those of the concubine in such a manner that it was impossible to distinguish the one from the other, and placed them in a stone coffin, on which he engraved the words, now happily effaced, Hic requiescit religio cum superstitione.¹¹⁰

¹⁰⁶ "Ecce inter turbam . . . adest juvenis immanissima lepra et postulis toto deformatus (sic) corpore. . . . Adjuro te, virgo Frideswida, per Deum omnipotentem, ut des mihi osculum. . . . At illa caritatis igne succensa illico accessit. . . . Ore virginis os leprosi tangitur, et . . . statim caro ejus sicut caro parvuli efficitur." — BOLLAND., vol. viii. Oct., p. 565.

¹⁰⁷ OZANAM, Notes Inédites sur l'Angleterre.

¹⁰⁸ See above, p. 193.

¹⁰⁹ The choir, with its superimposed arches, is specially admirable, as well as the tomb of Guitmond, first prior of the restored monastery in 1549, that of Sir Henry de Bath, Chief-Justice of England in 1251, and the graceful chapter-house of the thirteenth century. At Christ-Church resides the celebrated Dr. Pusey, canon of the cathedral.

¹¹⁰ See the learned and copious article of P. Bossue on St. Frideswida, ap. BOLLAND., vol. viii. Oct., p. 553-556.

III.

It may be a matter of surprise that there is nothing in the legend of St. Frideswida, nor in the recollections of the early days of her foundation, to connect them with the incontestable traditions which prove the intellectual and literary development of the great nunneries in England, of which something has already been said. We return to the subject, were it only in passing, reserving to ourselves the power of going back upon it when it becomes time to discuss the colonies of learned nuns who, issuing from their insular beehives, lent effectual aid to St. Boniface and the other Anglo-Saxon missionaries of Germany.

It is proved by numerous and undoubted witnesses that literary studies were cultivated during the seventh and eighth centuries in the female monasteries with no less care and perseverance than in the communities of men, and even perhaps with more enthusiasm. Was this, as has been supposed, a consequence of the new spirit which Archbishop Theodore had brought from Greece and Italy, and with which he had inspired all the monastic Church of England? or was it rather a tradition of Frankish Gaul, where the first Anglo-Saxon nuns had been educated, and where the example of Radegund and her companions shows us to what a degree classical habits and recollections found an echo in cloisters inhabited by women alone? ¹¹¹

At all events it is apparent that the Anglo-Saxon nuns interpreted the obligation to work which was imposed on them by their rule, to occupy the time which remained after the performance of their liturgical duties, as applying specially to study. They did not neglect the occupations proper to their sex, as is apparent by the example of the priestly vestments embroidered for Cuthbert by the abbess-queen Etheldreda. They even improved the art of embroidery in gold and silver stuffs, ornamented with pearls and jewels, for the use of the clergy and the church, so much, that the term "English work" (opus Anglicum) was long consecrated to this kind of labor. But the work of the hand was far from satisfying them. They left the distaff and the needle, not only to copy manuscripts and ornament them with miniatures, according to the taste of their time, but above all to read and study the holy books, the Fathers of the Church, and even classic authors. All, or almost all, knew Latin. Convent corresponded with convent in that language. Some of them became acquainted with Greek. Some were enthusiastic for poetry and grammar, and all that was then adorned with the name of science. Others devoted themselves more readily to the study of the Pentateuch, the Prophets, and the New Testament, taking for guides the commentaries of the ancient doctors, and seeking out historical, allegorical, or mystic interpretations for the most obscure texts.¹¹² It has been made apparent by what was said in respect to the cowherd Ceadmon, transformed into a poet and translator of Holy Scripture, to what extent the study of the Bible had been cultivated at Whitby under the reign of the great Abbess Hilda.¹¹³

¹¹¹ See above, vol. i. p. 488.

Each community of women was thus at once a school and workshop, and no monastic foundation is to be met with which was not, for nuns as well as for monks, a house of education, in the first place for the adults, who formed its first nucleus, and afterwards for the young people who crowded around them.¹¹⁴ Thus were trained the cultivated nuns who quoted Virgil in writing to St. Boniface, and too often added Latin verses, of their own fashion, to their prose;¹¹⁵ who copied for him the works he had need of, now the Epistles of St. Peter in gilded letters, now the Prophets writ large to suit weak sight;¹¹⁶ who consoled and nourished him in his exile by the abundance and beauty of the books they sent him; and among whom he found those illustrious fellow-workers, whom one of his biographers declares to have been deeply versed in all liberal studies,¹¹⁷ and who lent so stout a hand in the conversion of the Germans.

But the example most frequently quoted is that of Barking, where we have seen the wife and sister of Ina, the Queen of Northumbria and the Queen of Wessex, take the veil in succession, the one during the lifetime, the other after the death of her

Intellectual life at Barking under Abbess
Hildelida.

¹¹² MABILLON, Annal. Bened., vol. ii. p. 143; LINGARD, Antiquities, vol. ii. p. 193; and especially KARL ZELL, who, in a recent work, Lioba und die frommen Angelsächsischen Frauen (Fribourg, 1860), has most conscientiously treated of all that regards the studies and the whole life of the Anglo-Saxon nuns.

¹¹³ See above, p. 264.

¹¹⁴ The following is said of St. Cuthbert's foundation at Carlisle (see above, p. 402): "Ubi sanctimonialium congregatione stabilita . . . in profectum divinæ servitutis scholas instituit." — SIMEON DUNELMENSIS, i. 9.

¹¹⁵ S. BONIFACII ET LULLI Epistolæ, No. 13, 23, 148, 149; ed. Jaffé.

¹¹⁶ Ibid., No. 13, 32, 55.

¹¹⁷ OTHLO, De Vita et Virtutibus S. Bonifacii, p. 490.

husband. The abbess of this convent was Hildeida, whose wise administration and holy life, prolonged to a very advanced age,¹¹⁸ have been celebrated by Bede, and to whom her friendship with St. Aldhelm and St. Boniface gave additional fame. It was to her and her community that the famous Abbot of Malmesbury dedicated his Praise of Virginity, composed at first in prose, and which was rewritten in verse at a later period. In this dedication, he names, besides the Abbess and Queen Cuthburga, eight other nuns, who were bound to him by ties of blood or of intimate friendship, whose holy fame seemed to him an honor to the Church, and whose many and affectionate letters filled him with joy.¹¹⁹

This treatise, like all the other important writings of Aldhelm, is very uninviting to the reader, being full of pedantry and emphasis. But it is very interesting to all who desire to realize the ideas and images which one of the most holy and learned pontiffs of the Anglo-Saxon Church naturally appealed to, in addressing himself to the nuns of his own country and time. He quotes to them all the great examples of virginity which the Old and New Testaments could supply, or which were to be found in the lives of the Fathers and Doctors, and especially in the history of the martyrs of both sexes. But he also quotes to them Virgil and Ovid, and among others the well-known line —

“Quadrupedante putrem sonitu quatit ungula campum;”

and that from the Epithalamium —

“Mellea tunc roseis hærescent labia labris.”¹²⁰

He does not confine himself to a commonplace image, by describing them as bees who seek their honey from the most different flowers. He compares them now to athletes in the circus, taking advantage of the metaphor to make an enumeration of all the Olympian games; now to warlike cohorts engaged in a desperate struggle against what he calls ‘the ¹¹⁸ “Devota deo famula . . . usque ad ultimam senectutem eidem monasterio strenuissime, in observantia disciplinæ regularis et in earum quæ ad communes usus pertinent rerum providentia præfuit.” — Hist. Eccles., iv. 10. Cf. S. BONIFACII Epist., 10, ed. Jaffé.

¹¹⁹ “Nec non Osburgæ contribulibus necessitudinem nexibus conglutinatis, Aldgidæ ac Scholasticæ, Hildburgæ et Burngidæ, Eulaliæ ac Teclæ, rumore sanctitatis concorditer Ecclesiam ornantibus.” — De Laudibus Virginitatis, p. 1, ed. Giles.

¹²⁰ Ibid., c. 35.

eight great vices; and anon he borrows his images and exhortations from military life, always mixing, in his singular Latin, modes and turns of expression which are essentially Greek, and which presuppose, among several at least of his correspondents, a certain acquaintance with the Greek language. The last lines of his treatise breathe a touching humility and tenderness. He compares himself, a poor sinner who, still plunged in the waves of corruption, shows to others the perfect shore of the perfect land, to a deformed painter who has undertaken to represent the features of beauty. "Help me, then, dear scholars of Christ," he says; "let your prayers be the reward of my work, and, as you have so often promised me, may your community be my advocates before the Almighty. Farewell, you who are the flowers of the Church, the pearls of Christ, the jewels of Paradise, the heirs of the celestial country, but who are also my sisters according to monastic rule, and my pupils by the lessons I have given you."¹²¹

Nor were the nuns of Barking the only ones to whom Aldhelm addressed the effusions of his unwearied pen, and his laboriously classic muse; and we are expressly told that the works he dedicated to them were very popular among all who followed the same career.¹²² Many of his letters and poems are addressed to nuns whose names are not given, but of whom he begs not only intercession with God, but protection against criticism here below.¹²³ The communities who were honored by his visits or by his correspondence took pleasure, no doubt, in his play on words, and in the Greco-Latin acrostics and verbal refinements with which the celebrated prelate adorned his prose and verse; and insignificant as this kind of production appears to us now, it implies nevertheless a certain degree of literary culture generally diffused throughout the Anglo-Saxon cloisters.

But the interest which attaches to this revelation of an intellectual movement among the Anglo-Saxon nuns is in-

His letters to other nuns.

¹²¹ "Pulchrum depinxi hominem pictor fœdus, aliosque ad perfectionis litus dirigo, qui adhuc in delictorum fluctibus versor. . . . Valet, o flores Ecclesiæ, sorores monasticæ, alumnæ scholasticæ, Christi margaritæ, paradisi gemmæ, et cœlestis patriæ participes." — De Laudibus Virginitatis, c. 60.

¹²² "Beringensium quidem nomini dedicata; sed omnibus eandem professionem anhelantibus valitura." — GUILLELM. MALMESB., i. 35.

¹²³ "Sed vos virgineis comit quas infula sertis,

Hoc opus adversus querulos defendite scurras," &c.

— S. ALDHELMI Opera, p. 213, ed. Giles.

creased, when it is remarked that intellectual pursuits, though intensely appreciated, were far from holding the first place in the heart and spirit of these new aspirants to literary glory. The salvation of souls and the tender union of hearts carried the day over all the rest. In a letter written to an abbess distinguished by birth as well as by knowledge and piety, enclosing to her a series of leonine verses he had made on a journey he had taken into Cornwall, Aldhelm takes pains to demonstrate that he is specially inspired by a tender gratitude towards her who of all women has shown him the most faithful affection.¹²⁴ And another called Osgitha, whom he exhorts to a careful study of the Holy Scriptures, he addresses as his beloved sister, ten times, and even a hundred, a thousand times beloved.¹²⁵

Let us here take leave of Aldhelm and his learned correspondents, reminding our readers that one of his most important acts, that by which he consented to remain abbot of his three monasteries after his elevation to the episcopate, is dated from Winbourne,¹²⁶ which was the great feminine community of Wessex, founded by King Ina, and ruled by his sister Cuthburga. It was at the same time the monastery most famed for literary activity. The education of the young novices was the object of the most active and scrupulous care. Intellectual labor alternated with the works of the needle; but it is expressly said of Lioba, the nun whose name has thrown most lustre upon that community, the holy companion of Boniface in his German apostleship, that she devoted much more time to reading and studying the Holy Scriptures than to manual labor.¹²⁷ Let us also not forget that the development of spiritual fervor by prayer and the continual celebration of the monastic liturgy, occupied much the greatest place in the employment of the time and strength of all these young and generous souls.

¹²⁴ "Nullam reperisse me istic habitantium feminini sexus personam fide-liorem." — S. ALDHELM Opera, p. 104.

¹²⁵ "Dilectissimæ atque amantissimæ sorori. . . . Saluto te diligenter, Osgitha, ex intimo cordis cubiculo. . . . Vale! decies dilectissima, imo, centies et millies." — Ibid., p. 90.

¹²⁶ Ap. GILES, p. 351. — Cf. above, p. 539.

¹²⁷ "Crevit ergo puella et tanta abbatissæ omniumque sororum cura erudiebatur, ut nihil aliud præter monasterium et cælestis disciplinæ studia cognosceret. . . . Quando non legebat, operabatur manibus ea quæ sibi injuncta erant. . . . Læctioni tamen atque auditioni sanctarum Scripturarum magis quam labori manuum operam impendit." — Vita S. Liobæ, auct. RUDOLPHO, c. 7, ap. Acta SS. O. S. B., vol. iv.

There were five hundred nuns at Winbourne, who were all present at the nightly service.¹²⁸ It is easy to imagine how much authority, intelligence, and watchfulness, were necessary to rule such a crowd of young souls, all, no doubt, inspired with the love of heaven, but all, at the same time, sprung from races too newly converted to have freed themselves from the characteristic features of Saxon pride and rudeness. This necessity explains why princesses of those ancient dynasties, whom the Anglo-Saxons were accustomed to follow even without always respecting them, were everywhere sought for as superiors of the great communities; and why, after the sister of King Ina, another sister of the king, Tetta,¹²⁹ was called to the government of Winbourne, at the time when Lioba was being educated there. Among the crowd of minor authorities who lent their aid to this zealous and pious abbess, was the provost (preposita), the deaconess (decana), the portress, whose business it was to close the church after complines, and to ring the bell for matins, and who was furnished with an immense collection of keys, some of silver, others of copper or iron, according to their different destinations.¹³⁰ But neither the rank nor moral influence of the princess-abbess was always successful in restraining the barbarous impetuosity of that monastic youth. The nun who held the first rank among them after the abbess, and who was principally occupied with the care of the novices, made herself odious by her extreme severity: when she died, the hate which she inspired burst forth without pity: she was no sooner buried than the novices and young nuns rushed to the churchyard, and began to jump and dance upon her tomb, as if to tread under foot her detested corpse. This went so far that the soil, freshly filled in, which covered the remains of their enemy, sank half a foot below the level of the surrounding ground. The abbess had great trouble to make them feel what she called the hardness and cruelty of their hearts, and which she punished by imposing upon them three days of fasting and prayers for the deceased.¹³¹

The five hundred nuns of Winbourne.

The novices tread the tomb of their mistress under foot.

¹²⁸ Vita S. Liobæ, c. 5.

¹²⁹ "Illic ergo loco post nonnullas abbatissas et spiritales matres prælata est virgo religiosa nomine Tetta, genere quidem secundum sæculi dignitatem nobilis (soror quippe regis erat), morum autem probitate et sanctorum spectamine virtutum multo nobilior." — Ibid., c. 2.

¹³⁰ Ibid., c. 5.

¹³¹ "Nec tamen conquivit animus juvenum odientium eam, quin statim ut

IV.

Double
monastery. All that remains to be said of the strange but general institution of double monasteries — that is, two distinct communities of monks and nuns living together in the same place and under the same government — may be attached to the name of Winbourne. It is of all the establishments of this kind the one whose organization is best known to us. We have already met with the institution in Frankish Gaul, with St. Radegund and St. Columbanus, at Poitiers, at Remiremont, and elsewhere. We shall find them again in Belgium and Germany as soon as the monastic missionaries shall have carried the light of the Gospel there. Their origin has been largely discussed,¹³² and we do not pretend to give any decision on the subject. Examples may be found among the Fathers of the desert in Egypt and as far back as the times of St. Pacome,¹³³ who, however, placed the Nile between the two communities under his government. We have already pointed out a remarkable attempt at the same institution in Spain caused by the prodigious crowd of monastic neophytes of both sexes who gathered round St. Fructuosus.¹³⁴ Notwithstanding the assertion of Muratori to the contrary, the unassailable testimony of Bede proves that there was at least one community of the same kind in Rome in the middle of the seventh century.¹³⁵

These establishments, however, were more popular in Ireland than anywhere else, where they sprang spontaneously aspicerent locum in quo sepulta est, maledicerent crudelitati ejus; immo ascendentes tumulum, et quasi funestum cadaver conculcantes, in solatium doloris sui amarissimis insultationibus mortuæ exprobrarent. Quod cum mater congregationis venerabilis Tetta comperisset, temerariam juvenearum præsumptionem correptionis vigore compescens, perrexit ad tumulum et mirum in modum conspexit terram quæ desuper congesta erat subsedissee et usque ad semi pedis spatium infra summitatem sepulcri descendisse.” — Vita S. Lioba, c. 3.

¹³² MABILLON, Ann. Bened., vol. i. p. 125; LANIGAN, Eccles. Hist. of Ireland, vol. ii. pp. 19, 20; LINGARD, Antiquities, vol. i. 212; and above all, VARIN, 2d Memoir, already frequently quoted.

¹³³ See vol. i. p. 179. Cf. PALLADIUS, Hist. Lausiaca, 30-42; BOLLAND., vol. iii. May, p. 304.

¹³⁴ See above, vol. i. p. 435.

¹³⁵ “Cum monachum quemdam de vicino Virginum monasterio, nomine Andream, pontifici offerret, hic ab omnibus qui novere, dignus episcopatu judicatus est.” — Hist. Eccl., vol. iv. p. 1. Muratori maintains that double monasteries have always been unknown in Italy. — Antiquit. Mediæ Ævi, vol. v. p. 527.

from the beginning of the conversion of the island, to such a point that the apostle of the country, St. Patrick, saw himself obliged to forestall by wise precautions the disorders and scandals which might have arisen from the too close and frequent intercourse of the monks and nuns.¹³⁶ At the same time, the first pontiffs and missionaries of Hibernia, strong in the exceptional purity of the Irish temperament, which has continued to our own day the glorious privilege of the race, and strong above all in their own fervor and exclusive passion for the salvation of souls, feared neither the society of the women they had converted, nor the charge of governing them when they wished to devote themselves to God.¹³⁷ Less assured of themselves, if not more humble, their successors, those who are described as saints of the second order in the hagiographical annals of Ireland, declined the responsibility of administering the more or less numerous communities of virgins who grouped themselves around the older saints.¹³⁸ They carried this restriction so far as to refuse access to their retreat even to recluses who came to seek the viaticum from them.¹³⁹ However, the custom of combining the foun-

¹³⁶ "Sanxivit ut a mulieribus viri sequestrarentur, et utrique sua ædificia et oratoria distincta construerentur."—JOCELINUS, Vit. S. Patr., ap. BOL-LAND., p. 592. The ninth canon of the 2d council, which is attributed to him, is thus expressed: "Monachus et virgo, unus ab hinc et alia ab aliunde, in uno hospitio non commeant, nec in uno curru a villa in villam discurrant, nec assidue invicem confabulationem exerceant."—Ap. COLETTI, vol. iv. p. 754.

¹³⁷ "Mulierum administrationem et consortia non respuebant: quia super petram Christi fundati, ventum tentationis non timebant." Original text quoted by Ussher. To this category of the saints there may be added Bishop Dega Maccaryl (already spoken of above, vol. i. p. 695), who died in 589, and of whom it is said: "Confluxerunt undique ad eum sanctæ virgines, ut sub ejus regula degerent. . . . Moniales illas versus septentrionem ducens, in diversis locis diversa monasteria, in quibus cum aliis virginibus seorsum Deo servirent, eis, prout, decuit, construxit."—BOLLAND., vol. iii. August, p. 660. It appears also that a neighboring abbot reproached the holy bishop,
"ut eum de susceptione virginum objurgaret."

There is also the case of the thirty girls enamoured of St. Mochuda, who ended by becoming nuns under his authority, already mentioned, vol. i.
p. 697. And also that of St. Monynna, the contemporary of St. Patrick, who, with eight other virgins and a widow, went to the holy bishop Ibar, and
"longo tempore sub ipsius disciplina cum multis aliis virginibus permansit."
—BOLLAND., vol. ii. July, p. 291.

¹³⁸ "Pauci episcopi et multi presbyteri, diversas missas celebrabant, et diversas regulas; unum Pascha XIV. luna; unam tonsuram ab aure ad aurem; abnegabant mulierum administrationem, separantes eas a monasteriis."— Text quoted by Ussher.

¹³⁹ This is related of St. Senanus, who, about 530, founded a monastery in an island at the mouth of the Shannon, where no woman was permitted to disembark:—

dation, or at least the administration, of nunneries, along with that of similar communities of men, continued to prevail. But as the holy abbots declined to undertake the charge of nuns, the conditions had to be reversed. From this fact, no doubt, arose the singular custom universally established from the seventh century, not in Ireland, where I can find no example of it, but in all the Irish colonies, of two united communities, placed, not the nuns under the rule of an ecclesiastic, but the monks under that of the abbess of their neighboring nuns.

Such was the state of things in the foundations which we have seen develop under the influence of St. Columbanus, the Irish apostle of the Gauls, in the Vosges, in the valley of the Marne and of the Seine; and such too are the conditions which we shall find in Belgium when we consider the monastic influence of the Irish and Britons there. The Anglo-Saxon princesses devoted to the cloister found this custom established in the houses where they received their monastic education in Gaul, at Faremoutier, les Andelys, Chelles, and Jouarre,¹⁴⁰ and brought it into England, where it was immediately adopted; for of all the great nunneries of which we have spoken, not one was without a monastery of clerks or priests placed at the gates of the community of nuns, and ruled by their abbess.¹⁴¹ Let us recall only Whitby, where the Princess Hilda directed the monastery school, the nursery of so many bishops and missionaries, but of which the cowherd-poet Ceadmon, so often quoted, remains the principal celebrity;¹⁴² and Ely, where Queen Etheldreda attracted by her example, and arrayed under her authority, not only holy priests, but even men of elevated rank in secular life.¹⁴³ No doubt the necessity of providing for the spiritual wants, in the first place, of the numerous nuns who filled these monasteries, and of the lay population spread over the vast lands

“Cui præsul: quid feminis
Commune est cum monachis?
Nec te nec ullam aliam
Admittemus in insulam.”

Vita Rhythmica, ap. LANIGAN, ii. 7.

¹⁴⁰ BEDE, iii. 8. MABILLON, Acta SS. O. S. B., i. 420, iii. 20.

¹⁴¹ “Erat eo tempore monasteriis feminarum, amplis præsertim ac numerosis, conjuncta virorum, qui iis sacra administrarent, et familiam reliquam erudirent: eidem tamen abbatissæ omnes obediebant.” — BOLLAND., De S. Cedmono, vol. ii. February, p. 552.

¹⁴² See p. 264.

¹⁴³ See p. 372. Another instance is that of Repton, where St. Guthlac became a monk under the Abbess Elfrida. See p. 586 of this volume.

which the foundress, generally a princess of the reigning dynasty, conferred upon her community, contributed more than anything else to the extension of so singular a custom. The priests and clerks charged with this double mission found themselves naturally collected in a sort of community under the authority of her who was at once the spiritual superior and the lady — the seigneuress, if such a word may be used — of the monastic lands.¹⁴⁴ The whole together formed a sort of vast family, governed by a mother instead of a father, maternity being the natural form of authority — all the more so as the neophytes were often admitted with all their dependants, as was Ceadmon, who entered Whitby with all belonging to him, including a child of three years old, whom Bede describes as being nursed and cared for in the cell of the learned nuns of Barking.¹⁴⁵

The Greco-Asiatic Archbishop Theodore, when he came from Rome to complete the organization of the Anglo-Saxon Church,¹⁴⁶ does not appear to have relished this institution, which was not unknown to the Christian East, but which had probably left equivocal recollections behind it. In one of his charges he forbids all new foundations of this description, though respecting those which already existed.¹⁴⁷ But like so many other canons and decrees, his prohibition was disregarded; communities founded after his death, like Winbourne, were in full flower in the eighth century, and nothing indicates that double monasteries had ceased to flourish up to the general destruction of monasteries by the Danes at the end of the ninth century. They were swept away by that calamity, and no trace of them is to be found in the monastic revival of which King Alfred and the great Abbot Dunstan were the authors. It was a peculiarity belonging to the youth of the Church, which, like youth in all circumstances, went through all the difficulties, dangers, storms, and disorders of nature proper to that age, which disappear in maturer times.

¹⁴⁴ LINGARD, Antiquities, vol. i. p. 212.

¹⁴⁵ "Cædmon . . . susceptum in monasterium cum omnibus suis fratrum cohorti associavit." — Hist. Eccl., iv. 24. "Puer trium circiter annorum . . . qui propter infantilem adhuc ætatem in virginum Deo dedicatarum solbat cella nutrir, ibique medicari." — Ibid., iv. 8. We meet with many examples of a mother and daughter or two sisters being dedicated to God in the same convent. — Cf. BEDE, v. 3.

¹⁴⁶ See p. 346.

¹⁴⁷ "Non licet viris feminas habere monachas, neque feminis viros, tamen non destruamus illud quod consuetudo est in hac terra." — Capitula et Fragmenta, ap. THORPE, Ancient Laws and Institutes, p. 307.

This institution, however, is a new and very striking proof of the power of woman in the social order, a fact which we have already pointed out, following the example of Tacitus, both among the Germans and Britons.¹⁴⁸ Maintained, consolidated, and, in certain respects, sanctified by the Christian spirit among the Anglo-Saxons, it has remained very powerful in the race. It has produced that deference at once official and popular for the weaker sex, and, I willingly add, that public modesty of which the Anglo-Saxons of the present day in the United States give us so brilliant and honorable an example in their primary schools for boys, directed often in the midst of great cities, by young girls, who are protected against all outrage, and even all sarcasm, by the universal respect of both fathers and sons.¹⁴⁹

Let us hasten to add that even at this primitive period no trace of the abuses or disorders which the suspicious spirit of modern criticism might summon into being, are to be found. This is explained by the precautions everywhere to be met with when double monasteries existed, and which seem never to have been discontinued. The double family lived separately, in two buildings entirely distinct,¹⁵⁰ though near. As a general rule the nuns did not leave their cloister, and the monks were strictly forbidden to enter the enclosure reserved to the nuns, without the permission of the abbess, and the presence of several witnesses. At Winbourne, which must always be quoted as the type of establishments of this description, the two monasteries rose side by side, like two fortresses, each surrounded by battlemented walls. The austerity of primitive discipline existed in full vigor at the time when Lioba, who was destined, under the auspices of St. Boniface, to introduce conventual life among the women of Germany, resided there. The priests were bound to leave the church immediately after the celebration of mass, bishops themselves were not admitted into the nunnery, and the abbess communicated with the external world, to give her orders to her 720-748.

¹⁴⁸ "Neque enim sexum in imperio discernunt." — Agric., c. 16. "Solitum Britannis feminarum ductu bellare." — Annal., xiv. 35.

¹⁴⁹ EMILE DE LAVELEYE, De l'Instruction Publique en Amérique, confirmed by the accounts of all impartial travellers.

¹⁵⁰ "Multi de fratribus ejusdem monasterii qui aliis erant in ædibus" (BEDE, iii. 8), regarding Faremoutier. "Eam monasterii partem, qua ancillarum Dei caterva a virorum erat secreta contubernio" (Ibid., iv. 7), as to Barking.

spiritual and temporal subjects, only through a barred window.¹⁵¹

Coldingham is the only great community of this kind mentioned in history, the memory of which is not irreproachable, a fact which has been already mentioned in treating of the historical position of the Northumbrian princess, Ebba, foundress of that house.¹⁵² It must, however, be fully granted that the scandals pointed out by the severe and sincere Bede are not such as we might be tempted to expect; they are rather failures in obedience to the cloistral rule, than any infringements of Christian morality. These scandals, besides, whether small or great, were gloriously atoned for in the following century, when, under another Ebba, the nuns of Coldingham, to escape from the brutality of the Danish conquerors, cut off their noses and lips, and by their heroic self-mutilation added the palm of martyrdom to that of virginity.¹⁵³

With this single exception, the unanimous testimony of contemporary authors, as well as of more recent annalists, does full homage to the obedience to rule, the fervor, and even austerity of the double monasteries among the Anglo-Saxons. A great number of the most illustrious female saints, and prelates most distinguished by their virtues and knowledge, were educated in these communities, which were surrounded by universal veneration, and whose pure fame was never tarnished by the breath of calumny.¹⁵⁴

Is this to say that all was perfect in the monastic institutions of the country and time which I have undertaken to bring to the knowledge of the world? God forbid that I should thus attempt to deceive my readers. The more I advance in my laborious and thankless task — that is to say, the nearer I approach to my grave — the more do I feel mastered and overpowered

The abuses of the Anglo-Saxon monasteries.

¹⁵¹ "Porro ipsa congregationis mater, quando aliquid exteriorum pro utilitate monasterii ordinare vel mandare necesse erat, per fenestram loquebatur, et inde decernebat quæcumque ordinanda aut mandanda utilitatis ratio exigebat. . . . Virgines vero cum quibus ipsa indesinenter manebat, adeo immunes a virorum voluit esse consortio, ut non tantum laicis aut clericis, verum etiam ipsis quoque episcopis in congregationem earum negaret ingressum." — Vita S. Liobæ, auct. RUDOLPHO, c. 2, ap. Acta SS. O. S. B., sæc. iii. p. 2.

¹⁵² See p. 270.

¹⁵³ "Exemplum . . . non solum sanctimonialibus illis proficuum, verum etiam omnibus successuris virginibus æternaliter amplectendum." — MATTH. WEST., ROG. WENDOV., RIC. CIRENC., ii. 70.

¹⁵⁴ LINGARD, l. c.

by an ardent and respectful love of truth, the more do I feel myself incapable of betraying truth, even for the benefit of what I most love here below. The mere idea of adding a shadow to those which already shroud it, fills me with horror. To veil the truth, to hide it, to forsake it under the pretence of serving the cause of religion, which is nothing but supreme truth, would be, in my opinion, to aggravate a lie by a kind of sacrilege. Forgive me, all timid and scrupulous souls! But I hold that in history everything should be sacrificed to truth — that it must be always spoken, on every subject, and in its full integrity. The lying panegyric, where truth is sacrificed merely by leaving out what is true, is quite as repugnant to me as the invectives of calumny.

I have therefore sought with conscientious care for evidences of all the abuses and disorders which could exist in English monasteries, and especially in nunneries. If I have found almost nothing, it is not for want of having thoroughly searched through the historians and other writers of the time. I may then venture to conclude that evil, which is inseparable from everything human, has left fewer traces in the Anglo-Saxon cloisters than elsewhere.

I hesitate to insist with the same severity which was shown by the pontiffs and doctors of the time on the first of their complaints against the Anglo-Saxon communities, the excessive liking for rich and fine stuffs, in which certain nuns loved to dress themselves after having made them. These wonders of the distaff and broidery-needle, as they were used in the English cloisters, excited not only the anxiety but the indignation of the masters of spiritual life. Bede found nothing more serious to note in the transgressions which were to draw down the wrath of heaven upon Coldingham.¹⁵⁵ Boniface, when he became archbishop and pontifical legate in Germany, did not hesitate to indicate this as one of the greatest dangers of monastic life.¹⁵⁶ Aldhelm exerts all his rhetoric to preserve his friends at Barking from the revolting luxury displayed by the clergy of both sexes in their vestments, and especially dress.

Luxury in

¹⁵⁵ "Texendis subtilioribus indumentis operam dant, quibus at seipsas ad vicem sponsarum in periculum sui status adornant, aut externorum sibi viro-rum amicitiam comparent. Unde merito . . . de cælo vindicta flammis sævientibus præparata est." — Hist. Eccl., iv. 25.

¹⁵⁶ "Ut clericos et sanctimoniales de tenuitate et pompa vestium argueret." — GUILL. MALMESB., c. 82, p. 115. See above the text of the letter.

by the abbesses and nuns, who wore scarlet and violet tunics, hoods and cuffs trimmed with furs and silk; who curled their hair with a hot iron all round their foreheads; who changed their veil into an ornament, arranging it in such a way as to make it fall to their feet; and who, finally, sharpened and bent their nails so as to make them like the claws of falcons and other birds of prey, destined by nature to chase the vermin upon which they feed.¹⁵⁷

The Council of Cloveshove, however, justified these accusations by ordaining the monks and nuns 747. to keep to the costume of their predecessors, and in particular to recall to their minds the simple and pure dress which they put on in the day of their profession, that they might no longer resemble by a too gay exterior the women of the world.¹⁵⁸

Let us pass on to facts of a graver nature. Do we not meet on our path some of those disorders which, in modern times, the religious orders have been accused of as unpardonable crimes? Has compulsion never been employed to impose monastic life upon the young Anglo-Saxons? I am led to suppose that such a thing must sometimes have occurred when I read in the Penitentiary of Archbishop Theodore that daughters whom their parents had compelled to become nuns should be exempted from all punishment, even spiritual, if they married afterwards.¹⁵⁹

Was the virginal modesty of these brides of the Lord, which the Anglo-Saxons surrounded by so much national and popular veneration, always re- Attempts on the modesty of nuns. spected by those who occupied the first rank in the newly-converted nations, and for that reason ought to have shown them an example?

I am obliged to admit that this was not the case. Contemporary documents of unquestionable authority prove that more than one Anglo-Saxon king seems to have taken special pleasure in seeking his prey among the virgins consecrated to God.¹⁶⁰ It is probable that the princes and nobles followed but too often the example of the kings. Besides divers incidents which have retained a place in history, the many provisions of the penal laws under the Anglo-Saxon and Anglo-Norman kings, from Alfred to Henry I., against the rape of nuns — even when followed by subsequent marriage — and other outrages to their modesty, prove that such crimes were sufficiently well known to exact habitual and energetic repression.¹⁶¹ It is but too easy to imagine the fascination with which men still half barbarians must have been attracted towards the crowds of young girls, often beautiful and of high lineage, always pure, well educated, and trained in the utmost delicacy to which civilization then reached, who were gathered together in the spiritual fortresses which might guard them against the temptations of secular life, but were ineffectual to protect them from the assaults of the great ones of this earth, traditionally accustomed to sacrifice everything to the gratification of their passions.

¹⁵⁷ "Subucula bissina, sive hyacinthea, tunica coccinea capitum et manica sericis clavate calliculae rubricatis pellibus ambiuntur, anticae frontis et temporum cicini calamistro crispantur, pulla capitis velamina candidis et coloratis mafortibus cedunt, quae vittarum nexibus assutae talo tenus prolixius dependunt, unguis ritu falconum et accipitrum, seu certe cavannarum (sic) quos naturaliter ingenita edendi necessitas instigat, obunca pedum fuscicula et rapae ungularum arpegine alites et sorices crudeliter insectando grassari." — De Laudibus Virginit., c. 58. Cf. c. 17 and 56.

¹⁵⁸ "Non debent iterum habere indumenta saecularia, et ornatis et nitidis vestibus incedere, quibus laicae puellae uti solent." — Can. 28, ap. COLETTI, vol. viii. p. 331.

¹⁵⁹ "Puellae quae non parentum coactae imperio, sed spontaneo iudicio, virginitatis propositum atque habitum susceperunt, si postea nuptias diligunt, praevarecantur, etiamsi consecratio non accesserit." — Liber Penitentialis, c. xvi. § 24, ap. THORPE, p. 282.

Still more surprising and afflicting are the decrees given by the principal spiritual legislators of the country, the great archbishops, Theodore of Canterbury and Egbert of York, which foresee and punish transgressions of cloistral continence in which violence could have no part, and which lead us to suppose that such crimes might be committed even by those whose duty it was to watch over the purity of the ¹⁶⁰ See what is said above, quoting the epistles of St. Boniface, as to Osred, King of Northumbria, and Ceolred and Ethelbald, Kings of Mercia.

¹⁶¹ The laws of Alfred foresaw and punished offences against the purity of nuns by the following regulations: —

“§ 8. De concubitu nunne. Qui duxerit sanctimoniale ab ecclesia, sine licentia regis aut episcopi, amende de 120 sols;” half to the king, half to the bishop, “et ipsius ecclesiæ domino ejus monacha fuit.” If she survives him “qui eam abduxit, nihil de pecunia ejus habeat.” If she has a child “nihil inde habeat infans, sicut nec mater ejus.”

“§ 18. Si quis nunnam, causa fornicationis, in vestes aut in sinum, sine licentia comprehendat, sit hoc duplo amendabile, sicut antea de laica decrevimus.” — Ap. THORPE, pp. 32, 34, fol. ed.

The same offence is punished by section 4 of King Edmond's ecclesiastical laws (940-946) by deprivation of Christian burial, “unless he make bot, no more than a man-slayer.”

Art. 39 of the laws of the Council of Enham under Ethelred says, “If any one defile a nun, let him make bot deeply before God and the world.” The law of Henry I., art. 73, de nunne concubitu, orders the culprit to go to Rome: “adeat Papam et consilium ejus scire faciat.”

sanctuary — those whose sacred character ought to have imposed upon them the strongest of all restraints — by priests and even bishops.¹⁶² Let us state, however, that, at least during the period of which we have spoken, history reports no known incident which gives support to the humiliating provisions of the law; and we may add that Archbishop Theodore might have brought from his Eastern home the fear or recollection of certain excesses and corruptions which were strange to the character and habits of the northern nations, and have given them a place in his laws under the form of useful warnings. We should run the risk of falling into injustice and absurdity did we draw from such and such a provision of the penal code the conclusion that crimes thus stigmatized and punished were habitually committed by the nation which by its laws protested against them.¹⁶³

Impartiality, besides, requires us to remind our readers of all that has been already said in respect to the abuses that had crept into the monastic order from the time of Bede; upon the false monasteries which were nothing but lands worked to the profit of lay donors, ridiculously tricked out in the title of abbot; and upon the false monks and nuns who inhabited these contraband monasteries, and lived there in every kind of disorder.¹⁶⁴ To these pretenders, who, notwithstanding their known character, bore nevertheless the ¹⁶² The Liber Pœnitentialis of Theodore (chap. xvi.) provides for the case where a layman “fornicationem iniretur cum multis . . . sanetimonialibus, ita ut etiam numerum nesciat,” and condemns the culprit to ten years’ fasting, three on bread and water. Chap. xviii., De fornicatione clericorum, gives twelve years of penance to a guilty bishop, ten to a priest, eight to a monk or deacon, five to a clerk. The nun is equally punished. If there are children, the penance is prolonged to fifteen, twelve, ten, eight, and six years.

The married layman “maculans se cum ancilla Dei:” six years, two with bread and water; seven years if he has a child; five if he is not married. His companion in guilt the same.

“§ 20. Si quis monacham quam ancillam Dei appellant, in conjugio duxerit, anathema sit.” — AP. THORPE, pp. 282, 283.

“Monachus vel puella consecrata, si fornicati fuerint, septem annos jejument.” — ECGBERTI, Arch. Ebor., Confessionale, art. 13. Cf. ECGBERTI, Exceptiones, No. 134 and 136.

¹⁶³ What, for example, would be thought of an historian who from the text of art. 310 of our Penal Code concluded that the offence it punishes was common in France?

¹⁶⁴ We may here recall the passage already partially quoted: “Quod enim turpe est dicere, tot sub nomine monasteriorum loca (sic) hi qui monachicæ vitæ prorsus sunt expertes in suam ditionem acceperunt. . . . Vel majore scelere atque impudentia, qui propositum castitatis non habent, luxuriæ ac fornicationi deserviant, neque ab ipsis sacratis Deo virginibus abstineant.” — BEDÆ Epist. ad Ecgbert., c. 6.

title of monachi or sanctimoniales, are no doubt to be most generally imputed the excesses assailed in the ordinances of the English metropolitans and by the letters of St. Boniface; and let us hope that the accusation conveyed in the terrible and untranslatable words of his letter to the king of Mercia, "Ille meretrices, sive monasteriales sive sæculares,"¹⁶⁵ may be referred to the same class. Finally, it may be added that the great apostle, who was inspired at once by love of religion and desire for the honor of his country, spoke only by hearsay; that his most violent accusations are tempered by expressions of doubt; and that he never himself complained on his own authority of anything he had personally known or seen before his departure for Germany, but only what had been carried to him by report, more or less well founded, during the course of his mission in Germany.

V.

The letters of St. Boniface and his correspondents contain the most authentic information upon the state of souls in the Anglo-Saxon cloisters.

The correspondence of St. Boniface, which is a precious and unique mine¹⁶⁶ of information as to the ideas and institutions of the Teutonic races at their entrance into Christianity, reveals to us besides, in many aspects, the spirit which reigned in the cloisters inhabited by Anglo-Saxon nuns. Before as well as after his apostolic career in Germany, Winefred, the most illustrious monk in Essex, kept up frequent and intimate intercourse with the most distinguished nuns of his country. The letters which he wrote to them, and those which he received from them, acquired a double interest after his departure for the yet unexplored regions in which martyrdom awaited him. Only a very small number of them remains to us; but the ¹⁶⁵ Epistola S. BONIFACII, No. 59, ed. Jaffé, p. 175. He says also, in a letter to Archbishop Egbert of York: "Inauditum enim malum est præteritis sæculis et in triplo vel quadruplo sodomitanam luxuriam vincens, ut gens Christiana . . . despicat legitima matrimonia . . . et nefanda stupra consecratarum et velatarum feminarum sequatur."—Ibid., No. 61.

¹⁶⁶ It may be remarked that the usefulness of this collection is greatly lessened by the mania of each of its editors (Wurdwein in 1789, Giles in 1844, and Migne in 1863), subsequent to the first publication by Serrarius in 1605, for changing the order and numbering of the Epistles. We have adopted the numbers given in the last and extremely correct edition by Jaffé (Monumenta Moguntina, in Bibliotheca Rerum Germanicarum, vol. iii., Berolini, 1866), who thinks he has succeeded in introducing a certain chronological order entirely wanting in the older editions.

few which have been preserved suffice to afford us a glimpse of what was passing in the souls of these generous, intelligent, and impassioned women, whose life was passed in the shadow of monasteries, and among whom the great missionary found not only devoted sympathy, but the most active and useful assistants.

It is evident, in the first place, from this picture, that all was not happiness and gentleness in the cloister. We are all apt to exaggerate both in the past and present the peace and serenity of religious life amid the storms either of the ancient world, so violent, warlike, and unsettled, or of modern society, so frivolous in its emotions, so servile, and so changeable in its servility. We are right to look upon the cloister as a nest suspended amid the branches of a great tree shaken by the winds, or like the inner chamber of a vessel beaten by the waves. It is in the midst of the storm, yet in it there is shelter; a refuge always threatened, always fragile, always perishable, but still a refuge. Outside is the noise of the waves, the rain, and the thunder; at every moment destruction is possible, or even near. But in the mean time the soul is safe; it is calm, protected, preserved, and sails on with humble confidence towards the port. Such a joy is sufficiently tempered by the sense of insecurity to be safe from becoming in itself a danger, a temptation to laxity or to pride.

But in this nest and in this bark, preserved from external tempests, how many storms and perils and sunken rocks are within! Even in the midst of the most peaceful and best regulated community, what a trial is there in the daily death of individual will! in the long hours of obscurity and silence which succeed to the effort and impulse of sacrifice! and in the perpetual sacrifice, continually borne, continually renewed! A modern master of spiritual life has said, with severe clear-sightedness, "The continuity alone of the exercises, which, although varied, have always something in them that goes against human inclinations, from the moment that they are done by rule and for the service of God, becomes very fatiguing."¹⁶⁷ What a ray of pitiless light is thus thrown upon the weakness of the human heart! It accustoms itself to the rules, habits, and even to the most onerous obligations which have a purely earthly aim. But from the moment that it is a work for God, dislike appears. The difficulty must be met and surmounted day by day. This is the great exertion, and also the infinite merit, of cloistral life.

¹⁶⁷ Notice of the Société de la Sainte-Retraite, commenced at Fontenelles, in the diocese of Besançon, 1787, by M. Receveur, p. 19 of the text corrected in 1791.

If this is the case even among our contemporaries, who have been so long fashioned by Christian education and discipline, what must have been the effect upon the Saxon maidens of the seventh and eighth centuries, sprung from a race still new and young in the ways of the Lord, and which was still so impetuous, so turbulent, so enamoured of its own strength, freedom, and untamed independence? To the material restraint, which, though voluntarily accepted, might well lie heavy upon them, were added other privations of which they had not perhaps calculated beforehand all the extent. Hence those restrained but incurable agitations, those cries of distress, those vague but ardent and impetuous desires, which break forth in the pages on which they poured out their hearts to the greatest and holiest of their countrymen.

It is to be regretted that these candid and eager souls had recourse to Latin to express their emotions and confidences. If they had employed their native idiom instead of a language which, though not dead, since it is the language of spiritual life, must have cost them many efforts ere they became familiar with it, we should no doubt have seen their thoughts flow forth more freely, precipitating themselves in tumultuous waves, in abrupt movements, bearing the characteristic mark of a powerful and impassioned originality, like the verse of Ceadmon or the poem of Beowulf. Even under the artificial constraint imposed upon them by the use of Latin, the reader feels the swelling life and force of an original, sincere, and vehement nature.

The most striking peculiarity of these letters, in which unpractised hands reveal, in Latin more or less classical, and in superlatives more or less elegant, the agitations of their hearts, is the necessity they feel to express the tenderness, we might even say the passion, which animates them. The intensity of the affection which united some of them to each other, may be imagined from the tender enthusiasm of language with which they address the monk who has gained their confidence. Here is an example taken from a letter written to Winefred, after the first success of his mission in Germany, by the Abbess Bugga, who is supposed to have been the daughter of a king of Wessex, and who was con-

Impassioned letters written by the nuns.

sequently of the same race as her illustrious correspondent.¹⁶⁸

"I do not cease to thank God for all that I have learned by your blessed letter; that He has led you mercifully through so many unknown countries; that He has favorably inclined towards you the heart of the Pontiff of glorious Rome; that He has cast down before you the enemy of the Catholic Church, Radbod the Frisian. But I declare to you that no revolution of time, no human vicissitude, can change the state of my mind towards you, nor turn it from loving you as I am resolved. The fervor of love so inspires me, that I am profoundly convinced of arriving at certain repose by your prayers. I renew, then, my entreaties to you to intercede in favor of my lowliness with the Lord. I have not yet been able to obtain the Passions of the Martyrs, which you ask me for. I will get them as soon as I can. But you, dearest, send me, for my consolation, that collection of Extracts from the Holy Scriptures which you have promised me in your sweet letter. I beseech you to offer the oblation of the holy mass for one of my relations, called N., whom I loved above all. I send you by the bearer of these lines fifty sols and an altar-cloth; I have not been able to procure anything better. It is a little gift, but is offered you with great love."¹⁶⁹

Boniface and the companions of his mission were not less affectionate and unreserved in their epistolary communications with their sisters in religion. He wrote to those whom he hoped to draw to his aid, and associate with himself in his apostolic work, as follows: "To my venerable, estimable, and dearest sisters, Leobgitha, Thekla, and Cynegilda, and to all the other sisters who dwell with you, and ought to be loved like you, in Jesus Christ, the salutations of an eternal affection. I conjure and enjoin you to continue to do what you

Answers not less affectionate of Boniface and his companions.

¹⁶⁸ There are two, if not three, nuns of the name of Bugga, among Boniface's correspondents. We agree with the editor of Notes on the monastic tombs discovered at Hackness, p. 35, that the one here alluded to is the same whose ecclesiastical buildings are celebrated in the poem by St. Aldhelm (Migne, Patrology, vol. lxxxix. p. 289), and to whom St. Boniface wrote his letter 86, ed. Jaffé, commencing, "O soror carissima."

¹⁶⁹ "Venerando Dei famulo . . . Bonifacio sive Wynfritho dignissimo Dei presbytero Bugga vilis vernacula, perpetuæ caritatis salutem. . . . Eo magis confiteor, quod nulla varietas temporalium vicissitudinum statum mentis meæ inclinare queat. . . . Sed ardentius vis amoris in me calescit, dum pro certo cognosco. . . . Et tu, mi carissimus (sic), dirige meæ parvitati ad consolationem, quod per dulcissimas litteras tuas promisisti." — Epist. 16.

have done in the past, and must do always, that is, pray God, who is the refuge of the poor and the hope of the humble, to deliver me from my necessities and temptations, I who am the last and least of all to whom the Church of Rome has intrusted the preaching of the Gospel. Implore for me the mercy of God that, at the day when the wolf comes, I may not fly like an hireling, but that I may follow the example of the good Shepherd, and bravely defend the sheep and the lambs, that is to say, the Catholic Church with its sons and daughters, against heretics, schismatics, and hypocrites. On your side, in these evil days, be not imprudent. Seek with intelligence to know the will of God. Act manfully with the strength given you by faith, but do all with charity and patience. Remember the Apostles and Prophets who have suffered so much, and received an eternal recompense." ¹⁷⁰

A still more tender confidence seems to inspire him when he writes to the abbesses of the great English communities, and especially to Eadburga, who was to succeed St. Mildred in the government of the monastery founded by her mother upon the shore where St. Augustin landed.¹⁷¹ He calls her "blessed virgin and beloved lady, accomplished mistress of the monastic rule."¹⁷² He entreats her to pray for him while he is beaten about by all the storms which he must brave in the midst of heathens, false Christians, false priests, and licentious clerks.¹⁷³ "Do not be displeased that I always ask the same thing. I must ask often for that which I desire incessantly. My troubles are daily, and each day thus warns me to seek the spiritual consolations of my brethren and sisters." ¹⁷⁴

As his task becomes more laborious his heart has more and more occasion to pour itself forth to his old friend. "To ¹⁷⁰ "Venerandis et amandis carissimis sororibus . . . æterne caritatis salutem obsecro et præcipio quasi filiabus carissimis. . . . Quia ultimus et pessimus sum omnium legatorum." — Ep. 91.

¹⁷¹ See above, p. 383. The Abbess Eadburga only died in 751, four years before St. Boniface. He corresponded with her as well as with the Abbess of Barking before his departure for Germany.

¹⁷² "Beatissimæ virgini immo dilectissimæ dominæ Eadburge, monasticæ normulæ conversationis emeritæ." — Ep. 10.

¹⁷³ Epist. 87, ed. Jaffé; 27, ed. Serrarius. The latter concludes, from certain passages, that this letter must have been addressed to Eadburga, although it bears no name, and says simply: "Reverendissimæ ac dilectissimæ ancillæ Christi N."

¹⁷⁴ "Rogo ut non indignemini . . . quia cotidiana tribulatio divina solamina fratrum ac sororum me quærere admonet." — Ep. 87, ed. Jaffé.

my beloved sister, the Abbess Eadburga, long interwoven with my soul by the ties of spiritual relationship. To my sister Eadburga, whom I clasp with the golden links of spiritual love, and whom I embrace with the divine and virgin kiss of charity, Boniface, bishop, legate of the Roman Church, servant of the servants of God. . . . Know that for my sins' sake the course of my pilgrimage is through storms; suffering and sadness are everywhere around me; and the saddest of all is the snare laid by false brethren, which is worse than the malice of the unbelievers. Pray, then, to the Lamb of God, the only defender of my life, to protect me amidst all these wolves. . . . Pray also for these heathens who have been intrusted to us by the Apostolic See, that God, who desires all men to be saved and come to a knowledge of the truth, may deign to wrest them from idolatry and add them to our mother the Catholic Church. May the eternal rewarder of every good action make thee to triumph for ever in the glorious company of angels, my beloved sister, who by sending a copy of the Holy Scriptures hast consoled the poor exile in Germany. The man who has to penetrate into the darkest corners of these nations, cannot but fall into the snares of death, if he has not the word of God to light his steps. Pray, pray always, that He who from the highest heaven looks upon all that is humblest here below, may pardon me my sins, and grant to me when I open my mouth the eloquence that is needed to make the Gospel of the glory of Christ run and shine like a flame among the heathen nations." ¹⁷⁵

He wrote with not less effusion and tenderness to the Abbess Bugga,¹⁷⁶ who, overwhelmed with trials in the gov-

¹⁷⁵ "Dilectissimæ sorori et jamdudum spiritalis clientelæ propinquitæ connexæ. . . . Aureo spiritalis amoris vinculo amplectendæ et divino ac virgineo caritatis osculo stringendo sorori Eadburgæ abbatissæ. . . . Undique labor, undique mœror. . . . Carissimam sororem remunerator æternus . . . lætificet . . . quæ, sanctorum librorum munera transmittendo, exulem Germanicum . . . consolata est. . . . Qui tenebrosos angulos Germanicarum gentium lustrare debet."—Epist. 73, 75, ed. Jaffé. "Ut præstet mihi verbum in apertione oris mei" (Ephes. vi. 19); "ut currat et clarificetur inter gentes Evangelium gloriæ Christi" (2 Thessal. iii. 1).

¹⁷⁶ This Bugga was also called Eadburga. Could she be, as has been often supposed, the Heaburg cognomento Bugga who figures in the title of Epistle 14 ed. Jaffé, 38 ed. Serrarius, 30 ed. Giles? Nothing, it appears to us, can be more doubtful, but we have neither time nor power to discuss a question in itself so unimportant. The Anglo-Saxon custom of having two names, which we have already met with in the cases of Domneva or Ermenberga, foundress of Minster, and Winefrid or Boniface, &c., adds to the diffi-

ernment of her double monastery, had sought comfort from him, and who was anxious to complete her life by a pilgrimage to Rome. "To my beloved lady, the sister whom I love in the love of Christ, more than all other women, the humble Boniface, unworthy bishop. . . . Ah, dearest sister, since the fear of God and the love of travel have put between us so many lands and seas, I have learned from many, what storms of trouble have assailed your old age. I am deeply grieved to hear it, and lament that, after having put aside the chief cares of the government of your monasteries, out of love for a life of contemplation, you should have met with crosses still more frequent and more painful. I write thus, venerable sister, full of compassion for your griefs, and full also of the recollections of your kindness and of our ancient friendship, to exhort and console you as a brother. . . . I would that you were always joyful and happy in that hope of which the Apostle speaks, which is born of trial and never deceives. I would that you should despise with all your strength these worldly troubles as the soldiers of Christ of both sexes have always despised them. . . . In the spring-time of your youth, the father and lover of your chaste virginity called you to Him with the irresistible accent of fatherly love; and it is He who, now that you are old, would increase the beauty of your soul by so many labors and trials. Meet, then, dearest friend, the sufferings of heart and body with the buckler of faith and patience, that you may complete in your beautiful old age the work commenced in the flower of your youth. At the same time, I entreat you, remember your ancient promise, and do not cease to pray the Lord that He may deliver my soul from all peril. . . . Farewell, and be sure that the faith which we have sworn to each other will never fail." ¹⁷⁷ culty and confusion, sometimes completely inextricable, of all researches into the history of the early Anglo-Saxon Church.

¹⁷⁷ "O soror carissima, postquam nos timor Christi et amor peregrinationis longa et lata terrarum ac maris intercapedine separavit. . . . Nunc autem . . . beneficiorum tuorum et antiquarum amicitiarum memor." — Epist. 86, ed. Jaffé. "Quia omnes milites Christi utriusque sexus tempestates et tribulationes infirmitatesque hujus sæculi despexerunt. . . . Qui pater et amator castæ virginitatis tuæ, qui te primevo tempore juventutis tuæ. . . . Ut quod in bona juventute cœpisti, in senectute bella ad gloriam Dei perficias. . . . Domina dilectissimæ et in amore Christi omnibus ceteris feminini sexus præferendæ sorori. . . . Bonifacius exiguus. . . . Fidem antiquam inter nos nunquam deficere scias." — Epist. 86, 88, ed. Jaffé.

This Abbess Bugga, who must not be confounded with the one quoted

As to the project of the pilgrimage to Rome, he will not pronounce either for or against it, but he begs her to wait the advice sent to her from Rome by their common friend, an abbess named Wethburga, who had gone there to seek that peace of contemplative life for which Bugga sighed, but had found only storms, rebellions, and the threat of a Saracenic invasion.¹⁷⁸

The Anglo-Saxon monks who had accompanied the future martyr in his apostolic mission, rivalled their chief in the warmth of their expressions in their letters to their cloistered sisters. Lullius, who was to replace Boniface in the archiepiscopal see of Mayence, wrote along with two of his companions to the Abbess Cuneburga, a daughter of one of the Anglo-Saxon dynasties, telling her that she occupied the first place above all other women in the innermost sanctuary of their hearts.¹⁷⁹ The same Lullius wrote to the Abbess Eadburga, who was so dear to his master, begging her not to refuse him the sweetness of receiving letters from her, and to assure her that the spiritual brotherhood which united them made him capable of doing anything to please her.¹⁸⁰ There still remains to be quoted a letter from an anonymous monk to a nun equally unknown, which has had the honor of being preserved through all these ages, along with the letters of St. Boniface; a fact at which we rejoice, for it throws a pleasing light upon the tender and simple emotions which filled those honest, humble, and fervent hearts by whom Germany was won to the faith of Jesus Christ: — "N., unworthy of a truly close affection, to N., greeting and happiness in the Lord: Beloved sister, though the vast extent of the seas separate us a little, I am daily your neighbor in my memory. I entreat you not to forget the words that we have exchanged, and what we promised each other the day of my departure. I salute you, dearest; above, survived Boniface; she is mentioned as honorabilis abbatissa in a letter of the Archbishop of Canterbury to the successor of Boniface (Ep. 113, ed. Jaffé). She is probably the same who made a pilgrimage to Rome, and who will be spoken of farther on.

¹⁷⁸ Epist. 88, ed. Jaffé.

¹⁷⁹ "Dominae dilectissimæ Christique religiosissimæ abbatissæ, regalîs sapiæ generositate præditæ. . . . Agnoscere cupimus almitatis tuæ clementiam, quia te præ cæteris cunctis feminini sexus in cordis cubiculo cingimus amore." — Epist. 41, ed. Jaffé.

¹⁸⁰ "Et si quid mihi . . . imperare volueris, scit caritas ille quæ inter nos est copulata spiritali germanitate, id meam parvitatem totis nisibus implere velle. Interea rogo ut mihi litteras tuæ dulcedinis destinare non deneges." — Epist. 75, ed. Jaffé.

live long, live happy, praying for me. I write you these lines not to impose my wishes arrogantly upon you, but humbly to ask for yours, as if you were my own sister, did I possess one." ¹⁸¹

Tender and confidential as was the tone of the letters which arrived from Germany in the Anglo-Saxon cloisters, there seems to be something still more warm and intimate in the fragments which remain to us of those which were written in the cells of Winbourn, Minster, and many other monasteries, and which were sent from thence whenever a sure messenger presented himself, along with presents of books, vestments, spices, sacred linen, &c., to the monks engaged beyond the sea in the great work of the Teutonic missions.

One continually apparent feature in them, which we have already remarked, is an eager and unconquerable desire to travel, to go to Rome, notwithstanding the numerous and formidable obstacles which stood in the way of the pilgrimage, and the dangers of every kind to which women were exposed in undertaking it—dangers which Boniface and his companions had energetically pointed out. The last trace which remains to us of the exemplary activity of the illustrious Elfreda, Abbess of Whitby, who died in 714, after sixty years of monastic life, is a letter of recommendation addressed to the daughter of the king of Austrasia, who was abbess of a monastery near Treves, in favor of an English nun, whom she calls her daughter, as she had educated her from her youth; she had detained her as long as she could for the good of souls, but at last had permitted her to satisfy her ardent desire of visiting the tombs of St. Peter and St. Paul.¹⁸² One of the chief friends of St. Boniface, the Ab-

¹⁸¹ "Intimæ dilectionis amore quamvis indignus. . . . Amantissima soror, licet longuscula alta marium æqualitate distam. . . . Sis memor, carissima, verborum nostrorum, quæ pariter pepigimus, quando profectus fueram. . . . Vale, vivens ævo longiore et vita feliciore, interpellans pro me. Hæc pauca ad te scripsi, non arroganter mea commendans, sed humiliter tua deposcens seu . . . propriæ germanæ nuper nactæ. Vale." — Epist. 139, ed. Jaffé. This interesting production is unfortunately followed by an effusion in Latin verse much less admirable:—

"Vale, Christi virguncula, Christi nempe tiruncula,

4 Mihi cara magnopere atque gnara in opere," &c.

Cf. 96 and 97 of the same collection. Let us add that the same simple and tender familiarity between monks and nuns is found, five centuries after our Anglo-Saxons, in the interesting collection of letters from B. Jourdain de Saxe, second general of the Dominicans, to the nuns of St. Agnes of Bologna and to the B. Diana, their foundress, recently published by Père Bayonne, Paris and Lyons, Bauchu, 1865.

¹⁸² Epist. 8, ed. Jaffé.

bess Bugga, who must not be confounded with her whom we have just mentioned, had not only the strength and privilege of accomplishing that journey, but also the happiness of meeting him at Rome, from whence she returned safe to resume the government of her community.¹⁸³

The three Buggas and the two Eadburgas.

A third Bugga, who is also called Eadburga, eagerly entertained the same desire, and expressed it in a long letter written to Boniface, jointly with her mother Eangytha, who was abbess of the monastery in which both lived. What was this monastery? Its situation is not ascertained, but it is probable that it was either Whitby or Hartlepool, or some other house situated on the rocks which overlook the Northern Sea: so entirely do the images employed both by the mother and daughter reveal a life accustomed to the emotions of a sea-shore. Both of them, while consulting him on their project, open their heart to him, and tell him of their trials; and through their abrupt and incoherent style and faulty Latin thus afford us a glimpse of the agitations and miseries which too often trouble the peace and light of the cloister. "Loving brother," they write, "brother in the spirit rather than in the flesh, and enriched by the gifts of the spirit, in these pages, which you see bathed by our tears, we come to confide to you alone, and with God alone for a witness, that we are overwhelmed by the troubles accumulated upon us, and by the tumult of secular affairs. When the foaming and stormy waves of the sea break against the rocks on the shore, when the breath of the furious winds has roused the breadth of ocean, as the keel of the boats is seen in the air, and the masts under water, so the boat of our souls is driven about by a whirlwind of griefs and calamities. We are in the house which is spoken of in the Gospel: 'The rain descended, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house.' (Matth. vii. 25, 27). What afflicts us above all is the recollection of our innumerable sins, and the absence of any really complete good work. And besides the care of our own souls, we must bear, which is harder still, that of all the souls of every age and of both sexes which have been confided to us, and of which we must render an account before the judgment-seat of Christ, not only of their actions, but also of their thoughts, which are known to God alone! To which must be added the daily toil of our domestic affairs, the discussion of all the quarrels which the enemy of every good takes pleasure in sowing among men in general, and especially among monks and in monasteries. And besides, we are tormented by our poverty, by the small size of our cultivated lands, and more still by the enmity of the king, who listens to all the accusations made against us by the envious; by the taxes laid on us for the service of the king, his queen, the bishop, the earl, and their satellites and servants,—things which would take too much space to enumerate, and are more easily imagined than described. To all these distresses must be added the loss of our friends and relations, who formed almost a tribe, and of whom none remain. We have neither son, brother, father, nor uncle: we have no more than an only daughter, deprived of everything she loved in the world except her mother, who is very old, and a son of her brother, who is also unfortunate, though without any fault of his, because the king hates our family. There remains, therefore, not one person in whom we can put our trust. God has taken all from us by different means. Some are dead in their country, and wait in their dark graves the day of the resurrection and the last judgment, the day when envy shall be overcome and consumed, and all mourning and pain shall disappear from the presence of the elect. Others have left their native shore to confide themselves to the plains of ocean, and to visit the tombs of the apostles and martyrs. For all these reasons, and for others which could not be told in a day, not even one of the long days of July or August, our life is a burden to us.

¹⁸³ See the curious and interesting letter of Ethelbert II., King of Kent, to Boniface, to which we shall return later (Epist. 103, ed. Jaffé; 73 ed. Giles). It will there be seen that this Bugga was of the race of the Ascs: "Utpote consanguinitate propinquitatis nostræ admonita."

“Every being that is unhappy, and has lost confidence in himself, seeks a faithful friend to whom he can open his heart and pour forth all its secrets. Ah! how true is what they say, that nothing can be sweeter than to have some one to whom we can speak of everything as to ourselves. Now, we have sought for that faithful friend in whom we could have more confidence than in ourselves; who should regard our pains and distresses as his own; who should pity all our evils, and console them by his salutary counsels. Yes, we have sought him long. And at last we hope to have found in you this friend whom we have so long desired and eagerly hoped for.

“Oh that God would deign to carry us in the arms of His angel, as He did of old the prophet Habakkuk and the deacon Philip, into the far countries where you travel, and make us to hear the living word from your mouth, which would be sweeter to us than honey! But, since we do not deserve this, and that we are separated by land and sea, we will nevertheless use our confidence in you, brother Boniface, to tell you that for a long time we have desired, like so many of our kinsmen and friends, to visit that Rome which was once mistress of the world, to obtain the pardon of our sins. I above all, Eangytha, who am old, and consequently have more sins than others, I have this desire. I confided my plan formerly to Wala, who was then my abbess and spiritual mother, and to my daughter, who was then very young. But we know that there are many who disapprove our intention, because the canons enjoin that each should remain where she has made her vow, and give account of that vow to God. Troubled by this doubt, we pray you, both of us, to be our Aaron, and to present our prayers to God, that by your mediation He may show us what will be most useful for us, to remain at home, or to go on this holy pilgrimage. We entreat you to answer what we have written to you in a style so rustic and unpolished. We have no trust in those who glorify themselves in the sight of man, but we have much trust in your faith and charity to God and your neighbors. . . . Farewell, spiritual brother, faithful, amiable, and beloved with a pure and sincere love. . . . A friend is long sought, rarely found, and still more rarely preserved. Farewell; pray that our sins may not bring us misfortune.”¹⁸⁴ ¹⁸⁴ “Amantissime frater, spiritualis magis quam carnalis, et spiritualium gratiarum munificentia magnificatus, tibi soli indicare volumus et Deus solus testis est nobis, quas cernis interlitas lacrymis. . . . Tanquam spumosi maris vortices verrunt et vellunt undarum cumulos, conlisos saxis, quando ventorum violentia et procellarum tempestates sævissime enormum euripum impellunt et cymbarum carinæ sursum immutate et malus navis deorsum duratur, haut secus animarum nostrarum naviculæ. . . . Quas seminat omnium bonorum invisor; qui . . . inter omnes homines spargit, maxime per monasticos et monachorum contubernia. . . . Angit præterea paupertas et penuria rerum temporalium et angustia cespitis ruris nostris; et infestatio regalis. . . . Et ut dicitur, quid dulcius est quam habeas illum cum quo omnia possis loqui ut tecum? . . . Din quæsimus. Et confidimus quia invenimus in te illum amicum, quem cupivimus, et optavimus et speravimus. . . . Vale, frater spiritualis fidelissime atque amantissime et sincera et pura dilectione dilecte; . . . Amicus din quæritur, vix invenitur, difficile servatur.” — Epist. 14, ed. Jaffé. We have already quoted a letter in which Boniface replies to an Abbess Bugga on the subject of a pilgrimage to Rome (Epist. 88, ed. Jaffé). I do not think that this reply belongs to the letter I am about to quote, because it says nothing of the mother Eangytha, and because it is filled with various subjects of which there is no question in the letter of the mother and daughter.

The beginning of the friendship between Lioba and Boniface.

Let us now turn to the beautiful and learned Lioba (die Liebe, the beloved), and observe the means she took while still very young, from her convent at Winbourne, to make herself known to the great man who afterwards called her to his aid to introduce the light of the Gospel and monastic life among the German nations : —

“ To the very reverend lord and bishop Boniface, beloved in Christ, his kinswoman Leobgytha,¹⁸⁵ the last of the servants of God, health and eternal salvation. I pray your clemency to deign to recollect the friendship which united you to my father Tinne, an inhabitant of Wessex, who departed from this world eight years ago, that you may pray for the repose of his soul. I also recommend to you my mother Ebba, your kinswoman, as you know better than me, who still lives in great suffering, and has been for long overwhelmed with her infirmities. I am their only daughter; and God grant, unworthy as I am, that I might have the honor of having you for my brother, for no man of our kindred inspires me with the same confidence as you do. I have taken care to send you this little present, not that I think it worthy your attention, but that you may remember my humbleness, and that, notwithstanding the distance of our dwellings, the tie of true love may unite us for the rest of our days. Excellent brother, what I ask you with earnestness is, that the buckler of your prayers may defend me from the poisoned arrows of the enemy. I beg of you also to excuse the rusticity of this letter, and that your courtesy will not refuse the few words of answer which I so much desire. You will find below some lines which I have attempted to compose according to the rules of poetic art, not from self-confidence, but to exercise the mind which God has given me, and to ask your counsel. I have learned all that I know from Eadburga,¹⁸⁶ my mistress, who gives herself to profound study of the divine law. Farewell: live a long and happy life; intercede for me.

“ May the Almighty Judge, who made the earth,
And glorious in His Father's kingdom reigns,

¹⁸⁵ She had also two names in Anglo-Saxon, Truthgeba and Leobgytha; but she received the surname of Lioba or Lieba, under which she is generally known, because, according to her biographer, she was beloved by every one. — ZELL, op. cit., p. 262.

¹⁸⁶ This, then, is a third Eadburga, who was mistress of of the novices at Winbourne, and must not be confounded either with Eadburga, Abbess of Thanet, or with Eadburga, surnamed Bugga, both of whom appear in St. Boniface's correspondence.

Preserve your chaste fire warm as at its birth,
Till time for you shall lose its rights and pains." ¹⁸⁷

Beside the celebrated Lioba, let us quote an unknown nun, who calls herself Cena the Unworthy — Pontifici Bonifacio Christi amatori Cene indigna — but who writes to the great apostle with a proud and original simplicity which goes to my heart, and which I thank the ancient compilers for having preserved along with the letters of the great apostle. "I confess, my dearest," she says, "that, seeing you too seldom with the eyes of my body, I cease not to look at you with the eyes of my heart. . . . And this I declare, that to the end of my life I shall always recollect you in my prayers. I entreat you, by our affection and our mutual faith, to be faithful to my littleness, as I shall be faithful to your greatness, and to help me by your prayers, that the Almighty may dispose of my life according to His will. If one of your people ever comes to this land, let him not disdain to have recourse to my poverty; and if I can render any service, either spiritual or temporal, to you or to others, I will do it with all my might to the great profit of my soul." ¹⁸⁸

This letter was addressed to Boniface, then a bishop, very probably by one of those whom he had transplanted from England into Germany.

Let us now listen to another Anglo-Saxon maid, a contemporary of his youth, Egburga, whom some suppose to have been that daughter of an East Anglian king who was the abbess and friend of St. Guthlac. ¹⁸⁹ She wrote to Boniface while he was still abbot of an English monastery, to confide to him her private griefs — "To the holy abbot and true friend, Winifred, full of knowledge and religion, Egburga, the last of his pupils, eternal greeting in the Lord. Since I have known the blessing of your affection, it has remained in my soul like an odor of incomparable sweetness. And though I may be henceforward deprived of your temporal presence, I do not cease

Egburga
the Desolate.

718-722.

¹⁸⁷ I reprint the translation from the excellent work of Ozanam, La Civilisation Chrétienne chez les Francs, p. 226, from which I shall have many other quotations to make if I am enabled to continue my work, and to relate the conquest of Germany by the Anglo-Saxon monks.

¹⁸⁸ "Jam fateor tibi, carissime . . . et hoc tibi notum facio, quod usque ad finem vitæ meæ te semper in meis orationibus recorder, et te rogo per creditam amicitiam ut meæ parvitati fidelis sis, sicut in te credo." — Epist. 94, ed. Jaffé.

¹⁸⁹ See p. 588 of this volume.

to embrace you as a sister. You were already my kind brother; you are now my father. Since death, bitter and cruel, has snatched from me my brother Oshere whom I loved more than anybody in the world, I prefer you to all other men. Neither night nor day passes that I do not recall your lessons. Believe me, for God is my witness, I love you with a supreme love. I am sure that you will never forget the friendship which united you to my brother. I am good for very little, and much inferior to him in worth and in knowledge; but I yield nothing to him in my affection for you. Time has passed since then; but the heavy cloud of sorrow has never left me. On the contrary, the longer I live the more I suffer. I have proved the truth of what is written, that the love of man brings grief, but the love of Christ lights the heart. My heart has received a new wound by the loss of my dearest sister Wethburga. She has suddenly disappeared from my side — she with whom I grew up, who has sucked the same milk, as I call Jesus to witness.”

Here the poor nun, no doubt desiring to show to her ancient master that she was not unworthy of his lessons, proceeds to quote Virgil: —

“Crudelis ubique
Luctus, ubique pavor, et plurima mortis imago.”¹⁹⁰

But she quotes wrongly without perceiving it, as has been the case with two or three terrible solecisms which occur in the preceding part of her letter.¹⁹¹ After which she continues: —

“I should have wished to die had God permitted it. But it is not cruel death, it is a separation still more cruel which has withdrawn us from each other; she to happiness, as I believe, but I to misfortune, since she has left me as a sort of pledge to the service of the world, while she whom I love so much is now shut up, according to what I hear, in I know not what prison in Rome.¹⁹² But the love of Christ which ¹⁹⁰ Æneid, ii. 369, 370.

¹⁹¹ “Ego autem licet sententia tardiora et meritis viliora illo sim, tamen erga tuæ caritatis obsequium dispar non sum.” I shall perhaps be reproached for lingering over these minutiae. Let it be so; all that relates to the history of the soul, especially in the cradle of the faith, attracts me irresistibly. What is more touching than these imperfections of style in a classic tongue from the pen of a half-civilized woman, who at all risks must express to the heart of a friend the emotions which fill her own?

¹⁹² “Me vero infelicem, quasi quoddam depositum, huic sæculo servire permisit, sciens enim quantum illam dilexi, quantum amavi, quam nunc, ut audio, Romana carcer includit.” — Epist. 13. The anonymous author of blossoms in her heart is stronger than all bonds. She will ascend the strait and narrow way, but I am left lying in the depths, enchained by the law of the flesh. In the day of judgment she will sing joyously with the Lord, 'I was in prison, and thou visitedst me.' You too, in that day, will sit where the twelve apostles sit, and will be proud, like a glorious chief, of having led before the tribunal of the eternal King so many souls won by your labors. But I in this valley of tears weep for my sins which have made me unworthy of such company.

"For this reason the seaman, beaten by the tempest, does not long to enter the port, nor do the parched fields thirst for rain, nor the mother wandering along the winding shore in the agonies of suspense await her son, with more anxiety than that I feel in my desire once more to enjoy your presence. My sins prevent it, and I am in despair. But, sinner as I am, prostrated at your feet, I implore you from the bottom of my heart—I cry to you from the ends of the earth—O blessed lord, that you will carry me to the height of the rock of your prayers, for you are my hope and my citadel against the enemy visible and invisible. To console my great grief, to calm the waves of my trouble, to give some support to my weakness, send me help, either in the form of holy relics or at least by words from your hand, however short, that I may always look at them as at yourself."¹⁹³

Thus we see how warm still were the natural affections in these impetuous hearts, without wronging the new bonds of friendship and fraternity which religious life, with its active and extended connections in the spiritual order, developed in

Notes on St. Hilda and St. Bega concludes from this passage that Egburga had succeeded her sister Wethburga as abbess, and that it is the latter who is alluded to in the letter to St. Boniface as being already fixed at Rome. This conjecture appears probable enough. The two sisters, with an elder one, all three daughters of a king of East Anglia, would thus have been successively abbesses of Hackness. See genealogical table ix., p. 576.

¹⁹³ "Abbate (sic) sancto veroque amico . . . Wynfrido Egberg ultima discipulorum seu discipularum tuarum. . . . Caritatis tuæ copulam fateor; ast dum per interiorum hominem gustavi, quasi quiddam mellitæ suavitatis meis visceribus hic sapor insidet. Et licet interim . . . ab aspectu corporali visualiter defraudata sim, sororis tamen semper amplexibus collum tuum constrinxero. . . . Crede mihi, Deo teste, quia summo te complector amore. . . . Sed . . . ut scriptum est: Amor hominis deducit dolorem, amor autem Christi illuminat cor. . . . Non sic tempestate jactatus nauta portum desiderat, non sic sitientia imbres arva desiderant, non sic curvo litore anxia filium mater expectat, quam ut ego visibus vestris fructu cupio. . . . Vel paucula saltem per scripta beatitudinis tuæ verba, ut in illis tuam presentiam semper habeam."—Epist. 13.

them. The invaluable collection of the Epistles of St. Boniface encloses several letters from Anglo-Saxon nuns to their brothers, always in Latin, and in very unclassical Latin, but all bearing the marks of tender and sincere affection. "To my only and beloved brother," writes one of these, who describes herself as the least of the servants of Christ. "How, dearest brother, can you make me wait for your coming so long? Do you never think that I am alone in the world? that no other brother, no other relation, comes to see me? You do this, perhaps, because I have not been able to do all I wished for your service; but how can you so forget the rights of charity and kindred? Oh, my brother, my dear brother, why do you thus by your absence fill with sadness my days and nights? Do you not know that no other living soul is more dear to me than you are? I cannot say in writing all that I would; and, besides, I feel that you have ceased to care for your poor little sister."¹⁹⁴

The name of the writer of these words is unknown; and the name, but nothing more, is known of another nun whose only brother was among the companions of Boniface. She would not be comforted for his absence, and poured out her sadness in writing to her brother with a poetic and pathetic voice which recalls the wail of St. Radegund, two centuries earlier, in her convent at Poitiers, when thinking of the troubles of her youth.¹⁹⁵ Our Anglo-Saxon nun also attempted to interpret in Latin verse the sorrows of her heart. But her verses are far from having the merit of those which Fortunatus placed at the service of the abbess-queen of St. Croix. Her prose is at once more correct and more touching. "To Balthard, my

Lament of a nun over her brother's absence.

¹⁹⁴ "Fratri unico atque amantissimo . . . N. H., ultima ancillarum Dei. . . . Quare non vis cogitare quod ego sola in hac terra? . . . O frater, o frater mi, cur potes mentem parvitatæ meæ assidue mœrore, fletu atque tristitia die noctuque caritatis tuæ absentia affligere? . . . Jam certum teneo, quod tibi cura non est de mea parvitate." — Epist. 144, ed. Jaffé.

¹⁹⁵ See vol. i. p. 489. M. Zell believes this Bertgytha to be the same as the nun of that name who accompanied Lioba to Germany, and that it is from thence she writes to her brother; but this supposition is irreconcilable with the text of the letters, where it is said that the sister had been abandoned very young by her parents, while the only historian who speaks of the companions of Lioba says that Berchtgyd went to Germany with her mother, and that both became abbesses in Thuringia. — OTHLO, Vita S. Bonifacii, ed. Jaffé, p. 490. The messenger who bore the correspondence between the brother and sister was Aldred or Aldraed, who carried from Germany to England the messages of the deacon Lullius, the chief assistant of Boniface (Epist. 78), from which it has been supposed that the brother of Berchtgyd might have been employed on the same mission.

only brother, loved in the Lord, and more loved than any one in the world. . . . I have received with tender gratitude the message and gifts which you have sent me by your faithful messenger Aldred. I will do, with the help of God, everything you tell me, but on the condition that you will come back and see me. I cannot exhaust the fountain of my tears when I see or hear that others meet their friends again. Then I recall that I was forsaken in my youth by my parents, and left alone here. Nevertheless I have not been forsaken by God, and I bless His almighty mercy that He has preserved your life as well as mine. And now, dearest brother, I implore and beseech you, deliver my soul from this sadness, which is very hurtful to me. I declare to you that even if you only staid with me one day and left me the next, grief would vanish from my heart. But if it is disagreeable to you to grant my request, I take God to witness that never at least shall our tenderness be betrayed by me. Perhaps you would prefer that I should go to you instead of awaiting you here. For myself, I should willingly go where the bodies of our parents rest, to end my life, and to rise from that spot to the country of those beings whose peace and joy are eternal. . . . Farewell, dear servant of the cross, beloved of your sister ; keep your good fame forever."

On other occasions she writes again : " My soul is weary of life, because of my love for you. I am here alone, forsaken, deprived of all kindred. My father and my mother have forsaken me, but the Lord hath taken me up. Between you and me there is that gulf of great waters of which Scripture speaks ; but we are united by love, for true love is never overcome, neither by space nor time. At the same time I acknowledge that I am always sad. My soul is troubled even in sleep, for love is strong as death. Now I beseech you, my beloved brother, come to me, or let me go to you, that I may see you again before I die, for the love of you will never leave my heart. My brother, your only sister greets you in Christ. I pray for you as for myself, day and night — every hour and every minute. . . . I pray, weeping and stretched on the earth, that you may live happy here below, and that you may become a saint." ¹⁹⁶

¹⁹⁶ " Dilectissimo fratri in Domino et in carne carissimo Balthardo Berthgyth. . . . Et nunc, frater mi, adjuro te atque deprecor, ut auferas tristitiam ab anima mea: quia valde nocet mihi. . . . Sin autem displicet tibi implere petitionem meam, tunc Deum testem invoco, quod in me nunquam fit derelicta dilectio nostra. . . . : —

I pity those who, either from sceptical contempt for all religious tradition, or modern rigorism, can listen with indifference or contempt to the cries of love and grief which sprang more than a thousand years ago from the depth of those Anglo-Saxon cloisters, and which attest, before and after so many other witnesses, the immortal vitality of the affections and wants of the human heart, in all climates and all forms of society. What can be more touching than these outbursts of human tenderness amid the rude kindred of the Anglo-Saxons, and under the rugged bark of their wild nature? What more interesting than the effort of these souls to interpret, in a language which they supposed more cultivated than their own, the emotions which moved them, and, above all, to renew themselves continually in the truths and precepts of the Christian faith, which had for so short a time taken the place of the worship of their fathers among them! For my own part, I listen, across past centuries, to these yearnings of the heart, to these voices of the soul, with interest a thousand times greater than to the victories and conquests which have absorbed the attention of historians; and I offer up my heartfelt thanksgivings to the biographers of the saints and the editors of their works for having infolded in their volumes, like flowers in an herbal, these early traces of human love and the storms that assail it.

"It would be singular," says the austere and tender Lacordaire, "if Christianity, founded on the love of God and men, should end in withering up the soul in respect to everything which was not God. . . . Self-denial, far from diminishing love, nourishes and increases it. The ruin of love is self-love, not the love of God; and no one ever met on earth with affections stronger and purer, more ardent, more tender, and more lasting, than those to which the saints gave up their hearts, at once emptied of themselves and filled with God."¹⁹⁷

"Have, crucicola care, salutate a sorore;

Fine tenus feliciter famam serva simpliciter. . . .

"Tædet animam meam vitæ meæ propter amorem fraternitatis nostræ. . . . Multæ sunt aquarum congregationes inter me et te. . . . Tamen caritate jungamur; quia vera caritas nunquam locorum limite frangitur. . . . Neque per somnium mente quiesco.

"Vale vivens feliciter ut sis sanctus simpliciter. . . . Precibus peto profusis fletibus; solo tenus sæpissima." — Epist. 148, 149, ed. Jaffé.

¹⁹⁷ LACORDAIRE, Lettres à des Jeunes Gens. Toulouse, Nov. 9, 1852.

VI.

But the storms of the heart, like the storms of life, have an end which is death — that death which delivers from everything — which crowns and sometimes explains everything. How did our Anglo-Saxon nuns die? As far as we can make out, they died happy and even joyous, without contradicting or giving up the tender affections which had agitated their hearts and animated their life. It would be a mistake to suppose that they only, or that even they the first, among the monastic classes of old, kept up those beautiful and holy friendships to their last days. St. Gregory the Great has preserved to us the recollection of the noble Roman, Galla, daughter of the patrician Symmachus, who became a nun in a monastery near the Basilica of St. Peter, and being attacked by a fatal illness had a vision three days before her death. The prince of the apostles appeared to her in a dream and announced to her that her sins were pardoned. She would not content herself with that supreme grace, but ventured to ask from her holy protector that another nun, sister Benedicta, whom she loved most in the community, might die with her. The apostle answered that her friend should not die at the same time, but should follow her in thirty days. The next morning Galla told the superior what she had seen and heard, and everything happened as she said. The two friends at the end of a month were united by death.¹⁹⁸

Death does not end the friendship of the cloister.

St. Galla.

The great Abbess Hilda, of whom we have spoken so much, and who was for thirty years the light and oracle of Northumberland, had also in her community a favorite nun, or one, at least, who loved her, says Bede, with a great love. This nun had not the happiness of dying at the same time as her friend. But when the holy abbess, who had been consumed for seven years by a cruel fever, which did not for a single day interrupt the exercise of her spiritual maternity, came at last to the end of her trials — when she had given up her last breath in the midst of her daughters

Hilda and her friend.

¹⁹⁸ "Gothorum temporibus, hujus urbis nobilissima puella. . . . Ex amore sumens audaciam . . . quia quamdam sanctimonialem feminam in eodem monasterio præ cæteris diligebat . . . subjunxit: Rogo ut soror Benedicta mecum veniat. Cui ille respondit: Non, sed illa talis veniat tecum: hæc vero, quam petis, die erit trigesimo secutura." — S. GREGOR., Dial., l. IV., ap. Brev. Roman. Off. Propr. Cler. Rom. die 5 Oct.

collected round her bed to hear the last exhortation, in which she besought them to keep the peace of the Gospel between them and all men,—her friend, who was at that moment detained in the novitiate, in a distant corner of the monastic lands, had the consolation of seeing in a dream the soul of Hilda led to heaven by a shining train of angels.¹⁹⁹

Læta mortem vidit: she saw death with joy. These words, spoken by Bede of St. Hilda, seem to have been applicable to all the female saints, and even to all the nuns, whose recollection he has preserved to us. There was one at Barking, who, after having been for long the humble and zealous assistant of the first abbess, Ethelburga, was warned of the death of that abbess, her friend, by a vision, in which she saw her dear Ethelburga wrapt in a shroud which shone like the sun, and raised to heaven by golden chains which represented her good works. Deprived of her spiritual mother, she lived for nine years in the most cruel sufferings, in order, says Bede, that the furnace of this daily tribulation might consume all the imperfection that remained among so many virtues. At last paralysis assailed all her members, and even her tongue. Three days before her death she recovered sight and speech: she was heard to exchange some words with an invisible visitor. It was her dearest Ethelburga, who came to announce to her her deliverance. "I can scarcely bear this joy," said the sick woman; and the following night, freed at once from sickness and from the bondage of the flesh, she entered into everlasting joy.²⁰⁰

¹⁹⁹ "In quo toto tempore nunquam . . . commissum sibi gregem et publice et privatim docere prætermittebat. . . . Septimo infirmitatis anno . . . circa galli cantum, percepto viatico sacrosanctæ communionis, cum accersitis ancillis Christi . . . de servanda eas invicem, immo cum omnibus pace evangelica admoneret: inter verba exhortationis læta mortem vidit. . . . Nunciavit matrem illarum omnium Hild abbatissam . . . se aspectante cum luce immensa ducibus angelis ad æternæ lumina lucis . . . ascendisse. . . . Ferunt quod eadem nocte . . . cuidam virginum Deo devotarum quæ illam immenso amore diligebat, obitus illius in visione apparuerit."—BEDE, iv. 23.

²⁰⁰ "Christi famula Torchtgyd . . . adiutrix disciplinæ regularis eidem matri, minores docendo vel castigando curabat. . . . Vidit quasi corpus hominis, quod esset sole clarius, sindone involutum in sublime ferri . . . quasi funibus auro clarioribus. . . . Per annos novem pia Redemptoris nostri provisione fatigata, ut quicquid in ea vitii sordidantis inter virtutes per ignorantium vel incuriam resedisset, totum hoc cominus diutine tribulationis excoqueret. . . . Nequaquam hæc læta ferre queo. . . . Interrogata cum quo loqueretur: Cum carissima, inquit, matre mea Edilberge. . . . Soluta carnis simul et infirmitatis vinculis, ad æternæ gaudia salutis intravit."—BEDE, iv. 9.

A monument which is called the Maidens' Tomb is still shown in the fine church of Beverley; it is the grave of two daughters of an earl, a benefactor of the great Abbey of St. John, who had taken the veil there. On Christmas night, according to the legend, they were the last to leave the midnight mass, and did not reappear in their stalls. After the service of the following night, the abbess, made anxious by their absence, went to look for them, and found them asleep in each other's arms. When they woke it was found that they supposed themselves to have slept only an hour, and had dreamt of paradise. They went down to the choir, and there, kneeling before the abbess, after having asked and received her benediction, died, still embracing each other.²⁰¹

The daughters of the Earl at Beverley.

One of the most celebrated heathens of our century, Goethe, died asking for light. "More light!" these were, it is said, his last words. They recur to the mind involuntarily, when we read of the happy and joyful death of these virgins, sweet and full of light, who prepared, in the depths of their cloisters now despised or forgotten, the conversion of the country of Goethe. Light above all, a heavenly and supernatural light, floods over their deathbeds and their tombs.

Deathbeds full of light.

These visions full of light, and these happy deaths, seem to have been specially accorded to our Anglo-Saxons, and not only to those who died upon their native soil, but also to those who had passed their lives in foreign cloisters. At Faremoutier, in France, the daughter of a king of Kent, Earcongotha, of whom we have already spoken,²⁰² had edified all the inhabitants by the miracles of her virtue. Being warned of her approaching end, she went from cell to cell in the infirmary of the monastery asking for the prayers of the sick nuns. She died during the following night at the first glimpse of dawn. At the same hour the monks who occupied another part of the double monastery heard a sound like the noise of a multitude, who to the sound of heavenly music invaded the monastery.

The daughter of the King of Kent at Faremoutier.

²⁰¹ Earl Puch, the father of these two sisters, is mentioned by Bede (v. 4), who describes the miraculous cure of his wife by St. John of Beverley. One of their daughters was named Yolfrida; the narrative states that she became a nun at Beverley, and died there in 742. "Puch dedit cum filia manerium de Walkington." Puch held the manor of South Burton, two miles from Beverley. — DUGDALE, Monasticon, i. 170; MABILLON, Act. SS. O. S. B., vol. iii. p. 413.

²⁰² See above, pp. 664 and 671.

When they went out to see what it was, they found themselves in a flood of miraculous light, in the midst of which the soul of the foreign princess ascended to heaven.²⁰³

In the same cloister at Faremontier, where the daughter of the kings of Kent, the grandchild of Clovis and Ethelbert, thus lived and died, a humble lay-sister, also an Anglo-Saxon, had, like her royal companion, a joyous presentiment of her death, and a shining train of angels to escort her to heaven. One day when Willesinda (as she was called) worked in the garden of the monastery with the other lay-sisters, she said to them, "One of those who cultivate this spot is about to die; let us then be ready, that our tardiness may not injure us in eternity." They asked her in vain which one of them it should be. Soon after, she fell ill, and during all her sickness she looked up to heaven with eyes shining with happiness, repeating long passages from holy Scripture, though she had never learned them by heart. Like the cowherd-poet whom the Abbess Hilda brought into monastic life and to a knowledge of the Bible, she astonished all present by repeating to them the Old and New Testament in their order.

After this she began to sing with wonderful sweetness the services as she had heard them sung by the priests. Then all at once she said to her amazed companions, "Room, room, for those who are coming!" No one was seen to enter, but conversation was heard, which the sick woman kept up, bowing her head with an expression of respect and joy. "Welcome, my dear ladies, welcome," she said. "To whom are you speaking?" they asked her. "What!" she answered, "do you not recognize your sisters who have left this community for heaven? Look, Anstrude, there is Ansilda, your own sister, who has been long dead. She is clothed with the white robe of the elect." After this she breathed her last, and the choir of angels was immediately heard coming forth to meet the saved soul.²⁰⁴

²⁰³ "Magnarum fuit virgo virtutum. . . . Hujus multa ab incolis loci illius solent opera virtutum et signa miraculorum usque hodie narrari. . . . Cæpit circuire in monasterio casulas infirmarum Christi famularum. . . . Ipsa autem nocte . . . incipiente aurora . . . multi de fratribus . . . sonitum quasi plurimæ multitudinis monasterium ingredientis; mox egressi dignoscere quid esset, viderunt lucem cœlitus emissam fuisse permaximam, quæ sanctam illam animam . . . ad æterna gaudia ducebat. . . . Tantæ fragrantia suavitatis ab imis ebullivit, ut cunctis qui adstabant fratribus ac sororibus, quasi opobalsami cellaria esse viderentur aperta." — BEDE, iii. 8.

²⁰⁴ "Quædam ex genere Saxonum Willesinda nomine, . . . quadam die dum in hortum intra monasterii septa laboraret, cum sodalibus locuta est:

But it was especially among the learned ladies of Barking, in the monastery which had made so warm a response to the classical teachings of Aldhelm and Boniface, that death was sweet and radiant. During the great pestilence of 664, which so cruelly desolated the new-born Church of England, the nuns went out one night from their church, at the end of matins, to pray at the grave of the monks who had preceded them into the other world, when all at once they saw the entire sky lighted up and cover them all as with a radiant shroud. They were so terrified that the hymn they were singing died on their lips. This light, which was more brilliant than that of the sun, guided them to the burying-place in which they were themselves to rest, and then disappeared; and they understood that it showed them at once the heaven which awaited their souls, and the spot of earth in which their bodies were to await the day of resurrection.²⁰⁵

Vision of the shining shroud at Barking.

Among those who died in so great a number during this fatal year, there are two whose humble memory the Anglo-Saxon historian has not scorned to mingle with his narrative of the political and military events of Essex and East Anglia. One of them was still in perfect health, when she was told that a little child, who had been received and taken care of by the sisters, had just died, and with its last breath had called her thrice, "Edith! Edith! Edith!" Immediately she lay down on her bed, and died the same day, to follow her innocent forerunner to heaven.²⁰⁶

The virgin called by the child.

Cito a nobis quæ in hac area excolimus una itura est. . . . Cœpit læta ad cælum vultus referre, et ignotas sibi dudum scripturarum paginas enarrare, exorsaque a principio libros Moysis per ordinem recitare, Evangelique vitalia sacramenta ac Apostolica post veterum documenta narrare. Omnesque deinceps scripturas ex ordine memorare. . . . Hilari vultu, capiteque inclinato dixit: Benedicite dominæ meæ, benedicite dominæ meæ. Inquirentesque quæ adstabant quibus salutem præmitteret, respondit: Non cernitis sorores vestras quæ de vestro collegio migraverunt ad cælos? Quærentesque illæ si agnosceret, increpanti voce ad unam earum Ansitrudem nomine loquitur: Vel tu, inquit, non agnoscis sororem tuam Ansildem, quæ dudum ad cælos migravit candidatarum choris insertam." — Vita S. Burgundofaræ, c. vii., ap. MABILLON, Act. SS. O. S. B., vol. ii. p. 425.

²⁰⁵ "Egressæ de oratorio famulæ Christi . . . ecce subito lux emissa cœlitus, veluti linteum magnum . . . tanto eas stupore perculit, ut etiam canticum quod canebant tremefactæ intermitterent. Ipse splendor emissæ lucis, in cujus comparatione sol meridianus videri possit obscurus. . . . Ut nulli esset dubium, quin ipsa lux quæ animas famularum Christi esset ductura vel susceptura in cælis, etiam corporibus earum," &c. — BEDE, iv. 7.

²⁰⁶ "Puer trium circiter annorum . . . qui propter infantilem adhuc ætatem in virginum Deo dedicatarum solebat cella nutriri ibique medicari. . . . Clamavit . . . proprio cam nomine quasi præsentem alloquens, Eadgyd,

The extinguished lamp. Another, who was very young, but had been long ill, and was now in extremity, commanded those who watched her to carry away the lamp. "Put it out — put it out," she said, without ceasing, though she was not obeyed. "You suppose me mad, but I am not mad, and I tell you that I see this house full of such a light that your lamp troubles me with its obscure glimmer." Afterwards, when nobody would listen to her, she resumed: "Light your lamps then, and keep them as long as you please. But as for me, I have no need of your light; mine is elsewhere, and at dawn it will come for me." At dawn she was dead.²⁰⁷

VII.

History has retained but these few names, and it is not without difficulty that even these can be gleaned from chronicles and legends. The veil of forgetfulness and indifference has fallen between us and the distant centuries. That great fire, lighted by faith and charity in the souls of so many new and fervent Christians, is now extinguished: a few feeble rays scarcely reach us through the night of ages. That great garden of fragrant flowers, of blessed and glorious fruit, is now seen and enjoyed only by God; scarcely does a passing breath waft to us the faint lingerings of its perfume. Myriads of souls, candid and worthy, simple and delicate, sweet and fervent, which must have peopled these immense and numberless monasteries of old, will never be known to us! How many young and touching lives are thus buried in the darkness of forgetfulness, until the day when before the assembled universe they shall shine with the brightness of everlasting glory!

But in those distant ages they formed, for the honor and consolation of their country and the Church, a great army, numerous, hardy, and dauntless, bearing the glorious ensigns of sacrifice with magnanimous serenity and humble fervor.

Eadgyd, Eadgyd. . . . Ipso quo vocata est die . . . illum qui se vocavit ad regnum cœleste secuta est." — BEDE, iv. 8.

²⁰⁷ "Cœpit subito circa mediam noctem clamare petens ut lucernam . . . extinguerent; quod cum frequenti voce repeteret. . . . Scio quod me hæc insana mente loqui arbitramini. . . . Vere dico vobis quod domum hanc tanta luce impletam esse perspicio, ut vestra illa lucerna mihi omnimodis esse videatur obscura. . . . Accendite ergo lucernam illam quamdiu vultis; attamen scitote quia non est mea; nam mea lux, incipiente aurora, mihi adventura est." — Ibid.

They confessed victoriously before the new-born Christianity and the beaten-back barbarism of their age, as their sisters in the present time confess, in the face of our over-proud civilization, the divinity of Jesus Christ, the atonements of suffering, and the immortal empire of the soul over inferior nature.

In all these noble maids, betrothed to God, there appears a sort of courage and strength which is above their sex. It is the special attribute of monastic life to transfigure human nature, by giving to the soul that which is almost always wanting to it in ordinary existence. It inspires the young virgin with an element of manfulness which withdraws her from the weaknesses of nature, and makes her at the necessary moment a heroine; but a soft and tender heroine, rising from the depths of humility, obedience, and love, to reach the height of the most generous flights, and to attain everything that is most powerful and light-giving in human courage. It fills the heart of the true monk and true priest with treasures of intelligent compassion, of unlimited tenderness, of gentleness unmingled with laxness, and of an unremitting patience such as the heart of woman alone seems capable of containing. And sometimes to both, to the bride of God and to His minister, to the heroine of charity and to the master of doctrine and preaching, it adds by a supernatural gift the incomparable charm of childhood, with its artless and endearing candor; then may be seen upon a living countenance that simplicity in beauty, and that serenity in strength, which are the most lovely array of genius and virtue. Thus it happens by times that all that is most grand and pure in the three different types of humanity, the man, the woman, and the child, is found combined in one single being, which accomplishes all that a soul can do here below to rise from its fall, and to render itself worthy of the God who has created and saved it.²⁰⁸

Vigorous character of the most part of the Saxon nuns.

I speak in the present tense, for all this exists still, and is found and repeated every day in the bosom of our modern civilization.

Every trace of the ancient world of which we have been endeavoring to seize an impression, has

All the ancient world has ²⁰⁸ AUBREY DE VERE, Thoughts on St. Gertrude. Cf. T. W. ALLIES, The Formation of Christendom, 1865, Part I., Lect. 6, Creation of Virginal Life.

perished except the army of sacrifice.

disappeared — everything has perished or changed, except the army of sacrifice. The vast and magnificent edifice of the ancient Catholic world has crumbled hopelessly to pieces. There will rise, and already, indeed, there does rise, a new world, which, like the ancient, will have its own greatness and its own littleness. But that of which we have just told the history has lasted, still lasts, and will endure forever.

Twelve centuries after the Anglo-Saxon maids whose devotion we have related, the same hand falls upon our homes, upon our desolate hearts, and tears away from us our daughters and sisters. Never since Christianity existed have such sacrifices been more numerous, more magnanimous, more spontaneous, than now. Every day since the commencement of this century, hundreds of beloved creatures have come forth from castles and cottages, from palaces and workshops, to offer unto God their heart, their soul, their virgin innocence, their love and their life. Every day among ourselves, maidens of high descent and high heart, and others with a soul higher than their fortune, have vowed themselves, in the morning of life, to an immortal husband.

They are the flower of the human race — a flower still sweet with the morning dew, which has reflected nothing but the rays of the rising sun, and which no earthly dust has tarnished — an exquisite blossom which, scented from far, fascinates with its pure fragrance, at least for a time, even the most vulgar souls. They are the flower, but they are also the fruit; the purest sap, the most generous blood of the stock of Adam; for daily these heroines win the most wonderful of victories, by the manliest effort which can raise a human creature above all earthly instincts and mortal ties.

Have you seen in March or April a child breathing in the first fresh breath of nature, the first gleam of admiration lightening in his bright eyes as they meet the gleam of awakening life in the woods and fields? There does the spring-time of life meet with the spring-time of nature, and to witness this meeting is a delight and a charm. But still more enchanting and more enrapturing by far, a rapture by which the soul is borne away to the utmost height of human emotion, is the sight of a virgin creature already budding into womanhood, radiant with youth and beauty, who turns away from all the fragrance of life to breathe only the breath, and look only towards the glories, of heaven.

What a scene is this! and where can one be found which manifests more clearly the divine nature of the Church, or which throws more entirely into the shade the miseries and stains with which its heavenly splendor is sometimes veiled?

But, let us again repeat, this sight is afforded to us everywhere, not only in our old and unhealthy Europe, but in that America²⁰⁹ which all generous spirits regard with hope and confidence. Wherever the Gospel is preached, wherever a crucifix is raised, everywhere does Christ, with His irresistible arm, pluck and uproot these earthly flowers to transplant them nearer to heaven.

Number and persevering character of vocations in the present time.

Spoilers and oppressors may in vain resume their persecutions, which are daily predicted and provoked by the writers of revolutionary Cæsarism. Devoted and outlawed chastity will resume its task. In the garrets or cellars of the palaces inhabited by the triumphant masters of the future, over their heads or under their feet, virgins will be found who shall swear to Jesus Christ to belong only to Him, and who will keep their vow, if necessary, at the cost of their life.

In this age of laxity and universal languidness, these gentle victors have kept the secret of strength, and in the weakness of their sex, let it once again be repeated, they exhibit the masculine and persevering energy which is wanting in us, to attack in front and to subdue the egotism, cowardice, and sensuality of our time and of all times. They accomplish this task with a chaste and triumphant hardihood. All that is noble and pure in human nature is led to the fight against all our baseness, and to the help of all our miseries. Speak not of the charms of a contemplative life, of the peaceful joys of meditation and solitude. These are but the lot of few. Nowadays the great self-devoted crowd throws itself into quite another path. They rush forth to the rescue of the most repulsive and tedious infirmities of poor human nature, lavishing upon them unwearied cares; they swarm wherever they are wanted to cultivate the deserts of ignorance and of childish stupidity, often so intractable and restive. Braving all disgusts, all repugnance, all denunciations and ingritudes, they come by thousands, with dauntless courage and patience, to win, caress, and soothe every form of suffering and of poverty.

²⁰⁹ "We are penetrated with the most profound respect for those holy virgins who fill our religious communities. We fulfil one of the pleasantest of duties in giving public witness to the virtue and heroism of those Christian maidens, whose lives exhale the sacred odor of Jesus Christ, and who, by their devotion and their spirit of sacrifice, have contributed more perhaps than any other cause to produce a happy change in the minds of those estranged from our faith." — Pastoral Letter of the Archbishops and Bishops of the United States, assembled in full Council at Baltimore, Oct. 21, 1866.

And, along with their strength, they have light, prudence, and true insight. They understand life without having experienced it. Who has taught them all these sad secrets? Who has taught these beings, at once so pure and so impassioned, at an age when the heart begins to be consumed by an insatiable thirst for human sympathy and human love, that such a thirst will never be satisfied in this world? Who has revealed to them the disgraceful frailty of earthly affections, even of the noblest and sweetest, the fondest and most deeply rooted, even of those which believed themselves everlasting, and held the greatest place in the hearts out of which they have miserably perished? Nothing but a divine instinct which frees them by withdrawing them from us. They are delivered from that withering amazement of the soul which meets disappointment, betrayal, and scorn, instead of love, and sometimes, after so many struggles and so many delusions, the silence of death in the fulness of life. They have forestalled their enemy, unmasked, baffled, and discomfited him. They have escaped forever: "Our soul is escaped as a bird out of the net of the fowlers: the snare is broken, and we are escaped."

Thus they go bearing off to God, in the bloom of youth, their hearts, full of those treasures of deep love and complete self-renunciation which they refuse to man. They bury and consume their whole life in the hidden depths of voluntary renunciation, of unknown immolations.

When this is done, they assure us that they have found peace and joy, and in the sacrifice of themselves the perfection of love. They have kept their hearts for Him who never changes and never deceives; and in His service they find consolations which are worth all the price they have paid for them — joys which are not certainly unclouded, for then they would be without merit, but whose savor and fragrance will last to the grave.

It is not that they would forget or betray us whom they have loved, and who love them. No; the arrow which has pierced our hearts and remains there has first struck through theirs. They share with us the weight and bitterness of the sacrifice. Isolation from the world is not insensibility. It is only a false spirituality which makes the soul hard, arrogant, and pitiless. When religion dries up or hardens the heart it is but a lying tyranny. Here, in true sacrifice, in supreme self-mortification, human affection loses none of its rights. They are all respected, but all purified, all transformed into an offering to God, who has promised to comfort us more than a mother — “So shalt thou be son of the Most High, and He shall love thee more than thy mother doeth.” The warmth of tenderness, afflicted yet so pure, so straightforward, and so sure of itself, glows forth in every word, in every look. The blessedness of belonging to God will never close a noble heart to the griefs of others, or deprive it of any generous emotion. That heart becomes, on the contrary, more tender and more closely entwined to those it loves in proportion as it is entwined into a closer bond with the heart of Jesus.²¹⁰

Is this a dream? — the page of a romance? Is it only history — the history of a past forever ended? No; once more, it is what we behold and what happens amongst us every day.

This daily spectacle we who speak have seen and undergone. What we had perceived only across past centuries and through old books, suddenly rose one day before our eyes, full of the tears of paternal anguish. Who will not pardon us for having, under the spell of that everlasting recollection, lengthened, perhaps unreasonably, this page of a long uncompleted work? How many others have also, like ourselves, gone through this anguish, and beheld with feelings unspeakable the last worldly apparition of a beloved sister or child?

One morning she rises, she comes to her father and mother — “Farewell! all is over,” she says; “I am going to die — to die to you and to all. I shall never be either a wife or a ²¹⁰ “However firm might be the resolution of Theresa to leave her father, the tender affection she bore him rendered the separation heartbreaking to her. ‘I believe,’ she says, ‘that at the point of death I could not suffer more than I did then. It seemed as if my very bones were dislocated, because my love of God was not strong enough to triumph wholly over the natural tenderness I had for my parents. I was obliged to do myself extreme violence in leaving them, and if the Lord had not helped me, my good resolutions would never have enabled me to follow out my plans to the end; but His goodness gave me courage against myself. At the moment when I took the habit, God made me conscious how he blesses those who deny themselves for His sake. This internal struggle was known to Him only; on the surface nothing appeared in my conduct but courage and firmness.’” — Histoire de sa Vie, c. iii. ap. LE BOUCHER.

mother ; I am no more even your child — I am God's alone." Nothing can withhold her. "They immediately left the ship and their father, and followed Him."²¹¹ Lo ! she comes already arrayed for the sacrifice, brilliant and lovely, with an angelic smile, fervent and serene, blooming and beaming, the crowning work of creation ! Proud of her last beautiful attire, bright and brave, she ascends to the altar, or rather she rushes — she flies like a soldier to the breach, and, hardly able to keep down the impassioned ardor which consumes her, she bows her head under the veil which is to be a yoke upon her for the rest of her life, but which will also be her eternal crown.

It is done. She has crossed the gulf with that impetuous bound, that soaring impulse, that magnanimous self-forgetfulness, which is the glory of youth, with that pure and unconquerable enthusiasm which nothing here below will ever equal or extinguish.

Who then is this invisible Lover, dead upon a cross eighteen hundred years ago, who thus attracts to Him youth, beauty, and love ? who appears to their souls clothed with a glory and a charm which they cannot withstand ? who darts upon them at a stroke and carries them captive ? who seizes on the living flesh of our flesh, and drains the purest blood of our blood ? Is it a man ? No : it is God. There lies the great secret, there the key of this sublime and sad mystery. God alone could win such victories, and deserve such sacrifices. Jesus, whose godhead is amongst us daily insulted or denied, proves it daily, with a thousand other proofs, by those miracles of self-denial and self-devotion which are called vocations. Young and innocent hearts give themselves to Him, to reward Him for the gift He has given us of Himself ; and this sacrifice by which we are crucified is but the answer of human love to the love of that God who was crucified for us.

²¹¹ Matth. iv. 22.

APPENDIX.

I.

IONA.

NOTES OF A VISIT MADE IN AUGUST 1862.

(See pages 29 and 120.)

“To each voyager
Some ragged child holds up for sale a store
Of wave-worn pebbles. . . .
How sad a welcome!
Where once came monk and nun with gentle stir
Blessings to give, news ask, or suit prefer. . . .
Think, proud philosopher!
Fallen though she be, this Glory of the West,
Still on her sons the beams of mercy shine;
And hopes, perhaps, more heavenly bright than thine,
A grace by thee unsought, and unpossesst,
A faith more fixed, a rapture more divine,
Shall gild their passage to eternal rest.”

WORDSWORTH.

THE traveller who visits Iona in the hope of finding imposing ruins or picturesque sites is singularly disappointed in his expectation. Nothing, as has been already stated, can be less attractive than this island, at first sight at least. At view of its flat and naked surface a sense of that painful desolation which is so well expressed by the word bleak, untranslatable in French, strikes the traveller, and he involuntarily turns his eyes from that low and sandy shore to the lofty mountains of the neighboring isles and coasts. After a time, however, a sweet and salutary impression is evolved from the grave, calm, and lonely aspect of a place so celebrated in spiritual history. The spirit is a little reassured, and the visitor takes his way through the poor hamlet, which is the only inhabited place on the island, towards the ruins, of which so many learned and splendid descriptions have been written. Here again there is a fresh disappointment. These ruins have nothing about them that is imposing—nothing, above all, absolutely nothing, that recalls St. Columba, unless it be two or three inscriptions in the Irish tongue (Eirsch or Erse), which was his language. But they are not the less of great interest to the Catholic archaeologist, since they are all connected with the cloistral and ecclesiastical foundations which succeeded to the monastery of Columba. Turning to the north, after passing through the village, you come first to the remains of a convent of canonesses, the last foundation of the twelfth century, but which, for a little, survived the Reformation. Transformed into a stable, then into a quarry, the roofless church still exists; and in it is to be seen the tomb of the last prioress, Anna Macdonald, of the race of the Lords of the Isles, who died in 1543. Thence you pass to the famous cemetery, which was for so many centuries the last asylum of kings and princes, nobles and prelates, and of the chiefs of the clans and communities of all the neighboring districts, and—as a report made in 1594 says—“of the best people of all the isles, and consequently the holiest and most honorable place in Scotland.” At that epoch were still to be seen three great mausoleums with the following inscriptions:—

TUMULUS REGUM SCOTIÆ.

TUMULUS REGUM HIBERNIÆ.

TUMULUS REGUM NORWEGIÆ.

There was even the tomb of a king of France, whose name is not given, but who must have abdicated before his death.

Nothing is now shown of these mausoleums except the site. A tradition, more or less authentic, decides that eight Norwegian kings or princes were interred at Iona, four kings of Ireland, and forty eight Scottish kings. But all historians agree in stating that, from the fabulous times of Fergus until Macbeth, Iona was the ordinary burying-place of the kings and nobles of the Scottish race, and even of some Saxon princes, such as Egfrid, king of the Northumbrians, who died in 685.¹ Shakespeare, with his customary fidelity to national tradition, has not failed to send the body of Macbeth's victim to be buried at Iona.²

The burial-place of the kings was not transferred to the Abbey of Dunfermline until the time of Malcolm Canmore, the conqueror and successor of Macbeth, and the husband of St. Margaret.

At present this cemetery contains eight or nine rows of flat tombs very close to each other. Most of these are of blue stone, and covered with figures sculptured in relief, with inscriptions and coats of arms. On many of them may be distinguished the galley which was the heraldic ensign of the Macdonalds, Lords of the Isles—the greatest house of the north of Scotland. Among them is shown the tomb of the contemporary of the great king Robert

¹ “Ejus corpus in Hii insula Columbæ sepultum.” — SIMEON DUNELM, ap. TWYDEN, Scriptor., p. 3.

² See the passage quoted, p. 114, note.

Bruce and the hero of the poem of Walter Scott, who died in 1387. And there are still to be seen tombs bearing the arms of the Macdougalls, Lords of Lorn, the Macleods, Mackinnons, Macquaries, and especially Macleans—that is to say, of all the chiefs of the clans of the adjacent districts, along with several tombs of bishops, priors, and other ecclesiastics of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries.

In the centre of the burying-ground stands a ruined chapel, called St. Oran's, from the name of the first of the Irish monks who died after their landing on the island. It is thirty feet long by fifteen broad, with a fine semicircular western door. It is the most interesting, and perhaps the oldest monument of the island, for it is held to have been built by the sainted Queen Margaret, wife of Malcolm Canmore († 1093), mother of the king St. David, one of the most touching figures in the history of Scotland and of Christendom. She was the regeneratrix of faith and piety in Scotland, and was animated by a great devotion to St. Columba, by whose intervention she obtained her only son, after having long been without children.³

Before reaching the burying-ground, and on leaving it, two large stone crosses are seen, each of a single block, and from twelve to fourteen feet high—the one called Maclean's, and the other St. Martin's—the only two which remain of three hundred and sixty, which are said to have formerly existed on the island. Both, fixed on a pedestal of red granite, are long and slender in form, covered over with sculptured ornaments, in a style at once graceful and quaint, partially hidden by the moss. One of them, Maclean's cross, is said to be that of which Adamnan speaks in his Life of Columba. It is difficult to understand how, with the scanty means at their disposal in an age so remote, it was possible to quarry, sculpture, transport, and erect blocks of granite of such a size.

At last we reach the Cathedral, or rather the Abbey Church, a large, oblong edifice, in red and gray granite, one hundred and sixty-six feet in length, seventy in breadth at the transept, ruined and roofless, like all the others, but still retaining all its walls, and also several large cylindrical columns, rudely sculptured, with the tombs of an abbot of the clan Mackinnon, date 1500, and different chiefs of the Macleans. Over the cross of the transept rises a square tower, which is seen far off at sea, and is lighted by windows pierced in the stone, in unglazed lozenges and circles, such as are still found at Villers, in Brabant, and at St. Vincent and Anastasius, near Rome.⁴ The end of the choir is square, and cannot be older than the fourteenth century; but other portions of the church are of the twelfth and thirteenth. It has, like the beautiful Abbey Church of Kelso, in the south of Scotland, this peculiarity, that the choir is twice as long as the nave.

³ FORDUN, Scoti-chronicon, v. 37. REEVE's Adamnan, pp. xxx., edx.

⁴ See upon these stone windows the curious works of M. Albert Lenoir, in his Architecture Monastique, 1st part, pp. 133, 301, and of M. Ed. Didron, Annales Archéologiques, vol. xxiii. pp. 45, 201.

The sombre and sad aspect of all these ruins is owing in part to the absence of all verdure, and of that ivy which, especially in the British Isles, adorns elsewhere the ruins of the past.

This church became, in the fourteenth century, the cathedral of the bishopric of the Isles, the titular bishop of which afterwards resided at Man, one of the Sudereys—that is, the isles lying south of the point of Ardnamurchan, and distinct from the Nor-derneys, to the north of that cape, a division which dates from the times of the Norwegians. Hence the title of Episcopus Sodorensis, Bishop of Sodor and Man. Iona became the cathedral of the bishopric of the Scottish Isles after the union of Man to England under Edward I.

After the Reformation, and the suppression of all the bishoprics and monasteries, decreed in 1561 by the Convention of Estates, the Calvinistic Synod of Argyll gave over all the sacred edifices of Iona to a horde of pillagers, who reduced them to the condition in which they are now seen. During the whole of the eighteenth century the ruins and the cemetery lay desert: the cathedral was made into a stable; and thus was accomplished the prophecy in Irish verse ascribed to Columba, according to which a time was to come when the chants of the monks should give place to the lowing of oxen. The three hundred and sixty crosses which covered the soil of the holy island disappeared during this period, most of them being thrown into the sea. Some were conveyed to Mull and to the adjacent islands, and one is shown at Campbelton—a monolith of blue granite, incrustated with sculptures. In this same island of Mull is to be observed a line of isolated columns leading to the point of embarkation for Iona, and destined, according to local tradition, to guide the pilgrims of old to the sacred isle. (Note of the Rev. T. Maclauchlan, read before the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, February, 1863.)

Since 1693 the island has belonged to the Dukes of Argyll, chiefs of the great clan Campbell, who watch over the preservation of the ruins. It brings them an annual revenue of about £300. It contains a population of three hundred and fifty souls, all Presbyterians. This small population—which lives on the produce of the fisheries and of a few wretched fields manured with seaweed, where potatoes, barley, and rye are grown, but where even oats refused to thrive—offers, notwithstanding, the curious spectacle which is found in many of even the prettiest villages in Scotland: it has two churches, and forms two congregations; the one connected with the official or Established worship, whose ministers are nominated by the lay patrons, and supported by the ancient property of the Church; and the other attached to the "Free Kirk"—that is, a body whose ministers are elected by the people and maintained by their voluntary offerings.

The most interesting works to be consulted upon this celebrated island are, first of all, the Report of Archdeacon Munro in 1594; then Johnson's Journey to the Hebrides; Pennant's Tour in the Hebrides; N. D. Graham's Antiquities of Iona, London, 1850, in quarto, with plates; and finally, a good article in the Gentleman's Magazine, for November, 1861.

We cannot quit Iona without adding a word on the neighboring isle of Staffa, which contains the famous grotto of Fingal. It was not really known to the world till the visit of Sir Joseph Banks in August, 1772. There is no previous mention of it, not even in the journey of the great Johnson, although it lies within sight of Iona, which closes the horizon on the south, as seen from the cave—a juxtaposition which has inspired Walter Scott with these beautiful lines:—

“ Where, as to shame the temples decked
By skill of earthly architect,
Nature herself, it seems, would raise
A Minster to her Maker's praise. . . .
Nor doth its entrance front in vain
To old Iona's holy fane,
That nature's voice might seem to say,
' Well hast thou done, frail child of clay!
Thy humble powers that stately shrine
Tasked high and hard — but witness mine! ’ ”

The English, and travellers in general, profess a great enthusiasm for this cave, which, as every one knows, forms an immense vault, into which the sea penetrates, and which rests on rows of polygonal basaltic columns, ranged like the cells of a beehive. Sir Robert Peel, in a speech in 1837, compared the pulsations of the Atlantic which roll into this sanctuary to the majestic tones of the organ; but he adds, “The solemn harmony of the waves chants the praises of the Lord in a note far more sublime than that of any human instrument.” This sound is, in fact, the grandest thing about this famous cave. The rest is a wonder of nature far inferior, it seems to us, to the wonders of art, and especially of Christian art. The grotto of Fingal is but sixty-six feet high by forty-two broad, and two hundred and twenty-seven long. What is that beside our grand cathedrals and monastic churches, such as Cluny or Vezelay?

II.

CONCLUSIONS OF THE TWO PAPERS OF
M. VARIN

ON THE CAUSES OF THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN THE BRITISH CHURCH AND THE CHURCH OF ROME.

(Recueil des Mémoires présentés par divers Savants à l'Académie des Inscriptions. — 1st series, 1858.)

(See page 174.)

FIRST ARTICLE.

The struggle maintained by the three Celtic nations (Britons, Picts, and Scots) against the Roman apostles of the Saxon colony resulted, according to the opinion of the learned Anglicans of the last three centuries, from the fact that Britain had received the faith from Asia, and would thus have communicated anti-Roman doctrines to the Picts and Scots. The three populations, instructed by Asiatics, would naturally reject the religious yoke which Rome tried to lay on them (under the pretext of evangelizing the Anglo-Saxons) no less than the political yoke of the new conquerors. But,

1. There never was anything in common in the usages of Asia and those in which the three insular nations differed from the Roman Church.

2. The origin of these secondary differences, in as far as the Picts and Scots are concerned, is found in the subsequent substitution of British usages for those which, in the beginning, these same people received direct from Rome.

3. These usages, even among the Britons, did not extend back to the origin of Christianity in the British Isles. They had their sources in circumstances purely accidental, and completely opposed to any sentiment hostile to the Roman Church.

4. The Picts and Scots received the light of the gospel originally from Rome, and not from Britain. They already occupied at that period the ground which a school of learned men believe them only to have attained at a later date.

SECOND ARTICLE.

1. The differences between Rome and Britain were less numerous, less important, and, above all, of later date than the recent writers represent.

2. They indicate no relation between Britain and Asia.

3. They prove nothing against Rome: of the three nations which composed the British Church, two had from the first adopted the Roman usages.

4. As to the six controverted customs,

Three had their origin in a national, and not at all in an Asiatic feeling — to wit,

A. The tonsure — a national and even Druidic way of dressing the hair — that of the wise men, who are discussed in the lives of the Irish saints as opposing great obstacles to any modifications of the faith;

B. The national liturgy for the mass, such as existed in all the Churches evangelized by Rome, Gaul, Spain, &c.;

C. Aversion for the Roman clergy, repelled by patriotic sentiment, as apostles of the Saxon race;

And three in mistaken adhesion to the very doctrines of Rome:

D. The ceremonies supplementary to baptism, of which Bede speaks, ii. 2; but which the islanders would not recognize because their first apostles, who had come from Rome, had told them nothing about them;

E. The pascal computation (Easter), which the Britons maintained as they had received it at first from Rome without wishing to adopt the reform subsequently introduced by the Popes;

F. The celibacy of the clergy, as severely observed by the Britons as by the Roman clergy — only they accepted the double monasteries known in the East: and this is the only way in which any of the traditions of the East got a footing in the extreme West.

On the three principal points — 1, The supremacy of Rome; 2, The celebration of Easter; 3, The marriage of the priests — the British Church in no way differs from other Western Churches, — at least, during the first five centuries. On the three secondary points — 1, The tonsure; 2, The administration of baptism; 3, The liturgy — there were differences; but they were as great between Britain and the East as between Britain and Italy.

III.

LINDISFARNE.

(See page 235.)

LINDISFARNE at present bears the name of Holy Island, which was given it in 1093 by the monks, then transferred to Durham, in memory of the number of monks who were massacred at the Danish invasion, and venerated as martyrs.

Except the dark and scarcely visible island, situated on the southwest, fifty fathoms from the shore, which is still called St. Cuthbert's Isle, and where it is said some remains of his cell are to be seen, the Holy Island of Lindisfarne retains no material trace either of the dwelling-place of the great and popular saint, or of the ancient monastic cathedral of Northumberland. But it possesses the important and very picturesque ruins of the church, rebuilt in 1093 by Bishop Carilef. This bishop immortalized himself by the construction of the magnificent Cathedral of Durham, of which the church of Lindisfarne, built of fine red stone like the churches on the Rhine, is a dependence. It is in the Roman or purest Norman style, except the choir and its rectangular heading, which were added in the thirteenth century. Its architect was the monk Eadward, so much praised by Reginald in his Libellus de Miraculis Cuthberti, and who brought from the neighboring city, with the eager aid of the inhabitants, the good stone which was wanting at Lindisfarne, that of the island being too friable, and apt to be destroyed by the sea-spray. A double diagonal arch, ornamented with rich toothed mouldings, is the only remaining relic of the central vault of the transept, between the nave and choir. This arch, thrown from the north-western to the south-eastern corner, with the appearance of being suspended in the air, traces its outline upon the sky with boldness and majesty. It is four-and-twenty English feet in diameter, and rises to a height of forty-four feet above the ground, which is itself heightened by ruins. The lower side of the north is still entire, as well as two bays of the same side of the nave, which was composed of six. The ancient choir ended in a circular apse; the half of it remains, disfigured and mutilated by a square heading in materials different from the rest. The transept has two circular apses, in the same style as the choir. The reverse of the western front, in the interior of the church, has a fine effect. The entire ruin is very well rendered in the Architectural Antiquities of Durham, by Billings.

Some remains of the ancient monastery are still to be seen round the church. A fine fortress of the sixteenth century, built under Queen Elizabeth, occupies a conical mole at the southern extremity of the island.

A very minute description of Lindisfarne is to be found in the work of the learned James Raine, entitled The History and Antiquities of North Durham, or the shires of Norham, Island, and Bedlington, now united in the county of Northumberland: London, 1852. The article Holy Island is very long: it goes into minute details of the priory founded there in 1095, and is accompanied by an engraving made in 1728 by Buck, and which shows the state of the ruins at that period: they do not seem to have been more considerable then than at present.

Bamborough, the ancient residence of the kings of Northumbria, situated on the shore in sight of Lindisfarne, is placed on an immense rock, which commands the sea and all the surrounding country; the castle, much modernized, has been made by Lord Crewe into a charitable school and various establishments devoted to the work of salvage, which is so necessary and so energetically directed upon that dangerous coast.

I cannot resist the temptation of quoting here Walter Scott's fine lines, which will console the reader for the dryness of the preceding details, and which exactly depict the site of Lindisfarne except in respect to the grandeur of the ruins: the English are disposed to exaggerate the effect of the size of their historical monuments, which are almost always less than our own.

“ And now the vessel skirts the strand
Of mountainous Northumberland.

Thy tower, proud Bamborough, marked they there,
King Ida's castle, huge and square,
From its tall rock look grimly down,
And on the swelling ocean frown;
Then from the coast they bore away,
And reached the Holy Island's bay.
The tide did now its flood-mark gain,
And girdled in the Saint's domain:
For, with the flow and ebb, its style
Varies from continent to isle;
Dry-shod, o'er sands, twice every day,
The pilgrims to the shrine find way:
Twice every day the waves efface
Of staves and sandalled feet the trace.
As to the port the galley flew,
Higher and higher rose to view
The castle with its battled walls,
The ancient monastery's halls,
A solemn, huge, and dark-red pile,
Placed on the margin of the isle.
In Saxon strength that Abbey frowned,
With massive arches broad and round,

That rose alternate, row and row,
On ponderous columns, short and low,
Built ere the art was known,
By pointed aisle, and shafted stalk,
The arcades of an alley walk
To emulate in stone.

On the deep walls, the heathen Dane
Had poured his impious rage in vain;
And needful was such strength to these,
Exposed to the tempestuous seas,
Scourged by the winds' eternal sway,
Open to rovers fierce as they,
Which could twelve hundred years withstand
Wind, waves, and northern pirates' hand.
Not but that portions of the pile,
Rebuilt in a later style,
Showed where the spoiler's hand had been;
Not but the wasting sea-breeze keen
Had worn the pillar's carving quaint,
And mouldered in his niche the saint,
And rounded, with consuming power,
The pointed angles of each tower;
Yet still entire the Abbey stood,
Like veteran, worn but unsubdued."

— Marmion, cant. ii.

IV.

PETERBOROUGH.

(See page 333.)

This celebrated monastery has been the origin of an important town in Northamptonshire, which sends two members to the House of Commons, and was made into a bishopric of the Anglican Church by Henry VIII. The last abbot became bishop in 1541, and the abbey church was transformed into the cathedral of the new bishopric — an arrangement which still continues.

Peterborough was built on an isle in the marshy district which, at the time of the Saxon occupation, included a considerable portion of the existing counties of Northampton, Cambridge, Lincoln, and Norfolk, and which is still known as the Fens. There existed in these marshes some spots more solid, which could even be made into pasturage, and the industry of the monks soon brought them under cultivation. From this is derived the primitive name of Peterborough, Medehamstede, or, in modern English, the Home in the Meadows. Such was also the origin of the still celebrated abbeys of Ely and Croyland, and of several others, Ramsey, Thorney, Kirkstead, &c. This district is now one of the most fertile parts of England.

There are no remains existing of the church of the monastery built in the seventh century by the kings of the Mercians. The Danes destroyed it at their great invasion in 870, after having slaughtered all the monks. It was rebuilt a century later, and again dedicated to St. Peter by the famous Ethelwold, Bishop of Winchester, but afterwards destroyed by accidental fires in 1067 and in 1116. It was in 1118, after the last of these fires, that the present building was commenced by the abbot John of Seez: the choir was consecrated in 1143, and the chapels, to the east of the transept, from 1133 to 1145, under a very distinguished abbot, Martin du Bec. The existing nave, begun in 1155, was not finished till towards 1190. The aisles of the nave date from 1117 and 1143.

Like all English cathedrals, Peterborough has preserved its vast dependencies, and stands in the midst of gardens, flowery lawns, and groves, which heighten its grandeur and beauty. The tranquil majesty of the close which surrounds it naturally recalls to mind its monastic origin; the silence and serenity which reign there are scarcely disturbed, except by the flight or the song of birds, whose nests are built in the towers and buttresses of the immense church. The great and numerous buildings which shut in this close seem to reproduce, in part at least, the cloisters of the great abbey before its secularization. The entrance from the town into the sacred enclosure is by a gateway, in the form of a square tower, pierced by an arched passage, and surmounted by a chapel dedicated to St. Nicholas, but used at present as a music school. To the left is another chapel, dedicated to St. Thomas-à-Becket, which serves for the use of the choristers. Beyond this gateway is the spacious enclosure surrounding the church; to the right and to the south is the old abbatial palace — now the bishop's — built in 1319, its grand entrance flanked by two statues, larger than life, of an abbot and a monk. To the left and north is the deanery, a fine building of the date of 1518. But the eyes of visitors are at once attracted and enchanted by the magnificent western façade of the abbey church. This façade, built between 1200 and 1227, in the early ogival style, called in England Early English, is equally original and splendid; it is said, not without reason, to have no equal among the specimens of Christian architecture. It is composed of three porches or ogival doorways, equal in height, which occupy the whole elevation of the façade; they are surrounded by three triangular gables or frontals, and flanked north and south by two square towers of great elegance, with spires. The depth of these doorways is as astonishing as their height; the sides of the inner walls and the whole of the façade are lavishly enriched with sculpture, and decorated wherever it is possible with bays and roses in the finest style. The whole effect is truly wonderful, thanks to the immense dimensions of this triple porch and the masses of light and shade caused by the depths of the arches.

The two façades of the grand transept, to the north and south, flanked by polygonal turrets, and of Roman or Norman architecture, are also extremely beautiful. Nothing can be finer than the north façade with its seven tiers of arches and vaulted bays. This façade is, externally, the best preserved and most interesting part of the ancient Norman church, which is there seen without the disfigurement of those additions in the perpendicular or flamboyant style which have been made to the aisles of the nave, the mullions of the triforium, the circumference of the choir, and even in certain parts of the great western façade.

The circular apse of the primitive church may also be seen rising above the quadrilateral oblong which was added in the sixteenth century, and in spite of the disparity caused by the flamboyant architecture of the great windows of this apse, its effect is still remarkable. Besides the great transept, situated between the choir and the nave, there is another of smaller dimensions, situated between the nave and the western façade, and flanked by four turrets, two with battlemented terraces, and two with spires, already mentioned in reference to the principal façade. It has also a central tower, which is low and ungraceful, and which, moreover, is decorated at the four corners with those hideous bell towers which disfigure a large proportion of English steeples.

Peterborough Cathedral thus possesses a great number of towers and turrets, but their want of height diminishes their effect; and this is the case also with the whole of the roof, which, as in most English cathedrals, is so low as to wound the eye by the absence of that perfect proportion between the height and length of the building to which we are accustomed in those of France and Germany.

But whatever may be wanting to the exterior of Peterborough is fully compensated by the majestic and solemn beauty of the interior. I remember no church in the world whose whole aspect is, at the first glance, more striking. Every detail appears to be of the purest Roman or Norman art. And it is so especially in the central nave, which is of extraordinary length,⁵ with eleven bays (Notre Dame in Paris has only seven) divided by huge columns alternately round and octangular. The roof, instead of being vaulted, has a ceiling of wood, believed to be of the same date as the edifice, and covered with old paintings, recalling those lately restored with such success in the Church of St. Godehard at Hildesheim. The triforium, of which each bay is composed only of a pointed arch, is of a grand simplicity, and neutralizes the unfortunate effect of the flamboyant windows of the clerestory, the pointed bays of which are besides even lower than those of the triforium.

The aisles of the nave are in the same style, but with vaulted roofs in stone; their inner walls are entirely covered with vaulted and interlaced arches: unfortunately the windows of these aisles have been modernized in the sixteenth or seventeenth century.

The grand transept is also in the finest Norman style, and rivals the nave in size and magnificence; it has four bays in each arm, and six of these bays open on six chapels arranged parallel to the choir, in the manner of the Cistercian churches. The two façades of this transept, to the north and south, are pierced with three rows of vaulted bays, with mullions and trefoils.

The choir has four bays, and ends in an apse in four parts. But this apse itself is imbedded in a vast oblong construction much lower than the rest of the church. Here we find again the unpleasing fashion of finishing the finest churches with a parallelogram, to which English architects have always had a leaning, and which gives to their buildings a character so inferior to ours. This addition, called the Lady Chapel, was built in 1496. It has a richly sculptured vault of the special form of the English build ings of that period, such as may be seen at King's College, Cambridge, and at Henry VII.'s Chapel at Westminster.

⁵ It is 266 English feet in length, 35 wide, and 85 high. The total length of the church is 479 feet; the western façade is 156. The lantern of the central tower is only 135 feet high.

Within the choir is the oldest monument in the church, that of Abbot Hedda, massacred by the Danes in 870. It is in the form of a shrine, with statues of our Lord and the twelve apostles in bas-relief. It is attributed to Goodric, who was abbot from 1099 to 1103.

A little further on may be seen the gravestone, scarcely visible, of Catherine of Arragon, the first wife of Henry VIII., and opposite the place where the body of Mary Stuart was buried after her execution at the neighboring Castle of Fotheringay, and where it remained until her son James I. removed it to Westminster. These two great victims to the Reformation thus slept together in the old abbatial church of Peterborough, while the wicked and sanguinary Elizabeth finished her triumphal reign in peace.

This beautiful church cannot give us an idea of the buildings of Anglo-Saxon times; but it represents in all their majesty the great constructions of one of the greatest epochs of monastic history, that of the twelfth century, the era of St. Bernard and Peter the Venerable.⁶

I reserve for another volume my notes on the present state of two other monasteries, Croyland and Ely, which, from their commencement, were reckoned among the most celebrated in England, but the great splendor of which was later than the epoch of which I have hitherto spoken.

JULY, 1862.

⁶ An abridged history of this great monastery may be found in the biographical notes on its abbots, published by Stevens, Continuation of Dugdale; London, 1722, vol. i. p. 496. I take this occasion of recommending to all lovers of Christian antiquities this excellent work, full of curious information and of zeal against the sacrilegious profaners of the Catholic monuments and institutions of England.

V.

HEXHAM.

(See page 365.)

DESCRIPTION OF THE CHURCH BUILT AT THE MONASTERY OF HEXHAM BY
ST. WILFRID FROM 674 TO 680.

“Igitur profunditatem ipsius ecclesiæ criptis et oratoriis subterraneis, et viarum anfractibus inferius cum magna industria fundavit.

“Parietes autem quadratis et bene politis columpnis suffultos et tribus tabulatis distinctos, immensæ longitudinis et altitudinis, erexit. Ipsos etiam et capitella columpnarum quibus sustentantur et arcum sanctuarii, historiis et ymaginibus et variis cœlaturarum figuris ex lapide prominentibus et picturarum et colorum grata varietate mirabilique decore decoravit. Ipsum quoque corpus ecclesiæ appentitiis et porticibus nardique circumdixit quæ, miro atque inexplicabili artificio, per parietes et coeleas inferius et superius distinxit. In ipsis vero coeleis,⁷ et super ipsas, ascensoria ex lapide, et deambulatoria, et varios viarum amfractus, modo sursum, modo deorsum, artificiosissime ita machinari fecit, et innumera hominum multitudo ibi existere et ipsum corpus ecclesiæ circumdare possit, cum a nemine tamen infra in eo existentium videri queat. Oratoriaque quam plurima, superius et inferius, secretissima et pulcherrima, in ipsis porticibus cum maxima diligentia et cautela constituit, in quibus altaria in honore Beatæ Dei genetricis semperque Virginis Mariæ, et sancti Michaelis Archangeli, sanctique Johannis Baptistæ et sanctorum Apostolorum, Martyrum, Confessorum, atque Virginum, cum eorum apparatibus, honestissime præparari fecit. Unde etiam, usque hodie, quædam illorum ut turres et propugnacula, supereminent. Atrium quoque templi magnæ spissitudinis et fortitudinis muro circumvallavit. Præter quem in alveo lapideo aquæductus, ad usus officinorum, per mediam villam decurrebat.”⁸

⁷ Ducange, at the word Cochlea, says: “Cochleæ sunt altæ et rotundæ turres, et dictæ cochleæ quasi cycleæ, quod in eis, tanquam per circulum orbemque, conscendatur.”

⁸ RICHARDI PRIORIS Historia Hagulstadensis Ecclesiæ, c. iii., ap. TWYSDEN, Historiæ Anglicanæ Scriptores Decem, and RAINE'S Priory of Hexham, p. 11.

VI.

GENEALOGICAL TABLE OF THE KINGS OF NORTHUMBRIA.

BERNICIAN DYNASTY.

The names in capitals are the names of kings who reigned over Northumbria.
 The dates placed after these names show the beginning and close of their reigns.
 The names in italics are those of queens and princesses.

DEIRIAN DYNASTY.

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE OF THE KINGS OF NORTHUMBRIA AT THIS PERIOD.

547. Ida.	670. Ecgfrid.	716. Ceonred, son of Oeca, son	737. Eadbert, descended from Eadric,
559. Ella.	683. Aldfrid.	of Ida the Turner.	another son of Ida, and brother
592. Ethelfrid.	705. Osred.	718. Osric, brother of Osred.	of Archbishop Egbert, the cor-
616. Edwin.		729. Ceolwulf, brother of Ceonred.	respondent of Bede.

VII.

GENEALOGICAL TABLE

OF NUNS DESCENDED FROM THE RACE OF HENGIST AND DYNASTY OF THE ESCINGS, KINGS OF KENT.

(See Table IX.)

(See Table VIII.)

VIII. GENEALOGICAL TABLE OF NUNS DESCENDED FROM THE DYNASTY OF THE KINGS OF MERCA.

CRIDDA,
tenth in descent from Odin, founder of the kingdom of the Angles in Mercia, 585.

PYBBA or WIEBA, King from 593 to 596.

PENDA, King from 626 to 655.

The dates and references on which these tables are founded, are drawn chiefly from Lappenberg, who has with reason given great importance to the origin of the Saxon dynasties, founding them on the lists given by the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, Florent of Worcester, Nennius, &c. We have revised and completed these from Bede and the Bollandists. The latter have disputed many traditions received by earlier writers.

IX.

GENEALOGICAL TABLE

OF PRINCESSES OF THE RACE OF THE UFFINGS, KINGS OF EAST ANGLIA, WHO TOOK THE VEIL.

ANNA, King of E. Anglia from 653 to 654. m. Hereswitha , ¹ a Northumbrian princess, sister of St. Hilda, and, by a former marriage, mother of
Edilberga , natural daughter of King Anna, Abbess of Faremountier, in France.	St. Seeburga , widow of Ercombert, King of Kent, foundress of Sheppey, 2d Abbess of Ely, after her sister, from 679 to 699.	St. Etheldreda , m. 1st. Tombert, prince of the Girwians; 2d. Egbert, King of Northumbria, 1st Abbess of Ely, d. 679.	St. Wlburga , nun at Ely, afterwards foundress and Abbess of Derham, Norfolk.	Aldulphe , King of E. Anglia from 663 to 713, Sæthryd , Abbess of Faremountier in France.
St. Ermenilda , Queen of Mercia, 3d Abbess of Ely, after her mother.	St. Werburga , 4th Abbess of Ely.	Edlburga and Wlburga , successively Abbesses of Hackness, founded by St. Hilda, their great-aunt.
			Ecburga or Edburga , Abbess of Repton, afterwards of Hackness, friend of St. Guthlac

(See Table VIII.)

¹ According to some authors, Hereswitha married, not Anna, but his brother Eddeher, who was the father of King Aldulphe. (Cf. BEDE, IV. 23; Liber Eliensis, p. 15; LAPPENBERG, p. 237.)

X.

GENEALOGICAL TABLE OF THE KINGS OF WESSEX.

(DIRECT LINE, OMITTING KINGS DESCENDED FROM COLLATERAL BRANCHES.)

THE CLASSICS
OF WESTERN
SPIRITUALITY

Dechthild of Dagdeburg

THE FLOWING LIGHT OF THE GODHEAD

THE CLASSICS
OF WESTERN
SPIRITUALITY

Dechthild of Magdeburg

THE FLOWING LIGHT OF THE GODHEAD

THE CLASSICS OF WESTERN SPIRITUALITY

THE CLASSICS OF WESTERN SPIRITUALITY

A Library of the Great Spiritual Masters

President and Publisher

Kevin A.Lynch, C.S.P.

EDITORIAL BOARD

Editor-in-Chief

Bernard McGinn-Donnelly Professor of Historical Theology and the History of Christianity, Divinity School, University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

Editorial Consultant

Ewert H.Cousins-Professor of Theology, Fordham University, Bronx, N.Y.

John E.Booty-Professor of Anglican Studies, School of Theology, University of the South, Sewanee, Tenn.

Joseph Dan-Professor of Kabbalah, Department of Jewish Thought, Hebrew University, Jerusalem, Israel.

Louis Dupre-T. L.Riggs Professor of Philosophy of Religion, Yale University, New Haven, Conn.

Rozanne Elder-Executive Vice-President, Cistercian Publications, Kalamazoo, Mich.

Michael Fishbane-Nathan Cummings Professor, Divinity School, University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

Anne Fremantle-Teacher, Editor, and Writer, New York, N.Y.

Karlfried Froehlich-Professor of the History of the Early and Medieval Church, Princeton Theological Seminary, Princeton, NJ.

Arthur Green-Professor of Jewish Thought, Brandeis University, Waltham, Mass.

Stanley S.Harakas-Archbishop Iakovos Professor of Orthodox Theology, Holy Cross Greek Orthodox Seminary, Brookline, Mass.

Moshe Idel-Professor of Jewish Thought, Department of Jewish Thought, Hebrew University, Jerusalem, Israel.

Bishop Kallistos of Diokleia-Fellow of Pembroke College, Oxford, Spalding Lecturer in Eastern Orthodox Studies, Oxford University, England.

George A.Maloney-Spiritual Writer and Lecturer, Seal Beach, Calif.

Seyyed Hossein Nasr-Professor of Islamic Studies, George Washington University, Washington, D.C.

Heiko A.Oberman-Professor for Medieval, Renaissance, and Reformation History, University of Arizona, Tucson, Ariz.

Raimundo Panikkar-Professor Emeritus, Department of Religious Studies, University of California at Santa Barbara, Calif.

Jaroslav Pelikan-Sterling Professor of History and Religious Studies, Yale University, New Haven, Conn.

Sandra M.Schneiders-Professor of New Testament Studies and Spirituality, Jesuit School of Theology, Berkeley, Calif.

Michael A.Sells-Emily Judson Baugh and John Marshall Gest Professor of Comparative Religions, Haverford College, Haverford, Penn.

Huston Smith-Thomas J. Watson Professor of Religion Emeritus, Syracuse University, Syracuse, N.Y.

John R. Sommerfeldt-Professor of History, University of Dallas, Irving, Tex.

David Steindl-Rast-Spiritual Author, Benedictine Grange, West Redding, Conn.

David Tracy-Greeley Professor of Roman Catholic Studies, Divinity School, University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

The Rt. Rev. Rowan D. Williams-Bishop of Monmouth, Wales.

Mechthild of Magdeburg

THE FLOWING LIGHT OF THE GODHEAD

TRANSLATED AND INTRODUCED BY FRANK TOBIN

PREFACE BY MARGOT SCHMIDT

PAULIST PRESS
NEW YORK • MAHWAH

Cover art: MOTHER PLACID DEMPSEY, a Benedictine nun of the Abbey of Regina Laudis in Bethlehem, Connecticut, is a sculptress and painter. Of the cover illustration for this Classics volume, Mother Placid says, “It takes its inspiration from Christ’s words to Mechthild that she was to be a witness to the ‘light of my divinity flowing into all hearts that live without guile.’ Mechthild was eminent among these witnesses in the fullness with which her heart knew and lived this experience and from which she wrote of it. Yet, it seemed good to create an image that would ‘witness’ in its way to all hearts who have lived and continue to live this same reality. The cover image then portrays these hidden lights who fill our world with the unseen radiance of God’s light.”

Copyright © 1998 by Frank Tobin

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying, recording, or by any information storage and retrieval system without permission in writing from the publisher.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Mechthild, of Magdeburg, ca. 1212–ca. 1282
[Fließende Licht der-Gottheit. English]
The flowing light of the Godhead / Mechthild of Magdeburg ; translated and introduced by Frank Tobin.
p. cm. — (The classics of Western spirituality ; #91)

Includes bibliographical references and indexes.
ISBN 0-8091-3776-3 (alk. paper)—ISBN 0-8091-0495-4 (cloth).
1. Visions—Early works to 1800. 2. Private revelations—Early works to 1800.
3. Spiritual life—Catholic Church—Early works to 1800. 4. Catholic Church—Doctrines—Early works to 1800. 5. Mysticism—Catholic Church—Early works to 1800. 6. Mechthild, of Magdeburg, ca. 1212-ca. 1282. I. Tobin, Frank J. II. Title. III. Series.
BV5091.V6M43413 1997
248.2'2—dc21

97-44826
CIP

Published by Paulist Press
997 Macarthur Boulevard
Mahwah, New Jersey 07430

Printed and bound in the United States of America

CONTENTS

Foreword

Preface

Key to Abbreviations

Introduction

Notes to the Introduction

THE FLOWING LIGHT OF THE GODHEAD

Prologue to the Lux Divinitatis

Latin Foreword with Table of Contents and Middle High German Translation

BOOK I

1. How Love and the Queen Spoke to Each Other

2. Concerning Three Persons and Three Gifts

3. The Handmaids of the Soul and the Blow of Love

4. The Soul's journey to Court During Which God Reveals Himself

5. The Torment and the Praise of the Soul

6. The Nine Choirs: How They Sing

7. God's Curse in Eight Things

8. The Most Lowly Praises God in Ten Things

9. With Three Things You Dwell on the Heights

10. Who Loves God Triumphs over Three Things

11. Four Battle for God

12. The Soul Praises God for Five Things

13. How God Comes to the Soul

14. How the Soul Receives and Praises God

15. How God Receives the Soul

16. God Likens the Soul to Four Things

17. The Soul Praises God About Five Things

18. God Likens the Soul to Five Things

19. God Caresses the Soul in Six Ways

- 20. The Soul Praises God in Return in Six Ways
- 21. Of Knowledge and Enjoyment
- 22. St. Mary's Message and How One Virtue Follows Another. How the Soul Was Made in the Jubilus of the Trinity, and How St. Mary Nursed All the Saints and Nurses Them Still
- 23. You Should Ask That God Love You Passionately, Often, and Long; Then You Shall Become Pure, Beautiful, and Holy
- 24. How God Responds to the Soul
- 25. The Way to Suffer Pain Willingly for God's Sake
- 26. The Path upon Which the Soul Draws the Senses and Is Free of Suffering of the Heart
- 27. How You Become Worthy of This Path and Keep to It and Become Perfect
- 28. Love Shall Be Deadly, Boundless, and Unceasing; This Is the Folly of Fools
- 29. The Beauty of the Bridegroom and How the Bride Should Follow Him in Twenty-Three Steps of the Cross
- 30. The Seven Hours
- 31. You Should Ignore Scorn
- 32. You Should Ignore Honors, Suffering, and Possessions. Be Sad After Sinning
- 33. Concerning Food, Consolation, and Love
- 34. In Suffering You Should Be a Lamb, a Turtledove, and a Bride
- 35. The Desert Has Twelve Things
- 36. Concerning Malice, Good Works, and Concerning a Marvel
- 37. The Soul Responds to God Saying She Is Unworthy of These Favors
- 38. God Boasts That the Soul Has Overcome Four Sins
- 39. God Asks the Soul What She Is Bringing
- 40. She Replies: Something That Is Better than Seven Things
- 41. God Asks in Praise What the Precious Stone Is Called
- 42. The Precious Stone Is Called Heart's Delight
- 43. Put Your Delight into the Trinity
- 44. The Sevenfold Path of Love, the Three Garments of the Bride, and the Dance
- 45. The Eight Days in Which What the Prophets Longed For Was Accomplished
- 46. The Diverse Adornments of the Bride; How She Comes to Her Bridegroom; and How the Retinue Is Composed, Which Is Ninefold

- 1. Love Brings Elevation to the Soul, Not Inhuman Toil; That Comes from Self-Will
- 2. Two Songs of Love of Him Who Was Seen in Love
- 3. The Tongue of the Godhead, the Light of Truth, the Four Rays of God Shining into the Nine Choirs, the Trinity, and St. Mary
- 4. The Poor Girl, the Mass of John the Baptist, the Transformation of the Host into the Lamb, the Beauty of the Angels, Four Kinds of Sanctified People, and the Golden Penny
- 5. A Song of the Soul About Five Things, and How God Is a Garment of the Soul and the Soul of God
- 6. God's Singing Response in the Soul in Five Things
- 7. In Suffering Praise God; Then He Will Appear to You. The Two Golden Chalices of Suffering and Consolation
- 8. Of Purgatory; a Person Freed a Thousand Souls from It with the Tears of Love
- 9. God Praises His Bride in Five Things
- 10. The Bride Praises God in Return in Five Things
- 11. Seven Kinds of Love for God
- 12. Seven Kinds of Perfection
- 13. Between God and the Soul There Should Be Love
- 14. Where Bitterness, Low Spirits, Sickness, Terror, Sensitivity, Distress, Forsakenness, and Inconsolability Come From
- 15. How One Wounded by Love Is Restored to Health
- 16. The Seven Gifts of a Brother
- 17. How God Woos the Soul and Makes Her Wise in His Love
- 18. How the Soul Interprets God's Wooing in Eight Things
- 19. How Knowledge and the Soul Converse and How the Latter Says That She Is Threefold. Of the Three Heavens
- 20. How Sister Hildegund Is Adorned in Heaven with Three Mantles, with Seven Crowns, and How the Nine Choirs Praise Her
- 21. If You Would Behold the Mountain, You Should Have Seven Things
- 22. How Contemplation Asks the Loving Soul About the Seraphim and the Least of Men
- 23. How Love Questions and Instructs Dull Souls and Would Like to Bring Them to Their Lover and Begins to Speak; and How the Dull Soul Responds
- 24. How the Loving Soul Joins the Company of God and His Chosen Dear Ones and Shall Be Equal to All the Saints. How the Devil and the Soul Talk to Each Other
- 25. The Lament of the Loving Soul; How God Protects Her and Withdraws His Gift from Her. Concerning Wisdom, How the Soul Asks God How She Is and Where He Is. Concerning the Orchard, Flowers, and the Song of the Virgins
- 26. About This Book and the Writers of This Book

- 1. Of Heaven and the Nine Choirs and Who Is Supposed to Fill the Breach. Of the Throne of the Apostles and St. Mary and on Which Christ Sits. Of the Reward of Preachers, Martyrs, and Virgins, and of the Unbaptized Children
- 2. How the Soul Praises God and God the Soul for Seven Things. Of Balsam and Waiting
- 3. A Lament That the Soul Is a Maidservant for the Love of God
- 4. How Our Lady St. Mary Can Sin and How Not; the Holy Spirit Teaches This
- 5. How the Soul Complains That She Hears No Mass Nor Hours and How God Praises Her in Ten Things
- 6. If You Would Follow God Rightly, You Should Have Seven Things
- 7. Concerning Seven Obvious Enemies of Our Happiness That Cause Seven Kinds of Harm
- 8. Seven Things That All Priests Should Have
- 9. Concerning the Beginning of All Things That God Created out of Love
- 10. The Passion That the Loving Soul Has from God, and How She Rises and Ascends into Heaven
- 11. Between God and the Loving Soul All Things Are Beautiful
- 12. You Should Praise, Thank, Desire, and Beg. Concerning the Lantern and the Light
- 13. Sixteen Kinds of Love
- 14. Concerning False Virtues; Whoever Dwells Therein Lives in Lies
- 15. You Should Approach God's Table with Eight Virtues. By Ransom a Person Released Seventy Thousand Souls from Ghastly Purgatory, Which Is of Many Kinds
- 16. After a Gift There Follows a Scourge and After Disgrace Honor
- 17. The Purgatory of a Religious Person, His Five Kinds of Help out of the Torment, and the Nobility of the Order of Preachers
- 18. A Knight's Battle in Full Armor Against Sensual Desires
- 19. Two Kinds of Poor People: Those Who Are Cheerfully Poor and Those Who Are Unhappily So
- 20. The Five Prophets Who Illumine This Book
- 21. Hell: How It Has Three Parts; How Lucifer and Sixteen Kinds of People Are Tormented; There Is No Help for Them. Lucifer's Garment
- 22. Of God's Mercy, His Concern, and Justice.
- 23. The Intensity of Yearning Takes Away Words; God Cannot Do Without Virgins; God's Countenance, His Embrace, and His Joy Overcome a Thousand Deaths
- 24. Two Kinds of Spirits-from God and from the Devil-Are Offered to Two Kinds of Religious People. The Seven Kinds of Love

BOOK IV

- 1. Pure Virgins Should Have Five Things
- 2. This Book Has Come from God; the Soul Praises Herself for Many Things; She Is Given Two Angels and Two Evil Devils.

With Twelve Virtues She Does Battle Against the Flesh

3. Sinners Fall Away from God; of Three Gifts of Wisdom; of the Stone; of the Praise of the Virgin Who Is Christianity

4. Two Dissimilar Paths: the First Descends into Hell; the Second Ascends to Heaven

5. Our Sin, Future Fall, Earthly Being, the Kingdom of Heaven. God's Gifts Should Be Clearly Before Our Eyes

6. Being Chosen by God Cannot Hurt Anyone; True Repentance Earns Remission and God's Grace, and Frees from Purgatory

7. How a Free Soul Speaks to God in Total Love

8. Concerning God's Body, Which a Sick Person Vomits Up, and Concerning Power

9. Four Kinds of Offerings to Priests

10. Concerning the Offerings of Laypersons According to Their Means

11. Four Things Concerning How Christians Should Conduct Themselves in Dealing with Jews

12. How a Bride Who Is United with God Rejects Consolation from All Creatures Except for That from God Alone, and How She Sinks into Pain

13. The Text of This Book Is Seen, Heard, and Felt in All Members

14. Of the Holy Trinity, of the Birth and the Name of Jesus Christ, and of Human Nobility

15. Genuine Pure Love Has Four Things; If You Surrender Yourself to God, God Will Also Surrender Himself to You

16. Great Love Has More than Ten Parts and of Two Kinds of Complaint

17. Concerning a Lady Who Liked Being at Court; Concerning Her Devil Who Recommended to Her Seven Kinds of Evil

18. A Spiritual Person Resembles an Animal in Thirty Things as to His Nature

19. The Task of Blessed Love Is Manifold

20. The Six Virtues of St. Dominic

21. Sixteen Reasons Why the Order of Preachers Is Dear to God

22. Brother Heinrich's Fourfold Crown and of the Dignity of St. Dominic

23. About the Burial of St. John the Evangelist

24. How God Receives the Souls in Heaven; How He Crowns Three Kinds of People; How He Greets, Adorns, Praises, and Thanks Them

25. How We Are Now Present in Heaven, Purgatory, and Hell

26. God Consoles the Depressed Brother Baldwin

27. Concerning the End of the Order of Preachers and the Antichrist; Concerning Enoch and Elias

28. The Fivefold Power of Love. Because of the Weakness of People and the Treachery of the World One Must Remain Silent About the Truth

- 1. Three Kinds of Sorrow, Ten Kinds of Benefits, and the Path of Angels and Devils
- 2. Two Kinds of Suffering, Four Kinds of Benefits, and the Manifold Host of Sins
- 3. God Shall Weigh All Innocent Suffering and Also the Blood of Three Kinds of People
- 4. The Power of Marvelous Love Is Manifold; How the Soul Sinks. Four Kinds of Humility. The Sevenfold Beauty of the Loving Soul
- 5. The Purgatory of a Beguine Whom No Prayer Helped Because of Her Selfishness
- 6. How the Soul Praises the Holy Trinity
- 7. How God Praises the Soul in Return
- 8. A Good Person Should Have Three Children for Whom to Pray
- 9. Concerning the Glory of Seventy Men Who Arose with Christ as Testimony
- 10. How Sin Is Like God's Greatness
- 11. A Religious Name Shall Be Exalted. Concerning the Conduct of Sisters. How They Should Pray and Toil with God
- 12. How God Responds to a Brother Concerning What Is Written in This Book
- 13. Ten Kinds of Benefit a Good Person's Prayer Has
- 14. The Purgatory of Bad Priests
- 15. The Purgatory of a Good Priest
- 16. It Is Diabolical to Sin
- 17. This Is a Greeting, Praise, and Prayer of a Sinner
- 18. How God Responds to This
- 19. How Seventeen Kinds of Sin Pursue a Person
- 20. Praise of God in Eight Things. An Offering for Sins
- 21. Why Man Is Rejected and Yet Loved, and How You Should Bless Yourself
- 22. The Seven Things of Judgment; Shame and Good Will
- 23. St. Mary's Prayer, Gabriel's Light, the Child's Blanket, Where the Milk Came from, the Gifts for the Child, the Devils, and the Hunger Cloth
- 24. The Six Kinds of Children of Our Lord God and the Virtues of St. Dominic and How God Has Honored His Order in Four Ways
- 25. Something That One Misses in Heaven in Seven Things; Thereafter Follow Seven Things; the Praise of a Disheartened Person Is Beneficial in Seven Ways
- 26. How God Praises Himself and Celebrates Himself in Song

- 27. The Heavenly Father Received His Son, Jesus, with Twelve Words
- 28. The Seven Crowns of Brother Albert. Disposition Is One Thing, Choice Is Another
- 29. After Ecstasy with God a Person Would Be Like an Angel If He Were to Follow It, and Concerning the Wickedness of the Devil
- 30. Twenty Powers of God's Love and Many Kinds of Names
- 31. Of Ten Powers of Love and That No Creature Can Fully Imagine the Longing of the Soul for God
- 32. The Sublime End of Sister Mechthild
- 33. How Small Sins Harm Perfection and How Through Them the Devil Draws Close to the Soul
- 34. Five New Saints Sent for the Sake of Bad People and How God Will Hereafter Wash Christianity in His Own Blood
- 35. How Sister Mechthild Thanks and Praises God and Prays for Three Kinds of People and for Herself

BOOK VI

- 1. How a Prior or a Prioress or Other Religious Superiors Should Conduct Themselves Toward Those Under Them
- 2. The Rule of a Canon: How He Should Conduct Himself. This Came from God
- 3. God Gives Authority. How Billy Goats Become Lambs
- 4. Discernment and Fear That Preserve the Senses from Earthly Things
- 5. After Love and Desire the Beauty of Creatures Gives Knowledge Along with Sadness
- 6. At the End You Should Have Love, Longing, Fear, and Three Kinds of Sorrow
- 7. Our Self-Will Can Resist the Barbed Hook. The Good Soul Comes Swiftly to God
- 8. Between God and Lucifer There Are Two Kinds of Purgatory. How the Devil Tortures Souls
- 9. The Saints Honor Those Who Honor Them and They Console Them at Their Death
- 10. Prayer, Masses, God's Word, the Lives of Good People, Fasting, and Carenae Free Souls from Purgatory
- 11. How a Student Is Dead and a Dominican Was Seen
- 12. How You Should Conduct Yourself as to Fourteen Things
- 13. How Religious out of Blindness Fend Off Inwardness from Themselves. The Sixfold Power of God's Gift
- 14. Those Who Complain in Suffering Lack Six Things; How One Should Bear Sickness and Contempt
- 15. The Sufferings of Enoch and Elijah, the Last Preachers, and the Wickedness of the Antichrist
- 16. How the Soul of Our Lord Dwells in the Trinity and What Its Task Is; How It Speaks for the Sinner and Concerning the Task of Our Lady
- 17. God Considers the Sinner Good; What a Good Right Will Is; Concerning a Good Burden
- 18. You Should Scrutinize Your Heart at All Times

- 19. Good Intentions That One Cannot Turn into Deeds
- 20. This Book Came About out of a Threefold Favor; Love Flows, It Is Rich and Full of Desire, It Becomes Sick; Who Possesses Heaven; God Bestows Suffering and Consolation as Well
- [21. How Bad Priests Shall Be Humiliated; \[How Preachers Alone Should Preach and Be Bishops;\] Concerning the Last Brothers](#)
- 22. Seven Things, Five of Which One Finds in Heaven and Two on Earth
- 23. How God Speaks with the Soul in Three Places
- 24. How Christ Reveals His Wounds in Days of Suffering. Four Things Knock on Heaven's Gate
- 25. Concerning Burned Love
- 26. Thinking About Death and Living Long Are Good
- 27. How You Should Thank and Ask
- 28. When You Are to Die, Take Leave of Ten Things
- 29. Ten Parts of Divine Fire out of God's Nobility
- 30. Pure Love Has Four Things
- 31. How God Made the Soul. Concerning Pleasure and Pain. How God Is Like a Sphere
- 32. How We Become Like God, St. Mary, the Angels, and the Saints
- 33. Concerning a Strict Chapter to Which a Pilgrim Came Who Turned Out to Be a Great Lord
- 34. Someone Who Despises the World Should Be Honored with Nine Things
- 35. How the Soul of One Blessed Speaks to Her Body on the Last Day
- 36. That John the Baptist Sang Mass for the Poor Girl Was Spiritual Knowledge in the Soul
- 37. You Should Praise God, Lament, and Ask for Twelve Things
- 38. No One Can Destroy God's Heaven. Hell Drives God Out
- 39. The Reflection of God's Radiance by Our Lady and Her Power
- 40. Temptation, the World, and a Good End Test Us
- 41. How God's Splendor Is Reflected in a Human Being and in the Angels
- Sister Mechthild Wrote the Following in a Note to Her Brother B., of the Order of Preachers, Saying:
- 43. This Writing Flowed out of God

BOOK VII

- 1. The Crown and the Dignity of Our Lord Jesus Christ, Which He Shall Receive After the Last Day
- 2. How a Person Prayed for All the Souls on All Souls' Day

- 3. How Beneficial It Is for a Person to Examine His Heart Constantly with Humble Fear
- 4. Our Lord's Switch
- 5. Why the Convent Was Once Undergoing Trials
- 6. The Chapter Room and How a Person Should Examine His Infractions and Weep for Them; Two Golden Pennies and Good Will and Desire
- 7. How a Person May Always Be United with God
- 8. How a Person Seeks God
- 9. How the Loving Soul Praises Our Lord with All Creatures
- 10. This Happened at a Time When There Was Great Turmoil
- 11. How Our Lord Was Seen Looking Like a Worker
- 12. How a Person Should Resist Vain Honor and Temptation
- 13. How Our Lord Was Seen Looking Like a Pilgrim
- 14. God's Choosing and Blessing
- 15. How a Person Who Loves Truth Should Pray
- 16. How a Person Spoke and Prayed
- 17. How Knowledge Speaks to the Conscience
- 18. Suggestions for the Seven Hours for Honoring the Passion of Our Lord
- 19. The Greeting of Our Lady
- 20. How One Should Pray the Ave Maria to Our Lady
- 21. How One Should Examine One's Heart Before Going to God's Table
- 22. Praise of the Heavenly Father
- 23. How One Should Thank the Son
- 24. The Flood of Love
- 25. The Greeting for the Holy Trinity
- 26. How One Should Entreat God in Temptation
- 27. How a Religious Person Should Turn His Heart Away from the World
- 28. The Misfortunes of War
- 29. A Teaching
- 30. A Prayer When Virgins Receive Their Crown
- 31. A Lament

32. How the Works of a Good Person Shine Forth in Relation to the Works of Our Lord

33. A Spiritual Potion

34. Spiritual Food

35. The Seven Psalms

36. A Spiritual Convent

37. The Eternal Feast of the Holy Trinity

38. How a Person in Religious Life Should Daily Lament and Confess His Sins to God

39. How the Devil Rages and Chases About, Bites, and Gnaws When a Loving Soul That Burns with Divine Love Departs This World

40. Thus Does the Loving Soul Speak to Her Dear Lord

41. How a Dominican Father Was Seen

42. The Drink of Honey

43. Of Simple Love, How Wisdom Is Seen

44. Five Sins and Five Virtues

45. Seven Things, Five of Which One Finds in Heaven and Two on Earth

46. How the Soul Presents Herself in Spiritual Poverty

47. One Sin That Is Evil Beyond All Sins

48. How Love Was Seen with Her Maidens

49. Concerning a Lay Brother

50. The Visible Favor of God

51. A Prayer Against Sins of Omission

52. How the Loving Soul Bows Beneath the Hand of God

53. The Prison of Religious People

54. Four Qualities of Faith

55. How a Friend Writes to a Friend

56. How God Touches His Friends with Suffering

57. A Bit About Paradise

58. St. Gabriel

59. How the Message Came Before God

60. How the Child Was Seen

61. How One Should Prepare Oneself for God

62. How the Maidens Serve Their Lady the Queen

63. God's Will Is a Sovereign Lord in All Being

64. How God Serves Man

65. How God Adorns the Soul with Suffering

Notes to Text

Selected Bibliography

Index to Introduction and Text

Translator of This Volume

FRANK TOBIN is professor of German at the University of Nevada, Reno, and serves on the editorial boards of Studia Mystica and Mystics Quarterly. Born in Omaha, Nebraska, Dr. Tobin received a licentiate in philosophy from Berchmanskolleg in Munich in 1960, an M.A. in German from Marquette University in 1964 and a Ph.D. in German from Stanford in 1967. In addition to numerous articles and papers on medieval German thought and literature, his major publications include Mechthild von Magdeburg: A Medieval Mystic in Modern Eyes (Camden House, 1994) and Meister Eckhart: Thought and Language (University of Pennsylvania Press, 1986). Previous contributions to The Classics of Western Spirituality series include his collaboration on Meister Eckhart: Teacher and Preacher and his translation of Henry Suso.

Author of the Preface

MARGOT SCHMIDT is director of the Research Center of Medieval Spirituality, Asceticism and Mystics at the Catholic University of Eichstatt in Germany. Since 1985, she has served as editor of the collection of medieval texts and studies entitled Mystik in Geschichte und Gegenwart: Texte und Untersuchungen. In that series, she produced the first two volumes: she edited and translated the work of Rudolf of Biberach, De VII itinera aeternitatis, into German; the other is a volume of papers read at the Conference Theologia Mystica at Weingarten in November 1986. As of January 1998, the series contains fifteen volumes. She has written extensively on women mystics, especially Mechthild of Magdeburg, Hildegard of Bingen, Mechthild of Hackeborn and Margaret Ebner.

Joseph P Fisher, S.J.
and Bob Reardon
in memoriam

FOREWORD

In completing this translation of Mechthild of Magdeburg's Flowing Light of the Godhead, I have incurred a debt of gratitude to many. First, I would like to thank the publishers Max Niemeyer Verlag for their kind permission to use as the basis of my translation their excellent recent critical text and notes, the lifelong work of the Germanist Hans Neumann. Also, my debt to Margot Schmidt is manifold. The profound knowledge she has transmitted in her scholarship has affected my understanding of Mechthild in ways both palpable and impalpable. More particularly, she generously sent me her excellent translation into modern German of The Flowing Light of the Godhead and the accompanying notes even before publication. The opportunity to compare her renderings with mine saved me from many a misstep. Finally, I wish to thank her for contributing the preface to this volume. My thanks are also due to GertrudJaron Lewis for her support and encouragement, to Bernard McGinn for his thoughtful suggestions, and to Patricia Beckman for her willingness to engage in a lively E-mail dialogue that resulted in several improvements. Lastly, as in the case of several of my previous academic endeavors, Bob Reardon's meticulous scrutiny of the entire manuscript has been invaluable. I can only wish that the finished product does some justice to the help I have received and to Mechthild.

It is with great pleasure that I respond to Frank Tobin's request that I provide a preface for his fine English translation. In his introduction to the text he offers an initial orientation to this rich but difficult book and addresses important themes. To complement his remarks on Mechthild's book as an expression of mysticism, I would like to examine a theme—certainly of central importance—not touched upon there: the human and divine heart.

Mechthild's book is a phenomenon that should not be viewed in isolation—as one mystical document among all the documents of mysticism. Rather, it is the expression of a basic human drive that comes to the surface, sometimes more, sometimes less. To these basic human drives we can reckon hunger, love, sex, and a yearning for God. This last-mentioned drive appears to have been so smothered by the others that today we scarcely still perceive it as a basic drive. And yet, the testimony of the mystics teaches us that the human person in its capacity for God (capax Dei) soars above all other recognized drives and surpasses them in a marvelous and terrifying way, once we have been awakened by the spark of God's spirit or God's love. In the face of this bursting forth of a passion for God, everything else suddenly retreats. An important characteristic of this passion for God is that it irrevocably prevents us from falling back into an all too vapid and tame existence. The passion for God powerfully pushes aside all merely worldly concerns in order to appropriate our entire vitality and our life, in all its aspects, for itself. What thereby occurs is that we become separated and detached from all that is familiar, so that we might give ourselves over with total commitment to the demands of what is eternal.

Out of this interplay of personal experience of God, and an interior command to proclaim and teach, arose the driving forces and goals of mystical literature which took form in confessional, didactic, and admonitory writings. These texts, which articulated the most intimate relationships between God and the human person, or inspired elucidations of salvation history, were fashioned by a consciousness of self that is unique. What Mechthild has preserved in writing The Flowing Light of the Godhead eloquently bears witness to this passion for God.

In essence Mechthild of Magdeburg's book, The Flowing Light of the Godhead, is nothing other than the moving story of God's heart and the human heart, and of Lucifer's cunning attempts to interfere with the ties that join them. Understandably these levels, completely unequal in their power, unleash a highly dramatic life or death struggle. Reeling between exhilarating raptures and collisions with unyielding earthly reality, Mechthild is wrenched this way and that between her incomprehensible experiences of God on the one hand and, on the other, the uncertainty and terror of entering into a state of defenselessness and peril because of her writing. In this state of uncertainty she receives support from her confessor. Through him she received the legitimacy of her mission "to write this book out of God's heart and mouth" (IV 2). In another passage, in response to the astonishment of some people at her unusual disclosures, she claims legitimation from God: "If seven years ago, God had not offered support to my heart with special favor, I would still be silent and would never have written this" (111 1). Similarly, the close of Book Six, probably the work of an editor, formulates it thus: "The writing in this book flowed out of the living Godhead into Sister Mechthild's heart and has been as faithfully set down here as it was given by God out of her heart" (VI 43).

Her mystical understanding under the spell of immediate experiences takes on the intermediary function of supporting the human person and strengthening the church. Regarding her mission of proclamation she perceives the words of Christ: "Truly, I say to you, in this book my heart's blood is written" (V 34). This way of speaking alludes to her own existential giving of herself in her writing to the last drop of blood.

The heart is the principle and center of one's life as a person. It is also the place "where the human being in its own source borders on the mystery of God." According to Karl Rahner heart is a primal word in the sense that it does not derive from some other word. It does not denote the physiological heart muscle as such but rather the original center of the physical-spiritual person before any differentiation into body and soul. This center of the person is in its essence open to other persons and to God. These meanings should be noted when Mechthild speaks of the human heart, but also when she speaks of the heart of God and Lucifer's heart.

1. The Heart of God

Experiencing God becomes in the case of Mechthild a vital mutual interaction between the heart of God and the human heart in which, surprisingly, longing lies in God's heart:

(Soul:) "Lord, you are constantly lovesick for me.
That you have clearly shown personally.
You have written me into your book of the Godhead;
You have painted me in your humanity;
You have buried me in your heart...
Ah, allow me, my dear One, to pour balsam upon you."
(God:) "O One dear to my heart, where shall you find the balm?"
(Soul:) "O Lord, I was going to tear the heart of my soul in two and intended to put you in it." (III 2)

What is new in Mechthild is that the old motif of Christ as Physician is not limited to its traditional meaning of redemption and salvation of the soul, but rather becomes an expression of the unio mystica, in which the lovesick soul receives her fulfillment through Christ, the Physician (as in VII 58). And in the passage quoted just above we see the motif completely reversed. The Lord is lovesick for the soul and she, with complete emotional commitment, wants to be his physician! Eros forces not only the soul under its yoke, but God himself, because he created man out of love and had his Son become man to redeem him. From this Mechthild draws the conclusion: "This same nature forces God to greet us...with holy intimacy" \(IV 14\). This statement finds its place in the tradition of those who speak of God's indwelling in the heart, of his nearness in speaking to us, of elevation to the point of ecstasy, and declare categorically that God by his grace can do this at any time. This intimacy with God is only a foretaste of the everlasting union of God and humanity which Mechthild vividly portrays as a personal happening:

There eye reflects eye,
There spirit flows in spirit,
There hand touches hand,
There mouth speaks to mouth,
And there heart greets heart. (IV 14)

So intense at times is the assimilation of the human heart to the divine heart, as it leaves all earthly things behind, that the soul proclaims: "Lord, because I have no earthly treasure, I do not have an earthly heart either. For you, Lord, are my treasure, just as you are also my heart; and you alone are my good" (IV 7).

In spite of the sublimity of the union of God and humanity in the assimilation of heart by heart, the overwhelming power of God encounters only weakness in the human heart: "Whoever were to give himself over to the ecstasy that comes from God... would enter into such great delight and such holy knowledge that no heart would be able to bear it" (V 29).

Advanced in age, Mechthild, looking back in Book Six, reflects on the attraction and tension existing between human and divine hearts in order to clarify that, though the first step is always God attracting and the divine heart enticing, there can be no progress without a reaction of the human heart. Mechthild portrays as a love game how the divine heart goes about wooing.

When God sees fit to let his divine heart shine forth in love toward the very blessed soul so intensely that a small spark alights on the cold soul and she receives so much that the heart of this person begins to glow, his soul to melt, and his eyes to flow, then our Lord would like to make an earthly person so heavenly that one actually wants to follow, love, and see God in him. And the person's senses say: "No, I can be of much use in external matters." And it is especially cloistered people who say this when they are being especially clever. (VI 13)

Mechthild is here criticizing the neglect of interior religious training, which begins with the perceptivity and formation of the heart. In an allegory about the divine fire that is supposed to express something about the greatness and power of God to act, she suddenly breaks off and stammers:

Whoever wishes to speak more about this,
Let him prostrate himself in this fire
And see and taste how the Godhead flows,
How humanity pours,
How the Holy Spirit wrestles,
And vanquishes many a heart,
Forcing it to love God intensely. (VI 29)

The central focal point is always the heart which conquers and binds together what is divine and what is human. Indeed, on the basis of her experience of God she lays claim to kinship with God. She herself originates spiritually from the heart of the Father, corporeally from the heart of the Son, and has been purified by the Spirit of both. Thus elevated through divine grace Mechthild considers herself to be vitally subsumed into the life of the Trinity and she calls out to the Trinity:

Lord, heavenly Father, you are my heart.
Lord Jesus Christ, you are my body.
Lord Holy Spirit, you are my breath. (V 6)

It is as if the pulse of the three divine Persons, expanding mysteriously from heart to heart, was beating in her.

Theologically speaking, this image of physical oneness links characteristics specific to each Person of the Trinity with the fact that the human person to its very core is directed essentially to God. The creative energy of the human heart reacts to the unfathomable power of the Father Creator. The incarnation of the Son becomes the formative, molding power of earthly life, even of the body itself. From the power of the Holy Spirit as the Giver of Life the whole human person breathes and itself acts as inspired. Among the many and often difficult images for the Trinity in Mechthild's writings this one, in its compactness and profundity with respect to our close kinship with God, is the one that expresses most powerfully the evidence for the Trinity in the human person and for its transference into the human person. A life based on this excludes in its very nature a feeling of emptiness and homelessness. On the contrary, it makes the human heart secure. For God has placed it "in his glowing heart," where he, eternally craving for love, "neither increases nor decreases," but remains "as he always was" (14). This is yet another confirmation that eros lies within God himself.

2. The Goal of the Human Heart

Mechthild's basic assertion about the human heart is its insatiable longing for God. It comes to the fore as the infinite relationship reveals itself. Humans as finite beings reach out toward the infinite being of God. And the goal, for Mechthild, is attained in a vital infinite relationship of heights and depths which is stirred by intense emotions. It is only to pure longing that God reveals himself and says:

When I shine, you shall glow.
When I flow, you shall become wet.

When you sigh, you draw my divine heart into you....
...a blissful abiding prevails between us. (II 6)

The state existing between the divine and the human heart is described as a "blissful abiding," a blessed waiting for the other whose fulfillment presupposes leaving everything of this earth behind. Driven by its intense desire to live fully, the soul responds in strong, emotionally-charged words that nevertheless in their refinement show reserve:

Lord, then I shall persevere in hunger and thirst
In pursuing and in pleasure
Till that playful hour
When from your divine mouth
The chosen words shall flow
That are heard by no one
But the soul alone
That has stripped itself of the earth
And puts her ear next to your mouth.
She, indeed, grasps the treasure of love!

The soul that has experienced many raptures and blissful ecstasies suffers all the more when God withdraws his presence, and longing increases.⁴ Longing rises to the paradox that in spite of all the levels of rapture and union with God-and beyond them-the goal is far from attained; and that the highest stage in this life ultimately remains that of hungering and thirsting for God. This blessed longing is the final attitude to be assumed by the human heart. The end of a love dialogue blurts this out like a cry for help:

I have such a hunger for the heavenly Father that I forget all cares. And I so thirst for his Son that it removes from me all earthly desires. And I have such a passionate need for the Spirit of them both that it goes beyond the wisdom of the Father, which I cannot grasp; and beyond the Son's suffering, which I cannot bear; and beyond the consolation of the Holy Spirit, which I cannot receive.

Whoever becomes entangled in longing such as this must forever hang blessedly fettered in God. (111 3)

This antithetical paradox is the linguistic equivalent of an inscrutable, lofty stage of experiencing God. Thus she says: "Yearning love causes a pure heart much sweet anguish" (111 24). For the soul's wish to attain the vision of and union with God remains unfulfilled on this earth in spite of any foretaste and all the heart-rending laments:

O Lord, if it could ever happen to me that I might gaze upon you as my heart desires and hold you in my arms, then the divine pleasures of your love would needs permeate my soul to the degree possible for people on earth. What I would be willing to suffer thereafter has never been seen by human eyes. Indeed, a thousand deaths were too little.... If you, Lord, can bear it, let me long pursue you in yearning. (111 23)

At the end of her life in Helfta, in the context of a meditation on the seven penitential psalms in which she reflects on death, she writes:

If we were to think of this hour often, all our pride would sink to the ground, as he [God] shall then reveal his glorious countenance to us. Then my soul shall have its favorite pastime. What I now painfully long for can never happen on earth as my heart would wish it. (VII 35)

What remains in the heart to the end is the strength to yearn longingly. Hence she begs her Lord in the same passage to "cover me with the mantle of your long-cherished desire."

3. The Power and Impotence of the Heart

Up to now we have seen that it is only by accepting God's love that the soul is empowered because in opening itself to the unfathomable ground of God, the imperilment of one's own heart is exposed. It is primarily the superior power of God's love which causes inexpressible suffering: "Bright love of playful flood ...causes [the heart] to die without death" (111 13). The agonies of this love are compared in detail with the passion of Christ, with the result that devotion to the passion turns into a mysticism of suffering in which pain loses its bitter quality as one concentrates on following Christ and on his suffering as redemption and reparation-all the more so when the heart itself is affected:

She is pierced in the side by a blind man
With a sweet spear of innocent love.
From her heart flows forth many a holy teaching. (III 10)⁵

5 Cf. also my detailed study of this theme: "'Frau Pein, ihr seid mein nachstes Kleid.' Zur Leidensmystik im Fließenden Licht der Gottheit der Mechthild von Magdeburg," Die dunkle Nacht der Sinne, ed. Gotthart Fuchs (Dusseldorf, 1989), 63-107.

The power and authority of this teaching here does not derive from book-learning. Rather, her "teaching" flows forth from the capacity of her heart for suffering, which God has totally consigned to himself. This remains a mystery to the speculative intellect. For this reason she later distances herself from her theologically-schooled fellow nuns in Helfta.⁶ Earthly wisdom is contrasted with supernatural, heavenly wisdom. Its preeminence is stressed further by a vision of Christ in VI 24. In a vision Mechthild sees the bloody wound in the heart of Jesus and is instructed that divine blood had to be shed if we were to be saved.

All suffering and humiliation are just a knocking at the gate of heaven up to the time when my heart's blood poured onto this earth. Only then was heaven opened. (VI 24)'

This vision explains that the blood from the heart of Christ, taken as his whole suffering during the passion, calls out for all times on behalf of humankind, because of its own weakness, to the mercy of the Father. In this redemptive suffering all human suffering is subsumed. Christ does not free Mechthild from her suffering, but rather strengthens her in her imitation of him as a kind of overflowing of love, as suffering in reparation with the promise of final glory, of which she experiences a foretaste as the assurance of future glory. From the tension caused by this yearning hope, strength of heart increases and can thus say: "Lovely love with guileless gift blots out the surly heart's complaint" (III 13).

According to Mechthild's words, an unsuspectedly strong power grows in the heart so that "a person retains a heart alien to all earthly things, so alien that, if a person loses earthly things, his heart becomes buoyant and his soul unfettered" (VI 4).

Expanding on such a high degree of detachment-one is reminded of the teaching of Meister Eckhart-she continues:

No one possesses the whole of heaven in his heart but he alone who has removed himself from all consolation and all favors in this world....And yet God cannot restrain himself-and we cannot do without it-from giving us his abundance and his favor. (VI 20)

Despite all her joy in suffering, and in view of human frailty, her trust in God's mercy carries the day. It is so great that even human weakness, when it is the only possibility, is brought before God's countenance and serves even in this form as a song of praise:

The impotence of the heart rings in song so beautifully before God
That God loves the notes
That sing deep in the heart....
Then God's sweet gift shall flow into their hearts. (VII 36)

There are, however, opposing powers constantly at work that can distract the human heart from its destiny, and can pull it down and entangle it in purely finite goals. Suggestions whispered by the devil (under the seductive guise of total surrender as a sign of holiness), where it is a question of keeping within bounds and of being chaste, cannot shake a heart that has been steeled in suffering and thus possesses the power of discernment. In a dialogue with the devil, in response to his suggestions, she says:

If I were to tell everyone the secrets of my heart, things would be quite nice for me in the short term. But then you would intently strive to make the fun end badly. You would do this so that I might fall into doubt, sadness, unbelief, impurity, and thereafter into everlasting anguish. Another reason you are doing this is so that I might imagine that you come to me thus because I am so holy. (IV 2)

Out of the same certainty of her heart she responds:

In every movement of my heart,
In every bit of knowledge of my senses,
And in the whole nobility of my soul,
I could never find anything else
But that it is diabolical that one commit a sin. (V 16)

For out of Lucifer flows "ceaselessly from his fiery heart.. all sin and shame." She likewise recognizes that suffering "is born of Lucifer's heart" (IV 12). And the deepest pit of hell, duplicity, "is begotten in Lucifer's heart" (11 26). She fights on against all these destructive powers. Her chief concern is peace of heart, but not at any price. The "holiest peace of heart... comes from keeping one's integrity in all that one does" (V 22). Truth comes before any fraudulent peace. Because Mechthild takes no pride in her being divinely favored and admits that she displays self-effacement again and again in spite of her experiences of God, she says:

I dare not, alas, claim credit
For everything that I say about love.
It is God, rather, who is thereby reaching out
To all those chosen in his heart. (IV 19)

When Mechthild speaks here of chosen hearts as a parallel or allusion to the chosen "noble hearts" of courtly poetry, which foster courtly love in a special way in a culture of the heart, then the nobility which she claims for the soul derives, for her, from a divine origin. This is perceived in the depths of the heart when all of one's own activity there ceases. She only speaks of it with great reserve: "Divine sweetness is enjoyed in the solitude of the heart" (VI 2).

The solitude or desert wilderness of the heart points, by way of an image, to the inaccessible, secluded location of a doublefaceted experience of God. Terrifying in his infinite remoteness, emptiness, and immensity, God outdoes himself by bringing joy through his nearness. Thus she says: "Mary Magdalene, I live with you in the desert wilderness, because all things are foreign to me except God alone" \(11 24\).' Nearness of God surpasses all human consolation, leaving it far behind. God alone suffices. And yet words fail her in her blessed state:

The voice of love and the melody of the heart must be left unrendered,
For they can be captured by no merely human hand! (II 25)

Ultimately Mechthild forswears happiness with God for the sake of more genuine praise, wishing nothing more for herself. And thus, beset by the terrors of the dark night of God's remoteness and bereft of all consolation amid attacks of disbelief, she experiences how suddenly, as though through a miracle, bitter "gall has become honey for the palate of my soul" \(IV 12\) .9 In this highly dramatized dialogue of declaration and response Mechthild anticipates succinctly the central themes of the Spanish mysticism of Teresa of Avila and John of the Cross. Repeatedly she speaks of the various degrees of purification as a precondition for grasping God more profoundly, as the fruit of a higher level of love, in the same way as does Richard of St. Victor: "God bestows vision in proportion to love."

The final purification in the night of the senses and the intellect is described tersely and penetratingly in VI 12, as John of the Cross will develop it later in detail in the night canticles of his poetic theology. Thus Mechthild is an early classic witness for the human heart struggling with the love of God that consumes everything and demands all human energies. She experiences this struggle and all its consequences, be it the increase in her own capacity for suffering as the noblest form of praise and gratitude, or in courageously speaking prophetically to her times.

Because of the demanding nature of its language and content, it is consequently a great service Frank Tobin has performed in making this profound book accessible in its totality to the English-speaking world, for the first time with a solid edition of the original as the textual base. A commanding and fascinating female figure of the thirteenth century is thereby given the opportunity to speak. Alongside the manifestly intimate character of her writing, and going beyond what has relevance for her personal life, she assigns to her book a public function. Everything was done solely "for God's honor" and "for the book's teaching."

KEY TO ABBREVIATIONS

I. The abbreviations used for the books of the Bible follow the practice of the New American Bible.

II. Other frequently cited works are abbreviated as follows:

FL: Mechthild of Magdeburg's Flowing Light of the Godhead.

Lux div.: The Lux divinitatis, the Latin version of the FL. This can be found in Revelationes Gertrudianae ac Mechtildianae. 1875-77. Ed. Solesmes Monks (Louis Paquelin). 2 Vols. Poitiers and Paris: Oudin, 1875, 1877. Vol. 2: Sororis Mechtildis Lux divinitatis. 423-643.

Morel: Offenbarungen der Schwester Mechthild von Magdeburg oder Das fließende Licht der Gottheit. Aus der einzigen Handschrift des Stiftes Einsiedeln. Ed. Gall Morel. Regensburg, 1869. Reprinted, Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1963, 1976, 1980. (This was the only edition of the FL available until 1990.)

N I and N II: Das fließende Licht der Gottheit. Nach der Einsiedler Handschrift in kritischem Vergleich mit der gesamten Überlieferung. Ed. Hans Neumann. Munich: Artemis. Vol. 1 (1990): Text. The book, chapter, and line (s) in the FL being referred to are given, followed by N I plus the page number in Vol. 1; e.g., V 34, 41-43; N 1 68. Vol. 2 (1993): Untersuchungen (Investigations). References to Neumann's notes given by the text they refer to, followed by N II plus the page number in Vol. 2; e.g., note to I 28, 5; N 11 19.

Neumann 1964: "Beiträge zur Textgeschichte des 'Fließenden Lichts der Gottheit' und zur Lebensgeschichte Mechthilds von Magdeburg." In Altdeutsche und altniederländische Mystik. Ed. Kurt Ruh. Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1964. 175-239.

Schmidt: Mechthild von Magdeburg. Das fließende Licht der Gottheit. Zweite, neubearbeitete Übersetzung mit Einführung and Kommentar von Margot Schmidt. Stuttgart-Bad Cannstatt: Frommann-Holzboog, 1995. References are to the page preceded, where appropriate, by the note number; e.g., note 292, p. 397.

INTRODUCTION

1. The Beguines

Mechthild of Magdeburg (c. 1208-c. 1282/94), the author of The Flowing Light of the Godhead offered here in translation, lived most of her life as a beguine; and even though it would be taking matters to extremes to claim a type of spirituality specific to beguines,' a brief examination of their way of life, ideals, and the social situation in which the movement arose, flourished, and declined can contribute much to our understanding and appreciation of her book.^z Beguines were women who led lives of voluntary poverty, chastity, and religious devotion without joining an approved religious order. The movement began in the larger towns of the Low Countries during the twelfth century and spread south as far as Cologne and Strassburg, and also to the German-speaking East. It flourished from about 1220 to 1318 and gradually died out because of widespread ecclesiastical opposition. In Mechthild's time in Germany beguines usually lived in a communal house, sustaining themselves through support from their families, gifts, and work. Typical forms of work were nursing, weaving, spinning, embroidery, preparing the dead for burial, and housework for others.

The reasons motivating women to undertake this way of life seem to be the same as those contributing to the founding of the Franciscan and Dominican orders about the same time: the wish to return to the ideals of early Christianity and imitate more closely the lives of the apostles. Beguines strove to be unworldly while living in the world. Spending much time in prayer, both communal and private, attending mass and other church services, frequenting the sacraments, practicing moderate asceticism, and performing menial work, with nothing to call their own-not even themselves-they desired only to find favor with their divine Bridegroom and sought to elevate those around them more by leading exemplary apostolic Christian lives than by teaching.

Beguine houses usually fell under the jurisdiction of the local parish priest, but because of the similarities in mode of life and ideals beguines were often drawn into close contact with nearby Franciscan or Dominican communities. In contrast to earlier religious orders, they, like the beguines, settled in towns in order to carry out their apostolic work. From the beginning the beguines met with criticism from some quarters because they belonged to no ecclesiastically approved order and, hence, supervision over them was minimal. Also, because many beguine communities were developing into centers of mysticism and were providing northern Europe with its first mystical writings in the vernacular, questions of religious orthodoxy among them soon arose. This opposition to the beguines and the reasons for it are worth noting because the atmosphere thus created provides an essential part of the context in which Mechthild was writing. In composing her book Mechthild was faced with addressing the following two questions: What gave her, a woman with no formal education or special training in theology and belonging to no approved order, the right to speak out on theological matters and to criticize sharply the clergy, even its most prominent members? And by whose authority did she write, or why should she have expected her words to be taken seriously?

Though opposition to the beguines was in evidence from the beginning among those who viewed all change with suspicion, early papal pronouncements encouraged the movement. Pope Honorius III expressed approval of communities of pious women of northern continental Europe, and Pope Gregory IX's bull Gloriam virginalem extended papal protection to the "chaste virgins of Teutonia," which probably meant both those in Germany and those in the German-speaking parts of the Low Countries. Soon, however, those voicing criticism gained strength. Besides the misgivings arising from beguines not being members of an approved order, they were often accused of hypocrisy and laziness because, it was said, they lived on alms and refused to work. There were also charges that false piety cloaked lives of gross sensuality.

In the course of the thirteenth century several synods in Germany dealt with matters relating to beguines and passed decrees that forbade their wandering about and required them to live in communal houses, to work to support themselves, and to obey their parish priests; at two synods held late in Mechthild's life or shortly afterward (Trier, 1277, and Eichstatt, 1284) beguines were warned against the preaching of false doctrine. Of special interest for our purposes is a synod held in Magdeburg in 1261, when Mechthild was well along in her writing and parts of her book were no doubt already in circulation.' The synod, presided over by Archbishop Rupert, declared that beguines should, like other parishioners, obey their parish priests or be excommunicated.'

Not until well after Mechthild's death, however, did the forces opposed to beguines carry the day and deal serious blows to the vitality of the movement. In 1312 the Council of Vienne called for an inquisitional investigation of beguines and beghardstheir male counterparts-in Germany. It also decreed that beguine communities were to be dissolved and that such organizations should be permanently forbidden, but it left open the possibility for truly faithful women to live lives of penance and humility in common. Because of the decrees of the Council of Vienne and the inconsistent policies of the popes toward beguines, the movement declined, though some communities continued in the Low Countries and the Rhineland until quite recently. During the early decades of the fourteenth century most beguine communities in Germany resolved their precarious position by embracing the rule of an established order (Franciscan, Dominican, or Cistercian) and lived much as they had before, but under the guidance and supervision that these orders provided.

2. Mechthild's Life

The few facts we have about Mechthild's life come from her own writings, from the Latin translation of the FL (the Lux divinitatis), and from the forewords to them written anonymously. Scholars have generally accepted this information as trustworthy, and from it the following picture emerges.' Mechthild was born about 1208 into a noble family. Just what level of nobility, however, is a matter of conjecture and dispute. Schmidt places the family home within the archdiocese of Magdeburg.' Neumann describes her birthplace as the western Middlemarch.' The most convincing evidence for her being well born is the obvious familiarity her book shows with life in the castle and with courtly culture, especially courtly literature. Mechthild makes the point more than once that she is unlearned; that is, that she knows little Latin and has had no formal training in theology, which might invest her words with religious authority; but much of her writing shows a detailed knowledge of both the forms and content of the literature of the German high courtly period drawing to a close during her youth.

At the age of twelve, she tells us, she was "greeted" by the Holy Spirit-her expression for a special outpouring of divine favor and this continued daily for over three decades, well into the time when she was writing the FL. About 1230, as a young woman in her early twenties, she left the comforts of home to take up the life of a beguine in the not-too-distant town of Magdeburg, where she knew but one person; and even this one friendship she considered a spiritual liability, since she feared that, because of it, God might withdraw the spiritual divine love and contempt of the world that she sought (IV 2).

About 1250, in her forties, she revealed the extraordinary spiritual favors she has been experiencing to her confessor, probably the Dominican Heinrich of Halle. He urged her to continue her present way of life in cheerful confidence, and he commanded her to write the book "out of God's heart and mouth" (IV2).$ During the next ten years Mechthild completed the first five books of the FL, after which she may have originally considered her task completed. However, sometime during the following ten years (1260-70) she wrote Book VI, and still later composed Book VII.

Concerning the external details of Mechthild's life as a beguine in Magdeburg we know very little. We assume she lived in a house of beguines, and there is some evidence that she was, for a time, the superior of the community. She suffered through periods of sickness and reacted strongly to criticism of and threats against her book. She may have left Magdeburg occasionally because of sickness or hostility and returned to her relatives. But it is clear that she could count many supporters as well as detractors. The Lux divinitatis, the Latin translation of the first six books of the FL, reports that Baldwin, Mechthild's brother, was accepted into the Dominican order because of the merits of his sister.' Indeed, it was from the Order of Preachers, which she frequently singles out for special praise, that she seems to have derived much of her support.

It was in the Cistercian community at Helfta, however, that Mechthild spent her final years and wrote the seventh and final book of the FL. Under the guidance of its second abbess, Gertrud of Hackeborn (1250-91), Helfta was becoming known for its piety and learning. Here Mechthild retreated about 1270. There are signs that she felt ill at ease in this new environment, surrounded by women of whom many had enjoyed an education far superior to hers and could read and write Latin. This gave them direct access to the spiritual and theological traditions that Mechthild could only learn of secondhand. And yet these same nuns esteemed her and sought out her advice in spiritual matters (VII 21).

Two of these nuns themselves produced mystical texts that show clearly the influence of the FL. The first of these, The Book of Special Grace (Liber specialis gratiae), written down by two nuns after 1291, contains the revelations of Mechthild of Hackeborn (+1298 or 1299), sister of the aforementioned abbess. In the second book, known as The Herald of Divine Love (Legatus divinae pietatis), Gertrud of Helfta, "the Great" (+1301 or 1302), wrote an account of her interior life. Because these writings were in Latin, they enjoyed a wider readership than the FL and continued to be influential long after Mechthild of Magdeburg's vernacular work had disappeared, aside from anonymous bits that were here and there subsumed into manuals of piety. Here at Helfta, feeble and blind, which necessitated that she dictate the final chapters of Book VII, Mechthild finished out her life. The year of her death is uncertain-either about 1282 or about 1294.

3. The Flowing Light of the Godhead: a History of the Text

Since a manuscript of the FL was discovered in 1861 and became an object of scholarly investigation, the relationship of the text, as we have it, to the original document that Mechthild actually authored has been the object of much serious scholarship and debate. Understanding the problems and the degree to which they have been resolved is important for an intelligent reading of the text. The matter is perhaps best approached chronologically.

Mechthild originally wrote her book in Middle Low German, whereby Middle refers to the period in which the language was spoken and written-roughly 1050-1450-and Low refers to its geographical range-northern Germany.¹⁰ This original version has been lost, and there seems to be little hope of its recovery. Concerning this lost version, scholars have raised the question of how great a part Heinrich of Halle, Mechthild's confessor and spiritual advisor, played in its genesis. Heinrich, identified as lector" at the Dominican house in Ruppin after 1261 and member of the new Dominican community in Halle after about 1270, edited the first six books of the FL. He preceded Mechthild in death and seems to have had no influence on Book VII. Early scholarship gave him an important role in the genesis of Mechthild's book, claiming that he had altered greatly the content, style, and order of the text. More recently, Neumann has produced convincing evidence to show that Heinrich's influence on Mechthild's writing was minimal: that he confined himself to dividing the text into chapters while respecting Mechthild both as a person chosen by God to receive and impart special spiritual favors and as a talented writer. Some have suggested that Heinrich may have occasionally influenced the wording of sections dealing with difficult theological matters, where an orthodox formulation was a primary concern.' In general, however, there is now prevailing agreement that Heinrich let Mechthild's text speak for itself. And Neumann thinks there is good reason to believe that Mechthild herself participated in the editing process." just who is responsible for the chapter headings (which in the version we have are, with some inconsistencies, listed both at the beginning of each book and placed at the beginning of each chapter) is difficult to say. Because they differ in style from the rest of the text, they are probably not the work of Mechthild herself. Because they are at times misleading or less than apt, it is unlikely that they are Heinrich's doing. The headings of Book VII, because they differ markedly in style from those of the earlier books, must be attributed to sources other than the writer of the chapter headings of the first six books. Possibly they are the work of nuns at Helfta.

Books I through VI of the FL were translated into Latin, probably by two or more Dominicans in Halle shortly after Mechthild's death but, in any case, before 1298. The translators were apparently unaware of Book VII, composed at Helfta. This Latin version, the Lux divinitatis, changes the original order of the text, grouping material according to subject matter. The translators have toned down Mechthild's criticism of the clergy and some of her erotic imagery, and they occasionally offer an interpretation rather than a translation of a phrase or a sentence in the original. Otherwise, they demonstrate a solid understanding of the text and competence in translating it. The Latin translation is helpful in determining the meaning of Mechthild's occasionally obscure phrasing and serves as a welcome aid in correcting obvious corruptions in the vernacular version we possess.

What, then, in the absence of the original, is the nature of this surviving vernacular version, and what is its relationship to Mechthild's text? Somehow, a copy of Mechthild's work in the original Middle Low German¹⁴ fell into the hands of a secular priest in Basel named Heinrich of Nordlingen, confessor and spiritual advisor in many convents nearby. He supported mystical spirituality, was in contact with the Dominican John Tattler and possibly with Henry Suso as well, and corresponded with several mystically favored nuns. As we learn from a letter he wrote to the Dominican nun Margaret Ebner, to whom he is sending a copy of the FL, he was greatly moved by Mechthild's writing but, coming as he did from Bavaria and having worked first in Franconia and then in Swiss Basel, he found the German so strange that he realized it would have to be recast in Middle High German, the language of the German-speaking South, if it were to be read in that region with profit. Whether Heinrich did much of the translating himself or whether he delegated it to others in his circle in Basel, the task took two years. It is upon this version, existing in only one complete manuscript (ms E), discovered in 1861 in the library of the Benedictine monastery in Einsiedeln, Switzerland, that we must rely for access to Mechthild's lost original.

How close is this Middle High German version to the FL as it left Mechthild's hands? And is it possible to reconstruct the original from this version? To begin with the second question: Because the language of the area around Magdeburg was unstable at the time-admitting influences from several German dialects and forming no consistent internal linguistic unity-and hence, from the point of view of the present, unpredictable, scholars have never seriously considered attempting a full-scale reconstruction. This being said and despite Heinrich of Nordlingen's bafflement, one should not exaggerate the dissimilarities between these forms of medieval German. They are not different languages but rather different dialects of the same basic language and share to a large extent the same vocabulary. Most of the differences are in spelling and sound, the consequences of the second consonant shift. This and Mechthild's frequent use of rhyme enables philologists to ascertain the probable original forms of many words. Thus, though ms E must remain the basis for constructing a critical text-and one that must remain Middle High German-this is no cause for despair. As Neumann in his early study of ms E reassures us, the version originating in Basel shows that great pains were taken to render its source accurately." The translators were aided, he maintains, by the nature of Mechthild's language and thought, which transcends dialect and geography. Mechthild's modes of expression are often taken from the knightly-courtly world. The ideals and concepts of this world, drawn from a class culture spread throughout Europe, changed very little when transferred from a north German to a south German dialect. Neumann considers it an overstatement to call the Basel version a translation of its source. It is, rather, merely a "transplanting" or "transferring."

Until quite recently all work on Mechthild and all translations of the FL were based on an edition of ms E done by Gall Morel, the Benedictine librarian at Einsiedeln, and completed in 1869. This edition was reprinted three times (1963, 1976, and 1980) despite its many shortcomings. The desperate lack of a critical edition was finally ended with the publication of Hans Neumann's edition in 1990 (Vol. 1: Text) and 1993 (Vol. 2: Investigations), brought to completion by Gisela Vollmann-Profe. Neumann corrected the many misreadings of Morel's edition and made other emendations based on manuscripts containing fragments of the FL found since the publication of the Morel edition, on comparisons with the Lux divinitatis, and on the wealth of scholarship on Mechthild that has appeared during the past 130 years, to which Neumann himself is, perhaps, the foremost contributor." The translation presented here is the first in English based on the new critical edition.

4. The Flowing Light of the Godhead as literature

The FL has often been described as a unique document with no obvious antecedents or descendants whose singularity defeats all attempts to categorize it. The frequent medieval term for similar texts is revelationes (revelations) ; but if we take the term seriously, or a related description sometimes applied to it in German: Visionsbuch or Visionenbuch (visionary book or book of visions), we seem to be excluding much of the content of the FL from our definition. Many chapters deal with revelatory material only by the widest stretch of the imagination." Mechthild's first direct description of something she says she experienced in a vision (as opposed to ecstasy) does not occur until 11 3. Thus, categorization of her book remains a problem.

Compared to other mystical and religious writings in the vernacular, Mechthild's efforts are remarkable for how literary they are. Mechthild is not alone in turning her experiences into literature. One might well have to admit, for example, that Hadewijch writes more consistently at a high poetic level. What distinguishes Mechthild's book from the others is the variety of genres-literary as well as those less literary in nature-that she employs in formulating her thoughts. Most visionary writers of her time and in the generations after her seem to be passive in formulating their experiences. They wish simply and unadornedly to report what they have seen and heard, risking no changes that might contaminate the experience. Mechthild, on the contrary, seems to consider the experience as raw material that needs to be reflected upon, formed, and fashioned before it can become part of her book.

In her search for suitable forms she ranges far and wide, employing most genres available to an author of her time. Their number and variety are remarkable. Among the studies devoted to this, that of Wolfgang Mohr has been the best received.' His list spans the spectrum, from the genres and sub-genres of courtly literature to forms originating in folk culture and, of course, many forms drawn from religious sources. Simplifying Mohr's list, one can note the following major forms in the FL: 1. Religious genres: the vision," hymn, sermon, spiritual instruction and tract, prayer, liturgy, litany, and prophetic literature. 2. Courtly genres: courtly-love poetry, allegorical dialogue, dialogue between the lovers, the messenger's song (Botenlied), and the exchange (Wechsel). 3. Other genres: autobiography, drama, epigrammatic poetry and wisdom literature, anecdote, letter, parody, nursery rhyme, and polemics.

While it would be rash to assume on the part of Mechthild in the case of each chapter a conscious effort to exploit a well-established genre, the presence of a wealth of traditional forms, which is the distinguishing characteristic of the FL, can hardly be accidental. Intentionally or not, Mechthild, through her extensive absorption of the many kinds of writing to which she was exposed, wrote a book whose paradoxical nature is that its unity consists, in part, in its diversity of forms.

Mechthild's imagery is rich and varied. As reflected in the book's divinely received title, images of flowing and light abound. Flowing is often an outpouring from God, and dazzling light radiates forth from God and the angels, surrounding the souls of the blessed. Other images point ahead to Meister Eckhart; for example, her play with iht (something) and niht (nothing), or her mention of the wiiestenunge (the desert). She takes her metaphors from simple things, such as wine, a sphere, the dew, or a mountain.

In her visions Mechthild is able to create a vivid chart of supernatural geography: heaven (I 1), hell (I 21), purgatory (I 8), and paradise (VII 57). She puts upon a stage before us the drama of the end of time, as the forces of good and evil enter their final struggle (IV 27). Through lively dialogue she makes the devils come alive (IV 2 and VII 39). It is this cosmic dimension of many of her visions that distinguishes Mechthild from the women visionaries to follow, who confine themselves to reporting visionary experiences of a personal and private world. Mechthild, too, describes many visions private and intimate in nature. She is, however, also able to put before our eyes scenes of great significance for the history of salvation; and she paints such scenes from a privileged point of view.

Besides allegorical dialogues, such as ones between Love and the soul (I 2 and I 24) and between the soul and the senses (I 44), Mechthild, in the tradition of the bestiary, creates an allegorical animal that represents the truly spiritual person (IV 18). She also creates an allegorical house in which she dwells (VII 48), an allegorical convent (VII 36), and the allegorical crown Christ shall wear in heaven after the Last Judgment (VII 1). Especially striking in her depictions, whether meant literally or metaphorically, is the strong sense of order she evokes and how she expresses the worth of someone—whether angel, saint, or damned soul—by the place she assigns each in the space she creates.

5. The Flowing Light of the Godhead as an Expression of Mysticism

One could argue that the above heading is misleading if the following remarks are intended to address the religious content of the FL in its totality, and not just certain parts that are by general consensus mystical. Certainly there are sections of the book in which the subject matter and its treatment are so lacking in mystical dimensions that the term cannot be appropriately applied to the book as a whole. Consider, for example, the chapters in which Mechthild offers practical advice to religious superiors (VI 1) and canons (VI 2), or the chapter, enlightened perhaps at the time but an embarrassment to a present-day admirer of Mechthild, in which she counsels how one should conduct oneself in dealing with Jews (IV 11). In spite of this justifiable objection, I would like to retain the term because, once the term is understood as it is intended, I think it well describes the spirit in which the FL was composed.

If one thinks, as I do, that a most unfortunate aspect of many studies on mysticism has been the focus on it as an experience, and if one then chooses, with Bernard McGinn, the working definition of mysticism as a direct or immediate consciousness or awareness of the presence of God, then the term mystical seems apt to describe the whole FL.²¹ It is Mechthild's conviction that she has been favored with a special consciousness of God's presence that permeates the book and authorizes her. Without it she could not be its author. Without it she would have no authority to write about spiritual matters, whether the longing the divine Lover and the beloved soul feel for each other or a vision depicting the torments of the damned. As her description of God's greeting makes clear (I 2), this heightened awareness of God's presence is not and cannot be a lasting or constant state. Its impact, however, creates in Mechthild the ever-present conviction that she is divinely empowered to teach and to criticize; and this conviction informs not only the lyrical descriptions of her moments of special favor and the writing down of her visions, but every last bit of the book, even, or especially, when Mechthild finds writing a burden from which she would gladly be released.

Mechthild develops no system of theology or spiritual teaching of her own that one can easily summarize, though she does express a few thoughts that have a ring of originality. Her strengths lie elsewhere—in her ability to describe lyrically the relationship of God and the soul, or to depict vividly the heavenly heights or the infernal depths. Because, however, the FL is divided into so many discrete books and chapters with no immediately recognizable principle of organization, a brief presentation of some of her characteristic thoughts or themes is offered here to provide initial orientation.

Love is the force that compels Mechthild to write, and love is what determines the hierarchy of values in her world. Especially in the early books Mechthild's way of describing love is strongly lyrical. Chapters 1 and 2 of Book I are two of her poetically best compositions. They both set the lyrical tone and introduce us to the dominant theme of divine love—both God's love for the soul and the soul's for God. While God's favor cannot be earned or effected by human actions, one can remove the obstacles to God's action in the soul by getting beyond oneself (iüberkommen) and by having become nothing (ze nihte worden, I 2).

In I 1 Mechthild creates a dialogue between Love and the soul to illustrate how the soul is to empty herself. The soul complains that Love has taken everything from her: childhood, youth, wealth, friends, relatives, honor, and even health, consuming her flesh and blood. Love counters by listing what the soul has received in return: heavenly freedom, virtue, spiritual riches, knowledge; and she has been purified and drawn into God. When the soul continues to complain, Love offers itself to her and the soul feels abundantly recompensed.

In Chapter 2 Mechthild presents us with a poetically charged description of the divine "greeting," which she first experienced in her twelfth year and which, at the time of her writing IV 2, had continued for more than thirty-one years. So overwhelming has this experience been that it has made even major venial sins impossible. Here, at the outset of her book, she tries to recreate this defining experience of God's favor in words and to describe the heights to which this greeting lets her soar. These first two chapters set the tone for the lyricism of love that continues intermittently throughout.

Mechthild conceives of God, the object of her love, in various ways. God is the Emperor of the universe and is vitally present in creation, being "all things in all things" (11 19). God is three persons in one nature, with a rich interior life whose intimate conversations Mechthild is allowed to overhear (111 9). Most frequently, however, God appears as the human Lover and divine Bridegroom, passionately seeking spiritual union with the soul. To express the mutual love binding God and the soul, Mechthild often relies on two traditions: the lyric poetry of courtly love and the Song of Solomon. (Bernard of Clairvaux's treatment of this biblical text in his masterpiece on mystical love, the Sermons on the Song of Songs, reached Mechthild at least secondhand and unmistakably influenced her.) If mysticism implies union of the soul with God, then we must recognize that for Mechthild, as for her two principal sources, love's union consists as much or more in the yearning the lovers feel and express for each other as in fulfillment and oneness achieved. For the mystical beloved on earth, separation is as essential to love as union.

For Mechthild, two important qualities of the soul's love for God are that it should be bound and knowing love. Unbound love dwells in the senses and has not climbed to the soul. Unbound love is changeable and can lead to false love, as with David and Solomon. They did not sink beneath all creatures, nor were they wounded by love's power. Bound love transcends the senses and denies the body its will. In it the soul listens for the divine voice, sees the divine light, and seeks the divine will. Whoever is touched by bound love cannot fall into serious sin (11 24).

The soul's love for God must also be based on knowledge, but this seems to be personal knowledge of the divine Lover rather than the knowledge of the schools. Through the divine greeting Mechthild has this knowledge, and upon it her love rests secure. It cannot be taken from her by the "blind holy ones who love and do not know" (I 2). In I 21 Mechthild elaborates on the nature of the love she has sought and found:

Love without knowledge is as darkness to the wise soul.
Knowledge without its fruition she likens to the pains of hell.
Fruition short of death she cannot lament enough.

Love, knowledge, fruition, and death. We grasp the first three terms easily, but how are we to understand death? Mechthild's medieval audience would have had no difficulty understanding her. Love and death are linked both in religious and courtly traditions, and Mechthild several times exploits the interplay between these concepts already bound together in her cultural and spiritual environment. In a tradition going back to Paul, Christians are exhorted to die to themselves and to the world in order to rise again with and in Christ.²² Certainly such Pauline thoughts would occur to Mechthild's audience when she says: "Nothing tastes good to me but God alone; I am wondrously dead" (IV 12). Later Christian writers, for example Richard of St. Victor, with whose thought Mechthild was familiar, also speak of love of God causing a kind of death in the soul.²³

In courtly literature the closeness of love and death is a frequent theme. It is in the guise of a minnesinger that Mechthild presents herself when she writes:

I would willingly die of love
If it could happen to me. (II 2)

And again, this time drawing both on spiritual and courtly traditions: "I long to love him to the death, boundlessly and without ceasing. Be happy, my soul, for your Life has died for love of you. Love him so fiercely that you could die for him" (I 28).

Nowhere in medieval literature, however, is the bond between love and death so pivotal as in the story of Tristan and Isolde. In Gottfried of Strassburg's unsurpassed version, the prologue announces it as an underlying motif, using an oxymoron to express the paradox at the center of the lovers' all-enveloping love: "its dear life, its sorrowful death, its dear death, its sorrowful life."²⁴ And when Tristan is told that the love potion that is causing his all-consuming love for Isolde will be the death of him, he replies that "it has poisoned me most sweetly.... If my adorable Isolde were to go on being the death of me in this fashion I would woo death everlasting!"²⁵ In their ecstasy of love they die, losing all sense of self, so lost are they in their union. It is this paradoxical meaning of death that Mechthild conjures up when she exclaims: "In this greeting I want to die living" (I 2). And it is again a Liebestod she has in mind when she says: "Love's death, a sweet distress" (I 30). Toward her life's end, longing for physical death and union with her Lover in heaven, she begs that she "might die of love in love" (VII 21).

The vehemence of her passion is often expressed in erotic images. In the dance with her Lover the soul hopes to "leap with abandon" before she comes "into the bed of love" where she shall "refresh" herself with her Lover. She wants to drink "undiluted wine" and go to her Lover as a "full-grown bride." When she enters the secret chamber, our Lord bids her: "Take off your clothes." For Nothing shall come between them:

Then a blessed stillness
That both desire comes over them.
He surrenders himself to her,
And she surrenders herself to him. (I 44)

We should be well aware, however, that Mechthild is far from confusing or commingling spiritual love with physical love. Such a thought readily occurs to us, steeped as we are in popular psychology. Mechthild makes it quite clear, however, that only the soul that has left everything and gone "beyond the influences of the flesh" is ready for the dance and the bridal bed. And the clothes she is commanded to strip from her are the virtues with which she has adorned herself (I 44). Mechthild's passion is a spiritual passion. The searing images of physical passion are just that: images.

Despite Mechthild's resolute commitment to spiritual love, her attitude toward her body is not simply one of grim opposition. True, she has her soul call her body a murderer (I 2), but one must note carefully the context of her remark. Having left the confines of her physical body to spend an idyllic hour in spiritual bliss within the Trinity, the soul returns, as well she must, to the harsh reality of her uneasy partnership with the body. Mechthild laces her description of their reunion with humor. Both are out of sorts, grumbling and reproaching each other. Humor is possible for Mechthild precisely because body and soul are not pitted against each other as equals in deadly combat. The soul that truly desires to soar in spiritual realms cannot be held captive by the body but is free to go to her Lover.

Ultimately, body and soul will be partners forever, completely reconciled. Later in life, when thoughts of death become more frequent, Mechthild imagines how she will speak to her body on the last day. Addressing it as her beloved, healed of all its woes, she invites it to rise up and receive its reward. In the past the soul depended on the body. In heaven the roles shall be reversed (VI 35).

As the book continues, we notice changes in tone and emphasis. Lyrical effusions of love's yearning and its fulfillment in rapturous greeting grow less frequent. More consideration is given to practical rules of a holy life, to criticism of the clergy, and to visions both cosmic and private. But her perception of her relationship to her divine Lover changes as well. The importance and perhaps the frequency of the greeting diminishes. In its place we find Mechthild speaking of "sinking humility" and "estrangement," ideas that she now views as essential to this relationship. In two chapters especially (IV 12 and V 4), she articulates the change in her situation and attitude.

If Mechthild had in the past concentrated her lyricism on celebrating the blissful heights of love, sinking humility allows her to explore and value another dimension of divine love. It "chases" the soul "up into heaven and drags her down again into the abyss." Only in experiencing all aspects of God's love can the soul attain maturity: "When she has thus ascended to those heights possible for her while she is still attached to the body and has sunk to the deepest point that she can find, then she is fully grown in virtue and holiness." Not only does the soul accept this "deepest point" as an integral part of her life, but she actively seeks it and "retreats from what God does to her out of love." Sinking humility compels her to compare herself to all other creatures and to conclude that every one of them is better than she. Finally, it brings her to the lowest spot "where she can go no further: under Lucifer's tail." Here she would ever remain to God's honor and be "adorned with the suffering of long waiting" as her only reward (V 4).

Paired with sinking humility is estrangement, which Mechthild describes for us in detail (IV 12). After the soul has rejected all earthly joys and comforts, God answers her wish to forgo spiritual elevation and leaves her among those in purgatory and among the damned. Asked by our Lord how long she wishes to remain there, the soul begs to be allowed to sink further. Soul and body, bereft of God's palpable presence, enter total darkness. Here the soul is assailed by doubts about the divine origin of all the favors previously experienced: If they had been from God, why would he now forsake her? The soul remains steadfast, relying on the memory of these favors. There follows "constant estrangement from God" that completely envelops the soul. Earlier the soul regarded God's absence as "anguish beyond human dying / And beyond the torments of hell" (II 2). Now she accepts and embraces it eagerly: "Welcome, very blessed Estrangement." In a transvaluation of values incomprehensible to reason and categorized as an abnormality by human science, the soul rejoices in its desolation, finding that "gall has become honey for the palate of my soul." When God wishes to cool the ardor of his love in her, the soul consents, but only "in such a way that it is good for you and not for me." To estrangement is added pain, but this only increases the soul's joy: "the deeper I sink, / The sweeter I drink" (IV 12).

This enigmatic disposition of the soul does not, however, seem to be the end of Mechthild's spiritual odyssey. As she continues to write, thoughts of union with God while on earth—even the paradoxical union through estrangement—recede and are replaced by a longing for death with its uninterrupted and everlasting union; and estrangement from God is not the last "divine favor" she is asked to accept. Since she has already renounced the world and God's affection, what, one might ask, remains for her to accomplish?

The last book of the FL, coupled with the circumstances in which its author wrote it, furnishes insights into what might be seen as Mechthild's final accomplishment. Her renunciation of God's favor and acceptance of estrangement from him were heroic; and that is, perhaps, precisely why this cannot be seen as the ideal and final disposition intended for the soul. In welcoming estrangement Mechthild is still the great soul whose interior life holds center stage in her own mind. At Helfta she is then required to give up much of what had been special about her and accept being ordinary. She must submit to the usual problems of advanced age and the blows to her basic human dignity this involves. Though she was willing throughout her life to seek and accept advice from those she respected, one can only conclude from her writings that she was fiercely and proudly independent. Yet she seeks admittance to the convent at Helfta and submits to its discipline. Though she feels some uneasiness there, both at being less educated than many of the sisters and at their tendency to regard her as a holy relic," she does her best to fit in and fulfill the community's expectations of her.²⁷ Infirm and close to the death she so longs for, she sees in a vision how the saints and devils gather for her final struggle and triumph. But it is not to be. She recovers and must accept living onweak, blind, and with nothing to look forward to but ordinary banal human suffering (VII 63).

Renouncing God's favors and rejoicing at estrangement from him had been a noble gesture because it was done freely and with full human vigor. Now she has no choice but to accept her demeaning dependence on others. She must renounce herself and "let go," as the mystics urge, but not in some special sense limited to God's special friends. Rather, she, the visionary, the ecstatic, God's special messenger to Holy Christianity, must relinquish control over herself, as those must do who are feeble and helpless.

To the extent that one dare judge in such matters, it seems that she was equal to the challenge of accepting her very ordinary human lot. In the next-to-last chapter she composes a prayer, poignant in its directness and simplicity, which expresses her acknowledgment of her helplessness and her reaction to it. She thanks God that he has taken everything from her—her ability to provide food and clothing for herself, her eyesight, the use of her hands, her strength—thus forcing her to rely on others to take care of her basic needs. She has nothing left to give but her gratitude, as she humbly accepts the help of others. God has even stripped from her the "strength of my heart," and she thanks him for serving her "with the hearts of others" (VII 64). Love, knowledge, fruition, death she had written years before (I 21). It is perhaps a changed and deepened understanding of all that this entails which informs the concluding parts of The Flowing Light of the Godhead.

6. A Note on the Translation

Translations are by nature inferior to the originals. This is especially true concerning texts with such literary richness as the FL possesses. It is incumbent upon the translator both to set priorities and to explain, when possible, what the translation fails to accomplish. In a text such as the FL, which exploits the devices and conventions of literature but which, in fact, is trying to achieve a supra-literary goal, I have felt compelled to make content—the sense of what Mechthild is saying—the primary concern, even when this involves failing to reproduce adequately the form into which Mechthild casts her meaning. I have occasionally added some explanatory notes regarding literary forms and devices to help the reader become aware of what the translation has failed to accomplish. One pervasive aspect of Mechthild's style, however, which I have not been able to approximate in the translation, needs a more elaborate explanation than can be achieved in notes to individual passages. This is her peculiar conception and use of a literary region between prose and verse.

As the critical edition points out, Morel's edition, by how it made the text appear on the page, divided Mechthild's writing sharply into prose and verse, as though she were following the tradition of prosimetrum, as found, say, in Boethius's Consolations of Philosophy.²⁸ Actually, Mechthild's style is much more differentiated, and she delights especially in transitional forms between prose and verse. The device she employs to create this diversity is colon rhyme; that is, units shorter than a sentence that are bound together by rhyme. Sometimes this device is used loosely and spread out over a section of text in such a way that it is scarcely noticeable. Frequently then, at the close of a chapter, Mechthild will intensify its use, so that it occurs almost without interruption over several lines of text. Before illustrating this through examples, we must also examine Mechthild's concept of rhyme, because it is quite foreign to modern sensibilities. More frequent than rhyme as it is normally understood—as the correspondence of vowel and consonant sounds at the end of a word (can-man; token-broken) — are occurrences of assonance or vowel rhyme, where only the vowels correspond (can-fat; token-over) .²⁹The following examples with their translations are offered to clarify:

II 15:
Swelch mensche wirt zu einer stunt von warer minne reht wunt , der wirt niemer me wol gesund , er enküsse noch den selben munt , von dem sin sel ist worden wunt .	Whoever at some point Is seriously wounded by true love Will never become healthy again, Unless he kisses the same mouth By which his soul was wounded.
I 10:
Swelch moensch die welt übersiget und sime lichamen allen unnützen willen benimet und den túvel überwindet das ist die sele, die got minnet . Tuot ir die welt einen stos , da von lidet si kleine not ; tuot ir das fleisch einen wank , da von wirt der geist nút krank ; tuot ir der túvel einen bih , des ahtet die sele aber niht . Si minnet und si minnet und si kan anders nit beginnen .	Whoever conquers the world And takes from his body all useless desires, And overcomes the devil, This is the soul that loves God. If the world gives her a shove, She does not suffer much. If the flesh gives her a jolt, The spirit will not get sick from it. If the devil gives her a push, The soul pays no heed. She loves And she loves (keep on loving), and she does not know how to do otherwise.

Ein bruoder in der predier orden der was so sere beswert mit einem guoten ambachte in der gehorsami, als vil maniger ist, das im entgieng sein jugentlichú maht und verlor sine menlichen kraft; doch tet er es mit guotem willen. Do bat ich únsern herren, das er sine gnade da zuo woelte keren. Únser herre wisete mir und sprach: “Ich horte und sach alsus alle die arbeit, die er lidet und das er liset und schribet, das sol alles von minnen singen min lop vor minem ewigen gesinde alsus: grosser got, ewig, kreftig wunderlich, alleluia; und ich wil sin hovbet ufhaben und alle sine maht sterken als ich dir habe getan, nit alleine von nature, mere ovch sere von gnaden.”

A brother in the Order of Preachers was so weighed down by an important office accepted under obedience—as happens to many—that his youthful vigor was drained from him and he lost his natural strength; yet he still carried on with good intentions. So I begged our Lord that he might turn his favor in that direction. Our Lord instructed me and said: “I have heard and seen all the distress he is suffering, and what he reads and writes. All this shall become the following song of love praising me before my eternal court: Great God, eternal, mighty, marvelous, alleluia. And I shall lift up his head and increase all his might, just as I have done for you—not just by nature, but rather even more by grace.”

These three examples give the reader some idea of the diverse ways in which Mechthild employs different kinds of rhyme. The first example approximates closely a modern conception of rhyming verse, and the content is appropriate to the lyric form as well. The second example shows a predominance of assonance or vowel rhyme with an occurrence of conventional rhyme and an example of identical rhyme (minnet-minnet) thrown in for good measure. Again the linguistic structure and the content seem closer to verse than prose. In such cases I have, as here, usually cast the passage into verse-like lines without attempting to recreate the rhyme or assonance of the original. In like manner, I have not been overly concerned to reproduce the rhythms of the original, which are, in any case, most often irregular.

The third example contains a type of writing quite frequent in the FL. The passage begins as straight prose with no adornment of rhyme or assonance. The content, too, seems best suited to be expressed in prose. Then assonance sets in, punctuating the text at irregular intervals but in no way providing a verse-like structure for the whole. I have generally translated such passages into English prose. Also, following the practice of the critical edition and Schmidt in her translation, I have rendered several passages arguably more verse-like than prose-like in the original as prose. Hence, in such cases, there is no indication in the translation of this aspect of the original.

A few other matters regarding the translation need mentioning. Though generally of high quality, Mechthild's writing is uneven, and there are passages in the FL that could be improved upon. I have courageously resisted the temptation to improve her phrasing; neither have I altered anything aside from adding notes for the sake of clarity, unless the lack of clarity was rooted in syntactical differences in the languages themselves.

At times Mechthild's striving for rhyme or assonance seems to affect content negatively. So be it. I mention it here only because the reader has no way of knowing, especially in those passages rendered as prose, that rhyme or assonance may be affecting content. Sometimes, though rarely, an image will sound strange to the modern ear. The word nostrils is indeed uncommon in lyric poetry, but Mechthild uses it (IV 3). And when the divine Lover invites his beloved to sing to him, Mechthild has her reply: “Alas, my dear Lover, I am hoarse in the throat of my chastity” (11 25). But most of her images are appealing across the ages.

Another troubling area is the wide disparity in the amount of vocabulary—especially in the case of descriptive adjectives—available to Mechthild and to her translator into modern English. Mechthild had a relatively poor language at her disposal compared to the rich diversity and capacity for differentiating available in English. Should one always use the same English word to translate a Middle High German word? The answer is obviously that one should not, and I have not done so because it makes Mechthild's language seem primitive, which it certainly is not, though there is often an attractive naive simplicity about it, as there often is in the language of the best lyric poets. There are no rules that guarantee the right choice of words in translating. One can only try, as best one can, to get inside the world of the author and, from that perspective, choose what seems to be the nearest equivalent.

A few specific matters: 1. I have almost always used she and her as pronouns when they refer to the soul. I have not done so because soul is feminine in German and thus requires feminine pronouns in that language. Consistency would then demand that one treat similarly all feminine nouns, such as snake, keg, or sickness. My justification is, rather, that for Mechthild the soul is the bride of Christ, so that even in instances in which it or its might seem equally appropriate-or even more so than feminine pronouns, I have stuck with she and her. Only when pronouns refer to Christ's soul have I used the neuter pronoun. 2. Geistlich (spiritual) is frequently used by Mechthild to refer to persons who are religious in the sense that they are members of the clergy, of a religious order, or beguines. When this is not clear from the text, I have added an explanatory note. 3. Mechthild uses heilige/helige cristanheit (Holy Christianity) to refer to the whole Christian community on earth, and it could justifiably be translated simply as the church, as conceived of by a loyal and enthusiastic daughter thereof. I have decided to translate it literally because of the freshness of Mechthild's term for the modern reader and because of the additional baggage the term church has acquired since Mechthild's time. 4. Finally, in the chapter headings that are phrases and not sentences, retreating from literalness, I have not translated the Von (concerning, about, of) with which they almost all begin.

I have found translating Mechthild more difficult than other authors I have tried my hand at (Eckhart, Suso, Hartmann of Aue), but it has also been more rewarding. The act of translating forces one to ponder Mechthild's words meditatively. One approaches more closely that frame of mind in which the author intended that her words be read than when one is dissecting the text with purely scholarly intentions. Though I have not yet read Mechthild's book nine times, as its Foreword admonishes us to do, I am close. Each prolonged encounter with Mechthild's text has resulted in my esteeming her more. Her book has much to offer if one reads it in a contemplative and receptive spirit.

NOTES TO THE INTRODUCTION

1. This is the convincing conclusion reached by Ursula Peters, Religiose Erfahrung als literarisches Faktum, Zur Vorgeschichte und Genese frauenmystischer Texte des 13. und 14. Jahrhunderts (Tubingen: Niemeyer, 1988), 41-100.
2. For more on beguines, see E.W.McDonnell, The Beguines and Beghards in Medieval Culture, with Special Emphasis on the Belgian Scene (New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press, 1954) ; Herbert Grundmann, Religiose Bewegungen im Mittelalter, 2d ed. (Hildesheim: Georg Olms, 1961), also now in English: Religious Movements in the Middle Ages (Notre Dame, Indiana: University of Notre Dame Press, 1995) ; and Robert E. Lerner, The Heresy of the Free Spirit in the Later Middle Ages (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1972). The material presented here is taken from these sources.
3. It would seem safe to conclude that Mechthild's writings were already being read by some outside her immediate circle from what she writes in 11 26.
4. McDonnell, 508.
5. The most important section of the FL for biographical information is IV 2. I have also relied heavily on Neumann 1964; and Neumann, "Mechthild von Magdeburg," Die deutsche Literatur des Mittelalters: Verfasserlexikon, 2d ed. Kurt Ruh (Berlin: de Gruyter), Vol. 6 (1987) 260-70. Ursula Peters, Religiose Erfahrung, 53-67 and 1 16-29, is deeply skeptical about the factuality of almost anything presented as fact in the FL and in all other similar religious texts. Though her views have not won general acceptance, they bear consideration.
6. Schmidt, X.
7. Neumann, Verfasserlexikon, 260.
8. Peters, Religiose Erfahrung, 116-29, doubts that the confessor played a central role in the book's inception and considers the meeting with the confessor and his command to write to be a literary topos Mechthild employs to rid herself of the charge of arrogance in undertaking to write such a book as the FL. Because of the evident joy with which Mechthild often writes, one is certainly justified in questioning whether her confessor's command was crucial to her decision to write. Securing her confessor's approval, however, would certainly be a prudent thing to do if she was to claim that the book "comes from God and does not have its origins in human thought" (IV 2).
9. The Lux divinitatis also speaks of Baldwin's fine upbringing, which strengthens the general assumption that the family was of the aristocracy; and it reports that Baldwin became a subprior and enjoyed a reputation for virtue and knowledge. See Book IV, note 44 below.
10. Especially in the lyrical passages there are words coming from a less northern dialect called Middle German, a bit removed from Low German.
11. A lector was a Dominican, who, after finishing the basic course of studies required of all Dominican priests, had been chosen to complete additional studies in theology and was engaged in the instruction of younger Dominicans.
12. Schmidt in a few of the explanatory notes accompanying her translation states her conviction that this or that phrase or sentence was probably formulated by Heinrich. Hans Urs von Balthasar, in notes he contributed to Schmidt's earlier translation of the FL (Einsiedeln, Zurich, Cologne: Benziger, 1955) also points out several formulations he thinks might well have been the work of Heinrich.
13. Neumann 1964, 218-19.
14. Not, Neumann (1964, 176) says, the original text, but a Middle Low German version that had already undergone some changes.
15. Neumann, "Problemata Mechtildiana," Zeitschrift für deutsches Altertum und deutsche Literatur 82 (1948-50), 160.
16. Neumann, "Problemata," 172. The two words Neumann contrasts are übersetzen (translating) and umsetzen (transferring).

or transplanting).

17. For a survey of this scholarship, see Frank Tobin, Mechthild von Magdeburg: A Medieval Mystic in Modern Eyes (Columbia, South Carolina: Camden House, 1995).

18. We are speaking from the point of view of the literary scholar, of course. Mechthild might well have countered that the entire content of the book was a special revelation by God.

19. Wolfgang Mohr, "Darbietungsformen der Mystik bei Mechthild von Magdeburg," Marchen, Mythos, Dichtung: Festschrift zum 90. Geburtstag Friedrich von der Leyens, ed. Hugo Kuhn and Kurt Schier (Munich: Beck, 1963), 375-99.

20. It seems legitimate to consider the vision, as it occurs in the FL, more as a form drawn from tradition than as the reporting of raw experience because, first, Mechthild's visions have been reflected upon and crafted, and, second, she draws upon the traditions of the vision coming from, among other sources, the Book of Daniel, Paul, and the Book of Revelation, as is pointed out in the notes.

21. Bernard McGinn, The Foundations of Mysticism (New York: Crossroad, 1992), xiii-xx. The most troubling term in this definition, for McGinn as well, is direct or immediate. For our present purposes we can avoid difficulties by weakening it to something like heightened or intensified.

22. See, for example, Romans 6:1-11 and Colossians 3:20.

23. Schmidt, note 44, p. 356, and note 90, pp. 363-64.

24. Gottfried of Strassburg, Tristan, trans. A.T.Hatto (New York: Penguin, 1967), 42.

25. Tristan, 206.

26. At least this can be reasonably concluded from the first paragraph of VII 21.

27. The increase in imagery from and references to convent life in Book VII is quite evident.

28. N I, XXII-XXIII.

29. Mechthild also employs other kinds of rhyme that offend against modern taste, such as impure rhyme, identical rhyme, and cases where a rhyme occurs in an accented syllable of one word and in an unaccented syllable of the other word.

Mechthild of Magdeburg

THE FLOWING LIGHT OF THE GODHEAD

PROLOGUE TO THE LUX DIVINITATIS¹

Prologue of Brother Heinrich, Lector, of the Order of Preaching Brothers'

We read in the Book of Judges (4:4-5) that the holy woman Deborah, the wife of Lappidoth, full of the spirit of prophecy, was accustomed to set up her tent under a palm tree in the hills of Ephraim, residing there as a solitary to devote herself to God alone. Israel, God's people, would go up to her seeking judgment in all matters. Likewise, the Fourth Book of Kings (2 Kgs 22: 14-20) relates that Huldah, a prophetess living in Jerusalem, enlightened by the Holy Spirit as to the hidden judgment of God, informed the holy king Josiah about the coming scourges threatening the people. This just and pious king had sent priests and levites to her so that the holy woman might seek the Lord's guidance and pray on his behalf regarding the imminent misfortunes. Certainly there were at the time high priests of the seed of Aaron and other kinds of priests and levites learned in the law and of high moral integrity; yet, in spite of this, the Holy Spirit did not divulge his secret counsels to them. Rather, for these times he revealed them to these holy women of the weak sex, as he saw fit.

Quite often, in fact, almighty God has chosen what is weak in the world to confound what is stronger for its good. Therefore, let no one wonder or, lacking trust, fall into disbelief if God in the time of grace renews his marvels. He, who in the time of the law of Moses mercifully saw fit to perform similar works, now reveals his mysteries to the fragile sex. Because the people of Israel believed Deborah's prophecy, they won freedom from oppression and victory over their enemies. Also, a king, a religious man, was found worthy to gain solace and mercy through the prayer and advice of the prophetess Huldah. So, too, shall all who write or read this book, if they approach it with pious intent, attain an increase in solace and spiritual grace, as the Lord promises them in the book itself.

This writing must be read in a pious spirit, however. It must be understood, as is the case with other holy writings, in a wholesome manner and in good faith. In this way the reader will find nothing scandalous or offensive in it, and the writing itself will not be subjected to any perverse claim of falsehood. Its author is the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; it treats Christ and the church, as well as Satan and his body.' Its manner of proceeding is both historical and mystical; its purpose is the ordering of the present life, the useful calling to mind of things past, and the prophetic disclosure of things to come. The sincere devotion and dove-like simplicity of the woman through whom this writing was made public should completely suffice to guarantee the truth of what the pious faithful are asked to believe. From childhood she led a pure and innocent life. In her youth, at the urging of the Lord, she left everything she stood to gain and became an exile in a foreign land, leading a life of voluntary poverty. Finally, after many tribulations and at an advanced age, she was received into the community of holy sisters at Helfta. She lived there for twelve years and, as is confirmed by their testimony,' she flourished in the perfection of all virtues. She especially practiced charity, humility, long-suffering, and meekness. Raised up above all things by contemplation and made a sharer of divine illuminations and revelations, she was worthy to perceive from the Lord through her prophetic spirit numerous intimate divine mysteries concerning things past, present, and to come. Now, having been received by the Bridegroom of virgins, this holy virgin enjoys fully him whom she loved and whose wondrous love adorned his beloved with many marvels.

The revelations and visions that almighty God has deigned to disclose to his elect are founded upon and have their origin in the directness of their faith. Their purity of mind demands and expects them. The holiness of their life authenticates and corroborates them. For celestial secrets lie open to such people, and their testimony is greeted with belief by the hearts of those who hear them.

For this reason, before beginning this book, which is written in a primitive tongue and contains certain marvelous and previously unknown mysteries, I thought it worthwhile to point out beforehand a bit about the holiness of the person to whom these things have been revealed by heaven, so that the marvels mentioned in word might have the support of deeds more marvelous. For who shall describe for us more vividly the perfection of the elect than those very ones in whom and through whom God carries out his works? And who could have made known to the church more beneficially or better the perfection of Paul than Paul himself? In like manner, this holy one made public what the divine Spirit had wrought in her and with her, and proclaims his praise and glory.'

LATIN FOREWORD WITH TABLE OF CONTENTS AND MIDDLE HIGH GERMAN TRANSLATION¹

In the year of our Lord 1250 and for almost fifteen years thereafter this book was revealed² in German by the Lord through grace to a certain beguine who was a holy virgin in body and spirit. In humble simplicity, in the poverty of exile, weighed down by scorn, and in heavenly contemplation, as is made clear in this writing, she served the Lord with great devotion for more than forty years, following perfectly the footsteps of the brothers of the Order of Preachers. Always progressing day by day, she continually became better. It was compiled' by a brother of the aforementioned order and contains many good things, as is noted in these titles:

On the Trinity: 11 3; 111 9; IV 12 and 14; V 26

On Christ: 11 3; IV 14; V 23 and 27

On Our Lady: 1 22; 11 3; V 23

On the Nine Orders of Angels: 1 6; 111 1; V 1

On the Special Excellence of Certain Saints: IV 20, 22, and 23

On the Evilness of Demons: 11 24; IV 2 and 17; V 1; V 29

On the Dignity of a Human Being: I 44; IV 14

On Rapture and the Separation of the Soul from the Flesh: I 5

On the Description of Heaven: III 1

On the Description of Hell: 111 21

On the Many Kinds of Purgatory: 11 8; 111 15 and 17; V 14 and 15

On Many Virtues and Vices: I 22 and 25; 111 7 and 14; IV 4; and on Charity Especially: 111 13

On the Order of Preachers at the End of the World at the Time of the Antichrist: IV 27

And on many things unheard of that you shall understand if you read this book nine times in faith, humility, and devotion.'
Here is prophecy about the past, present, and future. Here also is the Song of the Three Persons: V 26.

[Middle High German translation:]

In the year 1250 after God's birth and for the fifteen years thereafter this book was revealed in German by God to a sister. She was a holy virgin both in body and in spirit. She served God devotedly in humble simplicity, in the poverty of exile, in heavenly contemplation, and weighed down by scorn, for more than forty years, and followed steadfastly and completely the light and the teaching of the Order of Preachers, and went forward from day to day and improved herself daily. But a brother of the same order gathered together and wrote this book; and much good is contained in this book on many subjects, as is noted in this list. You should read it through nine times in faith, humility, and devotion.

Book I

One Should Receive This Book Eagerly, For It Is God Himself Who Speaks the Words'

This book I hereby send as a messenger to all religious people both the bad and the good; for if the pillars fall,' the building cannot remain standing; and it signifies me alone and proclaims in praiseworthy fashion my intimacy. All who wish to understand this book should read it nine times.

This Book Is Called a Flowing Light of the Godhead

"Ah, Lord God, who made this book?"

"I made it in my powerlessness, for I cannot restrain myself as to my gifts."4

"Well then, Lord, what shall the title of the book be, which is to your glory alone?"

"It shall be called a flowing light of my Godhead into all hearts that live free of hypocrisy."

1. How Love and the Queen Spoke to Each Other'

The soul came to Love, greeted her with great deference, and said:

"God greet you, Lady Love."

"May God reward you, Mistress and Queen."

"Lady Love, you are indeed perfect."

"Mistress and Queen, that is why I am above all things."

"Lady Love, you struggled many a year before you forced the exalted Trinity to pour itself utterly into the humble virginal womb of Mary."

"Mistress and Queen, that was to your honor and benefit."

"Lady Love, you have now come here to me and have taken from me everything I ever gained on earth."

"Mistress and Queen, you have made a happy exchange."

"Lady Love, you have taken from me my childhood."

"Mistress and Queen, in its place I have given you heavenly freedom."

"Lady Love, you have taken from me all my youth."

"Mistress and Queen, in its place I have given you many a holy virtue."

"Lady Love, you have taken from me possessions, friends, and relatives."

"Come now, Mistress and Queen, that is a petty complaint."

"Lady Love, you have taken from me the world, worldly honor, and all earthly riches."

"Mistress and Queen, I shall make that up to you in one hour with the Holy Spirit on earth, just as you wish it."

"Lady Love, you have brought me to such a pass that my body is racked by a strange weakness."

"Mistress and Queen, in exchange I have given you much sublime knowledge."

"Lady Love, you have devoured my flesh and my blood."

"Mistress and Queen, you have thereby been purified and drawn into God."

"Lady Love, you are a robber; for this as well shall you make reparation."

"Mistress and Queen, then take me."

"Lady Love, now you have recompensed me a hundredfold on earth."

"Mistress and Queen, in addition you may demand God and all his kingdom."

2. Concerning Three Persons and Three Gifts'

God's true greeting, coming from the heavenly flood out of the spring of the flowing Trinity, has such force that it takes away all the body's strength and reveals the soul to herself, so that she sees herself resembling the saints, and she takes on a divine radiance. Then the soul leaves the body, taking all her power, wisdom, love, and longing. Just the tiniest bit of her life force remains with the body as in a sweet sleep.' Then she sees one complete God in three Persons and knows the three Persons in one God undivided.

He greets her in courtly language that one does not hear in this kitchen, clothes her in the garments that one fittingly wears in a palace, and surrenders himself into her power. Then she can wish for and ask whatever she wants. It is granted her and she is enlightened. What she is not enlightened about is the first cause of the Three Persons.' Then he draws her further to a secret place. There she is not permitted to beg on anyone's behalf or ask, because all alone with her he wants to play a game that the body does not know, nor the peasants at their plows, nor knights at their tournaments, nor his lovely mother, Mary-not even she may play it there. Then she soars further to a blissful place of which I neither will nor can speak. It is too difficult; I do not dare, for I am a very sinful person. Yet when infinite God brings the unfathomable soul to the heights, she loses sight of the earth in her astonishment and is not aware of ever having been on earth. Just when the game is at its best, one has to leave it.

Then God in full vigor speaks: "Young Miss, you must go down." She shudders and laments" her banishment. She says: "Lord, you have raised me up" so high here that I shall not be able to praise you in any fitting degree when in my body. Rather, I shall suffer as an outcast and shall struggle against the body." And he says:

"Oh, dear dove,¹²
Your voice is string music to my ears.
Your words are spices for my mouth.
Your longings are the lavishness of my gift."

She says: "Dear Lord, it has to be as the master of the house¹³ commands." And she sighs with all her might, which awakens the body.¹⁴

Then the body speaks: "Well, woman, just where have you been? You come back so love-struck, lovely, and vibrant, free and witty. Your carrying on has cost me my appetite, sense of smell, color, and all my strength."

She says: "Shut up, murderer! Quit your bellyaching. I'll always be on my guard with you around. That my enemy has been wounded-what do we care about that? It makes me glad."

This is a greeting that has many streams. It pours forth from the flowing God into the poor, parched soul unceasingly with new knowledge, in new contemplation, and in the special enjoyment of the new presence. O sweet God, inwardly on fire, outwardly blossoming, now that you have given this to the least," I would like to experience the life that you have given to your greatest. For that I would be willing to endure suffering even longer.

No one is able or is permitted to receive this greeting unless one has gone beyond oneself and has become nothing. In this greeting I want to die living." This the blind saints cannot ruin for me. They are the ones who love and do not know."

3. The Handmaids of the Soul and the Blow of Love¹⁸

All holy Christian virtues are the handmaids of the soul. The sweet listlessness of the soul complains to Love of her troubles:

"Well then, dearest Maiden, for a long time now you have been my chambermaid. Now tell me, where is all this leading? You have hunted me, trapped me, bound me, and wounded me so deeply that I shall never be healthy again. You have meted out to me many a cudgel blow. Tell me, am I ever going to recover from you? If I were not going to be killed by your hand, it would be better for me never to have known you."¹⁹

Love: "That I hunted you was my fancy.
That I captured you was my desire.
That I bound you made me happy.
When I wounded you, you were joined to me.
When I cudgel you, I take you into my power.
I drove God the almighty from heaven,
Took his human life,
And returned him to his Father in honor.
How do you, vile worm, expect to survive before me?"

The Soul: "Speak, my Empress, I fear a small secret medicine God has often given to me that I might thrive even in your presence."

Love: "If one does not want the prisoners dead,
One gives them water and bread.
The medicine that God has often given you

Is nothing other than a brief return to human life.
But when your Easter Day comes
And your body receives the death blow,
Then I'll embrace you tightly
And permeate you utterly,
And I'll steal you from your body
And give you to your Lover."

The Soul: "O Love, this letter I have written out of your mouth.
Now give me, Lady, your seal."

Love: "Whoever has succeeded in loving God more than self
Knows well where to get the seal.
It lies between the two of us."

The Soul speaks:
"Be silent, dear one, and speak no more.
Dearest of all maidens, let all creatures, myself included,
Bow down before you.
Tell my Lover that his bed is made ready.
And that I am weak with longing for him."

If this letter is too long, this is the reason: I was on the meadow where I found flowers of all kinds. This is a sweet lament: Who dies of love shall be buried in God.

4. The Soul's, journey to Court During Which God Reveals Himself

When the needy soul comes to the court, she is judicious and refined. She gazes at her God in high spirits. Oh, how tenderly is she welcomed there! She remains silent, longing boundlessly for his praise. With great longing he reveals to her his divine heart. It resembles red gold burning in a great fire of coals. He places her into his glowing heart. When the exalted Sovereign and the little waif thus embrace and are united as water and wine, she turns to nothing and is transported out of herself.²⁰ When she has no strength left, he is as lovesick for her as he always was; for he neither increases nor decreases. Then she says:

“Lord, you are my lover,
My desire,
My flowing fount,
My sun;
And I am your reflection.”

This is the journey to court of a loving soul that cannot exist without God.

5. The Torment and the Praise of the Soul²¹

My body is in great torment, my soul is in sublime bliss; for she has both gazed upon and embraced her Lover in her arms. He causes her, poor wretch, torment. When he draws her up, she flows. She cannot hold herself in check until he brings her within himself. She would like to speak but cannot, so utterly has she been enmeshed in sublime union with the awe-inspiring Trinity. Then he leaves her for a short while, that she might feel longing. She desires his praise but does not know how to find it as she would like. She would even want him to send her into hell that he might be praised beyond measure by all creatures.²² She looks at him and says to him, "Lord, give me your blessing." He looks at her, draws her up again, and gives her a greeting²³ that the body cannot express.

Then the body speaks to the soul:

“Where have you been?
I can’t take it anymore.”

And the soul says:

“Quiet, you are a fool.
I want to be with my Lover,
Even if it means you would perish.
I am his joy, he is my torment.”

This is her torment. May she never recover!
May you take this torment upon yourself as well,
And may you never escape it!

6. The Nine Choirs: How They Sing²⁴

Now hear,²⁵ my Beloved; listen with spiritual ears. Thus do the nine choirs sing:

We praise you, Lord, that you sought us in your humility.
We praise you, Lord, that you have kept us in your mercy.
We praise you, Lord, that you have glorified us in your humiliation.
We praise you, Lord, that you have provided for us in your generosity.
We praise you, Lord, that you have arranged us in rank in your wisdom.
We praise you, Lord, that you have shielded us with your might.
We praise you, Lord, that you have sanctified us with your nobility.
We praise you, Lord, that you have instructed us in your intimacy.
We praise you, Lord, that you have elevated us in your love.

7. God's Curse in Eight Things

I curse you:
May your body die.
May your words perish.
May your eyes close.
May your heart dissolve.
May your soul rise up.
May your body remain.
May your human faculties perish.
May your spirit stand in the presence of the Holy Trinity!

8. The Most Lowly Praises God in Ten Things

O you burning Mountain.
O you chosen Sun.
O you full Moon.
O you bottomless Well.
O you unscalable Height.

O you Brightness without measure.
O Wisdom without ground.
O Mercy without restraint.
O Might without opposition.
O Crown of all honors!
The most lowly person you ever created praises you.

9. With Three Things You Dwell on the Heights

Those who are on fire in true love and build on the firm ground of truth and bear abundant fruit for a blessed end-they dwell on the heights.

Explanation: This is about the Seraphim.

10. Who Loves God Triumphs over Three Things

Whoever conquers the world,
And takes from his body all useless desires,
And overcomes the devil,
This is the soul that loves God.
If the world gives her a shove,
She does not suffer much.
If the flesh gives her a jolt,
The spirit will not get sick from it.
If the devil gives her a push,
The soul pays no heed.
She loves
And keeps on loving,
And she does not know how to do otherwise.

11. Four Battle for God

O dove free of gall.²⁶
O maiden free of blemish.
O knight free of wounds.
O liegeman free of hesitation.
These are the four whom God can count on in battle.

12. The Soul Praises God for Five Things"

O Emperor of all honors.
O Crown of all sovereigns.
O Wisdom of all the learned.
O Giver of all gifts.
O Deliverer of all imprisonments.

13. How God Comes to the Soul

I come to my beloved as the dew upon the flower.²⁸

14. How the Soul Receives and Praises God

Ah, joyous sight!
Ah, lovely greeting!
Ah, dear embrace!
Lord, the wonder of you has overwhelmed me.
Your grace has crushed me.
O you lofty Crag.
You are so nicely honeycombed.
In you no one can rest but doves and nightingales.

15. How God Receives the Soul

Welcome, my precious dove.
You have flown so keenly over the earth
That your feathers reach to heaven.

16. God Likens the Soul to Four Things

You taste like a grape.
Your fragrance is like balsam.²⁹
Your radiance is like the sun.
You are an enhancement of my most sublime love.

17. The Soul Praises God About Five Things

O you pouring God in your gift!
O you flowing God in your love!
O you burning God in your desire!
O you melting God in the union with your beloved!
O you resting God on my breasts!³⁰
Without you I cannot exist.

18. God Likens the Soul to Five Things

O you beautiful rose among the thorns!
O you fluttering bee in the honey!
O you unblemished dove in your being!
O you beautiful sun in your radiance!
O you full moon in the firmament!
I cannot turn away from you.

19. God Caresses the Soul in Six Ways

You are my softest pillow,
My most lovely bed,
My most intimate repose,
My deepest longing,
My most sublime glory.
You are an allurements to my Godhead,
A thirst for my humanity,
A stream for my burning.

20. The Soul Praises God in Return in Six Ways

You are my resplendent mountain,
A feast for my eyes,
A loss of myself,
A tempest in my heart,
A defeat and retreat of my power,
My surest protection.³¹

21. Of Knowledge and Enjoyment

Love without knowledge is as darkness to the wise soul.³²
Knowledge without its fruition she likens to the pains of hell.
Fruition short of death she cannot lament enough.

22. St. Mary's Message and How One Virtue Follows Another. How the Soul Was Made in theJubilus33 of the Trinity, and How St. Mary Nursed All the Saints and Nurses Them Still

The sweet dew of the eternal Trinity gushed forth from the fountain of the everlasting Godhead into the flower of the chosen maid; and the fruit of this flower is an immortal God and a mortal man and a living hope of eternal life. And our Redeemer became a Bridegroom. The bride became exhilarated at the sight of his noble countenance:

Under this immense force she loses herself.
In this most dazzling light she becomes blind in herself.
And in this utter blindness she sees most clearly.
In this pure clarity she is both dead and living.

The longer she is dead, the more blissfully she lives.³⁴
The more blissfully she lives, the more she experiences.³⁵
The less she becomes, the more flows to her.
The more she fears,...³⁶
The richer she becomes, the poorer she is.
The deeper she dwells,³⁷ the more she expands.
..., the more forbearing she is.
The deeper her wounds become, the more violently she struggles.

The more loving God is to her, the higher she soars.
The more radiantly she shines in the reflected effulgence of the Godhead, the closer she approaches him.
The more she labors, the more contentedly she rests.
..., the more she grasps.
The more quiet her silence, the louder she calls.
..., the greater the marvels she works with his strength in proportion to her power.

The more his desire grows, the more extravagant their wedding celebration becomes.
The narrower the bed of love becomes, the more intense are the embraces.
The sweeter the kisses on the mouth become, the more lovingly they gaze at each other.
The greater the distress in which they part, the more he bestows upon her.

The more she consumes, the more she has.
The more humbly she takes her leave, the sooner she returns.
The more ardent she remains, the sooner she bursts into flame.
The more she burns, the more beautifully she glows.
The more God's praise is spread abroad, the greater her desire becomes.

Tell me, where did our Redeemer become the Bridegroom?

In the jubilus of the Holy Trinity. When God could no longer contain himself, he created the soul and, in his immense love, gave himself to her as her own.³⁸

"What are you made of, Soul, that you ascend so high above all creatures, mingle with the Holy Trinity, and yet remain whole in yourself?"

"You have brought up the question of my origin. I shall tell you honestly: I was made by love in that very place." For that reason no creature is able to give comfort to my noble nature or to open it up except love alone."

"Holy Mary, dear Lady, you are the mother of this wonder. When did this happen to you?"

"When our Father's jubilus was saddened by Adam's fall, so that he had to become angry, the Eternal Wisdom of the almighty Godhead intercepted the anger together with me. The Father chose me for his bride-that he might have something to love; for his darling bride, the noble soul, was dead. The Son chose me to be his mother, and the Holy Spirit received me as his beloved. Then I alone was the bride of the Holy Trinity and mother of orphans, and I brought them before God's eyes so that they might not all sink down, though some did. When I was thus the mother of many a banished child, my breasts became so full of the pure, spotless milk of true, generous mercy that I suckled the prophets and sages, even before I was born. Afterward, in my childhood, I suckled Jesus; later, in my youth, I suckled God's bride, Holy Christianity, under the cross when I was so desolate and wretched, as the sword of the physical suffering of Jesus cut spiritually into my soul."

Both his wounds and her breasts were open.
The wounds poured forth.
The breasts flowed.
The soul was invigorated and completely restored
As he poured the sparkling red wine
Into her red mouth.⁴⁰

As she was thus born and made healthy out of the open wounds, she was like a child, and very young. If she was going to recover completely after her death and birth, God's mother was going to have to be her mother and her nurse. This was and is as it should be, since God is her rightful father and she is his rightful bride. She resembles him in all parts.

"Lady, in your old age you suckled the holy apostles with your motherly instruction and with your powerful prayer, that God might reveal his honor and your will through them. Lady, thus did you suckle then and suckle still the hearts of martyrs with strong faith, the ears of confessors with holy protection, the virgins with your chastity, widows with constancy, married people with kindness, and sinners with patient hope."

"Lady, us, too, you must suckle, for your breasts are still so full that they are not likely to dry up. If you no longer wanted to suckle, the milk would cause you much pain. For truly, I have seen your breasts so full that seven streams pour out at one time from one breast over my body and over my soul. In that hour you relieve me of a labor that no friend of God can bear without inner suffering. In this same manner, you shall go on suckling until the last day. Then you shall become dry, for then God's children-and your children-will be weaned and fully grown for eternal life. Ah, then we shall know and see with inexpressible joy the milk and even the breasts themselves⁴¹ that Jesus so often kissed."⁴²

23. You Should Ask That God Love You Passionately, Often, and Long; Then You Shall Become Pure, Beautiful, and Holy⁴³

Ah, Lord, love me passionately, love me often, and love me long. For the more passionately you love me, the purer I shall become. The more often you love me, the more beautiful I shall become. The longer you love me, the holier I shall become here on earth.

24. How God Responds to the Soul

That I love you passionately comes from my nature, for I am love itself. That I love you often comes from my desire, for I desire to be loved passionately. That I love you long comes from my being eternal, for I am without an end and without a beginning.

25. The Way to Suffer Pain Willingly for God's Sake

God guides his chosen children along strange paths. This is a strange path and a noble path and a holy path that God himself trod: that a human being, though free of sin and guilt, suffer pain. Upon this path the soul that aches for God is joyful, for by nature she is joyful to her Lord, who suffered much pain because of his good deeds. Our dear Lord, the heavenly Father, delivered up his most beloved Son to be tormented by the heathens and martyred by the Jews despite his innocence. Now the time has come when some people, who have the appearance of being religious, torment the bodies of God's children and martyr their spirits. For he wants them to resemble his beloved Son who was tormented in body and soul.

26. The Path upon Which the Soul Draws the Senses and Is Free of Suffering of the Heart

It is a rarely traveled and lofty path upon which the devoted soul makes its way and guides the senses as one with sight guides a blind person. On this path the soul is free and lives without inner suffering, for she wants nothing but what her Lord wants, who arranges everything for the best.

27. How You Become Worthy of This Path and Keep to It and Become Perfect

Three things make a person worthy of this path-that one recognize it and enter upon it: first, that one submit to God relinquishing all human control, and that one piously hold on to God's grace and willingly keep it by being forgiving in all things as far as is possible for a human will. The second thing keeping a person on this path is that one welcome all things except for sin alone. The third thing keeping a person on this path is that one do all things equally for God's honor. Thus I think relieving my most basic need counts as much in God's sight as if I were in the highest state of contemplation that a human being can attain. Why? If I do it out of love in order to give honor to God, it is all one and the same. But when I sin, I am not on this path.

28. Love Shall Be Deadly, Boundless, and Unceasing; This Is the Folly of Fools

I delight in loving him who loves me, and I long to love him to the death, boundlessly, and without ceasing. Be happy, my soul, for your Life has died for love of you." Love him so fiercely that you could die for him. Thus you burn ever more without ever being extinguished as a living flame in the vast fire of high majesty.

Thus you become full of the fire of love.
This makes you here utterly happy.

You can no longer teach me anything.
I cannot turn away from love.
I must be its captive.
Otherwise, I cannot go on living.
Where it dwells, there I must remain,
Both in death and in life.⁴⁵
This is the folly of fools
Who live free of anguish.

29. The Beauty of the Bridegroom and How the Bride Should Follow Him in Twenty-Three Steps of the Cross` 6

Look at me, my bride.' See how beautiful are my eyes, how comely is my mouth, how on fire is my heart, how agile are my hands, and how swift are my feet. So, follow me! You shall be martyred with me, betrayed in jealousy, hunted in ambush, taken prisoner in hate, bound in obedience, your eyes covered so that one will not tell you the truth, slapped by the rage of the world, brought to trial in confession, struck blows by penance, sent to Herod in derision, stripped naked by abandonment, scourged by poverty, crowned with trials, spat upon by disgrace, bearing your cross in the hatred of sin, crucified in voluntary withdrawal from all things, nailed to the cross by the holy virtues, wounded by love, dying on the cross in holy constancy, pierced in your heart by constant union, taken down from the cross in true victory over all your enemies, buried in oblivion, arisen from the dead in a holy end, and drawn up into heaven in God's breath.

30. The Seven Hours`

Matins:	Love in abundance, a sweet delight. ⁴⁹
Prime:	Love's longing, a sweet burden.
Terce:	Love's pleasure, a sweet thirst.
Sext:	Love's feeling, a sweet cooling.
Nones:	Love's death, a sweet distress.
Vespers:	Love's flowing, a sweet pouring.
Compline:	Love's rest, a sweet joy. ⁵⁰

31. You Should Ignore Scorn

I was deeply scorned, and our Lord said: "Do not be much surprised. Since the precious unguent jar was utterly rejected and spat upon, what is going to happen to the vinegar jar, which has nothing of value about it?"

32. You Should Ignore Honors, Suffering, and Possessions. Be Sad After Sinning

If someone offers you honor, you should be ashamed.

If someone makes you suffer, you should be glad.

If someone does you a favor, you should be afraid.

If you commit a sin against me, you should be sad in your heart.

If you cannot feel sadness, then consider how greatly and how long

I was saddened for your sake.

33. Concerning Food, Consolation, and Love

My soul spoke thus to her Lover:

“Lord, your generosity is food for my body wonderfully.

Your mercy is consolation for my soul especially.

Your love is repose for my being eternally.”

34. In Suffering You Should Be a Lamb, a Turtledove, and a Bride

You are my lamb in your suffering;

You are my turtledove in your sighing;

You are my bride in your waiting.

35. The Desert Has Twelve Things

You should love nothingness.

You should flee somethingness.⁵¹

You should stand alone

And should go to no one.

You should not be excessively busy⁵²

And be free of all things.

You should release captives

And subdue the free.

You should restore the sick

And yet should have nothing yourself.

You should drink the water of suffering

And ignite the fire of love with the kindling of virtue:

Then you are living in the true desert.

36. Concerning Malice, Good Works, and Concerning a Marvel"

With the malice of your enemies shall you be adorned.

With the virtues of your heart shall you be glorified.

With your good works shall you be crowned.

With our mutual love shall you be raised on high.

With my delightful marvel shall you be made holy.

37. The Soul Responds to God Saying She Is Unworthy of These Favors

O dearly Loved One, in undeserved humiliation I take delight.
Virtues of the heart are my desire.
Good works, alas, I do not have.
Our mutual love I sully.
Of your beautiful marvel I am utterly unworthy.

38. God Boasts That the Soul Has Overcome Four Sins

In heaven God boasts about the soul on earth that loves him and says:

“Look, how she who has wounded me comes ascending.
She has cast from her the ape of the world.
She has overcome the bear of wantonness.
She has trod the lion of pride underfoot.

She has torn apart the jaws of the wolf of lust
And, like the hunted stag, comes running to me, the spring.
Like an eagle she rises out of the depths to the heights.”⁵⁴

39. God Asks the Soul What She Is Bringing

“You rush restlessly about in your love.
What do you bring me, my queen?”

40. She Replies: Something That Is Better than Seven Things

“Lord, I am bringing you my precious stone.
It is greater than the mountains.
It is wider than the world,
Deeper than the sea,
Higher than the clouds,
Brighter than the sun,
More numerous than the stars.
It weighs more than the whole earth.”

41. God Asks in Praise What the Precious Stone Is Called “O image of my divinity,

Glorified by my humanity,
Adorned with the Holy Spirit:
Tell me, what is your precious stone called?”

42. The Precious Stone Is Called Heart's Delight

“Lord, it is called my heart's delight,
Which I have taken back from the world,
Retained for myself,
And denied to all creatures.
But now I can carry it no further.
Lord, where shall I put it?”

43. Put Your Delight into the Trinity

“The delight of your heart
You shall put nowhere else but into my divine heart
And onto my human breast.
There alone shall you be consoled
And kissed by my Spirit.”

44. The Sevenfold Path of Love, the Three Garments of the Bride, and the Dance

“Ah, loving Soul, do you wish to know what your path shall be?”

“Yes, dear Holy Spirit, instruct me.”

“When you have passed beyond the need of sorrow and beyond the pain of confession and beyond the travail of penance and beyond the love of the world and beyond the temptations of the devil and beyond the influences of the flesh and beyond cursed self-will that thrusts many a soul backward with such force that she never achieves genuine love; and when you have struck down all your many foes, then you are so weary that you say: ‘Fair youth, I long for you. Where shall I find you?’ And the youth says:

‘I hear a voice;
It speaks its piece on love.
I have courted her many a day,
But the voice never addressed me.
Now I am moved;
I must hurry to her!
She is the one who bears anguish
And love joined together.’”

In the sweet dew of the morning-this is the cloistered inwardness that first enters the soul-her chamberlains, the five senses, speak thus:

"Lady, you should dress yourself."

"Dear ones, where am I supposed to be going?"

"We have definitely heard it whispered about that the prince intends to come to you in the dew and in the delightful song of the birds. Alas, lady, do not tarry!"

Then she puts on the slip of soft humility, so humble that it cannot bear anything underneath it. Over it comes a white dress of spotless chastity, so pure that it cannot bear anything in thought, word, or touch that might soil it. Then she puts on the cloak of her good name, which she has gilded with all the virtues. She enters into the woods, the company of holy people. There sings day and night the sweetest of the nightingales, the well-modulated union with God; and she hears many a sweet voice of birds, holy knowledge.⁵⁵ And still the young man did not come. So she sends out messengers because she is eager to dance. She sent for the faith of Abraham and the longing of the prophets and the chaste humility of our Lady, St. Mary, and all the holy virtues of our Lord Jesus Christ and all the excellence of his chosen ones. Then a splendid dance of praise takes place.

The young man finally comes and says to her: "Young lady, my chosen ones have shown off their dancing to you. Just as artfully should you now follow their lead."

She says:

"I cannot dance, Lord, unless you lead me.
If you want me to leap with abandon,
You must intone the song.
Then I shall leap into love,
From love into knowledge,
From knowledge into enjoyment,
And from enjoyment beyond all human sensations.
There I want to remain, yet want also to circle higher still."⁵⁶

And the young man has to sing thus:

"Through me into you
And through you from me."

[The soul:] "Willingly with you,
Woefully from you."⁵⁷

The young man speaks: "Young lady, you have done very well in this dance of praise. You shall have your way with the Son of the virgin, for you are delightfully weary. Come at noontime to the shade of the spring, into the bed of love. There in the coolness you shall refresh yourself with him."

The young lady says:

"Oh, Lord, that is too much
That she be your partner in love
Who has no love in her,
Unless she is moved by you."

Then the soul speaks to the senses, who are her chamberlains: "Now for a while I am weary of the dance. Leave me; I must go and refresh myself."

And the senses say to the soul: "Lady, if you wish to find refreshing coolness in the love tears of Mary Magdalene, they would certainly soothe you."

[Soul:] "Be still, my lords, you do not understand at all what I mean. Let me be on my own. For a time I want to drink undiluted wine."

[Senses:] "Lady, in the chastity of virgins great love is ready."

"That may be, but it isn't the noblest thing about me."

"In the blood of the martyrs you can cool yourself very well."

"I have been martyred so many times that I can't go there now."

"In the counsel of confessors the pure happily dwell."

"I shall always need counsel about what to do and what not to do; and yet I can't go there just now."

"In the wisdom of the apostles you will find much security."

"I have wisdom with me here. This shall always guide me to choose for the best."

"Lady, the angels are radiant and of love's color. If you wish to refresh yourself, rise up to them."

"The angels' bliss pains me in my love if I am not gazing upon their Lord and my Bridegroom."

"Then refresh yourself in the holy austere life that God granted to John the Baptist."

"The suffering I'm ready to bear, and yet the force of love transcends all austerity."

"Lady, if you want to refresh yourself in love, bow down to the small Child in the lap of the eternal virgin; and taste and see how the Joy of the angels sucked the unnatural milk."⁵⁸

"That is child's love, that one suckle and rock a baby. I am a full-grown bride. I want to go to my Lover."

[Senses:] "Oh, Lady, if you go there,
We shall go completely blind.
The Godhead is so blazing hot,
As you well know,
That all the fire and all the glowing embers
That make the heavens and all the saints glow and burn
Have flowed out from his divine breath
And from his human mouth
According to the plan of the Holy Spirit.
How can you stay there even for an hour?"

[Soul:] "A fish in water does not drown.
A bird in the air does not plummet.
Gold in fire does not perish.
Rather, it gets its purity and its radiant color there.
God has created all creatures to live according to their nature.
How, then, am I to resist my nature?
I must go from all things to God,
Who is my Father by nature,

My Brother by his humanity,
My Bridegroom by love,
And I his bride from all eternity.
Don't you believe I feel him intensely?⁵⁹
He can both burn powerfully and cool consolingly.
Now do not be overly sad.
You shall yet instruct me.
When I return, I shall certainly need your advice;
For the earth is full of snares."

Then the bride of all delights goes to the Fairest of lovers in the secret chamber of the invisible Godhead. There she finds the bed and the abode of love prepared by God in a manner beyond what is human. Our Lord speaks:

"Stay, Lady Soul."
"What do you bid me, Lord?"
"Take off your clothes."
"Lord, what will happen to me then?"
"Lady Soul, you are so utterly formed to my nature⁶⁰
That not the slightest thing can be between you and me.
Never was an angel so glorious
That to him was granted for one hour
What is given to you for eternity.

And so you must cast off from you
Both fear and shame and all external virtues.
Rather, those alone that you carry within yourself
Shall you foster forever.
These are your noble longing
And your boundless desire.
These I shall fulfill forever
With my limitless lavishness.”

“Lord, now I am a naked soul
And you in yourself are a well-adorned God.
Our shared lot is eternal life
Without death.”

Then a blessed stillness
That both desire comes over them.
He surrenders himself to her,
And she surrenders herself to him.
What happens to her then—she knows—
And that is fine with me.⁶¹
But this cannot last long.
When two lovers meet secretly,
They must often part from one another inseparably.⁶²

Dear friend of God, I have written for you this path of love. May God infuse it into your heart! Amen.

45. The Eight Days in Which What the Prophets Longed For Was Accomplished⁵³

This is a day of longing and blessed joy in the Annunciation of Christ.
This is a day of peace and dear tenderness in the Birth of Christ.
This is a day of charity and blessed communion,
Maundy Thursday.
This is a day of generosity and heartfelt love,
Good Friday.
This is a day of might and happy joy,
the Resurrection.
This is a day of faith and the pain of separation,
the Ascension.
This is a day of truth and burning consolation,
Pentecost.
This is a day of justice and the hour of truth,
the Last Judgment.
This is a week whose seven days we should celebrate with constancy.
The eighth day our Lord wants to celebrate on the last day with us all.

46. The Diverse Adornments of the Bride; How She Comes to Her Bridegroom; and How the Retinue Is Composed, Which Is Ninefold

The bride is clothed with the sun and has trodden the moon underfoot, and she is crowned with union.⁶⁴ She has a chaplain; this is fear. He has in his hand a golden rod; this is wisdom. The chaplain is clothed with the blood of the lamb and is crowned with honor; and wisdom is clothed with contentment and crowned with eternity. The bride has four bridesmaids. The first is love, who leads the bride. She is clothed with chasteness and is crowned with dignity. The second is humility, who holds the bride. She is clothed with lowliness and is crowned with eminence. The third bridesmaid is sorrow. She is clothed with small grapes⁶⁵ and is crowned with joy. The fourth bridesmaid is mercy. She is clothed with unguents" and is crowned with bliss. These two carry the coat of the bride, which is her holy reputation.

She has a bishop, which is faith. He brings the bride before the bridegroom. The bishop is clothed in precious stones and is crowned with the Holy Spirit. The bishop has two knights. The one is might and is clothed with battle and is crowned with victory. The other is daring and is clothed with boldness and crowned with all blessedness.

She has a chamberlain. That is watchfulness. He is clothed with constancy and is crowned with persistence. He carries a light before the bride and from behind her train. The light is understanding. It is clothed with insight and is crowned with generosity. The train is a holy conscience. It is clothed with good intention and is crowned with God's approval. She has a cupbearer, which is longing. He is clothed with desire and is crowned with peace. She has a minstrel who is amiability. His harp is intimacy. He is clothed with favor and crowned with help.

The bride has five kingdoms. The first are her eyes. They are founded in tears and adorned with restraint. The second are thoughts. They are founded in struggle and are adorned with good counsel. The third is speaking. It is founded in usefulness and is adorned with trust. The fourth is hearing. It is founded in the word of God and is adorned with consolation. The fifth is touch. It is founded in strength and is adorned with noble habit. These five kingdoms have an overseer. This is guilt. He is clothed with confession and crowned with penance. She has a judge. He is clothed with discipline and crowned with patience.

The bride has a beast of burden. This is the body. It is bridled with worthlessness: contempt is its fodder and its stable is confession. The pack it carries is innocence. The bride has a crimson silk cloth, which is hope. It is clothed with truth and crowned with song. She has a palm in her hand, which is victory over sin. In her other hand she has a canister that is full of longing and love. This she wants to bring to her Lover. She is wearing a hat of peacock feathers, which are her good name on earth and high honor in heaven. She follows a path, which is meekness. This is clothed with honey and crowned with safety.

And she sings:

"Chosen Lover, I long for you.
You take and give me many a heartache.
I have from you, besides, invisible suffering.
If you, Lord, command,
I shall be freed from myself."

And he speaks:

"Dearest love, think of the hour
When you may grasp the full treasure.
Do not let the time seem too long.
After all, I hold you constantly Embraced in my arms."

Then our Lord says to his chosen bride:

"Come, my beloved, come. You shall be crowned."⁶⁷

And he gives her a crown of truth that no one may wear but religious people." On the crown one sees four virtues: wisdom and sorrow, longing and perseverance. May God give us all this crown! Amen.

Book II

1. Love Brings Elevation to the Soul, Not Inhuman Toil; That Comes from Self-Will

The elevation of the soul comes about in love, and the glory of the body comes about in holy Christian baptism. There is no elevation beyond that of love, and outside Christianity there is no glory. For this reason they make great fools of themselves who imagine that they are scaling the heights with loathsome, inhuman toils,' even though their hearts are full of rancor. They are entirely lacking in holy, humble virtues that guide the soul to God. False holiness likes to hide where self-will holds sway in a heart.

2. Two Songs of Love of Him Who Was Seen in Love

I would willingly die of love
If it could happen to me.
Him whom I love I have seen
With my beaming eyes
Present in my soul.
Any bride who has offered a dwelling place
To her love has no need to go far.
Love cannot easily disappear
Where the maiden oft pursues the young man.
His noble nature is quite ready to receive
Her eagerly and place her close to his heart.
This is easily missed by foolish people
Who are not willing to seek out the lover.

O noble Eagle, O sweet Lamb, O flaming Glow, set me on fire!
How long must I be so dry?
An hour is much too hard for me,
A day is like a thousand years
When you are of a mind
To be far away from me.
If it were to last eight days,
I would rather go down to hell—

I'm there already—
Rather than that God be away from the loving soul.
That is anguish beyond human dying
And beyond the torments of hell. Believe me!
The nightingale must ever sing,
For by nature it voices only melodies of love.
If that were taken from her, she would be dead.
Alas, great Lord, be mindful of my anguish!

The Holy Spirit said to the soul: "Ah, noble maiden, make ready; your Lover is about to come." This startled her, and she was inwardly glad and said: "Oh, dear messenger, if it would only happen! I am so worthless and so utterly faithless that I can never find rest apart from my Lover. Whenever I find that my love for him is growing cold I am utterly in torment, but resolve to follow him in sorrow."

The messenger said: "You must tidy up and wash. Prepare the bed and scatter flowers."

The lonely soul said:

“When I tidy up, I must be ashamed.
When I wash, I must weep.
When I prepare the bed, I must hope.
When I break off flowers, I must love.
When my Lord comes, I take leave of myself;
For he brings me so many sweet strains with his strings
That it stops all impulses of my flesh.
And his strings are so full of all sweetness
That with his airs he relieves me of all interior suffering.”

3. The Tongue of the Godhead, the Light of Truth, the Four Rays of God Shining into the Nine Choirs, the Trinity, and St. Mary

The great tongue of the Godhead has spoken many a mighty word to me. I took them in with the feeble ears of my lowliness; and the brightest of lights opened up to the eyes of my soul. In it I saw the indescribable order and recognized the inexpressible glory, the incomprehensible marvel, the special intimacy with separation,' complete fulfillment, the greatest concentration in knowledge, bliss with interruption' in proportion to the capacities of the faculties, unadulterated joy in the common union, and the ever vibrant life in eternity as it is now and ever shall be.

There also four beams were visible that shot forth continuously from the crossbow of the Holy Trinity from the divine throne through the nine choirs.} There is no one, however rich or poor, whom the beam does not strike lovingly. The beam of the Godhead shoots incomprehensible light through them. Loving humanity greets them in fraternal company. The Holy Spirit touches them with the flood of the marvelous abundance of eternal bliss. Undivided God feeds them with the shimmer of his glorious countenance and fills them with the joyful breath of his flowing mouth. They glide effortlessly, as birds in the air do when not moving their wings, and they fly wherever they want, body and soul, and yet they remain separate in their own order.

The Godhead rings,
Humanity sings,
The Holy Spirit plucks the harp of the heavens
So that all strings resound
That are strung in love.

Also visible was that same glorious vessel in which Christ dwelt in body and soul for nine months, as she shall always remain, but as yet without the great adornment that the heavenly Father shall give to the bodies of the blessed on the last day. Our Lady will be without it as long as the earth floats on the sea. One saw how beautifully our Lady stood at the throne to the left hand of the heavenly Father, revealed in all her maidenly being; and how her human body is bathed and formed in the noble light of the soul of our Lady; and how her lovely uncovered breasts are so full of sweet milk that drops flow forth in honor of the heavenly Father and as a favor to humankind, so that man might be perfect above all creatures. The noble princes, the archangels, are so utterly amazed that other princes, who are human, have ascended above them, that it is praiseworthy that evidence of our perfection is there.'

On the right hand of our Lord stands Jesus, our Redeemer, with his open wounds bloody and unbandaged, ready to prevail over the Father's justice that severely threatens many a sinner. As long as sinning continues on earth, Christ's wounds shall be open: bloody, but not painful. But after judgment Christ shall put on such a garment as has never been seen, unless God revealed it, but this did not happen. Then the sweet wounds shall heal, as though a rose petal had been placed on the spot of the wound. One will then see the scars turned bright red-love's color; and they will never fade. Then the uncreated God shall make new all his creatures, so new that they can never grow old.

Now my German fails me; I do not know Latin. If there is something of merit here, it is not my doing; for there never was a dog so nasty that it would not come if its master coaxed it with a white breakfast roll.

4. The Poor Girl, the Mass of John the Baptist, the Transformation of the Host into the Lamb, the Beauty of the Angels, Four

Kinds of Sanctified People, and the Golden Penny

How useful it is for a person to have good will, even though she cannot perform good works. This was revealed by our Lord to a poor girl when she could not go to mass because unfortunately she was not well enough for his service. Thus did she speak to God: "Alas, my dear Lord, am I going to be without mass today?"

While she was in this state of longing, God took away all her earthly senses and brought her miraculously into a beautiful church. She found no one inside. She thought to herself: Oh, you poor lazy thing, you've come too late. That you got up just now isn't going to do you any good here. Then she saw a young man come in carrying a bunch of white flowers. He spread them beneath the tower and went away.' Then another youth came carrying a bunch of violets, which he spread in the middle of the church. Then a third youth came carrying a bunch of roses, which he spread decorously before the altar of our Lady. Then a fourth came carrying a bunch of white lilies and spread them in the choir.' When they had done this, they bowed reverently and went away. These youths were so noble and so beautiful to behold that, if a person could really see them, human bodily suffering could never be so great that all the suffering would not disappear. Then two school boys in white garments entered carrying two lights. They placed them on the altar. Then they withdrew properly and remained in the choir.

Then a fairly tall man came in, quite gaunt but not old. His clothes were so tattered that arms and legs showed through. He carried a white lamb on his breast and two cruets$ in his grasp. He went to the altar, placed the lamb on it, and bowed lovingly toward it. This was John the Baptist, who was going to sing the mass. Then a young man entered, quite delicate in his bearing, carrying an eagle on his breast. That was John the Evangelist. Then a simple man, St. Peter, entered. Then a strapping young man entered carrying a bunch of vestments, which the three men put on. Then a great throng came in. It was the mighty court of heaven that filled the church so full that the poor girl could not find a place where she might remain.

So she went back and stood beneath the tower, where she found a group of people dressed in white who did not have any hair. Instead, they wore simple crowns on their heads. These were those people who had not lived according to the law. They lack the ornament of hair, which is good works. How, then, did they get into heaven? By sorrow and good will at the hour of death. Farther away she saw people more beautiful, clothed in violet-colored garments. They were adorned with the lovely hair of virtue and crowned with God's law. She found people more beautiful still who were clothed in rose-colored garments. They wore the beautiful symbol of widows and the crown of freely chosen chastity.

The poor girl was wretchedly clothed and was physically ill. She was not able to remain in any of the three groups. So she went and stood in front of the choir and looked in to where our dear Lady was standing on the highest level. St. Catherine, Cecilia, bishops, martyrs, angels, and a large number of virgins were there. The poor thing looked at this imposing throng and then looked at herself. Did she dare stay there in her wretched condition? Suddenly she was wearing a deep red mantle woven out of love in proportion to the ardor of her faculties for God and all good things. The mantle was decorated with gold and also with a song that went: "I would willingly die of love." She saw that she was like a noble maiden and wore on her head a garland of splendid gold. On it was inscribed another song that went:

His eyes into my eyes,
His heart into my heart,
His soul into my soul
Untiringly enclosed.

And her countenance resembled that of the angels. "Alas, foul puddle that I am, what is happening to me? Unfortunately I am not nearly as blessed as I saw myself there."

All who were in the choir looked at her with a friendly smile. Our Lady motioned to her that she should stand above Catherine. She went and stood next to our dear Lady, for it could indeed rarely happen that she might address and behold God's mother: "Oh, dear and noble Lady!" She considered it a great favor that the lowly crow might stand next to the turtledove. All who were in the choir were clothed in radiant gold and enveloped in soaring bliss, brighter than the sun.

Then the mass began thus: Let us all rejoice in the Lord." As often as our Lady was mentioned, she genuflected," while the others just bowed, because God had given her the greatest honor. Then the wretched girl who had come to mass said: "Oh, Lady, may I receive the body of God since there are no dangers here?" The mother of God said: "Certainly, dear child, make your confession." Then the queen of heaven signaled to John the Evangelist. He went out and heard the confession of the sinful girl. She asked him to tell her how long she would live. John said: "I am not permitted to tell you. God does not want me to. For if it were to be a long time, you might in your great sadness fall into deep depression. But if the time were to be short, you might in the sadness of your heart fall into a desire to live a long time."

Then John went to read the gospel, the Liber generationis.¹² The poor girl said to our Lady: "Should I make an offering?" Our Lady said: "Yes, if you do not intend to take it back from him again." The poor girl said: "Dear Lady, you must give me this favor from God." Our Lady said: "Then take this golden penny your self-will-and offer it to my glorious Son in all things." With good manners and in holy fear the little maid took the large penny. She examined what image had been struck on the penny. On it was Christ being taken down from the cross. On the back was the whole court of heaven with the nine choirs and God's throne above. Then the voice of God spoke to her: "If you are offering me this penny with the intention of never taking it back again, then I will take you down from the cross and take you to me into my kingdom."

After that, the same priest, who had been ordained by the Holy Spirit in his mother's womb,¹³ celebrated a low mass. When he took the white host in his hands, the lamb, which was standing on the altar, got up and, at the words under the signs of his hand,¹⁴ joined itself to the host and the host to the lamb in such a way that I no longer saw the host, but only a bleeding lamb hanging from a red cross. It looked at us with such sweet eyes that I shall never, ever forget it. Then the poor girl begged our Lady thus: "Dear Mother, ask your glorious Son that he deign to give himself to me, wretched though I be." And she saw that a radiant beam shined forth from the mouth of our Lady onto the altar and touched the lamb with her prayer, so that God himself spoke out of the lamb: "Mother, I shall willingly put myself in the place you desire." The poor girl approached the altar with great love and an open soul. St. John took the white lamb with its red wounds and placed it between her teeth in her mouth. Then the pure lamb lay down onto its own image in her stable¹⁵ and began to suckle from her heart with its sweet mouth. The more it suckled, the more she gave it.

[Now the person to whom this happened is dead and gone beyond. May God help us that we might behold her in the company of the angels.] ¹⁶

5. A Song of the Soul About Five Things, and How God Is a Garment of the Soul and the Soul of God

You shine into my soul
Like the sun against gold.
When I may rest in you, Lord,
My joy is rich.
You clothe yourself with my soul
And you are her most intimate garment.¹⁷
That there must be a parting between them—
Never have I experienced greater heartache!
If you were to love me more intensely,

I would certainly pass away
To where I could love you as I wish unceasingly.
Now I have sung to you
And yet to no avail.
Were you to sing to me,
I would have to succeed.

6. God's Singing Response in the Soul in Five Things

[God:] When I shine, you shall glow.
When I flow, you shall become wet.
When you sigh, you draw my divine heart into you.
When you weep in longing for me, I take you in my arms.
But when you love, we two become one being.¹⁸
And when we two are one being,
Then we can never be parted.
Rather, a blissful abiding
Prevails between us.

[Soul:] Lord, then I shall persevere in hunger and thirst
In pursuing and in pleasure
Till that playful¹⁹ hour
When from your divine mouth
The chosen words shall flow
That are heard by no one
But the soul alone
That has stripped itself of the earth
And puts her ear next to your mouth.
She, indeed, grasps the treasure of love!

7. In Suffering Praise God; Then He Will Appear to You. The Two Golden Chalices of Suffering and Consolation

I, sinful, lazy creature, was supposed to pray once; and God acted as though he did not want to give me any kind of favor. I wanted to give myself over to deep sadness because of the weakness of my flesh, which seemed to me to be an obstacle to spiritual pleasure. "No!" said my soul. "Keep in mind all his faithfulness and praise your Lord thus: 'Gloria in excelsis deo.'"²⁰

As I thus praised, a great light appeared to my soul, and in this light God revealed himself in great majesty and indescribable brightness. Our Lord held two golden chalices in his hands that were both full of living wine. In his left hand was the red wine of suffering, and in his right hand the white wine of sublime consolation. Then our Lord spoke: "Blessed are those who drink this red wine. Although I give both out of divine love, the white wine is nobler in itself; but noblest of all are those who drink both the white and the red."

8. Of Purgatory; a Person Freed a Thousand Souls from It with the Tears of Love

A person should pray very simply and with great intensity to God in heaven for the poor souls. Once God showed her²¹ the horrible purifying fire and the kinds of torment in it as varied as the sins punished there. This person's spirit was so fiercely moved that she embraced the whole of purgatory in her arms. She carried on caringly and pleaded lovingly. Then God spoke from heaven: "Stop that now! Don't inflict pain on yourself! You are making it too hard for yourself." The spirit lamented: "Alas, dear Lord, then free some of them!" Our Lord said: "How many of them do you want?" The spirit said: "Lord, as many as I am able to make reparation for in your goodness." Our Lord said: "Then take a thousand and lead them wherever you wish." Then, black, fiery, slimy, burning, bloody, stinking they rose out of the suffering. Again the person's spirit spoke: "Alas, my dear Lord, what is going to happen to these poor ones now? With such disfigurement they can never enter your kingdom." Then God inclined himself exceedingly low beneath his nobility and said something that serves to give much comfort to us sinners: "You should bathe them in the tears of love that now flow from the eyes of your body." Then there appeared a large round lake. They arose in unison and bathed in love, bright as the sun. The person's spirit felt indescribable joy and said: "Praised be you, dear Lord, by all creatures forever. Now they are suited for you in your kingdom." Then our Lord bowed to them from on high and placed the crown of love on them, which had freed them from thence, and he said: "You shall wear this crown forever so that all those in my kingdom might know that you were redeemed by tears of love nine years before your allotted time."

9. God Praises His Bride in Five Things

You are a light of the world.
You are a crown of virgins.
You are a salve of the wounded.
You are a pledge among the false.
You are a bride of the Holy Trinity.

10. The Bride Praises God in Return in Five Things

You are a light in all lights.
You are a flower above all crowns.
You are a salve on all wounds.
You are an unwavering pledge free of falsity.
You are an innkeeper in all hostelryes.

11. Seven Kinds of Love for God

True love of God has seven approaches.
Cheerful love leads the way.
Fearing love takes on the task.
Strong love can accomplish much.
Loving love receives no honor.
Wise love has knowledge.

Free love lives without heartache.
Powerful love is forever happy.

12. Seven Kinds of Perfection

Willingly without honor,
Willingly unfeared,
Willingly alone,
Willingly quiet,
Willingly below,
Willingly high,
Willingly common to all.

13. Between God and the Soul There Should Be Love

Between God and you there should always be love.
Between earthly things and you there should be dread and fear.
Between sin and you there should be enmity and strife.
Between the kingdom of heaven and you there should be constant hope.

14. Where Bitterness, Low Spirits, Sickness, Terror, Sensitivity, Distress, Forsakenness, and Inconsolability Come From²²

Bitterness of heart comes from humanity.²³
Low spirits of the body come from the flesh alone.
Agility of spirit comes from the nobility of the soul.
Terror in the face of punishment comes from guilt.
Sickness of the body comes from nature.
Distress of loneliness comes from fickleness.
Infrequent consolation comes from restlessness.

15. How One Wounded by Love Is Restored to Health

Whoever at some point
Is seriously wounded by true love
Will never become healthy again

Unless he kisses that same mouth
By which his soul was wounded.²⁴

16. The Seven Gifts of a Brother

The soul is boundless in her longing,
On fire in her loving,
Amiable in her bearing,
A mirror of the world,
Small in her greatness,
Reliable in helping,
Recollected in God.

17. How God Woos the Soul and Makes Her Wise in His Love²⁵

Thus does God woo the guileless soul and make her wise in his love:

“Ah, precious dove, your feet are red,
Your feathers are smooth,
Your mouth is well-formed,
Your eyes are beautiful,
Your head is refined,
Your bearing is attractive,
Your flight is bold,
And you sink ever all too swiftly back to earth.”

18. How the Soul Interprets God's Wooing in Eight Things

“Lord, my feet are stained with the blood of your true redemptive act.
My feathers have been smoothed in your noble choosing.
My mouth has been formed by the Holy Spirit.
My eyes are brightened in your fiery light.
My head is ennobled by your constant protection.
My bearing is attractive because of your generous gift.
My flight is made bold by your restless exhilaration.
My sinking back to earth comes from your being united with my body.²⁶
The greater the freedom you give me, the longer shall I soar in you.”

19. How Knowledge and the Soul Converse and How the Latter Says That She Is Threefold. Of the Three Heavens

Knowledge speaks first:

“O loving Soul, I have beheld you.
You are quite wondrously lovely.
A light was given me that I might look upon you.
Otherwise, it never would have been my fortune.
There is a threeness about you.
You can indeed be God’s image:
You are a virile vassal in battle.
You are a finely attired maiden in your Lord’s presence in the palace.
You are an eager bride in your bed of love with God.²⁷
Loving Soul, in your battle you are armed with immense might
And with such great concentration of your faculties
That neither all the forces of the world

Nor all the aid of your flesh
Nor all the troops of the devil
Nor all the power of hell
Can bring you down from God’s favor.
No one can boast of that any more.²⁸
You constantly defend yourself with flowers.
Your sword is the noble rose, Jesus Christ.
That is how you defend yourself.
Your shield is the white lily, Mary.
It does not do them a bit of good
That they attack you.
Rather, they thereby enhance your beauty
And increase immeasurably in you God’s honor.

All who are pure and fight to the end
Shall receive ample recompense from the Emperor.
O overwhelmed²⁹ Soul, what is your honor like
In the palace of the Holy Trinity, when you stand Before your Lord so attractively adorned?”

“Lady Knowledge, you are wiser than I am.
Why are you asking me this?”

“Lady Soul, God has chosen you before all things.
You are my mistress and my queen.”³⁰

“Lady Knowledge, I was born noble and free.
I cannot be dishonored
Because of whom alone I love.
And so I shall bring it about
That the Holy Trinity loves, cherishes, and honors me,
And everything in heaven and on earth
Shall forever be subject to me.
If I let love have power over me,
Giving it room,

So that it can bind me to holy patience
And so that my guilt may not increase,
Then it will lead me to noble meekness,
That I may be ready for all good things;
And it will yoke me to strict obedience,
That I shall become lovingly subject
To God and all creatures.”

“Mistress Bride, would you say a word to me
About the ineffable intimacy that exists between God and you?”

“Lady Knowledge, that I shall not do.
Brides may not tell everything they experience.
Holy contemplation and precious enjoyment
You shall learn about from me.
My privileged experience of God must always be hidden
From you and from all creatures except for myself.”

“Lady Soul, your marvelous visions and lofty words
That you have seen and heard in God—
If you move me to divulge just a little,
Then I shall cast the light of the Emperor
Into a dark and dank stable.
Cattle eat their straw contentedly.

But there are some who seem to be God’s children
And yet thrust about like unfettered cattle
In the dark stable and say:
‘What is the point of such swindle?
It was thought up by self-will
And carried out in fake holiness.’”

“Lady Knowledge, one finds it written
That St. Paul was taken up into the third heaven.³¹
This never would have happened to him
If he had remained Saul.
If he had found the truth
In the first and second heaven,
He would never have climbed to the third.”

“Lady Soul, there is a heaven
Which the devil made with his alluring false cunning.
There thoughts wander about with sad feelings,
And the soul remains completely unmoved
Because she does not find love corresponding to her nature.
The soul remains unconsolated there
And the simple faculties are deceived.³²
In this heaven the devil reveals himself

As a radiant angel,
Even like God himself as to his five wounds.
Simple Soul, watch out!
The second heaven was created
By the longing of the senses
And by the first stage of love.
In this heaven there is no light;
The soul does not see God there.
Rather, she tastes an indescribable sweetness
That permeates all her members.
She hears as well a voice speaking of certain things

That she really wants,
For she is still joined to her earthly senses.
If she at this stage has not attained profound humility,
The devil brings his light there.³³
What then happens is not from God.
But if she has perfect humility,
The soul shall travel on to the third heaven
Where the true light is given to her.”

Then the senses say:
“Our lady, the soul, has slept since childhood.
Now she has awakened in the light of open love.”
In this light she looks around herself to discover
Who that is who reveals himself to her,

And what that is that one is saying to her.
Thus does she see truly and understand
How God is all things in all things.

[Soul:] “Now I shall put aside all my cares
And go with St. Paul into the third heaven
If God in his love will beat down my sinful body.”

This third heaven is vaulted, ordered, and illumined brightly with the Three Persons.³⁴

20. How Sister Hildegund Is Adorned in Heaven with Three Mantles, with Seven Crowns, and How the Nine Choirs Praise Her

On the feast of the holy virgin St. Barbara, Sister Hildegund received her glory. God revealed this to a lame dog who is as yet licking its wounds in wretchedness.³⁵ It happened thus while I was at prayer. I do not know whether heaven descended to me or I was drawn into the blissful house of God. There stood Hildegund before the throne of the heavenly Father, adorned as a new bride that the king had brought home. She had three mantles draped over her and wore on her head seven crowns, and the nine choirs offered her special praise. When I looked at her, I recognized her in all the gifts that she had received from God. I was eager to speak with her and, in order to remain longer with her in this blissful state, I asked her: "Tell me, where did you get that rosecolored mantle?"

Hildegund said: "I was a martyr in fiery love, so much so that often my heart's blood poured forth over my head."

Then I asked her further: "Where did you get this golden mantle that shines so splendidly?"

She said: "From the example of good works."

I said: "Where did you get this flowering white mantle?"

She replied: "From the overwhelming³⁶ love, which I kept secretly in my soul and in my senses."

These were the seven crowns: the crown of constancy, the crown of holy faith, the crown of fidelity, the crown of generous mercy, the crown of holy understanding, the crown of love, and the crown of virginity.

Then I asked further: "Dear Sister, where is your crown of humility that is so becoming to religious persons?"

She answered: "I do not have it especially, nor did I ever attain it just enough that God took away pride with it."

These seven crowns are all specially adorned with a garland of the dignity of pure noble chastity. The nine choirs praise her for nine virtues thus:

"We praise you for your sorrow,
For your good will,
For your truth,
For your wisdom,
For your sweet grieving,
For your voluntary poverty,
For your strength,
For your justice."

The Seraphim praise her thus, for they are her equals: "We praise you for your love, God's Queen."

The Thrones praise her thus: "We praise the bridegroom because of the beauty of the bride."

I asked her about many things which I shall now pass over in silence.
Though the kingdom of heaven is colored by love,
The kingdom of earth is, alas, quite changeable
For me and for many a person
Who never was taken up to heaven
Where one shall behold the truth.

21. If You Would Behold the Mountain, You Should Have Seven Thing.'

I saw a mountain—
That took place very quickly,
For the body cannot endure
The soul's being there for an hour.
At its base the mountain was white, like clouds,
And high up at the summit, fiery bright as the sun.

Its end and its beginning
I could not find at all.
Inside, it playfully sparkled
And flowed golden in boundless love.

I spoke:
"Lord, blessed are the eyes
That shall forever gaze upon this surging of love
And grasp this wonder.
I can never describe it."

The mountain spoke:

"The eyes that are to see me thus
Must be graced by seven things; otherwise,
They can never experience it.
These are: Slow to borrow, quick to pay back,
To hold back nothing for yourself,
To be kind in the face of hatred,
To be loving in the face of cruelty,
To be pure as to guilt
And ready for all one might receive."

22. How Contemplation Asks the Loving Soul About the Seraphim and the Least of Men

"Lady Soul, would you rather be an angel of the order of Seraphim or a human being with body and soul in the lowest choir of angels?"

The Soul to Contemplation: "Lady Contemplation, you have certainly noticed that the Seraphim angels are exalted princes and that they are one love and one fire and one breath and one light with God."

Contemplation to the Soul: "Lady Soul, you have certainly noticed that the angels are simple persons and that they do not praise God nor love him nor know him beyond the limits of their nature. The least of human beings can catch up with them by Christian belief, sorrow, longing, and good will. It's just that the human soul cannot burn as intensely in the Godhead."

The Soul to Contemplation: "Lady Contemplation, you have certainly noticed that the Seraphim angels are God's children and yet his servants as well. The least soul is a daughter of the Father and a sister of the Son and a friend of the Holy Spirit and, indeed, a bride of the Holy Trinity. When the game is over, then let one see how the scales tip-the noblest angel, Jesus Christ, who soars above the Seraphim, who is undivided with his Father. Him shall I, the least of souls, take in my arms, eat him and drink him, and have my way with him. This can never happen to the angels. No matter how high he dwells above me, his Godhead shall never be so distant that I cannot constantly entwine my limbs with him; and so I shall never cool off. What, then, do I care what the angels experience?"

23. How Love Questions and Instructs Dull Souls and Would Like to Bring Them to Their Lover and Begins to Speak; and How the Dull Soul Responds

"Alas, foolish Soul, where are you, or what is your dwelling like, and what are you living for? Where can you find rest since you do not love your vibrant God more than your own will or beyond all your might?"

"Let me sleep. I don't know what you are talking about."

"One certainly has to wake the queen when the king intends to come."

"I am a member of a religious order. I fast, keep vigils, am free of serious sin; I am bound enough."

"What good does it do to bind an empty vessel if the wine still runs out? One has to fill it with the stones of external hardship and the ashes of transitoriness."

"I dwell in the comfort of my relatives and my dear religious friends. Besides, how can I enjoy loving someone I don't know?"

"What? You don't know how to recognize the Lord who has been spoken of so lovingly to you so often? You are more concerned about that mongrel body of yours than about Jesus, your sweet Lord; and so you are never going to win honor in his eyes."

"I live by my own will. That is what I like to do."

"If you want to render God genuine loyalty, for his love you should follow his spirit."

"I rest in the vigor of my body."

"You should be ashamed of yourself today in God's sight, that you call yourself a religious and yet busy yourself the whole time with your body."

"How am I supposed to stay well if I take on the burdens you involve?"

"Oh, traitor! He who made the soul so noble that she feasts on nothing but God-he will not let your body perish."

"You are rebuking me severely. If I knew where he was, I could yet change my ways."

"If you wish to dwell with him in noble freedom, you first have to clear bad habits out of this dwelling."

"If I knew what was best, I would choose the best."

"Alas! That many a man who is wise in learning and by natural good sense does not risk putting himself completely in the power of naked love! Rather, it is the simple and pure who seek God alone in all their actions to whom God, given his nature, must favorably incline."

"I imagined that, having entered religious life, I had climbed high enough."

"What good does it do to put fine clothes on a sleeping man and set gourmet food before him? As long as he is asleep, he can't eat anyway. Ah, my love, let me awaken you."

"Well then, tell me where his dwelling is."

"There is no other Lord that dwells in all his castles at the same time but him alone. He lives in the peace of holy affection and whispers to his beloved in the narrow confines of the soul. He also embraces her in the noble comfort of his love. He greets her with his loving eyes when they earnestly gaze at one another with love. He kisses her passionately with his divine mouth. You are happy, more than happy in this most glorious hour. He caresses her, as well he can, on the bed of love. Then she rises to the heights of bliss and to the most exquisite pain when she becomes truly intimate with him. Ah, dear Soul, let yourself be loved and don't fiercely fend it off."

"Who are those who defend themselves fiercely?"

"Those who pester others and themselves with their own spitefulness. Now I shall tell you who he is. He is the loftiest of all pinnacles, and this same loftiest of all pinnacles bent down into the deepest of all valleys, and this deepest of all valleys ascended onto the highest of all pinnacles. O dull Soul, look all around you and open your blind eyes."

"If he has climbed down from the highest pinnacle for love of me and given himself along with all creatures to me totally, and if he does not now intend to withdraw his goodness from me, then I might well be ever ashamed in his sight that I was never quite willing to give up my worthless copper in return for his precious gold. Alas, where have I been, poor blind me, that I have lived so long without strong love? With it I can indeed conquer all my troubles in spite of all my enemies. Poor wretch, although I have missed much that is good, I shall nevertheless still go out from all things and into God. O Love, will you still receive me?"

"Yes, I shall. God has never denied himself to anyone. This is an equal balance: If you want to have love, you must leave love."

24. How the Loving Soul Joins the Company of God and His Chosen Dear Ones and Shall Be Equal to All the Saints. How the Devil and the Soul Talk to Each Other

Oh, Lord Jesus Christ, that you suffered despite your guiltlessness gives me consolation, for in all that I suffer I am guilty; and your salvific death keeps my memory of you alive, and your immaculate blood has coursed through my soul.

Mary, dear Mother, I stand next to you under the cross with all my Christian faith, and the sword of holy sorrow cuts through my soul³⁹ because so many of those who have the appearance of religious persons" are so unreliable.

John the Baptist, I was taken prisoner with you because the treacherous slut of deceitfulness killed the word of God in my mouth.'

John the Evangelist, I fell asleep with you in tender love on the breast of Jesus Christ, and then I saw and heard there such glorious marvels that my body often took leave of itself.⁴²

Peter, I have been crucified with you because things never go right for me as a human being, and spiritually I am often in pain for the praise of Jesus Christ.

Paul, I was miraculously caught up with you" and saw such a house that nothing has ever surprised me as much as the fact that I have been able since then to remain a living person. When I recall that the heavenly Father is the blessed chalice-bearer there and Jesus the chalice, the Holy Spirit the unadulterated wine, and how the whole Trinity is the full chalice and love the mistress in charge of the wine cellar, then, God knows, I would be happy indeed if love would invite me into the house. But for now I am happy to drink gall here. Ah, dear Jesus, reward all those lovingly who have here poured out bitterness for me to drink, for they have made me rich in divine favors. I received a chalice filled with gall that was so powerful that it utterly permeated my body and soul. And so I offered special prayers to God for the pourer, that he would pour out for him celestial wine. And indeed, he did so, saying: "Noble Maiden, be of good cheer. The magnitude of my wonder shall come over you. Lions shall fear you. Bears shall accept your dominion over them. Wolves shall flee you. The lamb shall be your companion." I am certain of this and, up until now it has turned out that I have had to drain many a chalice of gall because, alas, the devil still has many a one among religious people willing to pour it out. They are so full of poison that they cannot drink it all up by themselves, but must pour it out maliciously for God's children.

Stephen, I kneel next to you in front of Jewish hearts under the sharp stones, for they fall upon me large and small." Those who appear to be good people stone me from the back and run away and do not want me to know anything about its having befallen me because of them: but God saw it.

Lawrence, I was bound next to you for more than twenty years on a horrible gridiron, but God preserved me unburned and freed me more than seven years ago.

Martin, I live with you in obscurity and God's true love martyred me beyond all adversity.

Dominic, my dear Father, I have something in common with you because I have desired many a day that the sinful blood of my heart might flow beneath the feet of disbelieving heretics.

Catherine, I go with you into battle because the lords of hell want to bring me down. One of them came to me splendorous as the radiance of the sun so that I might know that he was an angel. He was carrying a shining book and said:

"Go ahead and take this kiss of peace,⁴⁵ when you cannot make it to mass."

The soul spoke with deliberate prudence: "He who has no peace himself, cannot bestow peace on me."

He went away and transformed himself and returned looking like a very wretched, sickly man whose guts were falling out and said: "Oh, you are so holy. Heal me."

The soul spoke again: "He who is himself sick cannot heal anyone."

"It is written: Who can do it better should help the other."

"It is also written: One should not help anyone against God."

"What one does for good is not against God."

"If there is nothing good about something, no one can achieve something good in its regard. You have an everlasting sickness.⁴⁶ If you want to recover, go and show yourself to a priest or a bishop or an archbishop or the pope.⁴⁷ I have no power except that of being able to sin." The he replied in rage: "That I will never do!"

Then he became like black smoke and comported himself indecently and disappeared. But I am not afraid of him.⁴⁸

Mary Magdalene, I live with you in the desert wilderness, because all things are foreign to me except God alone.

Lord heavenly Father, between you and me there goes unceasingly an imperceptible breath in which I come to know and see many marvels and inexpressible things. Unfortunately, they do me little good because I am such a worthless vessel that cannot endure your slightest spark. Unbound love dwells in the senses because it is still mixed in such a way with earthly things that a person can cry out: "Love is in grace, distant in the senses and has, alas, not yet climbed atop the soul." Many people have fallen because their soul remained unwounded.⁴⁹ Solomon and David received the Holy Spirit in their human senses, but when the senses changed, they fell into false love. God knows, their soul had not sunk into the lowest depths beneath all creatures nor was it wounded by the powerful part of love, for he who never tasted the best wine often whoops it up the most. Bound love dwells in the soul and transcends human senses and concedes the body nothing it wants.⁵⁰ It is restrained and very calm. It lowers its wings and listens for the inexpressible voice and gazes into the incomprehensible light and works with great desire to achieve the will of its Lord. If the body can still flap its wings, the soul can never reach the heights that are attainable for human beings. In this bound love the wounded soul becomes rich and her external senses very poor because the more riches God finds in her, the deeper she humbly lowers herself because of the true nobility of her love. I cannot imagine a person bound by the deepest stirrings of powerful love falling into serious sin; for the soul is bound, she has to love. May God thus bind us all!

25. The Lament of the Loving Soul; How God Protects Her and Withdraws His Gift from Her Concerning Wisdom, How the Soul Asks God How She Is and Where He Is. Concerning the Orchard, Flowers, and the Song of the Virgins

"Oh, you treasure beyond reckoning in your abundance!
Oh, you incomprehensible marvel in your variety!
Oh, you infinite glory in the power of your nobility!
How painfully I long for you
When you want to spare me;
This all creatures would not be able to express to you fully
If they were to lament on my behalf;
For I suffer inhuman anguish.
Human death I would find more pleasant.

I seek you with my thoughts
As a maiden secretly does her lover.
I shall fall terribly sick from this,
For I am bound to you.
The bond is stronger than I am,
Thus I cannot become free of love.
I cry out to you in great longing,
A lonely voice;
I hope for your coming with heavy heart,
I cannot rest, I am on fire,
Unquenchable in your burning love.
I pursue you with all my might.
If I had the strength of a giant
And if I got onto your trail,
Still I would quickly lose your tracks.
Please, my Love, run not so far ahead of me
And tarry a while in love,
So that I can catch you.

Please, Lord, just as you have taken from me all things that I have from you,
Leave me, at least, through grace that same gift
That you have given to dogs through their nature—
That I might be loyal to you in my misery,
Free of all discontent.
This I do indeed desire
More than I yearn for heaven.”

“My dear Dove, now listen to me!
My divine wisdom is so utterly upon you
That I direct all my gifts to you,
As much as your frail body can bear.
Your secret sighs shall reach me.
Your heart’s anguish can compel me.

Your sweet pursuit shall so exhaust me
That I shall yearn to cool myself
In your limpid soul,
To which I have been bound.
The sighs and tremors of your wounded heart
Have driven out my justice from you.
That suits you quite well, as it does me:

I cannot be without you.
No matter how far we are apart,
We can still never be really separated.
No matter how softly I caress you,
I inflict immense pain on your poor body.
If I were to surrender myself to you continuously, as you desire,
I would lose my delightful dwelling place on earth within you,
For a thousand bodies cannot fully satisfy the longings of a soul in love.
And so, the higher the love, the holier the martyr.”

“O Lord, you pamper to excess my dank prison,
In which I drink the water of the world and eat in great misery
The ash cake of my frailty,
And am wounded to the death
By the beam of your fiery love.
Now you leave me, Lord, lying in my misery,
My wounds untended, in great torment.”

“Queen dear to my heart,
Must you always be so impatient?
When I wound you most deeply,
I immediately apply salve most tenderly.
The abundance of my riches is yours alone,
And even over me shall you hold sway.
You are very dear to my heart.
If you have the scales, I have the gold.
All that you have done for my sake, renounced, or suffered,
I shall balance off completely and shall give myself to you forever Expecting nothing in return, just as you will.”

“Lord, two things I ask you;
In your kindness instruct me:
When my eyes weep in loneliness,
And my mouth remains mute in its simplicity,
And my tongue is constricted in affliction,
And my senses ask me again and again
What is wrong with me,
Then, Lord, everything in me is directed toward you.
When my flesh wastes away,
My blood dries up, my bones torture me,

My veins contract,
And my heart melts out of love for you,
And my soul roars
With the bellowings of a hungry lion,
Tell me, dearest One,
What will it be like for me then,
And where will you be?²⁹⁵¹

“You are like a new bride
Whose one and only lover has slipped away as she slept.
She had entrusted him with all her love
And simply cannot endure his parting from her for one hour.
When she then awakens, she can only have as much of him
As she can carry in her thoughts.
That is the source of all her lament.
As long as his bride has not been delivered to his house,
She must often be apart from her young man.
I come to you at my pleasure, when I will.
If you are patient and calm,
And hide your cares where you can,

Then the power of love shall grow in you.
Now let me tell you where I shall then be:
I am in myself in all places and in all things,
As I always have been eternally,
And I shall be waiting for you in the orchard of love
And shall pluck for you the flowers of sweet union⁵²
And shall make a bed for you out of the soft grass of holy knowledge,
And the bright sun of my eternal Godhead
Shall make you radiant with the secret wonder of my attractiveness—
A bit of which you have intimately revealed—⁵³

And I shall bend down for you the towering tree of my Holy Trinity.
Then you shall pick the green, white, and red apples of my succulent humanity,⁵⁴
And the shadow of my Holy Spirit shall protect you
From all earthly sadness.
Then you will have no thought of your heartache.
When you embrace the tree,
I shall teach you the song of the virgins—
The melody, the words, the dulcet sounds,
Which those cannot understand in the least

Who have led unchaste lives.
Still they shall receive sweet compensation.⁵⁵
Beloved, begin the song and let me hear how well you sing.”

“Alas, my dear Lover, I am hoarse in the throat of my chastity,
But the sugar of your sweet kindness
Has let my voice resound, so that I can now sing thus:
Lord, your blood and mine are one, untainted.
Your love and mine are one, inseparable.
Your garment and mine are one, immaculate.
Your mouth and mine are one, unkissed.
Your breast and mine are one, not caressed
By any man but you alone.”⁵⁶

These are the words of the song.
The voice of love and the melody of the heart must be left unrendered,
For they can be captured by no merely human hand!

26. About This Book and the Writers of This Book

I was warned against writing this book.
People said:
If one did not watch out,
It could be burned.
So I did as I used to do as a child.
When I was sad, I always had to pray.
I bowed to my Lover and said: “Alas, Lord,
Now I am saddened all because of your honor.”⁵⁷
If I am going to receive no comfort from you now,
Then you led me astray,
Because you are the one who told me to write it.”

At once God revealed himself to my joyless soul, held this book in his right hand, and said:

“My dear One, do not be overly troubled.
No one can burn the truth.
For someone to take this book out of my hand,
He must be mightier than I.
The book is threefold
And portrays me alone.
The parchment that encloses it indicates my pure, white, just humanity
That for your sake suffered death.
The words symbolize my marvelous Godhead.
It flows continuously
Into your soul from my divine mouth.
The sound of the words is a sign of my living spirit
And through it achieves genuine truth.
Now, examine all these words—
How admirably do they proclaim my personal secrets!
So have no doubts about yourself!”

“Ah, Lord, if I were a learned religious man,⁵⁸
And if you had performed this unique great miracle using him,
You would receive everlasting honor for it.
But how is one supposed to believe
That you have built a golden house on filthy ooze
And really live in it with your mother, with all creatures, and with your heavenly court?
Lord, earthly wisdom will not be able to find you there.”

“Daughter, many a wise man, because of negligence
On a big highway, has lost his precious gold
With which he was hoping to go to a famous school.
Someone is going to find it.
By nature I have acted accordingly many a day.
Wherever I bestowed special favors,
I always sought out the lowest, most insignificant, and most unknown place for them.
The highest mountains on earth cannot receive the revelations of my favors
Because the course of my Holy Spirit flows by nature downhill.
One finds many a professor learned in scripture who actually is a fool in my eyes.
And I’ll tell you something else:
It is a great honor for me with regard to them, and it very much strengthens Holy Christianity
That the unlearned mouth, aided by my Holy Spirit, teaches the learned tongue.”⁵⁹

“Alas, Lord, I sigh, desire,
And beg on behalf of your writers
Who write this book after me,⁶⁰
That you see fit to give them, too, as a reward
A favor that has never been bestowed on human beings.
Lord, your gifts are a thousand times more numerous Than your creatures who might receive them.”

Our Lord said:

“They have written it in gold letters.
All these words shall appear written on their outermost garments, forever visible in my kingdom
In heavenly shining gold above all their adornment,
Because to love freely must always be the highest value for people.”

As our Lord was speaking these words to me, I saw glorious truth in its eternal excellence.

O Lord, I beg that you preserve
This book from the eyes of evil cunning,
For this has come among us from hell.
It was never taken from heaven;
It was begotten in Lucifer's heart
And was born of spiritual pride
And was puffed up in hate
And has grown so large in powerful rage
That it imagines that no virtue is its equal.

So must God's children perish
And allow themselves to be oppressed in degradation
If they want to receive the highest honors with Jesus.
A holy watchfulness we must keep about ourselves at all times
To preserve ourselves from shortcomings.
A loving watchfulness we should have toward our fellow Christians
When they blunder, that we say to them only
That which bespeaks our good intentions toward them.
This can keep us from much wasted speech. Amen.

Book III

1. Of Heaven and the Nine Choirs and Who Is Supposed to Fill the Breach.' Of the Throne of the Apostles and St. Mary and on Which Christ Sits. Of the Reward of Preachers, Martyrs, and Virgins, and of the Unbaptized Children²

The soul spoke thus to its longing: "I beg you, go off and see where my Lover is, and tell him I want to love."

Then longing went quickly off, for it is by nature swift, and reached the heights and called out: "Great Lord, open up and let me in."

The Master of the house said:

"What is it you want that you are making such a fuss?"

"Lord, I report to you that my lady cannot live much longer in her present condition. But if you were to flow, then she could swim. A fish cannot remain alive and stay fresh long on the sand."

"Go on back. I'm not going to let you in unless you bring me the hungry soul that I desire more than anything else."

The messenger returned and the soul heard about her Lord's wish. Oh, how she trembled with love! She rose up with a deft movement and in pleasurable flight. Very soon two angels came to meet her. God sent them to her out of tender love. They said to her: "Lady Soul, what are you doing way up here? You are still clothed with dark earth."

She replied:

"Ye lords, be completely quiet about that
And see that you extend to me a better greeting.
I am going loving.
The closer you sink to earth,
The more you hide your celestial splendor;
And the higher I climb, the brighter I shine."

Then they took the soul between them and with light hearts led her forth. Then the soul first gazed upon the land of the angels where she is known and meets with no ill will, and heaven opened up before her.

She stood there, her heart melting, looked upon her Lover and said: "O Lord, when I look upon you, I have to praise you for your astonishing wisdom. Where have I come to? Am I now lost in you? I cannot even remember earth or any of my interior sufferings. On earth, when I caught sight of you, I used to wish to complain to you about many things. Now, Lord, the sight of you has struck me down. You have elevated me utterly beyond my worth."

Then she knelt down and thanked him for his favors and, taking her crown from her head, put it on the rose-colored scars on his feet and begged that she might come closer to him. He took her in his divine arms and laid his fatherly hand on her breast and looked her in the face. Well, was she kissed at all? In the kiss she was drawn up to the most sublime heights above all the angel choirs. The least truth that I saw and heard and understood there was incomparably more than the loftiest wisdom ever uttered here on earth. I saw there things never heard before, my confessors tell me, for I am ignorant of reading or writing. And now I fear God if I keep silent, but I fear uncomprehending people if I write. Dear people, what can I do about it that this happens to me and that it has often happened? In humble simplicity, in lonely poverty, and in demeaning shame did God show me his wonders.

There I saw the creation and order of God's house, which he himself built with his mouth.' In it he put what was most dear that he had made with his hands. The creation of the house is called heaven; the choirs in it are called kingdom. Hence one says kingdom of heaven. The kingdom of heaven has a boundary as to where it is placed, but as to its being a boundary will never be found. Heaven goes around the choirs, and between heaven and the lovely choirs the worldly sinners are placed, always equal in height to the choirs, that they better themselves and convert. The choirs are so delicate, holy, and marvelous that no one can enter without chastity, love, and renunciation of all things. For they were all holy who fell from there, and accordingly they must also be holy who enter. All newly baptized and children up to six years fill the breach not higher than to the sixth choir. Then up to the Seraphim those virgins shall fill the breach who defiled themselves by their childish disposition, but never did so in deed, and who cleansed themselves afterward in confession. Still, they cannot recover from it completely since they have lost their purity. Those who are pure spiritual virgins shall after the last judgment fill the breach above the Seraphim, from where Lucifer and those closest to him were cast out. Lucifer committed at one and the same time three mortal sins: hatred, pride, and greed. These caused the choir to tumble into the eternal abyss as fast as one can say "alleluia. Then the whole kingdom was struck with terror and all the pillars of the kingdom of heaven shook. Then some of the others fell as well.'

The desolation' is as yet empty and bare. No one is there, and it is utterly pure in itself and sparkles with delight to God's honor. Above the desolation is God's throne vaulted with God's strength in blossoming, shining, fiery brightness, and it descends to the heaven opposite the Cherubim, so that God's throne and heaven are one glorious house; and the desolation and the nine choirs are enclosed within it. Above God's throne there is nothing but God, God, God. God infinitely great. Above on the throne one sees the mirror of the Godhead, the likeness of Humanity, the light of the Holy Spirit, and one understands how these three are one God and how they fit together into one. I am able to say no more about this.

John the Baptist will fill Lucifer's breach and will possess his honor in the sweet desolation above the Seraphim, and all pure spiritual virgins together with him. They are all destined for this desolation.

On the throne is our Lady, St. Mary, who shall not fill a breach; for with her Child she has healed the wounds of all men who accepted grace and could and willed to preserve it. Her Son is God and she a goddess. No one can be compared to her. The apostles dwell closest of all to God on the throne and have the empty places among the Seraphim as their reward according to how pure they are. John the Baptist is also a prince at the throne. Angels dwell no higher than the Seraphim. Those above will all be human beings. The holy martyrs and God's preachers and spiritual lovers enter into the choirs even though they are not virgins. Indeed, they enter gloriously into the Cherubim!

There without asking I saw the reward of preachers as it shall come about. Their chairs are wondrous, their reward is special. The front legs of the chairs are two burning lights. They signify true love, holy example, and faithful intent. The backs of the chairs are so pleasantly free and sweet in delightful repose-more than one can express-in contrast to the strict obedience to which they were subjected here. Their feet are adorned with various kinds of precious stones, so beautiful that I would truly be filled with joy to receive such magnificence as a crown. This they have because of the exertion required of their feet on earth. O ye preachers, how unwillingly now do you move your tongues and so grudgingly incline your ears to the mouth of the sinner! I saw in God's presence that in the kingdom of heaven it shall happen that breath shall shine forth from your mouths which will ascend from the choirs to the throne and will praise the heavenly Father for the wisdom that he placed on your tongues; and it will greet the Son for his glorious company, for he was a preacher himself; and it will thank the Holy Spirit for his grace, for he is Master of all gifts.

Then God's preachers, the holy martyrs, and the loving virgins shall stand up, for the highest honor is given them in the form of special garments, delightful song, and marvelous garlands, which they wear to God's honor. The virgins' garments are white as lilies. The preachers' garments are fiery, bright as the sun. The martyrs' garments are glowing rose-colored because they suffered with Jesus a bloody death. The virgins' garland is many colored; the crown of the martyrs is large, catching the eye. The preachers' garland is made entirely of flowers. These are the words of God through which they have come into great honor here. Thus does this throng of three blessed bands go merrily forth into the presence of the Trinity, dancing finely in a circle. Then toward them a threefold stream flows out playfully from God, filling their minds and hearts so that they sing the truth effortlessly with joy, as God had entrusted it to them.

The preachers sing thus: "O chosen Lord, we have followed your generous kindness in voluntary poverty and have gathered together your straying sheep whom your hired shepherds let go off the right path."

The martyrs sing thus: "Lord, your innocent blood has made our death full, so that we are sharers in your suffering."9

The blessed, who now live so blissfully in heaven hovering weightlessly, are all suffused with light and are permeated with love flowing through them and are united in one will, and yet they do not have the dignity that attaches to their glorious chairs."

They rest in God's strength and flow in bliss, keeping themselves in God's breath, as does the air in the sun. But after the last day, when God shall hold his festive dinner, one shall seat the brides opposite their Bridegroom and thus shall love come to love, body to soul, and they shall possess full power in eternal glory.

O you charming Lamb and delightful Youth, Jesus, Child of the heavenly Father, when you then rise and pass through all the choirs waving lovingly to the virgins, they shall follow you filled with praise to that most overwhelming place of which I can say no more to anyone. How they shall then entertain themselves with you and devour your love's desire-that is such intimate sweetness and intense oneness-that I know nothing equal to it.

The widows shall follow as well in heartfelt yearning and will be utterly fulfilled in sweet contemplation when they shall see how the Lamb joins the virgins. Married people, too, shall look on lovingly in the measure possible to them according to their nobility, for the more one satisfies oneself with earthly things here, the less heavenly bliss shall be left over for us there.

The choirs each have a special light illuminating them and heaven has its own as well. The light is so extraordinarily glorious that I cannot and may not describe it. Many a dignity has been bestowed by God on the choirs and on heaven, and I can say a word or two about each-about as much as the honey a bee might carry off on its feet from a full hive.

In the first choir¹¹ bliss is the most exalted among all the gifts they have.

In the second choir it is meekness.

In the third choir it is charm.

In the fourth it is sweetness.

In the fifth it is cheerfulness.

In the sixth it is noble fragrance.

In the seventh it is abundance.

In the eighth dignity.

In the ninth burning with love.

In the sweet desolation¹² it is pure holiness.

The most exalted thing on the throne is mighty honor and strong dominion. Towering above everything that was ever in heaven is a sense of wonder. The most sublime thing is that they may behold that which is now happening and shall happen forever. Ah, the grand expanse and sweet eternity and the keen power to see into all things and the special intimacy that unceasingly exists between God and each individual soul is of such overwhelming tenderness that even if I had the wisdom of all mankind and the voices of all the angels, I would be incapable of describing it.

Unbaptized children less than five years old dwell in their own special honor, which God from his kingdom has provided for them. They do not have the qualities of someone thirty years old because they were not Christians with Christ." They do not have a crown; God cannot reward them for anything. And yet he has granted them in his goodness that they live in great comfort. The highest thing they possess is an abundance of favors. They sing thus:

"We praise him who created us,
But whom we have never seen.
If we were suffering pain,
We would forever lament;
But, as it is, we are doing quite well."

Now some people might be surprised how I, a sinful person, can undertake to write such a description. I tell you in utter truth: If seven years ago, God had not offered support to my heart with special favor, I would still be silent and would never have written this. Now, because of God's goodness, no harm has come to me from it. This is because of the obvious lowliness I reflect-which is so clearly manifest to my soul-and the nobility of favors that are contained in God's true gift. Indeed, the higher the soul has climbed, the less praise one should give to the body in word and deed. One should also not complain about the troubles one sees, for he¹⁴ is by nature a coward. Rather, one should treat him like an old pensioner who can no longer serve at court, and so one gives him alms purely for the love of God. This is truly of practical value. The nobler the dog, the tighter the collar!"

Well, dear Lord, I commend this description to your generous goodness and ask, my dear One, with sighing heart, with weeping eyes, and with desolate soul that no Pharisee may ever read it. And I ask, in addition, dear Lord, that your children find that meaning in the text which you, Lord, in authentic truth have given it."

2. How the Soul Praises God and God the Soul for Seven Things. Of Balsam and Waiting

"O sweet Jesus, most handsome Image, unconcealed to my exiled soul in distress and in love! In love I praise you through yourself in distress and in love in union with all creatures; I yearn to do this above all things.

Lord, you are the sun for all eyes;
You are the delight of all ears;
You are the voice of all words;
You are the force behind all piety;
You are the teaching of all wisdom;
You are the life of all that lives;
You are the ordering of all that is."

Then God praised the loving soul in fine words. He took great delight in doing so:

"You are a light to my eyes;
You are a lyre to my ears;
You are a voice for my words;

You are a projection of my piety;
You are an honor to my piety;
You are a life living in me;
You are a praise in my being."

"Lord, you are constantly lovesick for me.
That you have clearly shown personally.
You have written me into your book of the Godhead;
You have painted me in your humanity;
You have buried me in your side, in your hands and feet.
Ah, allow me, dear One, to pour balsam upon you."

"O One dear to my heart, where shall you find the balm?"

"O Lord, I was going to tear the heart of my soul in two and intended to put you in it."

"You could never give me a more soothing balsam than to let me unceasingly lie weightlessly in your soul."

"Lord, if you were to take me home with you, I would be your physician forever."

"Yes, I want that.
Still, my solicitude bids you wait;
My love bids you labor;
My patience bids you keep silent;
My concern bids you suffer poverty;
My dishonor bids you bear up;
My sufficiency bids you refrain from complaint;
My victory bids you pursue to the end all virtues;
My goal bids you endure many things;
For this you shall have glory when I remove your heavy burden."

3. A Lament That the Soul Is a Maidservant for the Love of God

"O Lord, what a poor and forsaken soul it is that here on earth is a maidservant for love of you. Oh, who shall help me lament what pain she suffers? For she herself has no idea what it is that she is renouncing!"

"Mistress Bride," in the Book of Love you say to your Lover that he should flee from you.¹⁸ Tell me urgently, Lady, what caused you to do this? For I would rather die, if I might do so in pure love, than in darkened wisdom bid God depart from me. If I may play intimately with my Lover, there is no need for wisdom to teach me about separation. But when I busy myself with other things with my five senses, then I willingly accept its bringing me holy moderation."¹⁹

[The bride speaks:] "Listen to me, dear Playmate! I was pleasantly half drunk with love; this is why I speak tenderly from the senses. But whenever I become utterly inebriated, I cannot even think of my body; for love commands me. What she wants has to be. And what God hopes for I boldly undertake. If he takes my life, my soul belongs to him. If you wish to go with me into the wine cellar, it is going to cost you. If you have a thousand marks, you will use it up in an hour. If you drink the wine undiluted, you spend more than you have, and the innkeeper cannot fill your glass to the brim. Then you shall become poor and naked and despised by all those who prefer to enjoy the ooze rather than squander their hoard in the lofty wine cellar. You must also endure the envy of those who go with you into the wine cellar. Oh, how much will they often despise you because they will not risk the great expense! They want to mix water with their wine."

"Dear Mistress Bride, I shall willingly consume everything I have in the tavern. Let me be pulled through the coals of love and be struck with the firebrands of humiliation, so that I might very often enter the blessed wine cellar. This I gladly choose because regarding love I cannot lose. And so he who tortures and despises me actually pours out for me the innkeeper's wine that he himself drank. From that wine I shall become so drunk that I shall truly become so subordinate to all creatures that it seems to me, given my human lowliness and the baseness I have taken on, that no one has ever so wronged me as to have committed some sin against me, wretch that I am. Therefore, I cannot take revenge on my enemies for my sufferings, even though I well know that they may not break God's commandment in their treatment of me."

"Dear Playmate, if it happens that they close the wine cellar, then you will have to go out onto the road hungry, poor, naked, and so despised that you have no Christian sustenance left except faith. If you can then still love, you shall never go to ruin."

"Mistress Bride, I have such a hunger for the heavenly Father that I forget all cares. And I so thirst for his Son that it removes from me all earthly desires. And I have such a need for the Spirit of them both that it goes beyond the wisdom of the Father, which I cannot grasp; and beyond the Son's suffering, which I cannot bear; and beyond the consolation of the Holy Spirit, which I cannot receive."

Whoever becomes entangled in longing such as this must forever hang blessedly fettered in God.

4. How Our Lady St. Mary Can Sin and How Not, the Holy Spirit Teaches This

O Mary, glorious Empress, God's Mother and my Lady! I was asked concerning you whether you were able to sin like other humans when you were on this sinful earth. Now the Holy Spirit, who knows fully all your secrets, has instructed me, Lady, that you were able to sin; for you had been created a full human being in your complete feminine nature and in full virginity. There was no deficiency in your nature, and that makes your lifelong chastity noble and precious in God's eyes.

But, Lady, noble Goddess above all pure humans, you were also able not to sin. This you had not from yourself, for the heavenly Father watched over your childhood with the foresight of his having chosen you long before, and the Holy Spirit bound your youth with the fullness of his fresh love, and Jesus so passed through your body as the dew through a flower that your chastity was never touched. And the power of the Holy Trinity had so pervaded your nature that it did not dare, nor could it, experience all-too-human stirrings. And the eternal wisdom of the almighty Godhead gave you, Lady, a shadow in which you kept your human life so that you could suffer pain, despite not sinning, and so that your thriving humanity would not perish under the sun of the powerful Godhead. In this shadow you carried Jesus in human fashion and, as his mother, raised him. However, Lady, in the message from the Father,²⁰ in the conception from the Holy Spirit, and in the birth of the Son, Lady, the fire of the Godhead and the light of the Holy Spirit and the wisdom of the Son were so great in you that you could hardly notice the shadow. God knows, Lady, later you would turn wretchedly cold in poverty, in trials, and in heartache. In spite of this, in your heart you continued to burn brightly in good works from that fire which burns in itself unaided without a beginning. This, Lady, pierced your walls with light and drove all darkness from your house.

5. How the Soul Complains That She Hears No Mass Nor Hours²¹ and How God Praises Her in Ten Things

Thus did a forsaken soul complain when God excluded her from his ecstatic love and loved her by means of great suffering: "Alas, how sulkingly does a rich man bear it when after glorious wealth he is led into great poverty!"

And she says: "Oh, Lord, now I am extremely destitute in my sickly body and am so miserable in my soul which is so lacking in spiritual order that no one recites the hours of the office in my presence and no one celebrates holy mass for me!"

The loving Mouth spoke, the Mouth that wounded my soul so terribly with his sublime words that I never received worthily:

"You are the feelings of love in my desire.
You are a sweet cooling for my breast.
You are a passionate kiss for my mouth.
You are a blissful joy of my discovery.
I am in you
And you are in me.
We could not be closer,
For we two have flowed into one
And have been poured into one mold.
Thus shall we remain forever content."

"Ah, dear One, how intimately you speak to me. And yet I never dare think upon these words in joy. For I constantly notice with anguish the stench of that dead mongrel, my body; and others of my enemies are always assailing me; and I, Lord, when I consider the matter, have no idea how things shall turn out for me in the end. What is more, just beholding you I lose all awareness of suffering. Thus, Lord, have you taken me from myself and have stealthily entered into me. What you then promised me, may it happen and may it result in your praise."

Our Lord answers thus:

"Downward I reach,
Widely I roam,
Upward I yearn,
Long I wait.

"Again I must teach you: Noble maidens pay a high price for their good breeding. They must maintain restraint in all their suffering and must often tremble before their governess. So it is with my brides on earth as to their bodies. On earth I was oppressively enclosed for love of you, and my raging enemies bore my death in their hands before my very eyes, and in shame I suffered dire poverty. In all this I trusted my Father's infinite goodness. Direct your spirit accordingly."

6. If You Would Follow God Rightly, You Should Have Seven Things

Whoever wants to follow God in faithful toil should not stand quietly. He should often rouse himself. He should consider what he was in sin, how he is now in virtue, and what can yet become of him if he falls. He should lament and praise and pray day and night. When the faithful bride awakens, she thinks of her lover. If she cannot possess him then, she begins to weep. Alas, how often this happens spiritually to God's brides!

7. Concerning Seven Obvious Enemies of Our Happiness That Cause Seven Kinds of Harm

Aimless activity is a very harmful trait for us. Bad habits harm us everywhere. Earthly desires blot out in us the holy word of God. Base strife because of self-will brings about in us many a harmful murder. Enmity in our heart drives out the Holy Spirit. An angry temperament robs us of God's intimacy. False holiness can never win out. Pure love of God can never perish. If we are not willing to leave these enemies, they will take from us more than heaven; for if we live holy lives here, it is a pre-heavenly existence. But if we allow these enemies their deceptions and their power over us, they rob us of the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit, and they extinguish for us the true light of the genuine love of God. They also blind our eyes to holy understanding and lead us thus blinded into the seven capital sins. Where else does that path lead but to the eternal abyss?

8. Seven Things That All Priests Should Have

The heavenly Father told me seven things that every priest of God should have and said: "They should be innocent in their persons, and the accoutrements for saying mass should be perfect. If there is any doubt about it, one should refrain from it²² and not do it. They should lay aside all fear from themselves and should forget the Jewish law and should eat my Lamb alive and should drink his blood sighing. Thus they can rightly call to mind his great passion. But if he has some personal guilt, then my children eat the Bread of Heaven and Judas goes to hell.²¹ And if the accoutrements for mass are not perfect, then God's table stands empty and the children's food is taken from them. But if they come into danger of death because of their age, it is better for them that they spill their own blood than his.

9. Concerning the Beginning of All Things That God Created out of Love

O Father of all goodness, I, an unworthy person, thank you for the faithful caring by which you have drawn me out of myself into your wondrous self in such a way that I have heard you in your whole Trinity and have witnessed the exalted decisions that took place before our time when you, Lord, were enclosed within yourself alone and your indescribable bliss was shared by no one. The Three Persons sent forth beautifully the beams of light in unison, each of them illumined by the other while remaining utterly one. The Father was adorned in his Person with the robust character of omnipotence; the Son was equal to the Father in infinite wisdom; and the Holy Spirit was equal to them both in full generosity.

Then the Holy Spirit in his superabundance played for the Father, plucking the Holy Trinity," and said to him: "Lord, dear Father, I shall give you out of yourself generous advice. We no longer wish to go on thus, not bearing fruit. We shall have a created kingdom and you shall form the angels in my image so that they are one spirit with me. For, dear Father, that alone is true joy, that in great love and infinite happiness one gather them in your sight."

The Father said: "You are one spirit with me. What you suggest and want is to my liking."

When the angel was created-you well know how it happened: If the angels' fall had been avoided, man would still have had to be created. The Holy Spirit shared his generosity with the angels, so that they serve us and are happy at the blessedness of us all.

Then the eternal Son spoke with great refinement: "Dear Father, my nature shall also bear fruit. Now that we want to undertake wondrous things, let us make man in my image. Even though I foresee great tragedy, I still shall love man forever."

The Father said: "Son, a powerful desire stirs in my divine breast as well, and I swell in love alone. We shall become fruitful so that we shall be loved in return, and so that our glory in some small way shall be recognized. I shall make a bride for myself who shall greet me with her mouth and wound me with her beauty. Only then does love really begin."

Then the Holy Spirit spoke to the Father: "Yes, dear Father, I shall deliver the bride to your bed."

And the Son spoke: "Father, you well know I shall yet die for love. Still, we want to begin these things joyfully in great holiness."

Then the Holy Trinity bent down to the creation of all things and created us body and soul in infinite love. Adam and Eve were formed and given a noble nature according to the eternal Son, who was born of the Father without a beginning. Then the Son shared with Adam his heavenly wisdom and his earthly power so that he possessed true knowledge and holy understanding in perfect love, and that he might command all earthly creatures. This is now rare indeed for us.

From the goodness of his heart God gave Adam a refined, noble, and delicate lady-that was Eve-and bestowed upon her the loving excellent moderation that his Son possesses to his Father's honor. Their bodies were to be pure, for God created for them no shameful members; and they were clothed with angels' garments. Their children were to be gotten in sacred love just as the rays of the sun play upon the water, though the water remains intact. But when they ate the forbidden food, they became shamefully deformed in their bodies, as is still evident in us. If the Holy Trinity had created us so hideous, we could never be ashamed of our being because of its noble nature.

The heavenly Father bestowed his divine love on the soul and said: "I am the God of gods; you are the goddess of all creatures, and I give you my solemn assurance²⁵ that I shall never reject you. If you do not yourself lose your way, my angels shall serve you forever. I shall give you my Holy Spirit as a chamberlain, so that you may not unknowingly fall into any serious sin. And I give you free will in abundance. Dearest Love above all loves, be prudently on your guard. You shall obey a small commandment, so that you will remember that I am your God."

The unblemished sustenance that God promised them in paradise was supposed to remain in great holiness in their bodies. But when they had eaten the disgusting food that did not agree with their pure bodies, they became so filled with poison that they lost the purity of the angels and forgot their virginal chastity. Then for many a year the soul cried out in great darkness for her Lover. Her voice filled with misery, she cried: "O Lord, dear One, where has your most delectable love gone? How bitterly have you called your wife and queen a whore! That is the meaning of the prophets .²¹ O great Lord, how can you bear this endless distress and do not give the death to our death? If only you were to be born. But, Lord, since all your deeds are perfect, so is your wrath."

Then another council convened in the Holy Trinity. The eternal Father said: "I regret my work. I gave my Holy Trinity such an admirable bride that the highest angels were to be her servants. Indeed, if Lucifer had retained his honor, she would have been his goddess, for to her alone was given the bridal bed. She decided not to remain in my likeness. Now she is ugly and hideously deformed. Who might accept this filth?"

But look! The eternal Son then knelt before his Father and said: "Dear Father, I shall be the one. If you will give me your blessing, I shall take bloody humanity upon myself. I shall anoint man's wounds with the blood of my innocence and shall bind all man's sores with the cloth of wretched disgrace until my end; and I shall, dearest Father, atone to you for human guilt by means of a human death."

Then the Holy Spirit said to the Father: "O almighty God, we shall form a splendid procession and shall go forth unchanged in great glory down from these heights. I was formerly, after all, Mary's chamberlain."

The Father then bowed to the wills of them both with great love and said to the Holy Spirit: "You shall carry my light before my dear Son into all the hearts that he shall move with my words. And, Son, you shall take up your cross. I shall traverse with you all your paths and I shall give you a pure virgin as your mother so that you might the more gloriously bear up under inglorious humanity."

Then in great joy the grand procession came down to the temple of Solomon.^{2'} There almighty God would be sheltered for nine months.

10. The Passion That the Loving Soul Has from God, and How She Rises and Ascends into Heaven²⁸

The loving soul betrays her true love in sighing for God.
She is sold in holy grief for his love.
She is sought with the host of many tears for her dear Lord,
Whom she likes so well.
She is captured in the first experience
When God kisses her in sweet union.
She is assailed with many a holy thought
That she not waver when she mortifies her flesh.
She is bound by the power of the Holy Spirit,
And her bliss is indeed manifold.

She is slapped with the great powerlessness
Of not being able to enjoy without interruption eternal light.
She is brought to judgment trembling with shame
Because God so often avoids her
Because of the stains of her sins.
She responds to all things in a holy manner
And cannot bear to treat anyone shamefully.
She is beaten at her trial
When the devils try her spiritually.
She is sent to Herod
When she recognizes herself to be worthless and unworthy
And despises herself with the great army of her thoughts.
She is delivered up to Pilate again

When she has to concern herself with earthly affairs.
She is buffeted and beaten with severe blows
When she must return to her body.
She is stripped of all things
When God clothes her with the silk of fair love.
She is delightfully crowned with manifold faithfulness
When she desires that God no longer reward her for all her woes,
Except to promote in the highest God's honor.
She is ridiculed in holy simplicity²⁹
When she is completely dissolved into God
That she forgets all earthly wisdom.
One kneels before her in great shame
When in delicate humility she puts herself under the feet of all creatures.

Her eyes are bound with her body's baseness
Because she is so utterly imprisoned in its darkness.
She carries her cross on a sweet path
When she truly surrenders herself to God in all sufferings.
Her head is struck with a reed
When one compares her great holiness to a fool.
With the hammer of the chase of love³⁰ she is nailed so fast to the cross
That all creatures are not able to call her back again.
She suffers terrible thirst on the cross of love as well,
For she would like to drink the pure wine of all God's children.
But they all come thronging and offer her gall.
Her body is killed in living love

When her spirit is raised aloft above all human senses.
After this death she descends into hell with her might
And consoles the dejected souls with her prayer about God's goodness
Without her body's knowing it.
She is pierced in the side by a blind man
With a sweet spear of innocent love.
From her heart flows forth many a holy teaching.
She hangs on the cross of sublime love,
High in the air of the Holy Spirit,
Facing the eternal sun of the living Godhead,
So that she becomes completely dry and bare of all earthly things.

Then in a holy ending she is taken from her cross
And speaks: "Father, receive my spirit; now everything is perfect."
She is interred in a sealed grave of deep humility,
When she becomes ever aware of being the most unworthy of all creatures.

She also rises joyfully on an Easter Day
After she has enjoyed a lament of love
With her Lover on the narrow bridal bed.
Then she consoles her disciples and Mary early in the morning
When she receives from God true assurance
That God has blotted out all her sins
Because of her love and sorrow.
She comes again to her disciples with the door shut
When she often repeats for her five senses the holy teaching of God.
Then she goes forth from the Jerusalem of Holy Christianity
With many a virtuous throng when the body becomes sad,

Which with its whole being in all its baseness would like to follow its own will.
And she says: "I am your master.
You shall follow me and obey in all things.
If I were not going to my Father,
You would remain as fools."
She also ascends into heaven
When God takes from her all earthly things in holy transformation.
She is received in a white cloud of holy protection
When she ascends in love and joyfully comes back again, free of all trouble.
Then the angels return and console the men of Galilee
When we call to mind God's chosen friends and their holy example.

This passion is suffered by every soul that in holy moderation of all her activity is truly permeated by genuine love of God.

11. Between God and the Loving Soul All Things Are Beautiful

When the loving soul gazes into the eternal mirror, she says: "Lord, between you and me all things are beautiful; and between the devil and his bride, the damned soul, all things are hideous and horrible indeed. When she remembers dear Jesus, she shudders and all her hellish suffering begins anew."

12. You Should Praise, Thank, Desire, and Beg. Concerning the Lantern and the Light

Oh, dear Lord, how poor I then was when I was not able either to remember all these words nor pray nor love! Yet I strove toward you with my forsaken senses and spoke thus: "Oh, dear Lord, by what means shall I now glorify you?"

And you said to the most worthless person you ever created:

"You should praise me for my faithful protection.
You should thank me for my generous gifts.
You should desire my holy wonder.
You should beg for a good end."

Then the soul asked in reverence: "Dearest, what wonder should I desire?" This I must continue writing, weeping all the while. May God help me, the poorest of humans, that I remain in Jesus!

My Lover then spoke thus: "I shall place the light onto the lantern, and for all those whose eyes look upon the light a special beam shall shine from the light into the eye of their knowledge."

The soul then asked with great submissiveness but without fear: "Dearest, what is the lantern supposed to be?"

Our Lord said: "I am the light and your breast is the lantern."

13. Sixteen Kinds of Love

Lavish love arising from holy mercy drives out empty honor and evil sickness.

True love arising from divine wisdom brings satisfaction and drives out contemptible lust.

Humble love arising from holy simplicity alone conquers pride and brings the soul forcefully into holy knowledge.

Constant love arising from good manners cannot engage in duplicity.

Grand love arising from a bold deed finds for itself good counsel in all things.

Love that has discovered God's intimacy effortlessly blinds the earth.

Bound love of holy habit never rests, yet lives with ease within itself.

Permeating love arising from great overflowing lies completely at rest and finds all things bitter but God alone.

Love that calls out from noble impatience is never silent and has happily forgotten all guilt.

Love that understands God's teaching is quick to incline to a child.

Beautiful love in its exalted power rejuvenates the soul, though the body become old.

Lovely love with guileless gift blots out the surly heart's complaint.

Powerful love of rich delicacies has the sweetest pleasure in God.

Hidden love turns precious treasure from good will into holy deed.

Bright love of playful flood causes the soul sweet distress. It causes her to die without death.

Stormy love arising from great power-that is something no one can grasp.

14. Concerning False Virtues; Whoever Dwells Therein Lives in Lies

I have a teacher; it is the Holy Spirit. He teaches me very gently what he wants. Other things he withholds from me. He speaks thus:

Wisdom without grounding in the Holy Spirit turns in the end into a mountain of arrogance.

Peace without the bond of the Holy Spirit very soon becomes empty frenzy.

Humility without the fire of love ends in open hypocrisy.

Justice without the depth of God's humility immediately turns into fierce hatred.

Poverty with constant cupidity is in itself sinful prodigality.

Dreadful fear caused by real guilt brings repulsive impatience.

Right-seeming conduct with wolfish intent is quickly seen through by the wise.

Holy desire out of full integrity is attained by no one without great effort.

A good life without adversity becomes lazy in pursuing useful things.

Presumptuous virtue without God's gift will be struck down by pride.

Lofty promises not kept by deed are duplicity counseled by the devil.

Sweet consolation without true security of the soul and approval of the Holy Spirit leads in the end to a miserable death.

Great patience without inclining one's heart to God is secret guilt, for all who are not sustained by God's truth in all things shall in great shame slip away from God eternal.

Love that does not have humility as its mother and holy fear as its father is orphaned from all virtues.

15. You Should Approach God's Table with Eight Virtues. By Ransom a Person Released Seventy Thousand Souls from Ghastly Purgatory, Which Is of Many Kinds

O you terribly foolish beguines, how can you be so insolent that you do not tremble before our almighty judge, since you so frequently receive the Body of God out of blind habit. Though I am the least among you, I must feel shame, blush, and tremble.

On a certain holy day I was so troubled that I did not dare receive him, because I was ashamed of my best piety in his eyes. So I asked my very dear One that he deign show me his honor in this matter. He said: "Truly, if you go before me in humble sorrow and holy fear, I shall follow you as the high waters follow the deep millstream. But if you come to me with the blossoming yearning of flowing love, I must go to meet you and caress you with my divine nature as my one and only queen."

I have to make my presence known if I am truly to be able to bring about God's goodness. And that" really does not hold me back any more than it impairs an oven to shove in a full load of white rolls. And so I went to God's table in a noble throng. They watched over me with much concern, but also exposed me to much harsh treatment:

Truth was cross with me.

Fear scolded me.

Shame scourged me.

Sorrow condemned me.

Yearning pulled me.

Love led me.

Christian faith shielded me.

Pure intention in all good things prepared me.

And all my good works sounded alarm over me.

Mighty God received me.

His pure humanity united itself to me.

His Holy Spirit consoled me.

Then I said: "Lord, now you are mine, for you have been given to me today especially in the passage where it says: 'A boy is given to us.'" Now, Lord, I desire your praise and not my advantage, that today your glorious body might come as consolation to the poor souls.' You are truly mine. Now, Lord, you shall be today a ransom for those imprisoned."

Then she received such power that with his strength she led him, and they came to as grim a place as ever was seen by human eye-a horrifying bath, a mixture of fire and pitch, of muck, smoke, and stench. A thick dark fog was drawn over it like a black hat. The souls were lying in it like toads in filth. Their form was like that of humans, and yet they were spirits and had about them a similarity to the devil. They boiled and roasted all together. They screamed and suffered countless torments because of their flesh, which had plunged them so deep. Flesh had blinded their spirit. This caused them to boil the most. The spirit of the person spoke: "O Lord, how many are there of these poor beings? You are my real price of ransom. You simply must show mercy."

Our Lord said: "They go beyond human numbering and you cannot comprehend their number as long as your flesh has an earthly share of you. They were all broken vessels and while on earth neglected the spiritual life. They are from all walks of life and from all lands."

Then the human spirit asked: "Alas, dear Lord, where are the hermits? I don't see any of them here."

Our Lord answered: "They sinned in secret. Now they are alone at the bottom, bound together with the devils."

Then the soul of the person became very sad and prostrated herself at the feet of our very dear Lord and yearned powerfully and toiled lovingly and said: "Very dear One, you know full well what I desire."

Our Lord said: "It was right for you to bring me here. I shall not let them go unremembered."

Around them stood an immense throng of devils that tended them in the accursed bath. They also were beyond my reckoning. They rubbed them, washed them, ate them, and were sated; and they struck them with fiery scourges. The spirit of the person spoke to them thus: "Listen, you devourers of sin, look upon this ransom. Is it not of such value that you will be satisfied with it?"

At that they all shuddered, quaking in ghastly shame, and said: "Yes, just lead them away. However wretched we may be, we have to speak the truth to you."

Then our Lord from his divine heart fulfilled a delightful wish for the poor souls. In great joy and love they arose. The stranger soul said: "Alas, very dear Lord, where shall they go now?"

He said: "I shall bring them to a mountain covered with flowers. There they shall find more happiness than I know how to express."

Then our Lord served them and was their chamberlain and their very dear companion. Our Lord told me that there were seventy thousand of them. The soul then asked how long their torment had lasted. Our Lord said: "They have been separated from their bodies for thirty years, and for ten more years they would have been in torment, had not such a precious ransom been offered for them."

The devils fled from them and did not dare accept it. "Dear One," said the soul, "how long shall they be here?"

Our Lord answered and said: "As long as seems good to us."

16. After a Gift There Follows a Scourge and After Disgrace Honor

The soul reminded our Lord of his earlier words thus: "Lord, you said there is no gift on earth that does not have a scourge connected with it. You said this to me with your own mouth and have afterward many a time carried through on it with respect to me. You also told me more than six years ago that religious people³" would hold me in great contempt. This they are still doing persistently and have done it viciously at times. Is that, Lord, the wonder I am supposed to long for?"

Our Lord answered and said: "My Father gave me power over his truth and the craft of his holiness; afterward he subjected me to numerous humiliations. Still later he gave me great honor and infinite dignity. In this same way do I wish to give my Holy Trinity to you."

17. The Purgatory of a Religious Person, His Five Kinds of Help out of the Torment, and the Nobility of the Order of Preachers

I also saw a religious man suffering. During his life I had a high opinion of him. For three months I prayed for his soul with anguished heart, that it might never happen that I might have to look upon his distress until the evening of the last day.

When he gave up his spirit, he was immediately shown to me in the prayer I was saying for the poor souls. I saw him alone, and he was not able to show me his suffering. He was pale in a white mist. I asked: "Alas, why did you not go to heaven?"

He answered me in obscure speech, ruefully ashamed and weeping all the while as he read from a book. All the words were screaming at him with all the books that he had ever read chiming in. He said: "In my life on earth I was too fond of ideas, words, and deeds."

Two dragons were lying at his feet and sucked out of him all the consolation that he was supposed to receive from Holy Christianity in return for meager obedience, since he for no reason wanted to live according to his own will rather than according to the determinations of his superiors. I asked him: "Where are the enemies who are supposed to torment you?"

He answered: "Because of the dignity of my order no devil was ever able to touch me. I had a great struggle with my body, and I wanted to achieve a certain thing that would have been very harmful if I had been successful. Because of this God did not let me live any longer. I am burning within myself; my own will must torment me."

I asked: "Alas, tell me, how can anyone help you?"

He said: "If a person were to offer up a hundred venias,'S twelve disciplines," and many tears with a sorrowful heart from pure eyes every day for a year, that would be a penance for me. And one should say masses for me. Alas, tell virgins' and priests that they should pray for me. The end of my torment I do not want to describe for you because I do not want to sadden my brothers" with it. Now, leave me!"

Then he took on the likeness of the devil, burned, and became mute toward me.

18. A Knight's Battle in Full Armor Against Sensual Desires

I prayed for a person, as I was bid, that God might free him from those desires of the body that occur without sin for the reason that an evil will does not cause them. But our Lord said: "Stop such talk! Would it please you if there were a knight fully armed, with noble prowess, true manliness, and able hands who had nothing to do, neglected his lord's honor, and lost his rich recompense and the ringing of worthy praise that is the due both of the lord and the knight of the realm? Another thing: if there were a liegeman without armor who never came to battle because he lacked the equipment-if such a person would then take part in a tournament of princes, he would promptly lose his life." For this reason I have to spare people who are so prone to fall. I let such people do battle with children so that they win a garland of flowers as a reward."

19. Two Kinds of Poor People: Those Who Are Cheerfully Poor and Those Who Are Unhappily So

I have seen two kinds of poor people. The ones are cheerfully poor and are always in fear that they will receive too much of this poor earth. The others are involuntarily and quite unhappily poor, and they constantly run around in great anxiety that nothing on this poor earth will ever be theirs. Our Lord commented on this and said: "The unhappily poor are within my justice, for if they had an abundance of earthly things, they would not care to return my love with love nor to know me to the benefit of their holiness. And so I must win them by being very hard on them. To those who are cheerfully poor I give more than they dare desire, but I cannot bear the dust on them that comes from their excessively weighing themselves down with earthly things; and I desire that their hearts remain ever open to me and that I might, unimpeded and unceasingly, illumine them and shine through them and they in turn into mine."

20. The Five Prophets Who Illumine This Book

Our Lord promised me he wanted to illumine this book with five lights:

Moses' great intimacy," his holy efforts, special humiliation, which he suffered through no fault of his own, his glorious won ders, his joyful teaching, and the intimate conversations that he was chosen frequently to have face to face with God eternal 12 on the high mountain-all these things should be a light; and God has granted and shall continue to grant that I should go forth with a light and cheerful step under his protection through all the evil scheming of my enemies, free of all shame arising through my own fault, just as Moses did with his friends through the Red Sea. And Pharaoh and his friends shall not pursue us very far. Alas, how they were drowned in this sea! Alas, have mercy, dear Lord, that our enemies be converted.

King David is the second light in this book with his psalter, in which he instructs us, laments, begs, admonishes, and praises God.

Solomon's words illumine-but not his deeds, for he is himself darkened-from the book of songs,"³ where the bride is found to be so drunkenly bold and the bridegroom says to her so passionately: "You are so exquisitely beautiful, my Darling, and there is no flaw in

Jeremiah illumines also for his part when he speaks of the intimate secrets of our Lady⁴⁵; for God told me that he possessed pure chastity, the most perfect love, and that he bore great torment in Christian faith, which he never saw with his fleshly eyes.

Daniel, too, illumines with marvelous wisdom. God, in his grace, gave him food for soul and body in the midst of all his enemies." The same thing happened to me, unworthy though I be, in my distress. This my enemies have noticed a bit and cannot tolerate it, and so they inflict much suffering on me.

21. Hell: How It Has Three Parts; How Lucifer and Sixteen Kinds of People Are Tormented; There Is No Help for Them. Lucifer's Garment⁴⁷

I have seen a city,⁴⁸
Its name is eternal hate.
It was built in the deepest abyss
From all kinds of stones of huge capital sins.
Pride was the first stone,
As is manifest in the case of Lucifer.

Disobedience, base greed, gluttony, lust—
These were four very heavy stones
Which our father Adam sent here.
Anger, duplicity, and murder—
These three stones Cain brought with him.
Lying, betrayal, despair of God, and rendering oneself lifeless:
With these four stones poor Judas murdered himself.
The sin of Sodom and false piety:
These are the essential cornerstones laid out for the structure.
The place was built many years ago.
Woe to all those who send their helpers there.
The more they send in advance,
The greater the shame with which they shall be received
When they themselves follow.

This place is so perverted that the highest are consigned to the lowest and basest place. Lucifer sits bound by his guilt in the deepest abyss. There flows forth unceasingly out of his fiery heart and out of his mouth all the sins, torments, sickness, and shame in which hell, purgatory, and the earth are so wretchedly entangled. In the bottommost part of hell the fire, gloom, stench, shuddering, and all kinds of intense pain are the greatest. It is there that Christians are placed according to their deeds. In the middle part of hell the suffering is more moderate. There the Jews are ranked according to their works. In the topmost part of hell the various kinds of pains are the least severe, and there the heathens are ranked according to their works. The heathens lament thus:

“Oh woe! If we had had a law,
We would not be suffering eternally such pain.”

The Jews lament as well:

“Alas! If we had obeyed God according to the teachings of Moses,
We would not be so terribly damned.”

The Christians lament even more, that they have lost great honor through their own evil will, though Christ had chosen them for himself with great love. In great anguish they constantly behold Lucifer and, naked with all their guilt, they are forced to parade publicly before him. Alas, how ignominiously they are received by him! He greets them grimly and speaks bitterly:

“O you cursed along with me,
What joys do you expect here?
You certainly never heard good spoken of me.
How could you then enjoy yourselves nicely?”

Then, first of all, he grabs the proud one and thrusts him under his tail and says: "I have not sunk so deep that I shall not lord it over you."

All the Sodomites pass down his throat and live in his belly. Whenever he draws a breath, they slide into his belly. But when he coughs, they are expelled again.

The false saints he puts upon his lap, kisses them hideously, and says: "You are my equals. I, too, was enveloped in false holiness; all of you are similarly duped."

Unceasingly he gnaws the usurer and rebukes him for never having been moved by mercy.

The robber he robs himself and hands him over to his henchmen to be chased and beaten mercilessly.

The thief is strung up by the feet to serve in hell as a beacon, but the damned do not see the better for it.

Those who were unchaste together on earth have to lie bound in like manner before Lucifer; but if such a one comes there alone, the devil is his partner.

The unbelieving teachers sit at Lucifer's feet so that they might look at their impure god directly. He also holds disputations with them that they might be humiliated.

The miser he eats, for he always wanted more. When he has swallowed him, he forces him out again by the tail.

Murderers must stand before him bloody and must receive fiery sword thrusts from the devil.

Those who here gave themselves over to fierce hatred must there serve as a smelling pot, ever hanging before his nose.

Those who here so keenly ate and drank to excess must there stand before Lucifer in unending hunger and eat glowing stones. Their drink is sulphur and pitch. There everything is sour instead of sweet. We see there what we have done here.

The slothful person is weighed down with all kinds of pain.

The hot-tempered is beaten there with whips of fire.

The bitterly poor minstrel who with high spirit⁴¹ can excite to sinful frivolity weeps in hell more tears than all the water contained in the sea.

I saw beneath Lucifer the ground of hell-a hard black pebblestone that shall bear the structure forever. Though hell has neither bottom nor boundary, it has as to ordering both depth and end.

How hell roars
And moans within itself.
And how the devils brawl
With the souls, and how these Boil and roast,
And how they swim and wade
In the stink and swamp
In the vermin and foul puddle;
And how they bathe in the sulphur and pitch—
Neither they themselves nor all creatures can fully describe it.

When I had seen this misery without my own doing but rather as a gift from God, I was so wretchedly in pain from the stink and the unearthly heat that I could neither sit up nor walk and was without the use of my five senses for three days, like someone struck by thunder." My soul, however, suffered no distress since that malady that is called eternal death had not brought it there. But if it were possible that a pure soul could be among them, that would be for them eternal light and a great consolation. For the innocent soul must of its nature ever radiate and shine since she is born painlessly out of the eternal light.' But if she takes on the likeness of the devil, she loses her beautiful light. Is it possible in eternal hell that any consolation at all might come to the damned from prayer and from alms? I never heard that. They are constantly in such a grim state of mind that they feel loathing toward anything good.

After the last day, Lucifer shall put on a new garment that has spontaneously come about out of the manure of all filthy sins that he was ever able to suggest to men or angels. For he is the primary vessel of all sin. Then he is released, but his grimness and fierceness are so much a part of all the souls and all the devils that one is aware of his presence everywhere. At times he will swell up enormously and his muzzle shall open very wide. Then in a single breath he shall devour Christians, Jews, and heathens. Still, they shall have their full reward in his belly and their special feast. Woe then to soul and body! What a human mouth is able to say about it here is nothing at all compared to the indescribable anguish taking place there. For in truth I cannot bear to think about it for as long as it takes to say "Hail, Mary." Alas, so horrible is it there!

At the top hell has a head that is hideous and has on it numerous fierce eyes which shoot forth flames and envelop the poor souls that dwell in the anteroom from which God took Adam and others of our fathers. This is now the worst purgatory that a sinner can enter. There I saw bishops, high officials, and great lords in longlasting anguish with countless sufferings. All who came there God had barely spared from everlasting hell.⁵² I found no one there who at the end had made a pure confession with his fleshly mouth. When because of the nature of dying their outer senses had been taken from them, the body lay still—though the soul and body still had a common will. When they had left behind earthly darkness, God gave them true knowledge in secret. Oh, how narrow there is the path to the kingdom of heaven! The union of body and soul, not yet separated, spoke thus: "True God, grant me pardon; I sincerely regret my sins!" This is a brief hour in which God has secretly saved many a soul that to all appearances had been lost. I never saw a case where this happened to a person who had not done something good with a well-intentioned will. The devils lead the stained souls from their bodies to purgatory because the pure angels cannot touch them as long as they are not radiant with a brightness similar to theirs. However, a soul can have the aid of friends on earth that prevents the devils from ever attacking the soul. But if she is very guilty, she must nevertheless suffer other torments. All this she can better endure if the devils are not able to grab her and constantly ridicule her.

When our holy fathers went down to hell, what they brought with them was true hope in the Christian faith with the holy love of God and very many humble virtues and faithful striving. Although they went to hell, they had been prepared for heaven. Nothing in hell could daunt them. What they brought with them that kept them from burning was love. This shall burn everlastingly in all the children of God; otherwise, they shall never reach heaven. This God has so ordained: What we take along with us we have to eat and drink there." But the procrastinators, who leave here without having done penance for great sins,⁵⁴ can never, short of being damned, suffer as terribly as they do before the mouth of hell. There at all times the breath of Lucifer shoots forth with all torments and permeates them so torturously that the poor wretches are just as utterly congealed in the flames and in the various kinds of savagery as the much blessed fathers were united in the sweet knowledge that God loved them. Of women there I saw only exalted ladies who here love all kinds of sins just as their husband lords do.

Hell also has a mouth at the top that remains ever open. All who enter into the mouth are never delivered from eternal death.

22. Of God's Mercy, His Concern, and Justice

I have heard and seen such boundless mercy from God that I said:

“Lord, how can this happen?
After all, your justice is equal to your mercy.
How is it that your goodness is so great?”

Then our Lord spoke a sincere word thus:

“I say to you by my divine faithfulness
That there are more Christians who from the mouth⁵⁵ enter the kingdom of heaven
Than there are who enter everlasting hell.
Justice has, indeed, its continual power.

Whatever is brought before it indicating guilt
Is never taken away by me from it.
Before all else, however, I want to come to the troubled soul as a Father⁵⁶
If I have heard anything clearly good about her.
This arises from the great concern that I have for my children.”

The soul said:

“Ah, my very dear Love, would you describe to me this concern
So that your pleasure and my desire might be united?”

Our Lord said:

“Now hear of my concern:
My goodness and my generosity,
My faithfulness and my mercy
Press me so urgently
That I let them flow over the mountains of pride
And over the valleys of humility
And over the bushes of confusion
And over the smooth paths of purity.
And my goodness actually presses me more insistently than an evil man is pressed
By his malicious disposition,
And yet my justice is even greater than the malice of all the devils.”

The soul said:

“Lord, your justice corresponds quite well with the living truth,
So that it gives me boundless joy without suffering of the heart.
Wherever it tends,
Truth is always joyful.”

23. The Intensity of Yearning Takes Away Words; God Cannot Do Without Virgins; God's Countenance, His Embrace, and His Joy Overcome a Thousand Deaths'

Whoever has burned in the powerful fire of love cannot endure abruptly cooling off through any kind of sin.

"Ah, dear Lover, when shall you yearn for what I yearn for?" Thus did a lonely soul speak.

Her dear One responded to her and spoke as though he did not know what she wanted: "What are you yearning for?"

She said in response: "Lord, the urgency of my desire has taken from me the ability to speak my thoughts."

He said: "Virgins do not know how to woo well because their modesty is by its nature refined."

She complained: "Alas, Lord, you certainly have been away from me much too long. If I could only win you, Lord, with magic, so that you could find rest only in me-ah, that would be a loving! Then you would have to beg that I behave sensibly."

Then he answered thus, saying: "O you spotless Dove, now grant me that I might spare you. The earth cannot yet do without you."

She said: "O Lord, if it could ever happen to me that I might gaze upon you as my heart desires and hold you in my arms, then the divine pleasures of your love would needs permeate my soul to the degree possible for people on earth. What I would be willing to suffer thereafter has never been seen by human eyes. Indeed, a thousand deaths were too little. Such, Lord, is my painful longing for you! For now I shall remain steadfast in my faithfulness. If you, Lord, can bear it, let me long pursue you in yearning. I know well, Lord, that the beginnings of desire for me will begin to stir in you. 1158

24. Two Kinds of Spirits from God and from the Devil Are Offered to Two Kinds of Religious People. The Seven Kinds of Love

Now I want to write you about a true spiritual sister and about a worldly beguine. They dispute with each other thus: The spiritual sister speaks from the true light of the Holy Spirit, free from interior suffering; but the worldly beguine speaks from her flesh in Lucifer's spirit with dreadful effort.

There are two kinds of religious people on this earth, to whom two kinds of spirits are offered. God offers his Holy Spirit to pure spirits who live here in a faithful holy attitude with their whole being. Here two pure natures meet: the hot fire of the Godhead and the flowing wax of the loving soul. If a pure wick of constant humility is there, a beautiful light shall burn by which one shall see far. O loving Soul, you shall become so rich that no one can make you poor-and yet you are the poorest of all! Humility makes one rich and well-brought-up; good habits make one noble and well-bred. Love makes one beautiful and praiseworthy." Being scorned exalts one aloft in God. Mark this well, spiritual Sister, and let no one drive you away from your good habits. Then shall you remain holy.

The devil, too, offers his spirit to the spirits who are ready to do the worst with hatred and with arrogant rapacity. They do not know what good things love brings. They become so poor from mean hatred and from the devil's grimness that it would be impossible for them to find or follow God's love.

Faithful love raises constant praise to God.
Yearning love causes a pure heart much sweet anguish.
Searching love belongs to herself alone.
Knowing love shares itself with all creatures.
Clamoring love is still mixed with sadness.
Silent love enjoys effortless pleasure.
Ah, the body knows nothing of what love does in stillness.
Pure love finds rest in God alone
Because the two of them have a single will,
And no creature is important enough to disturb them.

Knowledge has written this out of the eternal book:

Gold is often made very impure by copper.

Duplicity and empty honor do the same.

They erode all virtues from a person's soul.

The base soul is so attracted to transitory things

That she has never been shaken by love.

In her God has never spoken lovingly.

Alas, for her this life is total night.

Book IV

1. Pure Virgins Should Have Five Things

If you want to enhance virginity, which God has so glorified that for love of you he became the Son of a virgin just think what that means!-then you should be humbly silent and lovingly suffer distress and throughout all your days and in all situations practice virginal modesty. This will make your chastity thrive. O virgin, what God wants to give you then! He wants to be your handsome young man and wants to lead you in the heavenly dance. O wretched lame dog that I am, I would also shuffle along with you. Consider how I mean that: The number of pure virgins is small.

2. This Book Has Come from God; the Soul Praises Herself for Many Things; She Is Given Two Angels and Two Evil Devils. With Twelve Virtues She Does Battle Against the Flesh

All the days of my life before I began this book and before a single word of it had come into my soul, I was one of the most naive persons ever to be in religious life. I knew nothing about the devil's malice; I was unaware of the frailty of the world; the duplicity of people in religious life was also unknown to me. I have to speak to God's honor and for the sake of the book's teaching: I, unworthy sinner, was greeted by the Holy Spirit in my twelfth year, while I was alone, with such an outpouring that I could never, ever after that endure letting myself be led into a clear venial sin. This precious greeting occurred every day and lovingly spoiled for me all worldly sweetness, and it is still increasing day by day. This happened over thirty-one years. About God I knew nothing more than what the Christian faith teaches and I strove with constancy to keep my heart pure. God himself is my witness that I never in will or desire asked him to give me these things that are written in this book. Also, I never imagined that such things could happen to a human being. As long as I was with my relatives and my friends, to whom I was always the favorite, I had no knowledge of these things. Long before this I had had the desire to be despised through no fault of my own. Then for the sake of God's love I moved to a town where no one was my friend except for one person. I was afraid that because of him holy contempt and God's pure love would be withdrawn from me. But God nowhere abandoned me and let me experience such delightful sweetness, such holy knowledge, and such incomprehensible wonders that I found little enjoyment in earthly things.

Then for the first time my spirit was brought up through prayer between heaven and the air. I saw with the eyes of my soul in heavenly bliss the beautiful humanity of our Lord Jesus Christ, and I recognized in his sublime countenance the Holy Trinity-the eternity of the Father, the suffering of the Son, the sweetness of the Holy Spirit. Then I saw an angel, to whom I was entrusted through baptism, and my devil. Our Lord said:

"I shall take this angel from you
And shall give you two others instead.
They shall take care of you in these wonders."

When the soul looked at the two angels, oh, how completely was she unnerved in humble impotence, and she prostrated herself at the feet of our Lord, thanking him and urgently protesting that she was quite unworthy that princes such as this should be her chamberlains. One of the angels was from the Seraphim, and he is an igniter of love and a holy beacon for tender souls. The other angel was from the Cherubim; he is a keeper of the gifts and orders wisdom in the loving soul.

Then our Lord allowed two devils to come forth.
They were exalted masters, taken from Lucifer's school,
And had seldom come out.

When the soul looked upon the terribly hideous devils, she shivered a little, commended herself to our Lord, and quite freely accepted them. The one devil is a deceiver with beautiful angelic garments. Oh, what a lot of false cunning he presented to me at first! Once during mass he came down from on high and said: "I am so beautiful; don't you want to worship me?"

The soul replied: "God alone shall one worship in all good things and in all distress!"

He said: "Don't you want to look up and see who I am?" Then in the lower air he displayed a beautiful sham radiance, which has seduced many a heretic, and said: "In the throne room upon this seat you alone shall be the most exalted virgin, with me the fairest youth next to you."

But she replied: "A person would not be wise to take the worst when he could easily achieve the best."

He said: "Since you do not want to surrender yourself to me you are so holy and so humble-then I shall worship you."

She said: "No grace shall be given to you because you worship a foul cesspool."

Then he showed her the five wounds painted on his feet and hands and said: "Now you will see who I am. If you will live according to my advice, I shall give you great honor. You should tell people about this special favor; then much good would come of it."

She said-and his idle talk annoyed her greatly; nevertheless, she listened to it freely so that she might become more shrewd."You are telling me that you are God. Well then, tell me, who is that who is the Son of the living God now here in the true priest's hands?" He then wanted to depart, and she said: "By the almighty God, I admonish you that you now listen to me: I well know your intentions. If I were to tell everyone the secrets of my heart, things would be quite nice for me in the short term. But then you would intently strive to make the fun end badly. You would do this so that I might fall into doubt, sadness, unbelief, impurity, and thereafter into everlasting anguish. Another reason you are doing this is so that I might imagine that you come to me thus because I am so holy. Ha! You old archdeceiver, as long as God stands by me, all your efforts are for naught."

Then he cried out: "A plague on your magic; just let me get away from you. I'll never bother you again!"

The second devil who was assigned to me was a troublemaker and a master of concealed lewdness. However, God forbade him ever to come to me himself. Instead, he sent perverted evil people to me as his messengers who spoil good things for me and take what they can of my honor by their words. He also strives for this: where good people are together and are talking idly in a lewd manner, this cannot help but trouble poor me. Up to then that had never happened to me.

One night I was at prayer before my first sleep. This same devil came passing through the air and took a close look at the sinful earth. He was huge like a giant. He had a short tail and a crooked nose. His head was large like a tub. Out of his mouth fiery sparks came flying covered with black flame. He laughed with cunning malice and a horrible raucous voice. The soul asked him why he was laughing, what he was looking for, and what he was up to.

He answered and said: "I am glad, indeed, since I may not torment you myself, that I find so many who look like angels and are happy to torment you for me." Then he continued: "I am the chamberlain of religious persons and I look for two kinds of weakness in them that will separate them from God in an instant. One is concealed or secret impurity. Whenever a person in religious life seeks the comfort of the flesh without real necessity and in all his five senses, they become impure; that is, crass and lazy; and true love of God grows cold. The other is hidden hatred in open discord. This is a very useful sin for me. Wherever I find it unrepented overnight, there is a win for me, for it is the foundation of long-lasting malice and the loss of all holiness."

Then the soul said: "Since by your nature you have absolutely nothing good about you, how can it be that you can give a morally profitable explanation of your evil?"

And he replied: "Wherever I turn, God has me so firmly in his hands that I cannot do anything except what he directs me."

I, unhappy person, in my early childhood committed such a great sin that, if I had remained without repentance and without confession, I would have to have stayed in purgatory for ten years. But now, dear Lord, when I die, I shall cheerfully suffer torment there for love of you. I am saying this not from reason; love bids me say it.' When I entered religious life and took leave of the world, I looked at my body. It was fully armed against my poor soul with great fullness of strong power and with the energy of a complete nature. I saw full well that it was my enemy, and I also saw if I were going to escape eternal death, I would have to strike it down; conflict was inevitable. I also looked at my soul's weapon. This was the glorious passion of our Lord Jesus Christ. With this I defended myself. I had to remain constantly in great fear and throughout my youth had to deliver great defensive blows against my body. These were sighing, weeping, confessing, fasting, keeping vigils, scourging with rods, and constant adoration. These were the weapons of my soul by means of which I so completely conquered the body that in twenty years the time never came that I was not weary, weak, and sick-mostly from repentance and suffering, but also from holy longing and spiritual toil and, in addition, many a difficult day of sickness from my nature. There was also the violent force of love, which pressed me so intensely with these marvels that I did not dare remain silent about it. Still, because of my naivete, I had much to suffer. I said: "Ah, kind God, what do you see in me? You know quite well that I am a fool, a human being sinful and needy in body and soul. You should be giving these things to wise people; then you would be able to receive praise."

Then our Lord got very angry with little me and asked me for my judgment:

"Now tell me, are you mine or not?"

"Certainly, Lord, that is what I long for from you."

"Shall I then not do with you what I want?"

"Yes, Dearest to my heart, gladly; even if I should thus become nothing."

Then our Lord said: "You shall obey and trust me in these matters, and you shall also become sick for a long time, and I shall take care of you myself; and everything that you need for body and soul I shall give you."

Then, a wretch trembling in humble confusion, I went to my confessor, told him the whole story, and begged for his advice. He said I should boldly go forward with a light heart; God, who had been leading me, would certainly preserve me. Then he gave me a command that often makes me ashamed and causes me to weep because my utter unworthiness is obvious to my eyes; that is, he commanded me, a frail woman, to write this book out of God's heart and mouth. And so this book has come lovingly from God and does not have its origins in human thought.

3. Sinners Fall Away from God, of Three Gifts of Wisdom; of the Stone; of the Praise of the Virgin Who Is Christianity2

Just as one soothes a dear child, so does one spank a nasty one. Just so does our Lord act, saying: "Whoever has nothing good about him shall never enter my kingdom; and whoever cannot be made full by transitory things shall be satisfied with hunger for eternity. And woe to him who has goods that stick to his heart and who wants to set himself above other people. He shall slip away from me into the bottomless valley."

To this, holy knowledge replies that God has given us three different gifts in true wisdom from which we should take our fill and by which we should preserve ourselves from all injury.

The first is priestly wisdom and Christian teaching, as God revealed them to me in great glory. With the true eyes of my knowledge, effortlessly and in sweet bliss, I saw a stone that was like a well-shaped mountain and that had grown out of itself and had taken on the beauty of all kinds of colors and gave off the strong fragrance of precious heavenly spices. I asked the very delightful stone who it was, and it spoke thus: "I am Jesus." Then I went out of myself in love4 and leaned my head on it. I saw that outside it was shut off from all darkness and was filled inside with eternal light.

Upon the stone there stood the most beautiful of virgins that was ever seen aside from our dear Lady St. Mary, but she is her playmate. Her feet are adorned with a stone called jasper. This stone has such great power that it drives out base cupidity from the feet of its desire.' It also bestows pure fragrance and stimulates holy hunger. It drives all darkness from one's eyes. This precious stone is Christian faith. The virgin stood on two feet. The one is the bond, the other is the loosening of holy power.' All Christian believing priests have these. She carries in her right hand a chalice filled with red wine, which she drinks alone in untold bliss. The angels never get a taste of it. The wine is the blood of the eternal Son, which fills her spirit so full that she gives us many a sweet teaching. In her left hand she wields a fiery sword that is full of golden cymbals hanging from it that sound so sweet that everyone must approach her who strives toward the Holy Trinity. I asked the virgin why it was that she carried the sword in her left hand and the chalice in her right hand. She said: "I am supposed to threaten because on the last day of each human being God shall strike his blow. I am also supposed to give away his blood with my right hand, just as Christ is turned to his Father in glory."

She also has great strength in her hands with which she draws all to herself who choose God and casts off from herself as well all who deliver themselves over to the devil. Ah, she has such a fair countenance. I look at her with ever increasing joy. Unguent flows from her throat; this is mercy, salve for sin. In her mouth she has golden teeth with which she chews the celestial junipers. These are the sayings of the prophets. From her tongue drips honey that the bustling bees, the holy apostles, have sucked from the sweetest wild flowers. She wears on her mouth blossoming roses and her nose is adorned with sweet violets.' She wears on her brow verdant white lilies.' This means she is a mother to widows, a dear friend to married people and a glory to all virgins. Her eyes sparkle full of delight, just as the sparkling sun prods on before it the pale green dawn. And just as her eyes are threefold and yet one, so it is with the Holy Trinity. The white refers to the Father, the green to the Son, the radiant sun to the Holy Spirit." When they gaze at one another from their hearts, no greater joy can ever come about. This virgin also wears on her head a crown that is wrought from red gold. That is lofty counsel and holy action which one has from holy teachers. This crown is like a fortress with battlements before which lies a great pitiful army, and they have a terribly disloyal lord-that is the devil and his fol lowers-who is a treasonous wretch. Within the crown resides a praiseworthy army in full power with abundant defenses. They have a loyal Lord; that is Jesus our Redeemer. He constantly directs the defense of those under attack and leads the exhausted to the wine cellar.

In the crown there is a threefold horn"; in it the hardy shall dwell who are devoted to great love. They have to be the archers and sentries if the weakest are to survive. In the crown there is also a tower. The blessed who shall live there do not often need to enter the fray, but no one can climb up to it unless his complete earthly will has been taken from him by love. The crown has on the top of its battlements a great number of costly precious stones. These are those who have now gone from here to heaven. Inside in the heart of the virgin I saw a living spring flowing forth. Heathen children, all leprous and blind, were being brought there. Above this spring stood a deeply spiritual man. No one but him could reach into it. This was John the Baptist. He bathed the children in the spring that they might become seeing and radiantly healthy. I asked the virgin who she was. She said: "I am she whom you love so well, and I am your playmate. I am Holy Christianity and we both have the same Bridegroom." This is the virgin of blessed priests who so often gaze upon her with love.

The second wisdom comes from our natural faculties by means of which one can do both: lose and win. In this wisdom resides a throng of perverse lay persons and false priests and cunning religious." Never does a person become so holy that he learns how to guard against these three completely. So vicious are they that they pervert everything that is good. No one becomes spiritual from this gifts" unless he also is a fool for the sake of God's love. For pure holy simplicity is the mother of true divine wisdom. What good does it do that a refined gentleman has a lot of money and yet buys nothing but hunger, thirst, long-lasting disgrace, and eternal interior torment as well?

The third wisdom comes from grace and orders all of God's gifts. It never becomes so abundant that it dare compare itself to the lowest creatures. Their distress never saddens it; rather, it rejoices only in God's will. Also, it cannot bear that a single virtue remain locked outside its door.

4. Two Dissimilar Paths: the First Descends into Hell; the Second Ascends to Heaven¹⁴

Abundance of transitory things is a capricious guest;
Holy poverty offers before God a precious burden.

Vanity reflects not on its destructiveness;
Constancy is fully laden with all virtues.

Folly is comfortable only with itself;
Wisdom is never satisfied with what it learns.

Anger brings utter darkness into the soul;
Holy meekness is assured of every grace.

Pride always wants to be the best;
Humility can never rest, but must offer its service to all creatures.

Empty honor is before God deaf and blind;
Undeserved disgrace sanctifies all children of God.

Deceit has a most fair appearance;
Perfection is despised by the high and mighty.

Cupidity always has a loud mouth;
Blessed moderation has a delightful foundation.

Sloth misses abundant treasure;
Holy diligence does not overly seek out its own comfort.

Disloyalty always gives bad advice;
Full loyalty never omits a good deed.

True spirituality never avenges itself on anyone;
The uncultivated heart always seeks to break the peace.

Genuine devotion cannot do evil;
Evil will is subordinate to no one.

Malice by nature is grounded in evil;
Divine grace has a lovely countenance and a sweet mouth.

Worldly hearts like to be honored;
A spiritual soul always wants to go elsewhere.

Hidden cruelty has a plain mouth;
Open kindliness discovers God's treasure.

Deceitful concern is hate's neighbor;
Holy mercy alone shall stand with God.

A lie appears outwardly beautiful and inwardly hideous;
This is why it receives a friendly welcome from its companions.

Truth is rejected because it is little esteemed;
Hence all who love it must suffer many a humiliation with Jesus.

Hate rages unceasingly;
Love burns without injuring; it is free of all torment.

Evil disfavor hates God's generosity;
A pure heart full of love rejoices at everyone's happiness.

Malicious gossip feels shame neither before people nor God,
Who, after all, hears and sees all things.

Despair is a horrible fall;
True hope preserves it all.

False consolation will never be happy;
True guilt saddens it¹⁵ so.

After our dear Lord had revealed this to me, he then said: "He who considers how good I am always holds himself fast on me." To that end help us, Lord, for the sake of your own honor!

5. Our Sin, Future Fall, Earthly Being, the Kingdom of Heaven. God's Gifts Should Be Clearly Before Our Eyes

Lord, my guilt through which I have lost you stands before my eyes like an immense mountain and has created an extensive darkness between you and me, and an eternal distance of you, alas, from me! Ah, Love above all loves, draw me back into you!

But, Lord, a future fall's stands before my eyes like a fiery dragon mouth that at any time would like to devour me. Ah, my only Good, now help me that I might flow spotless into you!

Lord, my earthly being stands before my eyes like a parched field on which little of value has grown. O dear Jesus Christ, send me the sweet rain of your humanity and the warm sun of your living Godhead and the gentle dew of your Holy Spirit, that I might lament my heart's suffering.

Lord, your eternal kingdom stands open before my eyes like the most splendid wedding feast and the greatest celebration and the longest banquet. Alas, my Darling, there you shall forever draw your love-craving bride to your embrace.

Lord, your whole gift that I have received from you appears to my eyes like a wretched box on the ears, because your most sublime gift here makes me seem so worthless. Thus does God who gives it all speak:

“Your mountain shall dissolve in love;
Your enemies shall gain no part of you;
Your field has been penetrated by the warm sun;
And your fruit has nevertheless remained unspoiled;
And in my kingdom you shall be a new bride;

And there I shall give you a delicious kiss on the mouth,
That my entire Godhead shall soar through your soul;
And my threefold eyes shall forever sparkle unceasingly in your twofold heart.

So where is your grieving now?
Even if you pray for a thousand years,
I would not grant you a single sigh.”

6. Being Chosen by God Cannot Hurt Anyone; True Repentance Earns Remission and God's Grace, and Frees from Purgatory

A despondent person asked me to pray for him, which I did with fear and special concern. God heard me with his gaze, with his words, and with his true voice, saying: "There is no lamb so white or so pure that it cannot be vanquished by wolves; yet no one can deter my determinations. I have made this clear to him in three ways. First, I was merciful in regard to his guilt. Second, I have given him my grace. Third, I have never allowed untrustworthy people to exercise any power over him."

Then I lamented for him thus: "Lord, he still has great fears that you have not completely forgiven him his guilt."

Thus did God reply: "That would be impossible. Whoever is sorry for his sins I forgive. Those who repent with deep compunction I grant my grace; and whoever so repents them that he would sacrifice his life before he would ever do it again and remains constant in this shall not be condemned to any punishment after this life because of his guilt, unless he commits real venial sins and is found unrepentant of them.

7. How a Free Soul Speaks to God in Total Love

Lord, because I was subservient to all creatures, you have drawn me up above all things to yourself; and, Lord, because I have no earthly treasure, I do not have an earthly heart either. For you, Lord, are my treasure, just as you are also my heart; and you alone are my good, but I am capricious in all things.

8. Concerning God's Body, Which a Sick Person Vomits Up, and Concerning Power

That a sick person who is vomiting may not receive the Body of God-I was so naive about this that I did not know how to figure it out completely by my own powers of thinking and my own faith, because one can lose God only by sinning. So my soul asked our Lord in the union of love what the truth of the matter was. Our Lord gave this reply: "You are right. One can only lose me by sinning, but one's body can lose my body through sickness." In these words I saw in the Holy Trinity this explanation: Whenever we receive God's Body, the Godhead unites itself to our innocent soul and God's humanity mixes itself with our hideous body, and thus does the Holy Spirit make his dwelling in our faith. This blessed union we should preserve with great care.

9. Four Kinds of Offerings to Priests

Then our Lord said to me that priests should receive offerings from four things and from nothing else: from the altar; from bringing God's Body to the sick-but the sick person should give an offering for the last anointing according to his means and according to what he thinks is good; from the field" he should take what one wants to give him. A priest should not determine and should not demand, because what a sick person has given he should receive only as a favor and not as something rightfully his."

10. Concerning the Offerings of Laypersons According to Their Means

Laypersons who give an offering should keep themselves from evil parsimony when giving, as much as the priest should preserve himself from greedy cupidity. This is very important for both of us because the layperson should give his offering with great love and a cheerful soul into God's generous hand. The priest should take it in humble fear and quaking heart from God's hands and should in all his actions return it to God in a praiseworthy manner; for earthly goods are like slaves when one receives them, but they are like the freeborn when one gives them away.

11. Four Things Concerning How Christians Should Conduct Themselves in Dealing with Jews

Then God taught me how Christians should conduct themselves toward Jews. One should not observe their law. One should not reside with them. One should not even spend the night in their dwelling. One should buy and sell from them without acting too friendly and without cunning or greed.

12. How a Bride Who Is United with God Rejects Consolation from All Creatures Except for That from God Alone, and How She Sinks into Pain

So speaks God's bride who has taken her rest in the sealed treasury of the holy complete Trinity: "Oh, get up and depart from me, all you creatures! You cause me pain and you are not able to console me."

The creatures say: "Why?"

The bride says: "My Love left me as I slept, as I was resting in oneness with him.""

"Can't this beautiful world and all the good it contains console you?"

"No, I see the snake of deceit and how treacherous cunning slithers into all the pleasures of this world. I also see the hook of lust in the carcass of base sweetness with which she catches many."

"Can the kingdom of heaven console you at all?"

"No, in itself it would be dead if the living God were not there."

"Well then, Lady Bride, can't the saints console you?"

"No, if they were to be separated from the living God flowing through them, they would weep more bitterly than I; for they have ascended above me and dwell deeper in God."

"Can God's Son ever console you?"

"Yes, I certainly ask him when we stroll through the flowers of holy knowledge, and I beg him full of longing that he open up for me the playful flood flowing in the Holy Trinity from which alone the soul lives.

If I am to be consoled in proportion to my nobility,
God's breath must draw me effortlessly into itself,
For the sparkling sun of the living Godhead
Shines through the bright water of cheerful humanity,

And the sweet pleasure of the Holy Spirit
Who proceeds from them both
Has taken from me everything
That dwells beneath the Godhead.
Nothing tastes good to me but God alone;
I am wondrously dead.
I am freely willing to give up this taste
So that he be wonderfully praised.
For when I, a worthless human being, cannot praise God with my powers,
I send all creatures to court
And bid them that they praise God for me

With all their wisdom,
With all their love,
With all their beauty,
And with all their longing,
Just as they were created by God in innocence,
And also with all their voices
As they now sing.
When I look upon this great praising,
I feel no pain.

"I cannot endure that a single consolation touch me except my Lover. I love my earthly friends in the company of heaven and I love my enemies in holy aching for their happiness. God has enough of everything; caressing souls is the only thing he cannot get enough of."

After this marvel and this consolation had been going on for eight years, God wanted to console me way beyond what was due to my soul's nobility. "No, dear Lord, do not elevate me so much," said the unworthy soul. "It's much too good for me in the lowest part; for your honor's sake I am quite happy always to remain there."

Then the poor wretch sank down among those suspended ²¹ and among the damned souls, and she thought this was too good. After that our Lord pursued her as he does those who experience the lowest kind of joy,²¹ for God shines beautifully into all according to the degree of holiness they achieved here in love and according to how noble in virtues they became. St. John says: "We shall see God as he is."²² This is true. But the sun shines according to the weather. There are different kinds of weather on earth under the sun, and in like manner there are different kinds of dwellings in heaven. Hence, he is to me as I can bear him and see him.

Then our Lord said: "How long do you want to be here?"

The bride said: "Oh, leave me, dear Lord, and let me sink further for your honor."

After this both soul and body entered into such a great darkness that I lost knowledge and light, and I knew nothing of God's intimacies. Even blessed love went off on its own. The soul said: "Where are you now, Lady Trust? I now want to entrust to you the duties of love, and you must preserve God's honor in me."

Then this chambermaid took charge of her lady in such a holy spirit of suffering and cheerful patience that I was living without a care. But then disbelief came and enveloped me completely in such great darkness and screamed at me in such great rage that I shuddered at its voice. It said: "If this favor had been from God, he would not have so utterly forsaken you."

The soul said: "Where are you now, Lady Constancy? Command true faith to come to me!"

Then the Father of heaven said to the soul: "Remember what you experienced and what you saw while there was nothing between me and you."

And the Son said: "Remember what your body suffered from my pain."

This is what the Holy Spirit said: "Remember what you wrote."

Then both body and soul answered with the constancy of true faith: "As I have believed, loved, enjoyed, and known, so shall I go forth from here unshaken."

After this came constant estrangement from God and enveloped the soul so completely that the blessed soul said: "Welcome, very blessed Estrangement. Fortunate I am that I was born—that you, Lady, shall now be my chambermaid, for you bring me unusual joy and incomprehensible marvels and unbearable delight as well. But, Lord, you should take delight from me and let me have estrangement from you. Ah, how good I feel, darling God, that I may bear it because love is changeable. How it comes to me I dare not say; only that gall has become honey for the palate of my soul."

Then I desired that all creatures might praise our Lord with the Te deum laudamus.²³ But they did not want to do this and turned their backs on me. Then the soul became happy beyond all bounds, and herself said: "That you now despise me and turn your backs on me—look, I'm glad. This praises our Lord immeasurably. Now his honor is accomplished through me, for now God is strangely with me, now his estrangement from me is more welcome to me than he is himself." The soul knew full well that God would console her even in great estrangement. She said: "Remember, Lord, who I am and avoid me."

Our Lord said to her: "Grant me this: that I might cool the heat of my Godhead, the longing of my humanity, and the pleasure of my Holy Spirit in you."

To this she replied: "Yes, Lord, but in such a way that it is only good for you and not for me."

After this the bride entered such a great darkness that her body sweated and writhed in painful cramping. The pain was asked by someone² to be a messenger to God for her. She said: "Lady Pain, this I bid you: that you release me now, for you are now the most important thing about me."

Then pain arose from the soul and the body like a gloomy shine and ascended to God with judicious intent and called out in a loud voice: "Lord, you know well what I want."

Our Lord went to meet her before the door of the kingdom, saying: "Welcome, Lady Pain, you are the garment I wore next to my skin on earth and the whole world's contempt was my finest mantle. Despite how much I loved you there, you are not entering here. Rather, to the virgin who is willing to do two things I shall give two things. She should constantly prove herself well-bred and prudent. Then shall she help you be her messenger, and then shall I give her my embrace and union with my heart."

Then pain said this: "Lord, I make many blessed and yet am not blessed myself, and I consume many a holy body and yet myself am evil, and I lead many to heaven and yet do not enter it myself."

To this our Lord responded: "Pain, you were not born from the kingdom of heaven; therefore, you may not enter it. Rather, you were born from Lucifer's heart; there you shall return and shall dwell with him eternally."

Ah, blessed Estrangement from God, how bound I am to you in love! You strengthen my will in pain and make pleasant for me the difficult long wait in this miserable body. By whatever means I make myself more your companion, the more intensely and wondrously God falls over me. O Lord, in the depths of pure humility I cannot sink away from you; alas, in pride I easily stray away from you!

But the deeper I sink,

The sweeter I drink.

13. The Text of This Book Is Seen, Heard, and Felt in All Members

I do not know how to write, nor can I, unless I see with the eyes of my soul and hear with the ears of my eternal spirit and feel in all the parts of my body the power of the Holy Spirit.

14. Of the Holy Trinity, of the Birth and the Name of Jesus Christ, and of Human Nobility

I saw and still see three Persons in the eternal heights before God's Son was conceived in the body of St. Mary. They were then known and seen by all the holy angels in their distinctness, in their completeness, in their name, and in how the Three were one God. No matter how good the angels' eyes were, they saw neither bone nor flesh nor color nor the glorious name Jesus. This was miraculously hidden from them in the breast of the eternal Father. They called the Father the uncreated eternal God, the Son wisdom with no beginning, the Spirit of them both they called right knowledge of truth. The fiery angels of the highest order, who are suspended opposite the loving Godhead in the breath of the whole Trinity, served and were witness to the blissful decision when God became man. Gabriel brought only the name down at the Annunciation. He was entrusted with neither bone nor flesh nor blood. The Second Person-that was always the eternal Son. Although he had not yet assumed human nature, he had always been ours but had not been given to us before Gabriel brought the message. If this same Second Person had been flesh, for the sake of redeeming us, before the Annunciation, then it would have to be a beginning; but this never took place.² This same Second Person had become one nature with Adam's humanity before he debased himself in sin. Although Adam's nature was broken and changed and his inheritance lost forever, God never gave up on him. Hence we were and still are able to return. God has kept his noble loving nature intact. Hence he cannot withhold himself. God immediately cast Lucifer from himself into the eternal prison, but he pursued Adam, asked him where he was, and brought him back to the path. Lucifer had only a single nature in God. When he destroyed it, he could not return.

Man has a complete nature in the Holy Trinity, and God saw fit to fashion it with his own divine hands. When his holy efforts on our behalf went for naught, he was forced back within himself by a threefold delight. For this reason he wanted to restore us with his own feet and his own hands so that we would have great oneness with him. If man had remained in paradise, God would have been immediately visible to him, would have greeted his soul and refreshed his body. Thus did I see God come from heaven to paradise, like a great angel.

Also, this same nature forces God to greet us with knowledge and with holy intimacy to the extent that we are prepared through holy virtues and true innocence. When I reflect that divine nature now includes bone and flesh, body and soul, then I become elated in great joy, far beyond what I am worth. But angels are to some degree formed according to the Holy Trinity, but they are pure spirits. The soul alone with its flesh is mistress of the house in heaven, sits next to the eternal Master of the house, and is most like him. There eye reflects in eye, there spirit flows in spirit, there hand touches hand, there mouth speaks to mouth, and there heart greets heart. Thus does the Lord and Master honor the mistress at his side. But the princes and the vassals-these are the holy angels-these the Master keeps in full view. All service and all praise the angels engage in are offered totally to the mistress as well as to the Master. Our vassals rank in nobility according to how rich in holy virtues we are on earth.²⁶

15. Genuine Pure Love Has Four Things; If You Surrender Yourself to God, God Will Also Surrender Himself to You

Genuine pure love of God has four things about it that never rest. The first is growing desire, the second is flowing suffering, the third: burning sensation in soul and body, the fourth: constant union bound to great vigilance. No one can achieve this unless one enters into a full exchange with God, such that you give God everything that is yours, both inwardly and outwardly, and he truly gives you everything that is his inwardly and outwardly.

When the hour of bliss has passed when God gave his most sublime consolation to the loving soul, ah, then the beloved is so content that she considers everything good that estranged souls feel as pain. If you are then cross, you might well fear that the devil has anointed you.

16. Great Love Has More than Ten Parts and of Two Kinds of Complaint

Great love gets its nature from this: It does not flow with tears; rather, it burns in the great fire of heaven. Within this it flows forth most lavishly and yet remains within itself in utter calm. It climbs up closest to God yet remains utterly interior to itself. It grasps the most and keeps the least.

"O most blessed love, where are those who know you?"

"They are totally consumed in the fire of the Holy Trinity; they do not dwell in themselves. These blessed ones can never fall into mortal sin."

"Why?"

"They are so completely permeated with and absorbed in God; the more they are tempted, the stronger they become."

"Why?"

"The longer they are here in the struggle and keep on loving, the more noble does God seem to them and the more frail and wretched they seem to themselves."

"Why?"

"The holier the love, the greater the fear; and the more consolation, the more constant the fear. But the loving soul cannot cravenly fear; she fears nobly."

There are two things that I cannot condemn enough: the first, that God's kindness is so forgotten in the world; the second, that those in religious life are so imperfect. Because of this many a fall must occur, for the perfect have never fallen.

17. Concerning a Lady Who Liked Being at Court; Concerning Her Devil Who Recommended to Her Seven Kinds of Evil

A lady had retreated from the world" and yet still wanted to serve at court. I prayed for her with all my might, both day and night, for I saw that the damage to her was so great that, if she remained there, she would woefully become the devil's companion upon her death. Why? Because she loved her importance there to excess and did not strive for God's honor. Rather, she gave herself over to idle courtly manners and kept her eyes focused on the prestige of her lord and lady.

After this a huge devil came-fiery, bloody, black, with claws, with horns,²⁸ and with glassy eyes. It came and stood before me. But I was not afraid of it. I just blessed myself and went to sleep. Then it trundled over me like a sack full of water and tormented me so much that I sought relief from our Lord. A white angel came to my aid. It was from the fourth choir of angels and was the guardian angel of this same lady. I asked him who this enemy was and why he was assailing me.

Ah, then the lovely angel said in a heavenly voice: "He is one of the most malicious devils that hell can muster. His task is to bind up with ruinous love the hearts of the pure who really do want to be good, and he is tormenting you because you are trying to push him away from this lady."

"Alas, is he going to torment me for a long time?"

"No, God shall soon show his mercy."

After this the devil came again and shot fiery rays at me that inflicted hellish pain on me in body and soul.

I said: "Do everything to me that God allows you."

At this the devil was weakened and said: "Since you humbly submit yourself to this suffering, I am losing all my power."

The soul said: "By the living God, I admonish you to tell me your name and what your business with this lady is."

"My name-ha! That I shall not tell you because that would do me too much harm."

"You must, by the last judgment!"

"I am fostering in her fierce arrogance, deceitful cunning, and powerful lust; and I fend off from her all mercy. My name is Raging Anger that destroys spiritual hearts."

18. A Spiritual Person Resembles an Animal in Thirty Things as to His Nature²⁹

Thus does a despondent soul lament and speak forlornly to her Lover: "Ah, Lord, for a long time I have desired two things that have not yet been granted me. The first is a faithful spiritual life. Alas, Dearest to my heart, that has all been left undone.

The second is a holy end. I am so looking forward to it that I am losing my doleful earnestness."

To this our Lord replied by showing me a frail, insignificant little animal and saying: "Look, you are like this tiny animal."

Then I saw how the animal was brought forth on an island in the sea out of the slime that had separated from the sea between the hot sun and the water in such a way that the sun was the animal's father, the sea its mother, and the slime its matter.

Thus was Adam created by God's power on earth out of weak matter. The animal signifies true spiritual people. When a person receives a spiritual spirit, he is begotten by the burning Godhead and is conceived in his mother, God's humanity. The matter he is made of is the Holy Spirit, who rubs out his sinful nature in all respects. The animal grows toward the warm sun. So does a spiritual person who has received" God's Spirit. This is such noble seed; it sprouts and grows till the blessed person's end.

This animal does not eat. Rather, it has a large tail that is full of honey. This it sucks on every day. It also has a golden beard that rings so delightfully when it is sucking that its sweet voice and cheerful sound echo playfully in its heart; and its body is nourished by drinking the sweet honey. This tail is the death of holy people, which they cheerfully and prudently keep before their eyes in their good works and constant practice of virtue, and they joyfully practice faithfulness in patient waiting. The golden beard is God's noble love that chimes through the loving heart into the noble soul. Fortunate is he to have become a human being who ever really experiences this!

This animal has at times a natural desire to drink from the sea because of a misguided sense of thirst. It cannot regain its health unless it voids and gives back the bitter seawater. Thus it is with us sinners: when we drink of the foul puddle of the world and make use of the baseness of our flesh according to the counsels of the evil spirit, we poison ourselves with our selves. If we ever want to survive, we have to leave ourselves and give back what we owe to the world.

This animal has big ears. They are exposed to the heavens, and it listens for the song of birds. It flees vicious animals and fears the snakes of the earth. This, indeed, is also what the loving soul does. It constantly flees evil company and detests false wisdom, and its ears are wide open to hear God's wisdom.

This animal has a noble temperament. It cannot remain in the sea when animals do their mating dance and the water is raging. It loves chastity and hurries up the highest mountain that it knows, and it picks out the most beautiful tree and climbs it with cheerful effort and clasps the lofty trunk; and so does it rest with great pleasure in lofty freedom. This is what the loving soul does. She finds vanity bitter and flees urgently what is merely passing that flows onward like water. She also knows how to work with great virtues and holy efforts on the highest mountain in the beautiful kingdom of heaven. Effortlessly, she climbs further into grace upon the fairest tree of the Holy Godhead. There she embraces the loftiest trunk and is herself embraced by the Holy Trinity.

This animal has two sharp horns with which it defends its body with such intelligence that it goes free among all the animals. O loving Soul, this you well understand. You drive the devil away from you through God's intelligence and you live in holy purity, free of all sin.

This animal has two beautiful human eyes that pour forth tears toward the beautiful mountain where it would like to be again. Ah, loving Soul, how fair are the eyes of your knowledge, for you have gazed into the eternal mirror and your sweet tears are ready to fall from love. And yet you willingly endure the bitterness of the sea of sin.

This animal has a soft mouth and a pure tongue, but it does not have teeth. It can neither snarl nor bite. The loving person also has a useful mouth; he eagerly teaches and instructs at all times. His tongue is far from and closed to all harmful words. He, too, has no teeth for biting. He willingly consoles those who are sad. There is also no viciousness in him except against sin and derision of God. Indeed, nothing hurts him as much as this. The mouth of this animal is wide open on top and small at the bottom. The large part of our mouth is the unrestrained praise that we should offer to God in the company of all creatures in all our actions and in all things at all times. The lower part of our mouth is all too ready to speak about the sinful earth. Woe to all empty phrases! What shall become of the impostor saints who fraudulently nourish their sinful bodies with gifts meant for holy people and comport themselves as though they gained complete knowledge of God's holy truth? May God in his trustworthiness, who alone has loved the truth, preserve his innocent friends from them!

This animal is swift of foot and has no voice. It is quiet by nature. The soul in rapture has this same nature: at the height of love she is both swift and at rest.

This animal's skin and hair are of a common color, and is faded and ugly to behold. No one hunts it for its present beauty. But after its death, when other animals rot, its skin becomes so ennobled and its hair so richly beautiful that all the most prominent people that can get it wear its coat rather than the finest sable. The peace, useful habits, and holy teachings of people striving for perfection receive, alas, little notice during their lifetime; but after their death, whenever we sinners come into need and we then remember how holy their lives were and how solicitously they warned us, as sinners we feel shame that we kept our distance from them. And so their life becomes a beautiful sable that in its full beauty we sinners keep before our eyes and in our hearts. And yet during their life, we always fear for our worthless copper, so that we willfully neglect reaching out for refined gold.

This animal's flesh is eaten on Friday. It does not die unless it is beaten to death by the waves of the sea. The lives of holy people consist only of Fridays, for they constantly fast because of sin and do not eat forbidden foods; rather, they live in a godlike manner. The great stormy swells of tempestuous love make them die to all things and live in God alone. Indeed, all things are not really theirs except as shared with God in love. Thus does their love have the valuable power of praising God in all things.

This animal's bones are the skeleton of a noble fish.' From it one can fashion beautiful jewels that noble persons wear in honor. What a precious jewel is a holy body full of love and free from sin! God shows us this through the example of his dearest friends when we discover the true signs in them. In his holy friends God has given us many a valuable jewel. If we do not praise him for this, we cannot become one with the saints, whom one here elevates from the earth.³²

This animal's name is, in German: Valuable for Everything.³³ Fortunate is he that he ever became man who has this name before God.

19. The Task of Blessed Love Is Manifold

O blessed Love,
This has always been your task, and still is:

To bind together God and the human soul.
That shall be your task forever.

Greetings, my Lady, and take care
That I do not complain about you to my Lord.
If he intends to be away from me too long,
I would freeze too much.
Keep that from happening, Lady of my heart and Queen.
You have seduced me in God
So that I am blissfully bound.

O Love, Lady, help me
That I may die in his arms which now embrace me.
But still, willingly shall I suffer the pain of death
In my sinful body.

Love, you have ever more the greatest power of all the virtues;
For this I shall ever thank God. You free me from many a heartache.
I no longer have any virtue;
He serves me with his virtues.
That I ever could do anything good separated from my Lord:

That would be more difficult for me than death.
I dare not, alas, claim credit
For everything that I say about love.
It is God, rather, who is thereby reaching out
To all those chosen in his heart.

Those to whom this is addressed shall indeed know:
Love makes empty hearts full.
But when we are full of wrangling and discontent,
The game of love is completely closed to us.

Good night, Love. I'm off to bed, alleluia!

20. The Six Virtues of St. Dominic

On the feast of St. Dominic I prayed to our Lord for the whole Order of Preachers. Our dear Lord deigned to come to me himself and he brought along St. Dominic whom, if I dare say it, I love above all the saints.

Our Lord said: "My son Dominic had four things about him while on earth that all priors should have about them. He loved his fellow Dominicans so much that he could never bear to trouble them with things arising from some whim of his own. The second is that he often improved the food to help and show affection for his brethren, so that the young brothers might not think back on the world and so that the older ones might not succumb on the way. The third is that in holy wisdom he provided for them the model for being moderate, for the sake of God, in their whole being, in all their customs, and in all their wants. The fourth is that he was so merciful that he never wanted to burden his dear brethren with any kind of penance that the order did not require for wrongdoing."

And our Lord continued: "I shall mention two more things. Whenever Dominic laughed, he did so with true delight of the Holy Spirit. But when he wept, he wept with such sincerity that first and foremost among his desires he always put his brethren before my eyes and, in addition, with all his strength, Holy Christianity." Before this I did not know that any laughing could be free of frivolity and not wrong.

21. Sixteen Reasons Why the Order of Preachers Is Dear to God'

After this our dear Lord said: "I love two things in the Order of Preachers so much that my divine heart unceasingly smiles upon it. The first is the holiness of their life; the second is their great value for the church. In addition, they greet my Holy Trinity with seven things. These are: deep sighs, sincere weeping, intense longing, strict discipline, distressful exile, genuine humility, and joyous love."

Our Lord spoke again: "They also glorify my three names externally in seven ways: with hymns of praise, with sincere preaching, with correct remission," by lovingly consoling, with friendly help, by being models of holiness. They are also a wholesome bond of Christian faith."

In addition, our darling Lord said: "The alms they give to the poor for love of me are so holy that the sins of the poor people who receive them are reduced and, then too, the devil is not able to remain where their gifts are being eaten. This is because of the holiness of their pleasing poverty."

Ah, eternal spring of the Godhead, out of which I and all things flowed, I, unworthy creature, praise you with everything that is below you that, in spite of everything, Lord, I have been consoled by you. Amen.

22. Brother Heinrich's Fourfold Crown and of the Dignity of St. Dominic^{3e}

In the Order of Preachers a brother died on the solemn feast of Easter after he had preached, sung mass, and had given people the holy body of our Lord. And when he had taken care of all his duties, he had himself anointed and departed toward nightfall. After he was buried, a certain person³⁷ went to where his dead body was and greeted both soul and body. She did this regularly upon the death of religious people. There God celebrated in her soul a divine feast, and his soul was shown to her in God's embrace in great glory. She saw clearly that his glory was not yet complete, and she asked our Lord how long he was going to remain like that and whether he had suffered at all in purgatory. Our Lord said: "He shall remain like this for a week." That is, seven days and seven nights. He had rested himself on God's breast in untold bliss of spiritual fervor that he had not experienced on earth. Very quickly had he come there without suffering, just as a mother takes up her dear child out of the ashes onto her lap. He said: "Tell my sister³⁹ I shall console her with God in fourteen days." It happened. She died fourteen nights later.

Then he invited me to his feast, where he was going to receive his glory. The whole heavenly army prepared for it and joined together in a beautiful procession. St. Dominic came with a whole throng. They were all preachers, and they all wore the golden crowns of those who died in the order, crowns that differed in value according to how holy they had been in the order. St. Dominic brought a shining crown toward Brother Heinrich that sparkled as beautifully as the sun at its brightest. He gave it to him as a reward from God, because he had followed his holy example in the Dominican order.

St. Dominic is indescribably more beautiful than the others because he receives a special honor from each brother as a reward. I saw him especially well clothed because of three qualities. He wears a white garment of innate purity; in addition, a green garment of growing wisdom of God, and also a red garment decorated with clasps because he had suffered spiritual martyrdom. They carry a military standard displaying the order's honor, one that no one else carries. A fine banner precedes them that all follow who on earth have lived according to their teaching.

Our Lord sat in his omnipotence and crowned this brother with three kinds of honors. They were: simple obedience, voluntary poverty, constant humiliation. Brother Heinrich thanked our Lord thus: "I thank you, Lord, that you found me, preserved me, and received me." He then bowed to our Lord and turned to his brothers. St. Dominic said: "Welcome, dear son, now enter into the glory of your Lord, alleluia!"

That I might experience this favor and might see this was especially due to my being lonely for the love of God and to being constantly treated with malicious contempt by the friends of God.

23. About the Burial of St. John the Evangelist⁴⁰

I actually saw the body of St. John the Evangelist with the eyes of my unworthy soul. He lies unburied in great bliss above all corruptible things beneath the creation of the eternal kingdom." His body has now taken on so much of divine eternity that it glows like a fiery crystal. He lies there so lovely in his human form, as though his spirit had fallen asleep in the midst of a heavenly rapture. His eyebrows are still brown; his eyes are closed and he is lying on his back. Beneath, above, and all around him everything is bright, and every seven hours the holy angels come to his body with a song of praise that goes like this: "Holy, pure, simple, wise, and dear to God's heart." The song has a sweeter melody than the sound of a thousand strings or harps. Between his body and the creation of the kingdom of heaven exists only a thin wall, like the membrane of an egg, and yet it is forever tough, so that no body is able to pass through it until the last day.

24. How God Receives the Souls in Heaven; How He Crowns Three Kinds of People; How He Greets, Adorns, Praises, and Thanks Them

The kingdom of heaven has many beautiful gates and yet it has none. The many doors are the glorious different rewards with which God receives each soul, and all of heaven opens up for God's lovely bride. God descends through all the choirs toward the soul, and the whole heavenly host follows him with everything beautiful in proportion to what she may receive as her reward. Thus does the soul joyfully leave purgatory or her exile on earth. Many a fair angel follows her as well. At the gates of heaven the two lovers meet-God and the soul. The noble look with which he receives her and the holy reflection of his splendor that she receives from him have such power in her that she can never again think of what has caused her harm or interior sorrow.

The usual crown of the kingdom is placed upon her head at the gate; that is God's will. With it he leads her in with honor. That is why it is called the crown of the kingdom. That sinner who was evil to the end and to whom God then sends sorrow receives no other honor as his reward. God crowns three kinds of people with his fatherly hands: virgins, widows, and married people. Just as he receives them with all praise, so does he then crown them. Widows and married people are crowned by our Lord as he sits in almighty glory. But for the virgins he rises and crowns them, standing like the son of an emperor. He greets them inwardly with his living Godhead; he honors them outwardly with his almighty humanity; he adorns them with the generosity of the Holy Spirit; he also rewards them everlastingly according to rank with the whole Trinity in his kingdom for all that which they bring along. He thanks them all individually for coming, and they praise God fervently that he saved them from eternal death.

25. How We Are Now Present in Heaven, Purgatory, and Hell

We are now present in heaven. Just as we are now on earth clothed with virtues and adorned and permeated with holy love of God, so are we now visible to all the blessed, and they praise God and rejoice because of us, as though we were now with them there. They do not see in advance what is happening to us, but they do see that we are growing in nobility, increasing in splendor, and ascending to the heights. This is what is happening hour after hour to the blessed who are still on earth. Because of it the joy of the saints and angels increases. Alas! If we sink into great venial sins, our fair heavenly radiance is extinguished. Then the angels beseech and the saints beg our dear Lord that we turn back and become pure again.

We are also present in purgatory as soon as we have earned it on earth. This pains all those who are there, but they cannot help us because they are themselves burning in such torment. There are many poor souls in this purgatory with such guilt that they cannot know whether they are ever going to be redeemed." Why? Because they never wanted to confess with their fleshly mouth. We have seen how they may be saved in a different chapter.⁴

The sinner's presence is also manifest in hell. God's mercy follows him. Hence they are there today, and tomorrow they are the angels' companions.

Thus does our presence go in and out of heaven, purgatory, and wretched hell according to where our own free will seeks to align itself.

26. God Consoles the Depressed Brother Baldwin'

A brother in the Order of Preachers was so weighed down by an important office accepted under obedience-as happens to many-that his youthful vigor was drained from him and he lost his natural strength; yet he still carried on with good intentions. So I begged our Lord that he might turn his favor in that direction. Our Lord instructed me and said: "I have heard and seen all the distress he is suffering, and what he reads and writes. All this shall become the following song of love praising me before my eternal court: Great God, eternal, mighty, marvelous, alleluia. And I shall lift up his head and increase all his might, just as I have done for you-not just by nature, but rather even more by grace."

27. Concerning the End of the Order of Preachers and the Antichrist; Concerning Enoch and Elias

The Order of Preachers was under severe attack from false teachers and, in addition, from many greedy sinners. So I prayed to our dear Lord that he might protect in them his own honor. God said: "As long as I want to keep them, no one can destroy them."

I asked: "O dear Lord, will the order exist until the end of the world?"

Our Lord said: "Yes, they shall continue until the end of the world. But another kind of people shall come." They shall then instruct these people who then come so that they shall be wiser, mightier, and poorer in earthly needs, and made more fervent by the Holy Spirit because of the wretched ill fortune that is approaching for Holy Christianity."

Then I saw these people, their garb, their manner of life, and that there were a great number of them. They had no more than two garments; the undergarment is white and the outer garment red, signifying the pure humanity of our Lord and his holy death. Their hair and their beards were let grow as long as they would. Their belt is fashioned of woven material from an olive tree signifying holy mercy, which they bring to misguided Christianity. They all go barefoot, but in regions where it freezes they wear red shoes with white laces but no stockings. They wash their faces in summer with water, even in the woods, but not in winter, for they have no dwellings of their own. They are strangers in all places and suffer much distress. They have neither house nor home, and neither silver nor gold stored anywhere. Each of them walks with a white staff colored red. The staff has a curved upper part that is a span long and made of ivory. The ivory means they should be chaste and pure in all things. The staff is white and red; thereby they call to mind Christ's death. Into one side of the staff is carved the passion of our Lord; on the other side his ascension into heaven. They must keep this staff with them in all places, when eating or sleeping, praying or preaching, celebrating mass or hearing confessions. And when they put the staff aside, they must stick it into the ground before their eyes, so that they might constantly behold the passion of Christ.

When their journey is thirty leagues long and they must go to be of help or out of necessity, so may the two of them take along a donkey they may sometimes ride. In such cases they may not carry their staff at their side but must carry it upright in front of them in their hand as God's cross. They must ride this lowly animal so that they might resemble God in humility. Also, their feet shall cause them such pain that they cannot complete the whole distance. But they may not wear shoes any longer than from All Saints until the day on which St. Peter became pope.⁴⁷ They shall ask no one for breeches or other clothing, but when no one offers them bread, they should humbly ask for it and should eat and drink with the common people all the food that is given them with the exception of meat. Also, they should not fast any more than Christian law already commands, and they should find such shelter that they might pray and sleep under a separate roof away from other people.

As people come to recognize and acknowledge their holy way of life, they will be so improved because of it that they shall give them willingly what they need in great love. They should also not dwell under the same roof with any widow. People should wash their calloused feet with great tenderness, and they should thank God profusely that they go forth and anoint misguided Christianity, just as Mary Magdalene did for our Lord.⁴⁸ They anoint them also, but only men should do it because they are not God.⁴⁹ When people notice that their clothing is worn out, they should give them new clothing. If someone freely wants to give them much, they should not accept it. Rather, they should advise people to give with compassion wherever it does some good.

Their general chapter meeting takes place twice a year for the good and benefit of Christianity: in summer in the woods, in winter in the town hall. Whoever wants to enter this order should himself have two books at hand. He shall preach from the larger book. The first thing that is written in this book is the Credo in deum,⁵⁰ and thereafter it is filled with learned sermons all ordered according to the articles of Christian faith. From the smaller book he shall recite to our Lord the hours of the Holy Office. The first master⁵¹ who will take up this way of life will be the son of the king of Rome. His name before God in German is Alleluia. The pope shall invest him with his immediate power. After that he shall himself choose and shall receive this way of life from the pope.⁵²

Then many important masters shall join him. They should not be younger than twenty-four years of age. They shall accept no one except those who are healthy and have had advanced studies. They must all be priests, confessors, and sound, well-qualified masters. The first master shall be called their prince and should be accompanied by three brothers, because the Christian faith shall undergo trials most frequently in his case. There should be one master for every thirteen of them. They shall call him their protector, and he should be accompanied by two brothers. Their power is very great, for no bishop is their equal. Wherever they go, they shall be authorized to preach, hear confessions, and sing and say mass. In each diocese there shall be seven of them, signifying the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit. In an archdiocese there shall be thirteen of them, signifying the holy convent of our Lord.⁵³ At Rome there shall be thirty of them, signifying the blessed selling that took place with Christ." The greatest number of them shall be in Jerusalem where Jesus suffered death for our sake. Their small chapter meeting shall be held every three weeks, signifying the complete union with the Holy Trinity; by five brothers, signifying the five wounds; or by seven, signifying the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit; and thereafter by as many as can gather together. Wherever they eat or drink, the oldest in the order shall speak for a while about Christ's deeds and his holy life, and the others should be silent.

I also saw their bed-how they should lie on straw between two white woolen blankets with a pillow under their head. This should be placed under the bottom blanket on the straw. Their loins shall never sit nor lie comfortably, for they shall be hardy all their days until their holy martyrdom, as was the case with Christ. However, if an old master who has served well, and because of age cannot practice austerity up until the end of the order, should become sick or weak, he should be bedded in comfort and lovingly cared for, because they are still capable of giving much holy advice. And they should also be given the best nourishment. This holy life shall continue in great tranquility for thirty years. During that time they shall so greatly illumine and instruct Christians that no one shall turn away from the Christian faith because of untutored simplicity.

Woe, thereafter calamity shall strike! The Antichrist shall come⁵⁵ and assume power over the secular princes by means of gold, precious stones, and unimaginable deceptive cunning, to which they are now so drawn. Hence they follow him quite happily and say that he is their god and lord, and they follow him in solemn procession, presenting him with their seal and proclamations. Alas, then he comes to the spiritual powers. There he also discovers greed and brings such great perverse wisdom that very few bishops, priors, and priests withstand him. But these blessed brothers shall put their life on the line and preach fervently the Christian faith. And they shall give true indulgence for all sins to all those who die in the Christian faith with true sorrow, so that they will be saved without purgatory. Because these pious brothers dealt with people in such a pious manner earlier, many a holy martyr among them shall triumph. Many Jews and some wise heathens shall receive holy baptism and the Christian faith from these brothers. This shall so enrage the Antichrist that he shall impose his stern prohibition and intense severe oppression upon all those who go to their sermons. Whoever then goes there and stands by them is certainly a blessed person.

Then tribulation begins. The good separate from the evil and risk their bodies and all that they have. The Antichrist's messengers arrive there and, first of all, stab the holy preacher with an iron pole because of his Christian faith. God's dear friend must hang there writhing in front of the children of God. Thus do they carry the holy man impaled between them for all the world to see. The evil ones laugh, the good weep. And he sings with the voice of the Holy Spirit: "Credo in deum," and he consoles and calls out: "Follow me, ye holy children of God!" All who then follow him are captured, have their eyes bound, are struck with scourges, and are driven like sheep being stolen to a place where a flood of water is passing by. There, their blessed heads are all chopped off and hurled into the water. Where there is no water, they are driven onto a field and martyred. God gives the evil ones the idea to bind the eyes of the good so that in their prison they may not see the great splendor, the enormous power and honor that the accursed ones have from their lord, the Antichrist. So may they the better persevere; for they, too, are just human, as are these. They take the dead blessed preacher and put him high up on the same place from which he spoke God's word and was martyred. Those who wish to preach there according to the Christian faith have to be living martyrs and great saints.

The Antichrist's power is so great that no one is his equal. When the pope can no longer do battle against him, he turns to the holy brothers and suffers what they suffer. Then Enoch and Elijah come to their aid.⁵⁶ They are now in sweet paradise, living there in both soul and body in the same bliss and eating the same food that had been given to Adam if he had remained there. They, too, in obedience to God, must avoid the same tree from which Eve and Adam ate the apple when they broke God's commandment. I have seen this tree. It is not large, and its fruit is outwardly quite lovely and desirable like a rose; but under the surface it is by nature very sour. That signifies the bitter harm of sin, which God never intended for man. Because this fruit is so detrimental for a noble person that it is still poison for us, God has put his prohibition on it, for he never wanted to cause human beings distress.

In this final agony, after these blessed brothers have consoled the simple folk until no good person is left who has not suffered a martyr's death, most of these brothers will be still alive. Though innocent, their suffering is so great and their prayers so holy, that God then sends Enoch and Elijah to them, who console them and lead them out of the woods so that they might go preach again and prepare for death. These two lords, who then come from paradise, are so wise in divine truth that by their might they turn the Antichrist around and drive him off. They tell him clearly who he is, from what power his emblems derive, how he has gotten where he is, and what sort of end he shall have. When the perverted ones hear what a pitiful god had been given them because of their great greed and because of their lust for the many kinds of evil that God sees in their hearts, then many a noble man and many a fair woman among Christians who had followed the Antichrist are converted. And so these blessed must be martyred, for then the Antichrist is given supreme power on earth. He commands that all the men be rounded up so that he can test their Christian faith. On the streets red-hot griddles are made ready to which they are then driven all together. Their wives and fair children are summoned. Then they are commanded to choose: whether, by denying their faith, they prefer to keep their lovely wives and dear children, their riches and honor or, by keeping their Christian faith, they are willing to cook on the griddles and lose their lives. The men say: "Oh, dear wives and children, do not think about me; remember rather that you are Christians and offer your bodies to God. Then we shall not be separated."

Then the men are bound hand and foot and are thrown onto the griddles. The women and children say: "Lord Jesus, Child of Mary, for love of you we gladly want to suffer the same torment."

Then a pit filled with fire is made ready. The children and the mothers are hurled into it, and firewood and straw are heaped upon them. Thus are they burned to death.

An angel accompanies Enoch and Elijah from paradise. The radiance and bliss that show on their bodies shall always be preserved. When they behold the earth, they shudder, as men do who look upon the sea and wonder in fear how they are going to get across it. Then they" receive earthly appearances and, as a result, become human beings who are mortal. They eat honey and figs and drink water mixed with wine, and their spirits also receive sustenance from God.

28. The Fivefold Power of Love. Because of the Weakness of People and the Treachery of the World One Must Remain Silent About the Truth

This book was begun in love, it shall also end in love; for nothing is as wise or as holy or as beautiful or as strong or as perfect as love. Our Lord Jesus Christ said: "Speak, Father; I shall now be silent as you are silent in the mouth of your Son, angered because of the weakness of people. Just so did my humanity speak trembling at the treachery of the world; for it rewarded me with bitter death."

Book V

1. Three Kinds of Sorrow, Ten Kinds of Benefits, and the Path of Angels and Devils

There are three kinds of sorrow by which the sinner conforms himself again to the seal that was inscribed on the cross when sins crushed us. The first is sorrow for guilt, which has three qualities: bitterness in the heart out of which the sin flowed; shame in the senses that took pleasure in the sin; a clear image of the life in which the person became evil. This sorrow reconciles the sinful soul to the heavenly Father and frees her from the eternal pains of hell. The second is sorrow of penance, which also has three qualities: intense striving and constant aspiration and pure victory over all temptations. This sorrow completely frees the sinner from purgatory. The third is sorrow out of love, for it is true to God alone. It considers an insult to God much more serious than harm to itself or its own interior suffering. Also, it would rather go body and soul to hell than sadden its lover with a serious sin. This sorrow out of love makes people on earth holy and perfect, and raises them up before God in heaven. When the blessed soul is in such a state, God is dearer to her than she is to herself, and sin is her most serious regret.

The blessed person who has these three kinds of sorrow receives the honor here on earth that God lets his fiery spirit shine forth unceasingly from his Holy Trinity into this loving soul, just like a bright sunbeam shining forth from the hot sun lights up a new golden shield. The radiant light of God and the loving soul that so delightfully sparkles forth from both of them has such great power and shines so brightly for all who are in heaven, purgatory, and hell that the highest angels, Cherubim and Seraphim, feel an intimate closeness to the loving soul, and in this same light, on fire with boundless love, they descend to the soul as it flames with love.' That is the path of the noble princes² to the pampered soul in this poor body, for the angel and the loving soul are from God a whole nature in their innate chastity and in the fire of love in the Seraphim. But acquired chastity, adorned and illuminated with the flowing fire of divine love, beams forth downward into the Cherubim.' Toward them in turn fiery bright joys of love burst forth from the Seraphim, for they⁴ are on fire with love. This is why the exquisite radiance travels down, causing them⁵ to flash with love. The angels that are given to us in baptism cannot tend this burning love, for God has not given them the heat. Rather, they are given to us to cultivate our virtue; and their noble presence and our best free will sanctify all our actions and drive the devil's cunning and power away from our five senses. But the great fiery radiance that lights up everything, as it descends from the Holy Trinity into the loving soul, strikes such fear into the devils that they dare not pass through this holy ray. Because of it they suffer much humiliation. The paths that God has allowed them in the air-these can be taken from them by an earthly human being through union with God. They can freely travel over those paths where evil wants them to be. But where they sense a loving soul in a body, they must pass by under the earth. Also, they cannot foul the air where they find those blessed who truly live free of serious sin. All the sins they bring to us they must always begin on earth. As we then ascend to God with our Christian faith in our best strivings, they lose all their power and must hasten away from us.

2. Two Kinds of Suffering, Four Kinds of Benefits, and the Manifold Host of Sins

I thank God for all goodness and I find fault with myself the while I live, for God does not punish without a reason. As long as a person has the ability to sin, he needs suffering as well as virtues. That suffering is very profitable which a person inflicts upon himself for the love of God after seeking counsel. But that suffering is much nobler and more useful which God inflicts upon us by means of his enemies or his friends, since he is nobler than all tormentors. Christ did not redeem us with the pain that he inflicted upon himself; rather, he taught us how we should serve him in toil and suffering. But he redeemed us with the suffering that his enemies inflicted upon him, despite his innocence, and with his woeful, shameful death, when no one remained his faithful friend except one maiden: Mary, his mother, was truly inwardly united to him, as she outwardly remained there standing near him.

As I, in my disloyalty, was being ill-tempered because of my suffering, God gave me this consolation and said: "Look, no one can do without suffering because it purifies a person of his many sins from hour to hour." Alas, I saw such a huge and frightening host of sins of all kinds following us, as though all the mountains, all stones, every drop of rain, all grass, trees, greenery, and sand were all living persons and were trying to crush us so that we would never ascend to God. Alas, for the pitiful mote sins that we cannot express in words; for them that suffering is visited upon us here which we carry secretly on our wretched body. Second, the bitterness of suffering protects us from a future fall, which often causes a pure heart to tremble, though it carries enclosed within it God's spirit. Third, the nobility of suffering makes us worthy to receive God's favor; for if I receive all my comfort, my necessities, and my earthly consolation with fear, with dread, and with a lonely heart, then God is present with his consolation.

3. God Shall Weigh All Innocent Suffering and Also the Blood of Three Kinds of People

On the last day, Christ Jesus shall hold aloft a glorious scale before his Father. Upon it will lie his holy toil and his innocent suffering, and in it and next to it all the blameless torment, humiliation, and interior pain that was ever suffered by human beings for the love of Christ. Indeed, when the right side of the scales sinks, those rejoice the most who have much upon it. The blood of virgins by its nature, the blood martyrs shed for their Christian faith, and other blood spilled through killing but shed in innocence during justified self-defense: this is what the holy Son of God shall weigh together with his blood, because it was poured out in true innocence. Marriage blood is not put onto the scale. Why? It is beforehand impure, but it extinguishes that very sin that arises from carnal knowledge.⁶

4. The Power of Marvelous Love Is Manifold; How the Soul Sinks. Four Kinds of Humility. The Sevenfold Beauty of the Loving Soul

O wondrous Love of God, you possess great sacred power, you illumine the soul, teach the senses, and bestow full strength on all virtues. Fortunate am I, poor village maid, that I ever beheld you, dear Lady. O Love, you are full of delight and worthy of praise in all your acts. This is what I experience in my soul. All virtues are your subjects. But sinking humility that has not been fouled with arrogance in spirituality, and chastity-innate or acquired, that are both completely pure-these two virtues must accompany love, though they are subject to her.

This love passes through the senses and storms the soul with all its might. All the while that love grows in the soul, it ascends to God longingly and, richly flowing, opens up to receive the wonder that is approaching. It dissolves through the soul into the senses. Then does the body gain its share, so that it is refined with respect to all things.

Can someone who loves God have evil habits? Nowhere do I find this to be the case; such great power does genuine love of God have. And yet the soul is never so utterly flooded with divine love that she is not often tempted by earthly things. This love a soul can never receive that is riddled with false love. When love has grown to ripeness in the soul, it has also ascended as far as is humanly possible. For love is limited in its capacity. If it did not have a limit, alas, sweet God, how many a pure heart would burst in sweet bliss.

When the soul in her pursuit of love and the great longing of her God-stalking heart has ascended the lofty mountain of powerful love and beautiful knowledge, she acts like the pilgrim who has climbed mountains with great zest but then climbs down the other side in great fear, so that he does not take a tumble. Just so, when the soul has been permeated by the radiant heat of long love and has thus become faint in the embrace of the Holy Trinity, she begins to sink and to cool, as does the sun when it descends from its highest point and sinks down into the night. God knows, this is what happens to the soul and also to the body. The soul, rich in love, sinks downward under the pull of profound humility and constantly retreats from what God does to her out of love. This is very agreeable to her because of her noble nature, which God and she fill to the same single end. Also, she turns the eye of her desire from all things in order to be able to gain much praise for God. The body, too, sinks far down when it serves its enemy,' obeys without complaint, and avoids its friends to God's honor. The soul sinks deeper still because she has more strength than the body. She sinks with great zeal to the lowest place that God holds in his power. Oh, how dare I name this place for those who know nothing of sinking humility.

First humility is external, having to do with one's dwelling place and clothes-that they are proper, are tailored to a religious cut, and yet are clean. Second humility has to do with conduct in the company of others-that it is lovingly attuned to all needs and in all things. Out of this grows the holy love of God. Third humility has to do with the senses-that a person make proper use of them in all things and love in the right amount. Fourth humility dwells in the soul. This is sinking humility, which performs many a sweet marvel in the love-rich soul. It chases her up into heaven and drags her down again into the abyss. It leads the soul to all creatures one by one and says: "Now look, all this is better than you are!" And it brings her then to the spot where she can go no further: under Lucifer's tail.' If, in her desire to honor God as she would want, she could remain there, she would prefer nothing better. So tightly is the poor love-rich soul bound by humble love that she feels no fear or shame except in the temperate way one is accustomed to fear in heaven.' But the poor body must feel both fear and shame because of the darkness of its heart and the weakness of its external senses, because it has not yet been transformed by death.

The soul, on the other hand, is just as beautiful in her body as she is in heaven, but she is not as secure.
She is just as bold but she is not as strong.
She is just as powerful but she is not as constant.
She is just as lovely but she is not as happy.
She is just as generous but she is not as rich.
She is just as holy but she is not as innocent.
She is just as content but she is not as full.
That soul alone is satisfied which is here flooded with the humble love of God.

When she has thus ascended to those heights possible for her while she is still attached to the body and has sunk to the deepest point that she can find, then she is fully grown in virtues and holiness. Then she shall be adorned with the suffering of long waiting.

Then she goes to wait faithfully
And looks upon all things with great wisdom;
Nothing can escape her;
She makes it all yield its praise to God.

5. The Purgatory of a Beguine Whom No Prayer Helped Because of Her Selfishness

Woe, Sin, you are so destructive since even holy works that one performs without counsel are very destructive if one speaks thus: "No, I am beyond the need for human counsel. I intend to live according to God's counsel." I always shudder at these words because no person in any situation can humble himself to better advantage than by following Christian counsel with an obedient heart. This became clear to me in the case of a woman who loved our Lord from her heart and cherished this love with such superhuman exertion that her nature shriveled up and she died. As is the Christian custom, I prayed for her. In a rapture of my spirit I saw her spirit, which was in itself bright as the sun. This came from the faithful love in her pure heart. She was surrounded by great darkness and urgently desired to reach eternal light. Whenever she was ascending, dark night always blocked her. This was her selfish will refusing counsel that so utterly held this person back.

I asked her: "How can one help you?"

She replied: "While on earth I never wanted to follow anyone's advice given according to Christian custom. Because of this no one's prayer or desire can be of help to me."

So I turned to our dear Lord and asked him how it could be that a person could be delivered over to suffering who, while on earth, has assumed so much holy suffering out of love for him.

Our Lord said: "All virtues are worthless to me that come about apart from counsel; for I came to earth because of counsel." And I served my Father and all men on earth with great submission, and then I ascended into heaven in complete freedom. But in what I always did, no one follows me. The longing, prayer, and all the effort that one expends on her on earth shall adorn her when she ascends to heaven."

The soul: "Everything that is given to us as a help on our path to heaven is rightfully ours. But once we arrive there, it is shared by the souls. This God does for us for our own good, so that they might more readily come and help us praise God in eternal glory."

In justice, her suffering was to last seventeen years, but God's mercy reduced it to seventeen months because she had acted out of such intense love. May God help us to right moderation! Amen.

6. How the Soul Praises the Holy Trinity

Lord Jesus Christ, you have flowed spiritually out of the heart of your eternal Father from eternity and were born in the flesh from a pure and untouched virgin, St. Mary, and are with your Father one spirit, one will, one wisdom, one power, one superior might over everything that ever was, forever!

Lord, eternal Father, I, too, the most unworthy of all human beings, have flowed forth spiritually from your heart and, Lord Jesus Christ, was born in the flesh from your side and, Lord God and Man, I have been purified by the Spirit of you both. Thus do I, poor despondent human being, speak:

“Lord, heavenly Father, you are my heart.
Lord Jesus Christ, you are my body.
Lord Holy Spirit, you are my breath.
Lord, Holy Trinity, you are my only refuge and my eternal rest!”

7. How God Praises the Soul in Return

You are a solid foundation for my divine flowing.
You are a glory of virginal constancy.
You are a flower of sublime delight.
You are a vanquisher of devils.
You are a mirror of inward contemplation.

8. A Good Person Should Have Three Children for Whom to Pray

No one knows what consolation or suffering or longing is unless he is touched by these three himself. I am seeking help because I am sorely afflicted. I have three children that I see suffering great distress.

The first child is poor sinners who lie in eternal death. There is nothing to console them with except that they have a living human body." Alas, I look at the child with a bloody heart and I take it into the arms of my soul with weeping eyes and carry it before the feet of its Father from whom I got it. Then I look at the child and beg its faithful Father, Jesus, that he awaken this child with the same voice of his divine mercy with which he awakened Lazarus.¹²

To this God replies: "I shall heal the sickness of this child. If it does not again succumb to this death, it shall be like me in my beauty, in my nobility, and in my abundance, surrounded and permeated by all bliss in eternal everlastingness. Arise, my dear child, you are healed! Free will I have given you and shall never take it away, for according to it all your dignity shall be measured, like that of the saints, in the beautiful kingdom of heaven." Alas, this child still lies motionless upon its own selfish will.

My second child: these are the poor souls who are tormented in purgatory; to them I must give my heart's blood to drink. When I pray for them and see the many kinds of distress and the bitter thirst that they suffer in a specific manner for each sin, then I suffer the pain of a mother. And yet I am happy that they suffer torment for their real guilt to the glory of God. They accept their suffering with great patience because they see all their guilt clearly. They suffer their pain with acquired wisdom and drink into themselves much interior suffering. If this child is to recover soon, its mother has to be very faithful and merciful.

My third child: these are the imperfect in religious life. When I look upon all my sick children, for none do I feel more distress than for this one because, alas, it has so completely estranged itself from heavenly things through its external preoccupation with transitory things that it has utterly lost its noble way of life and its sweet intimacy with God, to which God had drawn it by especially choosing it. Because of this they become so completely disoriented that no one can turn them around with words. And so they revile the interior life, pervert God's sweetness, and maliciously interpret everything they see and hear, as well. Thus they appear wise outwardly but unfortunately are all fools inwardly. This child has the worst chance of recovery because it is the first to slip into stubborn contentiousness, then into indolence, then into false consolation, then into despair, and then, alas, it loses all grace. And so this poor child creeps along in its sinful existence till its end. Thus it is very doubtful indeed which direction this confused soul will take.

9. Concerning the Glory of Seventy Men Who Arose with Christ as Testimony

On the glorious day of Easter, when our redemption was so clearly made manifest and Jesus Christ arose in such might and left his grave in such majesty that the Jews and the heathens lost their power and all their honor and true Christians were blessed by the Father's good will, were made fortunate by the power of the Son, and were made holy evermore by the teaching of the Holy Spirit: on that day seventy men arose together with our Lord. They had been obedient to God's commands when they fought God's fight. They were found to be just when they were tempted and, in their great thirst, they splashed water with their hands to their mouth. Their souls were joined again by God to their bodies but in such a way that one could clearly tell that they had been dead.'

But the sinful human juice that Adam bit from the apple, that still courses through all our members because of our nature and, in addition, the cursed blood that originated in the apple for Eve and all women-that was not given back to them because their transformation was supposed to be a divine testimony with God that eternal death was dead. They were no longer subject to death because they did not have in themselves these two things.' Their soul separated from their body without pain or suffering. Their bodies lie in beauty above the air and above the stars. Because they did not die a second time in a human manner, their bodies did not need to be buried on earth.

Adam, and all men with him, retained this juice. Eve and all women kept this shameful blood. This alone it is that by nature torments our flesh and our senses, and ultimately has to die bitterly within us. For after Adam's fall the only affliction Jesus Christ took from us was eternal death and he ordained that, through sorrow, we might come back. He did, however, give us very much sweet consolation, counsel, and teaching through which we might easily recover from all our debilities.

10. How Sin Is Like God's Greatness

The greatness of almighty God is similar to nothing as much as it is to the sinful immensity of my wickedness.

11. A Religious Name Shall Be Exalted. Concerning the Conduct of Sisters. How They Should Pray and Toil with God

O religious Name,¹⁵ how noble you are above all earthly names. For this reason Jesus Christ himself wanted to bear you so faithfully his whole life that all lofty names-king, emperor, count, and all names that are named for nobility-must decay; but a religious name alone shall be exalted to the extent that it has been here nobly borne. Indeed, it shall be wonderfully, especially, and in sanctity raised up near Brother Jesus and Sister Mary, who were the very first always to bear a religious name, suffering outwardly such great contempt but with such holiness inwardly. This is very much contrary to those people who here with much ostentation adorn themselves spiritually with holy bearing and deep bowing, and drape themselves in public in beautiful words that one might well imagine that inwardly they possess the flood of the Holy Spirit which is causing it all to come gushing forth. No, unfortunately it is sometimes a very cunning temptation that causes a person to assume out of self-will that, without effort and without striving, he has a good name; and yet he does not feel in his heart the full birth of the Holy Spirit. This comes clearly to light when he turns into a fierce bear and a roaring lion in the presence of his closest companions, when he should be a lamb as to meekness and a dove as to virtues. Thus their life before the world is a sham, and before God and their equals a very damaging lie.

Woe to you, most wretched Lust, how my heart is enraged by you! For you rob my dear sisters of their inward sweetness of God and the outward loveliness that should be preparing them and leading them to the holy bridal bed of the Holy Trinity. You make them so hard inwardly and so indignant outwardly that one cannot utter a spiritual word in their presence without their immediately twisting it.

No, dear Sister, before all else you must have an open mind. Then you will get an obliging heart and an open soul into which grace can flow. If you expand too much your basic needs without reason or necessity, truly you shall never have a share in the heights of holy longing, the breadth of divine feeling, and the depths of God's flowing sweetness. It is an eternal shame and an extreme crudity that a king's bride so much enjoys wallowing in muck.

Ah, Sister, if you are to pray as you should, surrender yourself to God completely and say: "Dear intimate Friend, Jesus, this hour belongs to you alone, to poor sinners, to Holy Christianity, and to distressed souls, but not to me. All power and strength of my heart I give you today, Lord, that you, my Love, to your own praise might come to their aid in accordance with my desire; and grant me thereafter, Lord, that I really know who I myself am. Then I shall really be downcast."

But, dear Sister, when you go to your work, bless yourself and say: "Lord, this hour belongs to you and me. Help me, Jesus, Love of my heart, that I may burrow my soul and my mind so deeply into you that earthly desire may not devour me." Indeed, Sister, if you are just humanly wise, desire will attack you fiercely. But if your wisdom comes from grace, no evil can seduce you or betray you. For in that grace which flows forth from the Holy Trinity into a heart that remains ever open to heaven, one finds truth and good judgment in all things. It is quite easy to seem good to people. But if truth is absent, you are snake's venom. Make your heart ever pure within and be humble outwardly. Then you are one with God.

12. How God Responds to a Brother Concerning What Is Written in This Book"

Master Heinrich, you are surprised at some of the words that are written in this book. I am surprised that you can be surprised at this. Indeed, ever since I, sinful woman, have been required to write, it has been a matter of great distress to me in my heart that I am able to describe this authentic knowledge and these holy sublime contemplations to no one except through these words. They seem to me, compared to eternal truth, all too feeble.

I asked the eternal Master what he had to say about this. He replied: "Ask him how it happened that the apostles, after having been so timid, became so bold when they received the Holy Spirit." Ask also where Moses was when he saw nothing but God.' Then ask as well how it happened that Daniel spoke in childhood.'"

13. Ten Kinds of Benefit a Good Person's Prayer Has

That prayer has great power
Which a person undertakes with all his might.
It makes a bitter heart sweet
A sad heart happy
A poor heart rich
A foolish heart wise
A faltering heart bold
A weak heart strong
A blind heart seeing
A cold soul burning.
It draws great God down into a small heart.
It drives the hungry soul up to God's fullness.
It brings together two lovers, God and the soul, to a place of bliss.
There they talk much of love.
O woe! That I, unhappy sack of misery, cannot die there!

14. The Purgatory of Bad Priests

It has been a long time since I saw purgatory. It was like fiery water and boiled like fiery bell metal. Above it was a cloak of murky fog. In the water fish were floating about that had human form. These were the souls of wretched priests who in this world floated in greedy desires and burned in damned lust that so utterly blinds them that they are unable to love anything good. Upon the water were fishermen who had neither boats nor nets. Instead, they fished with their fiery claws because they actually were spirits and devils. When they brought them to the shore, they cruelly tore their skins off and threw them right into a boiling pot. Then they jabbed them with fiery pitchforks. When they decided they were well done, they gobbled them with their beaks. Then the devils went back out on the water, expelled them from under their tails, and then fished for them, boiled them, and devoured them again.

15. The Purgatory of a Good Priest

A pure priest died in his own assigned parish. I prayed for him, as one Christian is accustomed to do for another. Then my soul saw him in marvelous honor, as he was yet in the state of waiting for heavenly glory. Four angels led him across the storms in the first heaven and plucked harps with heavenly strings for his enjoyment. This was the purgatory by which they prepared him for heavenly bliss. I asked him how he had gained this special honor.

He said: "On earth I loved solitude and was fearful only in my prayers."

I said: "Ah, most blessed Man, why did you not ascend right to heaven with these delightful angels?"

He replied thus: "The glory that I am to receive because of my pure priestly life is so great that I cannot yet enter into it."

16. It Is Diabolical to Sin

Some people who are learned say it is human to sin. In every temptation of my sinful body, in every movement of my heart, in every bit of knowledge of my senses, and in the whole nobility of my soul, I could never find anything else but that it is diabolical that one commit a sin. Whether the sin be small or great, the devil is always its companion. Indeed, it is the devilishness that we take upon ourselves through our selfish free will that is much more harmful to us than our whole human nature. This is human: hunger, thirst, heat, frost, pain, grief, temptation, sleep, weariness. These are the things that Christ, who was true man, bore upon his person because of us and with us. Indeed, if sin were purely human, then he should have sinned, too. For he was true man in the flesh, a just man in wisdom, a man steadfast in virtue, and a perfect man in the Holy Spirit. Beyond that he was eternal God in eternal Truth and not a sinner. But if we are to become like him, we also have to live like him or be saved by sorrow.²⁰

17. This Is a Greeting, Praise, and Prayer of a Sinner²¹

Greetings to you, living God.
You are mine before all things.
I am endlessly glad
That I can speak to you without guile.
When my enemies pursue me,
I flee to your arms
Where I can complain about my suffering
While you incline yourself to me.
You well know how you can pluck
The strings of my soul.
Ah, begin at once

That you may be ever blessed.
I am a low-born bride;
And yet you are my lawful husband.
I shall ever rejoice about this.
Remember how well you can caress
The pure soul on your lap
And do it, Lord, to me now,
Even though I am not worthy of you.
Ah, Lord, draw me up to you.
Then I shall be pure and radiant.
If you abandon me to myself,
I shall remain dark and sluggish.

18. How God Responds to This

Thus does God answer:

"I respond to your greeting with such a heavenly flood:
Were I to give myself to you in all my power,
You would not preserve your human life.
You well know I must hold back my might
And hide my splendor

To let you remain in earthly misery
Until all my sweetness rises up
To the heights of eternal glory,
And my strings shall play sweetly for you
In tune with the true value of your patient love.
Still, before I begin,
I want to tune my heavenly strings in your soul,
So that you might persevere even longer.
For well-born brides and noble knights
Must undergo a long and intensive preparation at great cost.”

19. How Seventeen Kinds of Sin Pursue a Person

These things drive a person so far from God that he can never come back to God unless great force is exerted upon him by the Holy Trinity.

Vanity is the first sin that begins to chase a person away from God;
And if we don't leave it, then lust rises up;
But if we don't leave lust, then greed rises up;
If we don't leave that, then sloth rises up;
If we don't leave that, then lying rises up;
And if we don't leave that, then perjury rises up;
If we don't leave that, then anger rises up;
And if we don't leave that, then slander rises up;
If we don't leave that, then pride rises up;
And if we don't leave that, then hatred rises up;
And if we don't leave that, then vengeance rises up;
And if we don't leave that, then despair rises up;
If we don't leave that, then insolence rises up;
If we don't leave that, then shamelessness rises up;
If we don't leave that, perverted wisdom rises up;
If we don't leave that, unbelief rises up and says: “It is not as they say.”

Alas, they then receive all things coming from God with such distrust that one scarcely dares say anything at all to them. And what they produce themselves is so twisted and utterly shot through with lies that, alas, no one can find the Holy Spirit in their words. But sometimes they act in a praiseworthy manner. Unfortunately it is deceptive.

Perfect soul, rejoice.
You alone are like God.
This is indeed fitting;
For you drink in with godlike patience
Many a bitter draught though guiltless.

You are often saddened by your enemy like hell's frost on heaven's flowers. Yet they go on blooming, exalted in their noble beauty. For through the Holy Spirit the root of their constancy is green in all seasons.

20. Praise of God in Eight Things. An Offering for Sins

O great dew of the noble Godhead,
O tender flower of the sweet maiden,
O beneficial fruit of the fair blossom,
O holy sacrifice of the heavenly Father,
O faithful pledge of redemption for the whole world!
You, Lord, are my refreshment
And I am your blossoming.
You are small before me, Lord, in your submissiveness,
And I am great before you in the misery of my wickedness.
Daily I offer you whatever I have:
Nothing but baseness.
And you, Lord, shall infuse me with your grace.
Then I can flow from your love.

21. Why Man Is Rejected and Yet Loved, and How You Should Bless Yourself

Thus does the mind of a person speak who has experienced truth: Lord, my body has been killed through the elimination of all wickedness. That is why your enemies have cast me from their presence like a dead man who smells foul. And yet, Lord, my soul is alive in you. That is why I am loved by your friends. Ah, Bridegroom dear to my heart, my sweet Jesus Christ, I bless myself unceasingly in my heart before all earthly things and I beg you that you keep me untouched by them; for no matter how holy they are, they draw me away from you at the highest point. That I cannot bear, and that is why I must creep away from them.

22. The Seven Things of Judgment; Shame and Good Will

The noblest joy of the senses, the holiest peace of heart, and the greatest delight in doing come from keeping one's integrity in all that one does. Our dear Lord speaks about this and teaches me seven things that all the blessed shall have about them who shall preside over the last judgment with Jesus Christ.²² Whoever does not have these things shall stand before the court like a sold servant before his master. For all who here struggle against God's truth on the side of crafty lying sell off these virtues.

The first is: to be just in the present life. This means: if I see my friend treating God's enemy and mine unjustly, then I should in loyalty reprove my friend and in charity help my enemy. The second is: to be merciful in distress. Explanation: if I see my friend and my enemy in equal distress, I should help both equally. The third is: to be faithful in public. Explanation: I should never scold my companion except for his unrepented sins. The fourth is: to be ready to help in secret. Explanation: that one search out and inquire where the lonely, sick, and prisoners are; and that one soothe them with words and bid them tell you their secret distress, so that you might be able to come to their aid. Woe to those who pass by those who are sick and alone without groans, tears, or any sign of compassion. How ill that befits those in religious life and, alas, drives them so far from God that they immediately lose sweet intimacy with God; yet they do not want to believe that God's judgment has struck. The fifth is: to be silent in distress. Explanation: that one not speak those reckless words that arise out of an arrogant and angry heart. If one so refrains, one shall find unfathomable favor with God. The sixth is: to be full of the truth. Explanation: that person is genuinely full of the truth whose heart, to the best of his knowledge, reproaches him with not the slightest wrongdoing and who is glad that God's eye sees into his heart, and who would not need to feel ashamed anywhere, even if everyone looked into his heart. The seventh is: to be the enemy of lies. Explanation: that we reproach lies in everyone and we do not cover them up in our own case.

These seven things we should practice and accomplish against the desires of our miserable flesh and against lust and the weakness of the human senses. We can accomplish them in no other way.

But the nobility of our soul gives us the first counsel for all good things with God's true sweetness; however, our perverted flesh in its baseness neglects many a godlike deed. Whenever we remember the blessed hour when God so skillfully created us out of the infinite depths of his heart, and out of his wisdom and out of his cheerful disposition, which pours out in all its goodness without surcease, and out of his sweet mouth-spiritually into our soul, with wisdom into our mind, with benefit to our body, then we must outwardly be ashamed of our evil habits and inwardly of our fickle heart. We should also, alas, be consciously ashamed that with so little benefit we bear the noble and numerous gifts of God, that they return such puny fruit to the place from which they flowed out.²³ Good will brings all virtues to their rightful place, even when the body is incapable of the deeds.

23. St. Mary's Prayer, Gabriel's Light, the Child's Blanket, Where the Milk Came from, the Gifts for the Child, the Devils, and the Hunger Cloth

I saw a maiden at her prayer. Her body was bowed to the earth and her spirit had raised itself toward the eternal Godhead; for before the time when Jesus Christ opened heaven with the key of the holy cross, no human being was so holy that his spirit could or would ascend to the eternal heights by striving and soaring, by longing and embrace with the love of the Holy Trinity. This is why the spirit of the pure virgin was not able to enter heaven because Adam had shoved the bolt shut so fast. But God inclined himself at times so close to the earth that he consoled his friends and they perceived his will. And the prophets cried out and entreated our Lord to come down. But it was this virgin who drew our Lord down here with the sweet voice of her soul; and she said in her prayer when she was alone: "Lord God, I am happy that you intend to come in such a noble manner that a maiden shall be your mother. Lord, I want to serve in this with my chasteness and with all that I have from you."

Then the angel Gabriel strode down here in a heavenly light. The light surrounded the virgin all around, and the angel wore garments the likes of which I never discovered anywhere on earth. When she glimpsed the light with the eyes of the flesh, she arose and was frightened. Looking at the angel she discovered in his face the same chasteness that she had. She stood there with great composure, inclined her ear, and raised up her mind. Then the angel greeted her and announced God's will to her. His words were pleasing to her heart; her senses became full and her soul fiery. But still she asked for clarification. Her maidenly modesty and divine love moved her to do so. When she had been instructed, she opened her heart willingly with all her might. She knelt down and said: "I surrender myself to God's service according to your words."²⁴

Then the whole Holy Trinity, with the power of the Godhead, the good will of its humanity, and the noble delicacy of the Holy Spirit, passed through her whole virginal body into the fiery soul of her devout will, placed itself in the open heart of her most pure flesh, and united itself with all that it found in her, so that her flesh became its flesh in such a manner that a perfect child grew in her body and she became a true mother of his flesh, while remaining an unblemished virgin. The longer she carried him, the more radiant, beautiful, and wise she became. Then she arose and said: "Lord Father, I praise you because you have made me great, and my family shall become great in heaven and on earth."²⁵

When the time had come, when other women are sad and move about with difficulty, Mary was agile and cheerful. And yet her body was quite swollen because she had within it the fully developed Son of God. Mary did not know in advance when God wanted to be born of her until she saw him in her lap on the road on that night in Bethlehem-in a strange town where she herself was a poor homeless guest. The almighty Father with his wisdom, the eternal Son with his human truth, the Holy Spirit with his delicate sweetness passed through the intact wall of Mary's body with blissful ease and without any effort. It had happened just as quickly as when the sun in loving calm sends forth its light upon the sweet dew.

When Mary gazed at her fair child, she inclined her head to his face and said: "Welcome, my innocent Child and mighty Lord, all things are yours." At the conception of our Lord, while his mother was expecting, at his birth, and while he was on the lap of his mother before being placed in the crib, the power of the Holy Trinity and the blissful celestial fire in Mary were so intense that the spirit of hell, which travels about the whole world and knows everything that happens to all things, was not able to approach closely enough to the land and place where Mary was to learn of the miraculous way the Child had gotten there.

Mary took a coarse blanket from Joseph's saddle-one that the donkey had on his back under the saddle-and the upper part of her shift under which she had carried our Lord. The other part she tied around her body again. The delicate virgin wrapped the hardy Savior in this blanket and laid him in the crib. Then he immediately began to cry like a newborn child. As long as babies are unable to speak, they never cry except to express a real need. This is just what our Lord did when, despite his noble nature, he was put to bed in a cowshed because of base sin. He wept for all humankind, hiding all his happiness and all his power. The virgin was sad, and the Child was hungry and cold.

Then the mother had to nurse her Son. This was his Father's will and the Holy Spirit's pleasure. In maternal love, with maidenly bearing, the virgin bent down to her afflicted child and offered him her youthful breast. Now hear of the marvel! The bright blossoming of her fair eyes, the spiritual beauty of her maidenly countenance, the sweetness flowing from her pure heart, and the delightful sparkle of her noble soul: these four things drew together according to the will of the Father, the need of the Son, and the delight of the Holy Spirit in her maidenly breast. And sweet milk flowed forth from her pure heart without any pain. The Child suckled like a human child and his mother rejoiced in a holy manner. The angels sang to God a hymn of praise. The shepherds came and found for all to see our true pledge of redemption in a crib belonging to another.

Then I asked Mary where Joseph was. She said: "He has gone into town and is buying us some small fish and plain bread." Water is what they drank. Then I said: "Lady, you should be eating the very best bread and drinking the finest wine." "No," she said, "that is the food of rich people. We don't have any of that in this poor life."

When the strange star appeared, Satan, too, came to Bethlehem and cunningly followed the three kings; and he gazed with much malice at the Child.

As they were offering the Child great honor with expensive gifts, Satan's thoughts became very confused and he said this to himself: "Poor wretch, what is happening to you now? This could well be the same child of whom the prophets have written, whom your master Lucifer so long and so often put in your charge-that you should come to his birth and make it impure. Then the whole world would remain subject to hell. This child was begotten and born without sin. Otherwise, it would not have been hidden from me. Now all my wiles have been lost. Now I will have to return to my master and lament to him my distress, for this child is going to be too much for us. If it is going to climb above us, how are we supposed to put up with that? Never was any child born who was given such honor."

When Lucifer heard this news, the archfiend sat there gnashing his teeth and shrieking, and the fire of his wrath lit up all of hell. He spoke: "If a human being is to be judge over us, we shall have to tremble evermore before all men who live according to his will. Go back again, Satan, and get the help of the princes of the land, the teachers of the Jews, and teach them how to kill him while he is still a child before he goes to school."

When Satan came to Herod, he discovered Lucifer's likeness in this evil man: hate, pride, greed. On these three paths the great devil proceeded into his bulky heart and spread out into all his five senses and made the king so murderous that he carried out the devil's will on innocent children, who are now glorious saints in heaven.

I asked Mary what she had done with the gifts²⁶ since she did not buy a sacrificial lamb.²⁷ She said: "Sacred flowing generosity, mercy to those in distress, and the love of voluntary poverty took this treasure from me. My sacrificial lamb was Jesus Christ, the Son of God almighty, who was born out of my heart and whom, according to the decree of his Father, all immaculate lambs signify who were ever brought for sacrifice in honor according to his Father's intention. He is my true sacrificial lamb; I was to have no other. The offerings that were brought to my Child I used to remember all those whom I found truly to be in need. These were poor orphans, and pure virgins who were thereby able to marry and not be stoned.²⁸ Also, those who were alone and ill, and those far advanced in age: these were supposed to have the advantage of it, and God intended it for them. But thirty marks of gold were left over after I soothed the distress of these poor. These I was supposed to give for a hunger cloth to which the common people went for their prayer; for there were many symbols pictured on it."²⁹

The cloth was half black and half white. On the north side in the temple the cloth was black. This signified the long-lasting darkness during the old law.³⁰ Upon it were embroidered green images; for although the old law was darkened by many serious sins, yet there were some people during that time who did not shrivel up from their sins; rather, they were dark because of the legalistic observances. All the pictures showed the guilt and distress that so greatly moved mighty God to preserve Noah the just man and his household and let the whole world perish. On the south in the prayer house the cloth was splendidly white. This was a sign of the pure radiant chastity of St. Mary, through which we all should still overcome all the sufferings of our hearts. Upon it were embroidered pictures in gold, likenesses of the birds that Noah sent forth from the ark, which were recognized as signifying the faithless greedy ones who seek all their comfort here on earth. Also embroidered there was the pure dove with the green branch who, guiltless of this, came back again, who did not take the carrion flesh into its mouth. This signifies those who day after day approach God with new virtues and keep themselves steadfastly flying on course toward heaven, drawn by the Holy Spirit.

All the way down the middle, where the pieces came together, was a stripe of gold. Through the middle of this went a green border encrusted with precious stones. This signified the most precious wood that bore the body of our Lord when the gates of heaven were pierced through and beat upon with hammers, and the bolt of Adam flew off them. Although few recognized the meaning, the two ornaments were a glorious cross.³¹ Upon the cross was embroidered a white sacrificial lamb and it was adorned with precious stones and bright gold, as though it were about to catch fire. This was a prophetic symbol-and it then came to pass when the innocent Lamb of God suffered a great death of love upon the lofty tree. This is why, at the passion of our Lord, the lifeless hunger cloth fell, together with the dead lamb, so that the living Lamb of God should ever be adored on that very spot. Mary sewed for her Child Jesus a coat with an adjustable seam, so that when the coat became too short or tight, she would widen and lengthen it. The coat was brownish and of coarsely fibered thread.

Joseph was a poor people's carpenter and earned many a penny for their needs. Mary sewed and spun to make clothes for the three of them. When they fled into Egypt, God's angel embraced them with a heavenly light, so that the devil did not know where the Child had gone off to until the time when it had grown to a youth thirty years old and was a perfect man. Then the devil became aware of him in the desert and thereafter on many occasions when he manifested his divinity. Then he turned to the Jewish teachers; they were inwardly very wicked but outwardly quite handsome in their bearing. He taught them how they might resist Jesus with twisted words and not accept his teaching, but might stand firm in their Jewish law.

Then Satan went again to Lucifer and said: "Alas, Master, our honor shall fall! I have found on the sinful earth a man who is by himself stronger and wiser than were all of us before we fell. Even with all my wits I cannot make him entertain a sinful thought."

And Lucifer again bared his fangs like a dog and snapped with his hellish mouth and said: "You shall stir up all men against him. If he is the most exalted of all men, he will be able to escape all sin."

"Master, we can easily get out of this mess, for I can find a lot of people who would gladly kill the man."

He said: "No, I am afraid it might well turn out bad for us, for with the power of God on high he so easily frees people from infirmities of the flesh and from human death. If his body were taken from him, I fear even more that his soul would come to us and free those who are his. For that goes far beyond our power that he frees people on earth-contrary to nature-from all kinds of suffering and even death. Still, because of original sin he must go down to hell himself. But if he remains pure of all sin and if one takes his life from him though he is innocent, then he does not belong in hell, for never was an angel or a human being damned without being guilty. But if he is noble and free, then whatever he wills shall happen, no matter what we want. But you can see to it with your artful ways that the greatest crowd belongs to us, to hell. And you should constantly strive that people revile him to the limit and that they torture him with the most excruciating pain. If he then turns out to be simply human, he will fall into great despair and thus will remain ours."

Mary, our Lady, spoke to our Lord with her thoughts as often as she wanted, and his Godhead then answered her sometimes. This is why she bore the sufferings in her heart with such control. Mary Magdalene, however, was quite unprepared when she did not see our Lord with the eyes of the flesh.³² She was inconsolable and her heart was the while full of grief and distress. She burned intensely in simple love without lofty knowledge of heavenly things until the hour when the apostles received the Holy Spirit." Only then was her soul wounded by the Godhead. But our Lady was very calm when our Lord arose from death so gloriously. And yet of all humankind her heart was most deeply filled with divine knowledge.

24. The Six Kinds of Children of Our Lord God and the Virtues of St. Dominic and How God Has Honored His Order in Four Ways

An exalted prince has a son who is an advantage for him and brings much consolation to his people. The son is such a cause of praise for his father and such a gloriously dear son that the memory of the son and all his deeds engender the father's glory wherever the son turns. This exalted prince is our dear Lord, the heavenly Father. He has gotten seven capable sons and a very beautiful daughter by our mother, Holy Christianity. His first Son, our dearest Brother-that was our Lord Jesus Christ. What honor the heavenly Father has from this Son and what consolation his people have from him are quite obvious. And how the heavenly Father united himself with this Son and how he has put him at his right hand and how much majesty and honor he has given him-that is boundless and yet fitting. The second son of the heavenly Father were the holy apostles, who preserved for us the precious treasure that was dug out of the lofty mountain³⁴ that a tree bore, and our enemies pierced through it³⁵ at five places and drove out and smashed all our heavenly treasure. The third son were the bold martyrs who drenched the path to heaven with their blood. The fourth son were the steadfast confessors who cleanse us and teach us. The fifth son were the pure virgins who have preserved their chastity out of love for God. They are able to move the heavenly Father on our behalf because they bear his likeness fully in themselves. He wants to have them for himself alone, and they shall wear their garlands in his embrace forever. Indeed, they shall not cover their heads in shame, as is the custom for earthly brides.

When our Lord so gloriously put these worthy children near him in such sublime hospitality that all their earthly suffering and practices had been forgotten, his common folk wandered so far off from the true faith and from sincere confession that the heavenly Father felt compassion and got then two more sons at one birth by our dear mother, Holy Christianity. And she nursed these two sons herself at her two breasts which are so full of sweet milk that never in the least can they be sucked dry. These breasts were and are the old law and the new law with which our mother, Holy Christianity, nurses all God's children.

Our Lord said this, too: "One should not ordain anyone a priest unless he is familiar with both the Old and the New Testament, because with just one leg no one can go to court or serve for any length of time."

The two sons are the preachers and the lesser brothers, of whom St. Dominic and St. Francis were the first roots. Alas, how much of what they faithfully practiced has been lost! The more that is lost, the weaker the order becomes. The less long it stands, the sooner another son shall be born out of the faithful heart of the eternal Father, who does not want to desert his children in these times.

St. Dominic watched out for his brothers with true devotion, with a friendly face, and with holy wisdom; not carelessly, not with perverse intentions, and not in a cruel manner. The wise man he taught, in addition, to temper all his knowledge with divine simplicity. The simple man he taught true wisdom. Those suffering temptation he helped bear all their interior suffering in secret. The young he taught to hold their tongues; because of this they became outwardly proper and inwardly wise. The sick and the frail he consoled quite lovingly and also showed serious concern for all their distress. They were all very happy that he stayed with them so long, and his sweet company soothed them for all their wearying toil. In its beginnings this order was pure, simple, and full of burning love of God, as well. The pure simplicity God gives to some people is at times so ridiculed by others that the gift in which one finds and chooses God's wisdom is lost. This extinguishes the burning love of God as well.

That member of the order who finds it painful to be highly esteemed and who considers all earthly honor to be a serious temptation cannot desert this way of thinking because of the nobility of his religious spirit that he accepted from God in an attitude of holy submission of his heart to all creatures. Either he will retain the honor in shame and fear, in constant zeal, in compassionate helping, and in cheerful joy, or he must strive with all great wisdom to put down the burden honorably. For the heart of a religious must have calm peace and must blossom forth in love toward the Holy Trinity.

God has given special honor to these two sons in four things. He did this so that they would have no other concern about themselves except to avoid sin. "Rather," our Lord said, "all their concern and striving should be directed toward my people's becoming blessed and holy." The first thing is that they are handsomely welcomed by people. The second is faithful help without payment with the necessities of life. The third is holy wisdom coming from divine truth. The fourth is power in practical matters in Holy Christianity. When one mercilessly drives the brothers to work without gentle counsel, much damage results, about which I must now be silent.

25. Something That One Misses in Heaven in Seven Things; Thereafter Follow Seven Things; the Praise of a Disheartened Person Is Beneficial in Seven Ways

One thing in heaven I miss most of all. It is also the noblest, shines forth toward the Trinity most beautifully, and costs the most in this life as well. This is that one is willing, able, and skillful in praising God well from the heart and in thanking him cheerfully and in raising one's desires aloft and in bringing one's works to fruition while one is in poverty, in disgrace, in loneliness, in times of suffering, in spiritual aridity-which is most difficult of all, while compelled by obedience, and in all kinds of bitterness both within and without. Because of this the soul and body in heaven become so worthy of esteem and praise that they sing more beautifully of love than the others, shine more radiantly in joy than the others, soar higher than the others, and live in greater bliss than the others. They are more finely adorned than the others, have a greater abundance of honor than the others, enjoy greater delight, and drink more deeply in the Holy Trinity than the others.

"Lord God, I ask you: How fragrant do you find this praise and these acts of thanksgiving that a despondent person offers without experiencing any sweetness?"

Now hear what he said: "It rises up majestically, its honor is and shall become manifold; for all that ever was shall yield to it until it arrives at the abode of my Holy Trinity and there performs such marvels that it utterly permeates my Three Persons and stirs, charms, and enamors my whole Trinity. The soul senses quite well the fragrance I possess. I cannot be completely intimate with her unless she is willing to lay herself in utter repose and nakedness in my divine arms, so that I can take delight in her. For it was for this that I surrendered myself into her power-like a child, poor, naked, bare, scorned, and finally into death-that she alone-ah, if she desires it-might be my closest, my dearest companion. And she shall ever more in soul and body soar about and play to her heart's content in my Holy Trinity and drink herself full like the fish in the sea. And all the pain that she suffered for love of me and in imitation of mewhere has it all gone then? Thus shall I prepare for her sweet amusements.

26. How God Praises Himself and Celebrates Himself in Song

Ah, now listen how the Holy Trinity praises itself with its wisdom that has no beginning, with its goodness that has no end, with its everlasting truth, and with its whole eternity. Now harken to that sweetest, most sublime, and bliss-filled voice, as the Holy Trinity sings with full voice within itself from where have flowed forth the sweet voices of all the saints that have sung in heaven and on earth, and shall do so eternally.

The Father's voice recites a hymn of praise to himself: "I am a flowing spring that no one can block; but a man can easily block up his heart with an idle thought, so that the restless Godhead that continually toils without toil cannot flow into his soul."

The Son sings thus: "I am a constantly recurring richness that no one can contain except the boundlessness which always flowed and shall ever flow from God, and which comes again in its fullness with his Son."

The Holy Spirit sings this praise: "I am an insuperable power of truth. This one finds in a person who to his honor perseveres in God, come what may."

Thus does the whole Trinity sing: "I am so strong in my undividedness that no one can ever separate me or shatter me in all my eternity."

27. The Heavenly Father Received His Son, Jesus, with Twelve Words

With these words the heavenly Father received his Son when he had come out of this earthly strife into heavenly peace: "Welcome, my glorious Son, who are I myself, my hand in your works, my honor in your power, my strength in your struggle, my praise in your victory, my will at your resurrection, my marvel at your ascension, my wrath at your judgment. The immaculate bride that you are bringing me shall belong to you and me indivisibly forever. My Godhead is your crown, your humanity is my reconciliation." The Spirit of us both is one will, one counsel, one strength in all things without end and without beginning. Your soul is the most intimate bride of our Three Persons."

Oh, how delightfully the soul of Christ sparkles in the whole Holy Trinity, just like the delightful flashing in the beautiful sun that no one can see who does not have the fairest of eyes.

28. The Seven Crowns of Brother Albert. Disposition Is One Thing, Choice Is Another

Wherever knowledge includes wisdom and love, choice brings fruit; and no one knows whether one is good until one is tempted by evil.

I prayed for the soul of Brother Albert of Minden, and God showed me his excellence. I saw the crowns of seven virgins suspended above his head. I was greatly puzzled how this could be, because he had been a penitent.³⁷ Our Lord said: "He won these crowns because he preserved seven virgins' chastity through much effort simply out of love for me; and all of them shall enhance his dignity eternally, but they shall never touch his body or his soul."

I saw this in heaven: reward, dignity, and crown; and it is not all the same thing. Reward has to do with actions, dignity with virtues, the crown with love. But the reward's abundance is determined by the number of good actions. Dignity is extended by the amount of virtues. The crown shines on high according to the intensity of the fire of love.

Brother Albert told me then that a brother was going to die in six years, but this turned out not to be true. In the seventh year I asked our Lord why this was the case. Our Lord said: "He saw the predetermination and not my choice. I choose for my special friends long humiliation for which they are not at fault, and I keep alive in them the holy desire to live longer."

Whenever a person scrutinizes his heart in the light of love, that is, in truth, then he discovers nothing other than that he should by rights be scorned more than anyone else. In this state his desire grows with boundless hunger and draws the person out of himself and into God's will to such an extent that God sees fit to prolong his life and bestows upon him completely new favors, if he is willing to keep and preserve them with diligent care.

29. After Ecstasy with God a Person Would Be Like an Angel If He Were to Follow It, and Concerning the Wickedness of the Devil

If a person were to conduct himself rightly after the ecstasy that comes from God and after the light which he experiences, he would enter into such great delight and such holy knowledge that no heart would be able to bear it. He would thus be like an angel ever in all things united in love with God. He would thus become the hell of the devil and the heaven of God. But when a good person leaves this rapture, God sends the devil to him to tempt him with those things that are hardest of all, so that he might wake him up again. But our dear Lord takes the devil's power away from him and protects the person so that he cannot bring him down. And yet he really thinks that he has been given leave to bring the person down as he would like. This is why he is so busy day and night. Alas for me! This has often happened to me!

God revealed to me such a glorious thing, promising to fulfill it, that because of my worthlessness I did not dare believe it. And so, alas, I did not thank him for it. Then the devil came and wanted to inflict pain on me.

I said: "What do you want? You see quite clearly that God is with me. How dare you torture me in his presence!"

The devil said: "I want now what I have always wanted-to put my chair next to his. Indeed, I would like to drive him from the chair of your soul, if I could, and sit down on it, and I would like heaven, paradise, purgatory, and earth to be one big hell in hell eternal."

And I said: "Don't you wish that all these things were heaven, so that you, too, might receive favor?"

He said: "No, that I can never do."

I said: "Alas, how very miserable you are, that you feel no shame before God!"

He said: "Whoever has anything good about himself is not completely evil, and he who sins loses all sense of shame; for if he felt shame he would not commit any sins. I am as cocky as a fly and land on everything. I spare no one.

Only the one who defends himself with virtue Remains untroubled,
And he who stands firm in God
Conquers gloriously all the sorrows of his heart."

30. Twenty Powers of God's Love and Many Kinds of Names

Ah, dear divine Love, ever embrace my soul,
For it would murder me beyond all pain

If I were to be separated from you!
Ah, Love, let me now not grow cold,
My actions are all dead
When I do not feel you.
O Love, you cause sweet pain and distress;
You give the true children of God instruction and consolation.
O Fetter of love,
Your tender hand is strong.
It binds both young and old.
O Love, you make large burdens light,
And to you small sins seem heavy.
You serve without reward
Ministering to all creatures.

Ah, sweet divine Love, whenever I sleep too long
And miss good things,
Be so kind and awaken me,
And sing to me, Lady, your song
With which you touch the soul
Like a sweet chord of strings.

Ah, Lady Love, throw me beneath you.
I would gladly suffer defeat.
If you would only take my life,
That would be, Lady, all my solace.
Alas, generous divine Love, you pamper me too much.
This shall be my constant complaint.
Love, your most elegant greeting
Has filled my spirit.
Love, your most pure sufferings
Make me live without sin.

Love, your constant devotion
Has brought me to such sweet distress.
O divine Love, how can I be patient in your absence
If you want to be estranged from me?
Love, it is a blissful, heavenly exhilaration
That your absence is so pleasant for me.
O wondrous Love, ever blessed is he indeed,
Whom you instruct.
That is his most blissful humility,
That, Lady, he asks you to leave him.

Ah, Love, how few do you find
Who seek you with all their might in all things,
And with constant effort enjoy you
And who in the pangs of love bid you
That you flee from them.
But there are many
Who call out to you with their mouths
And turn from you in their actions.

Love, your leaving and coming
Are equally welcome to the well-ordered soul.
Love, you have worked that great miracle,
That God has performed with us in heartfelt love.

Love, your most refined purity
Standing like a lovely reflection
Of the chaste soul in God's presence
Creates in the breast of virgins
Hot pangs of desire
For Jesus their Love.
Those who love intensely and are virgins,
These are the maidens of the Seraphim.

Love, your holy mercy
Causes the devils much suffering.
Love, your sweet peace
Fosters calm minds and a pure life.
Love, your holy fulfillment
Makes spirits free
In voluntary poverty.
Love, your true perfection
Does not easily complain about misfortune or hardship.

31. Of Ten Powers of Love and That No Creature Can Fully Imagine the Longing of the Soul for God

O Love, how far your light shines in the soul
And how fiery is your glow
And how incomprehensible is the wonder of you
And how rich is your wisdom

And how ready is your gift
And how powerful are your bonds
And how perfect is your being
And how pleasant is your flow
And how abundant are your refreshments
And how faithful is your labor
And how holy is your discretion.

When you pass through the soul with all these things and she then rises up and begins to fly with the wings of a dove, which are all the virtues, and she then begins to desire with the longing of the eagle, she follows the heat up to heaven, for she finds everything transitory to be cold and tasteless.

Thus do I then speak from the mouth of truth:

Lord, the desire I have for you when you draw me up,
Lord, the wisdom I then receive in the flights of love,
Lord, the union I then grasp in your will,
Lord, the constancy I then preserve as your gift,
Lord, the sweet remembrance when I think of you,
Lord, the pampering love that I feel for you is so rich in itself and is in your divine eyes so great-even if you did not know it, Lord, not even all the grains of sand, all the drops of water, all the grass and leaves, stones and wood, all lifeless creatures; in addition, all living creatures: fish, birds, animals, worms, flying and creeping things, devils, heathens, Jews and all your enemies; and more: all your friends, humans, angels, saints-now if all these persons could speak, were willing to, and called out unceasingly till the last day; truly, Lord, as you well know, they could not make clear to you even half of the intensity of my longing and the pain of my suffering and my heart's pursuit and my soul's striving for the fragrance of your balsam, to hang inseparably in your embrace forever.

Indeed, Lady Mary, Mother of God, how did you fare when with your Son you began to experience the love of the eternal Godhead that a soul free of duplicity has in this life, united with the eternal Godhead, and the caresses with which he cherishes her? Lady, you could become weary and your Son would become faint, for the fiery energy of divine love surpasses all human strength.

32. The Sublime End of Sister Mechthild

Now I must, though under duress, write this story that I would gladly pass over in silence, because I greatly fear the stealthy sword thrust of empty glory. But I fear much more, if God gives me my due, that I, poor woman of God, have already kept silent about too much. Misery, fear, and constant suffering of the heart have I borne secretly from childhood regarding a good end. Now, most recently, God has revealed to me that two throngs came down from heaven in procession. These were virgins and angels. The virgins signify virtues with which a person has served God. The angels signify a pure life in which a person has followed God.

Our Lord and his glorious mother followed this delightful procession until the first ones stood before the person's mouth. The path was peaceful; all around it was brighter than the sun from the radiance of the saints who came out of God's bliss. Then the soul said: "Lord, this path suits me just fine, out of all proportion to my worth. But I greatly fear that I shall come out of my body."

Our Lord said: "If that should happen, I shall draw you into my breath, so that you will follow me like you would a magnet."

On both sides of the procession was a throng of devils. There were so many of them that I was unable to encompass them all with my sight. Still, I was not afraid of a single one. They thrashed about with great ferocity and they clawed each other like madmen. The soul was all the more elated when she then saw our Lord before her. In great astonishment she asked our Lord how this could be. Our Lord said: "The elation comes from the positive certainty that you know for certain that all these devils can never, ever keep you from me."

33. How Small Sins Harm Perfection and How Through Them the Devil Draws Close to the Soul

It impedes people in religious life most of all in their pursuit of perfection that they pay so little heed to small sins. I tell you truly: whenever I blunder with a laugh that harms no one, or with an annoyance in my heart that I reveal to no one, or with a bit of impatience at my own suffering, then my soul becomes so dark and my mind so dull and my heart so cold that I must weep in my gloom and lament in misery and amicably beg and strongly desire and humbly recognize all my deficiencies. Only then is the favor granted me in my wretchedness that I may creep back like a beaten dog into the kitchen. Further: when I have a defect about me that is unrecognized and unrepented, there immediately arises a hell stain on my soul. There is no help for it. The devil who is in charge of purgatory, where the sin shall burn, immediately thinks he is seeing his likeness. Terror begins to come over me since I am alone, though my soul had been made free of all terror when I received the gift that one calls conscious love. Then I fall immediately to the ground and say: "Have mercy on me, God" or "Our Father." And then I return immediately into my sweet paradise out of which the stain had driven me.

34. Five New Saints Sent for the Sake of Bad People and How God Will Hereafter Wash Christianity in His Own Blood

Given the nobility of holiness and the weakness of human nature, I am very surprised that St. Elizabeth was so quickly canonized a saint after having been buried so short a time." Our Lord explained this to me and said: "It is right for messengers to be quick. Elizabeth is and was a messenger whom I sent to wretched women living in castles who were so permeated with lust, so covered with arrogance, and so constantly engulfed in vanity that they by rights should have gone into the abyss. But many a lady followed her example to the extent they could and wanted. I sent St. Dominic as a messenger to unbelievers and as a teacher to the ignorant and as a comfort to the despondent." I sent St. Francis as a messenger to greedy priests and arrogant lay persons.' St. Peter, the recent martyr, is my messenger of blood in which heretical Christianity so miserably lies imprisoned .12 They all say they are pure, but in my eyes they are impure. They say they are faithful, and yet in my eyes they are false. They say they love me, but they love their own flesh much more. Whoever wishes to remain with me, let him renounce with St. Peter his earthly body. Hidden guilt ultimately creates public distress."

I, poor wretch, became so bold in my prayers that I acted foolishly and took depraved Christianity into the arms of my soul.

I groaned to raise her up. Then our Lord said:

“Give up, she is too heavy for you.”

“No, sweet Lord, I shall lift her up and carry her to your feet with those very arms of yours with which you carried her on the cross.”

And God granted wretched me my wish
So that he might make me hush.

When poor Christianity then stepped before our Lord, she was like a maiden. I looked at her and I noticed that our Lord was looking at her as well. I became very ashamed. Our Lord said: "Now just look! Isn't this maiden clearly the right one for me to love without end in my eternal nuptial bed and for me to take in my lordly arms and gaze upon with my divine eyes? She is blearyeyed in knowledge and her hands are crippled as well. She can hardly do any good works. She hobbles on the feet of her desires, for she seldom and listlessly thinks of me. Her skin is filthy as well, for she is impure and unchaste."

Then the poor spirit" said: "What can be done for her then?" Our Lord said: "I shall wash her in my own blood, and all the blessed who are truly guiltless I shall protect and take unto myself secretly in a holy death. What is more," said our Lord, "Sister Jutta of Sangerhausen I have sent as a messenger to the heathens with her holy prayers and good example."

Our Lord said this as well: "I hereby send this book as a messenger to all religious people, both the good and the bad; for if the pillars fall, the building cannot remain standing." Truly, I say to you," said our Lord, "in this book my heart's blood is written, which I shall shed again in the last times."

Our Lord told me about three kinds of blood: "The first blood that was shed by Abel, the holy innocents, John the Baptist, and all those who shed their holy innocent blood before the death of our Lord-that was Christ's blood because for his sake they suffered a holy death. The second blood was the blood of the heavenly Father, which Christ poured forth from his innocent heart. The third blood, which shall be shed in Christian faith before the last day, is the blood of the Holy Spirit, for without the Holy Spirit's help no good action has ever been performed. The blood of the martyrs shed for the love of Christ gives participation⁴⁶ and a crown. The blood of the Father in Christ gives redemption and faith. The last blood in the Holy Spirit gives perseverance and glory."

35. How Sister Mechthild Thanks and Praises God and Prays for Three Kinds of People and for Herself

Ah, kind Father, God in heaven, draw my ever-flowing soul unimpeded into yourself and flow toward her, Lord, with all the delightful things you have within yourself. Then she can beg and demand and praise you to the fullest for your goodness.

Ah, and give me, Lord, the rapture of your Holy Trinity in the sweet soaring of love, Lord, so that I may enjoy with honor all your generous gifts and so that, sweet Lord, I may never ask you for something, Lord, which you do not want to give me for your glory. Amen.

Ah, Father of all goodness, I, a poor sinner, thank you for all your faithful concern for my ravaged body, for my forsaken soul, for my sinful heart, for my saddened senses, for my being, which is despised in this world-Lord Father, these are what belong to me and nothing else-and for your dear Son, Jesus Christ, and for the community of all creatures when they were as yet undepraved and as they shall come again into the most glorious state that they can and want to attain.

Ali, sweet Father, with all these things I praise you today for all your faithful protection that you granted to my poor body and my forsaken soul. With these same things, great God, I thank you, Lord, for all your generous gifts which you, Lord, have ever deigned to give me in body and soul. With this throng of all creatures, I desire today, Lord, your praise in all things and for all things that, Lord Father, have flowed spotless out of your sweet heart. But with all these things, my Dearest of all dear things, I beg you, Lord, to give honor to yourself by the true transformation and complete conversion of poor sinners who today lie in mortal sin. I beg you also, my true Love, for a holy increase in all virtues and in Christian constancy for all the blessed who live here free from mortal sin. I pray to you also, Dearest, for all the suffering souls who have gone to purgatory because of our sins, souls whom we should have kept safe by our good example. I beg you, Lord, for holy sanctification, for true protection, and for the fulfillment by the Holy Spirit for all those expressly who, for the sake of your love, have helped wretched me, Lord, endure my exile in body and soul.

I beg you, bountiful God, for the sake of your poor Son, Jesus, that you turn the pain of my spiritual poverty and the gall of my bitterness into honey on the palate of my soul. I pray to you, living God, on behalf of the eternal nobility of our Christian faith, that you, Lord, preserve it for us in your divine wisdom against all false testimony; and fortify, Lord, our spirit that it rest in your Holy Trinity. I pray to you, sweet Lord, for all my Christian torturers, that they may yet get to know you and love you in holiness. I pray to you, almighty God, for true support for false people in power to rule with good judgment and that the innocent in the community be mercifully spared. I beg you, eternal Consolation, that you come today to comfort all burdened souls who on this day in fear take leave of their bodies, that you, merciful-hearted God, may be their champion and mete out to them eternal life. I beg you, Lord, for the complete purification, spiritual constancy, and glorious preservation of divine truth in all things for all those especially who wear the garment of religious life and wield spiritual authority purely out of love for you.

I beg you, kind God, for true thankfulness at all times for all your gifts to help those who for love of you carry troublesome burdens. I beg you, holy God, for mercy when you consider my worthless life, and for constant union, Lord, of yourself with my soul and for the trusted viaticum of your holy body, that it may be at the end my last nourishment for soul and body. I also beg you, sublime, bliss-filled Trinity, at the last hour of that difficult separation of my poor soul from my sinful body, that you then, Lord, incline toward me so that all my enemies depart from me sad and I, Lord, according to your sweet pleasure and my long-felt desire, might unceasingly so gaze upon you that the eyes of my soul might sparkle in your Godhead and the sweet pleasure of your love might glide out of your breast and through my soul. Through our Lord Jesus Christ your Son."$ Amen.

Book VI

1. How a Prior or a Prioress or Other Religious Superiors Should Conduct Themselves Toward Those Under Them

Great fear is bound up with power. When one says, "You are now our superior or our prior or our prioress," God knows, my dear friend, you are in dire straits. You should then perform your venia with great humility, turn immediately to prayer, and let God console you. You should so transform your heart in God's holy love that you love in a special way each and every brother or sister entrusted to you in all his needs. In all their difficulties you should show your subordinates and brothers loving cheerfulness or kind concern and compassion. With friendly words you should bid them go forth and preach boldly and hear confessions competently, for this is why God has sent them into this world-that they should be redeemers and helpers for poor sinners in the same way Christ was the Redeemer of the whole world, coming down from the lofty palace of the Holy Trinity into this stenchoozing world.

Thus shall you speak to each of your brothers in the deep humility of your pure heart: "Alas, my dear fellow, I, though unworthy of anything good, am your servant in all the ways I can be and not your master. Unfortunately, however, I have authority over you and send you forth with the heartfelt love of God. The difficulty of your task moves me deeply, and yet I make the decisions. I rejoice in the sublime honor the heavenly Father has prepared for you.

"I hereby send you forth in the same name, just as Jesus went forth from his Father, when he went searching for the one lost sheep for such a long time that he died of love. May God's true love go with you on holy paths and in productive efforts. I shall send along with you the longings of my soul, the prayers of my heart, and the tears of my sinful eyes, that as a favor to me God might send you back here holy and full of love. Amen."

Thus shall you encourage all your brothers as they go forth. You should also raise their spirits when they return. You should go in advance to the guest quarters and with God's liberality make all arrangements for the basic comfort of God's disciples as far as is in your power. Indeed, dear fellow, you should even wash their feet yourself. You still remain their master or mistress. And be subject to them in humility. You should not spend a long time with guests. You should keep good order in the religious community. The guests should not stay up late; this is a holy matter. You should visit the infirmary every day and comfort the sick with the consoling words of God and refresh them generously with earthly things, for God is rich beyond all accounting. You should clean for the sick and in God cheerfully laugh with them. You should yourself carry away their personal waste, lovingly ask them in confidence what their private infirmity is, and truly stand by them. Then God's sweetness shall flow into you in marvelous ways.

You should also go into the kitchen and see to it that the needs of the brethren of the community are well taken care of, that your own stinginess and the laziness of the cook do not steal from our Lord sweet song in the choir. For a starving cleric does not sing well. Also, a hungry man cannot study with concentration. And so God often loses the best through the worst.

At chapter meetings you should be just but with a gentle spirit, basing your judgments completely on the amount of guilt. You should be very careful not to use your authority contrary to the will of the brethren or the community, for that is the source of much dissension.

You should always bless yourself when prideful thoughts come to you. Unfortunately, these do come into the heart under the semblance of good and say, "Well, after all, you are prior (or prioress) in all matters. You can certainly do what you think is best." No, dear fellow, in so doing you disturb God's holy peace. With a submissive spirit and endearing cheerfulness you should say: "Dear brother (or sister), how does this suit you?" and then take action according to their best-intentioned wishes.

Whenever the brothers (or sisters) in your community offer you honor, you should be inwardly afraid with a sharp watch on your heart, and outwardly you should show moderate embarrassment. You should receive all complaints with sympathy and you should offer all advice with sincerity.

If your brothers are planning great building projects, turn it into something holy and say: "Oh, dearly beloved brothers, let's build the Holy Trinity a delightful palace in our souls with the Holy Scripture as the lumber and with noble virtues as the stones." Profound humility is the cornerstone of this glorious palace in which God eternal shall caress his love-starved bride without end with all the pleasure in his power according to her consuming desire. It has been chiseled in the sweet sufficiency of earthly transitoriness, where insatiable arrogance and cutting empty honor shall never provide the urge that we build something the way worldly lords or ladies do. Rather, we want to build on earth as heavenly princes do. Then, on the last day, we shall sit by Jesus, who will still be poor, just like his holy apostles.² Dear brothers, we want to build our dwellings in heaven with divine joy, and we want to build our huts on earth with concern,' for we have no certainty that we will live until tomorrow.

You should have an eagle's eyes, observing and seeing those under you lovingly in God, not with malice. If you find someone secretly suffering temptation, by all means stand by him with great love. Then God cannot help but be secretly close to you.

I want to tell those blessed brothers who have some office some words of truth that I saw in the Holy Trinity when I was alone in prayer. When a person prays in Christian faith with a heart so humble that one cannot endure a single creature to be beneath one, and with a soul so detached that all things but God alone disappear when one is praying, then a person is a divine God with the heavenly Father. But if a person then has a profound realization of how frail he is on his own, even in sweet embrace he will remain fearful to the extent that nothing will concern him but God's honor alone.

When, however, because of a real need and to achieve a practical result a person toils with the same love with which he prayed, then he is a human God with Christ. But what one botches up and does to no practical purpose and out of no real need is all dead before God.

When a person purely for the love of God and not for earthly reward instructs the ignorant, converts sinners, consoles the despondent, and brings those in despair back to God, then he is God the spirit with the Holy Spirit.

Ah, that is a very blessed person who does everything humanly possible that is praiseworthy in God's eyes with that same love for God's praise and with the constant good intention of his whole heart. That person is one whole person with the Holy Trinity.

But the dust of sin that settles upon us constantly, even against our will, is quickly annihilated by the fire of love when the glance of the eyes of our soul touches the Godhead with the lonely sighing of sweet desire that no creature can resist. When she begins to rise, the dust of sin falls away from her and she becomes one God with God in such a way that whatever he wills she wills as well, and they can be united in complete union no other way.

Indeed, dear fellow, you should readily offer our dear Lord God a free hour, day or night, during which you can pray lovingly and undisturbed. For heaven's gift with which God greets and instructs his chosen dear ones is in its nature so noble and so refined and flows so sweetly that when God eternal, gravely wounded by love for her, wants to visit the love-hungry soul in the cozy bridal bed, he would renounce for more than thirty years everything that he found pleasant if he might kiss her again and again and embrace her with his bare arms. If you were to think about this, how could you act so crudely as not to give him an hour a day in return for those thirty years?

When I, the most wretched of persons, go to my prayer, I deck myself out according to my worthlessness. I dress myself in the foul puddle that I myself am. Then I put on the shoes of precious time that I wasted day after day. Then I gird myself with the suffering I have caused. Then I put on a cloak of wickedness of which I am full. Then I put on my head a crown of secret shameful acts that I have committed against God. After this I take in my hand the mirror of true knowledge. Then I look at myself in it and see who I really am. Alas, I see nothing but utter misery. I prefer to wear these clothes rather than to have my wish regarding all earthly possessions. And yet they cause me such distress in my wretched fury that I would rather be clothed with hell and crowned with all the devils if this could happen through no fault of mine. Alas, how very often do robbers-our own fickleness come and strip these clothes from us when we are pleased with ourselves and in our guilt declare ourselves innocent?' Then we have been robbed by vain honor and struck down by pride. Then we are more naked than naked. Alas, how deeply must we then be ashamed before God, his friends, and all creatures!

If we want to overcome our shame with great honors, we must clothe ourselves with ourselves. So adorned, I seek Jesus, my sweet Lord, and I find him so quickly by no other means as by those things that are repugnant and burdensome. One should very eagerly step forward with intense desire, ashamed of one's guilt, and with flowing love and humble fear. Then the filth of sin disappears from the divine sight of our Lord. And then lovingly he begins to cast his radiance toward the soul and she begins to dissolve out of deeply felt love. The soul loses all her guilt and all her sorrow, and he begins to teach her his complete will. Then she begins to taste his sweetness and he begins so to greet her with his Godhead, that the power of the Holy Trinity penetrates fully her soul and her body; and she receives true wisdom. And then he begins so to caress her that she becomes weak. She so begins to drink it all in that he becomes lovesick. Then he begins to limit the intensity, because he knows better her limits than she herself does. And then she begins longing to show him great faithfulness. And then he begins to give her full knowledge. And then she begins to taste with delight his love on her flesh. And then he begins to strengthen with holy feeling in her soul all his gifts. If she then guards against the ignoble love of her flesh and the alluring sweetness of all earthly things, she will be able to love to perfection and gain much praise for God in all things.

Now, dear fellow, there are still two more things that you must guard against with holy zeal, for they have never borne fruit. The first is that a man or woman wants to accomplish much in pursuing good deeds and fine conduct in order to achieve a high church office. Such an attitude vexes my soul. When such people have then achieved power, their baseness becomes so many-faceted that no one who voted for them with great enthusiasm is happy with them. They then become misguided by honors and their false virtues turn into vices.

The second is when a person is chosen rightfully with no meddling on his part and he then changes so completely that he never feels the urge to leave this office. This is a sign of many failings. For even if he is irreproachable in it, he should still be fearful and humble.

A sincere woman and a good man who after my death would have liked to talk with me but cannot should read this little book.

2. The Rule of a Canon: How He Should Conduct Himself. This Came from God

We should greet people in the Holy Spirit with his divine fullness, and we should thank them for their merciful gifts. But even more, in union with all creatures, we should thank the heavenly Father for his holy favor that he unceasingly pours out of his Holy Trinity day after day into the hearts of sinners. That the eagle flies so high, it has no need to thank the owl for that.

I prayed for a noble cleric at his wish.' This is the holy answer from God which he spoke to me: "His wish is to sink to a humble life, the favor I give him is great, and his will is holy. Nevertheless, he should remain right where he is." God, the sublime pope of heaven, has sent him this rule, and it reads as follows: "He should pray always and without ceasing according to the rules for clerics. In addition, I shall grant him my divine sweetness. This he shall enjoy in the solitude of his heart. Whenever he is tempted, he should call out to me with great vigor and I shall come quickly to his aid. He should fulfill his duties completely but should keep expenses small. He should keep no one in his pay for the sake of power or as a return for favors. Rather, he should retain honest servants in proportion to his rightful needs. He should not occupy himself with the concerns of his relatives. But if one of them wants to follow him, he should help him. He should wear simple, comfortable clothes, as he presently does; but next to his skin he should wear coarse clothing to combat the various pleasures he has received in his skin. In addition, he should sleep on straw between two woolen blankets, and he should have two pillows for under his head. During the day he should cover his bed with a fine quilt, and his bed should remain exactly where it was before for all to see. In front of his bed he should lay a mat and a kneeler. Thus, with humble heart he should give good example against an evil life. He should also have two switches next to his bed to chastise himself with upon awakening.

"Once a day, while he lies fully prostrate, his prayer should be as follows: 'Lord, eternal Father, God of heaven, I, a worthless human being, thank you, Lord, that you have let your grace descend upon me. I ask you now, dearest Father, together with all those close to you, that your sweet heavenly flood that ever pours down out of the inexhaustible living spring of the whole Holy Trinity may cleanse my soul continually of all stains through our Lord.'"

At this point I asked: "Lord, how shall he preserve himself in earthly honor without sinning?"

Our Lord said: "He should keep himself in constant fear, just like a mouse that is caught in a trap and awaits its death. The bottom part of the trap is earthly honor; the upper part is my almighty power." This is the explanation our Lord gave: "Whoever desires that I taste good to him should tremble in fear at all times in all things at the taste of his own flesh, where the heart plays with hidden lust. Therefore, when he eats, he should be easily satisfied and selfless. When he sleeps, he should be disciplined and alone with me. When he is out in the world, he should be a mouse in his heart. When he goes to confession, he should be truthful and obedient and act in all matters as his confessor advises."

3. God Gives Authority. How Billy Goats Become Lambs

That this same noble cleric' was chosen deacon is God's will. For he himself said: "For this reason I have taken him from one chair and put him onto another, that he might be food for billy goats." Explanation: God calls the cathedral canons billy goats because their flesh stinks of lust in eternal truth before his Holy Trinity. The skin of a billy goat is noble, and this is true of their authority and possessions. But when this skin is removed at death they lose all their nobility. And our Lord was asked how these goats might become lambs. Our Lord spoke thus: "If they eat the fodder that Canon Dietrich puts in their trough, that is, holy penance and sincere advice in confession, they shall become the kind of lambs that one calls sheep rams: lambs with horns." The horn is spiritual power that they use in a holy manner to God's praise. One should be strong and trust God utterly, for he says: "I myself shall help this canon successfully atone for his guilt."

4. Discernment and Fear That Preserve the Senses from Earthly Things`

Oh, what a wretched person I am! I complain to God in heaven that I am worse than I was thirty years ago. For the creatures that then helped me bear my misery did not have to be so noble to help this poor body thrive. This is why I must constantly station two guards between my soul and all earthly things, so that she may find just that amount of pleasure in my flesh that my meager needs require. They also preserve my senses, so that these earthly things do not lead me astray into a greedy desire to possess much or to linger in pleasure.

The one guardian is discernment, which arranges all things in such a way that they are used entirely according to God's will. In this way a person always retains a heart alien to all earthly things, so alien that, if a person loses earthly things, his heart becomes so buoyant, his soul so unfettered, and his senses so carefree that he feels as comfortable in God as though his dearest friend had taken the heaviest of all burdens from him; for whichever person does not find earthly things to be a heavy burden cannot be called a truly spiritual person before God. This is why our Lord said: "In times of want one uses all things rightly. What is good about poverty is that it uses only what is necessary. That is why it is holy. Then overindulgence cannot bring darkness into the soul."

My other guardian is holy fear, which together with God's wisdom keeps my soul from smiling upon the earthly things that are given to her. Rather, she receives them as though they were a temptation, a hook baited to catch cupidity and vain honor, which cast many a praiseworthy person in religious life into such darkness that he loses the light of discernment, the fire of love, and the taste for God's sweetness, peace, and mercy without even noticing it.

And so our Lord said: "Indeed, they make fine arguments: that they want to love earthly things and gather much for themselves so that they might the better serve me. But they serve themselves more than me." The person who works only for his own comfort and advantage is his own self. However, everyone should be a Christ in himself, living for God and not for himself. For that most blessed person who lives completely in God, it is all the same to him what he has. For it is holy poverty into which God casts this man with his power in the same way he cast his most beloved Son down from heaven onto the road and into a feeding trough belonging to someone else. Just so does our Lord cast his chosen friends far from earthly consolation, so that they might hunger for heavenly consolation.

A truly holy person fears earthly happiness more than he shows concern for the basic necessities of life. Why? His home is in heaven and his prison is in this world. This is why our Lord said: "Those who know and love the nobility of my liberty cannot bear to love me only for my own sake. They must also love me in creatures. Thus do I remain what is most close to them in their souls."

5. After Love and Desire the Beauty of Creatures Gives Knowledge Along with Sadness

The first knowledge that God gave me, after touching me with love and after the flood of desire, was accompanied by sorrow. Whenever I glanced at anything that was beautiful or dear to me, I began sighing and then weeping; and then I began to reflect, to complain, and to speak thus to all things: "Alas! Be careful! No, this is not your Beloved who greeted your heart, lit up your senses, and captured so blissfully your soul. Don't let the rich delights of earthly things push you away from him."

Rather, in the nobility of creatures, in their beauty and usefulness, I shall love God and not myself."

6. At the End You Should Have Love, Longing, Fear, and Three Kinds of Sorrow

I asked our Lord how I should conduct myself in the time just before my death.

Our Lord said: "You should conduct yourself in the final hours just as you did in the beginning. You should have love and longing, sorrow and fear; for these four things were the beginning of your life, and so they should also be your end."

Then I said: "Dear Lord, what happens to those two things that are the foundation and crown of heavenly honor: Christian faith and true hope?"

Our Lord responded thus: "Your faith becomes a knowing and your hope is transformed into true certainty."

I saw these explanations in his words and know them in my heart, as well.

My sorrow arises from three things. Most of all, I am sorry for my sins. This is the result of love. But by constantly loving I have lost the pain of sorrow. I am sorry for the sins of all human beings, which makes me like a sick person who has a craving for something very fine that he can never or seldom have. And so my heart remains disconsolate and my soul in her desire chases after a huge wild animal. Our Lord said about this: "One cannot catch large animals unless one drives them into water. Thus a sinner will never be converted unless he is pursued by the swift desire of holy people into the deep tears of their hearts."

I am sorry for all the good works that I have failed to do out of love of my flesh without real necessity. Our Lord said about this: "One cannot build a dwelling unless one has a place to build. In like manner one cannot receive a reward in heaven without having performed good works." Our Lord lets this hold true because of love in his heart, so that he can say to each and every soul: "Receive, my very dearest, this rich honor you yourself have earned." That God might be able to address these words to the soul with sincerity to her glory and love, as though he were not the cause of her happiness, and that she might receive in body and soul full honor-this is why our Lord is so deeply concerned that in our struggles, in our want, and in times of suffering we carry on in sincere love: that he might in generosity depart from his justice as much as is fitting for his Godhead. This is what I discovered in the heap of God's favors.

7. Our Self-Will Can Resist the Barbed Hook. The Good Soul Comes Swiftly to God

In my community there is a religious person who causes me much distress because of her contrary disposition. This person is not willing to obey me in regard to anything.' With great intensity I complained to God and was very perplexed how this could be. And our Lord said: "Look what is causing the trouble."

Then I saw that a special devil was clinging to this person and was pulling her away from all good things. So I said: "Who gave you the power to cause God such great humiliation through this person?"

And the devil said: "Nothing other than this person's own selfish will gave me this power."

At these words I saw that the devil pursued all religious persons who give him the opportunity with such derisive contempt because they lead such phony lives by making excuses for themselves before God and all creatures.

Then I said: "Who is going to help this poor wretch to become free from you?"

The devil, under compulsion from God, said: "No one can help her but her own free will, for God has given her the power to change. If she does that, I will be forced to scurry off."

"I hereby ask you by the eternal Truth: what is your name?"

The devil replied: "I am called Barbed Hook, and this throng that you see back there are all mates of mine with the same task that I have. There are as many of them as we find people who are not willing to obey their well-intentioned superior in good things."

Thereupon my soul flew to God so swiftly that she literally arose with no effort on her part and snuggled herself into the Holy Trinity, just as a child snuggles into its mother's coat and lays itself right at her breast. My soul then spoke with the power and the voice of all creatures thus: "Ah, dear Lover, consider my distress with this person so that, Lord, you change her attitude with your divine sweetness."

"No," said our Lord, "she is not worthy of my sweetness. Instead I shall make her body sick, and the pain will so paralyze her that only with great difficulty will she continue on her sinful path. And I shall strike her dumb, that she not utter spiteful words. She shall also become so blind that she will be ashamed to see frivolity. And yet, whatever one does to her, one does to me."

Fourteen days later this actually happened. Alleluia.

8. Between God and Lucifer There Are Two Kinds of Purgatory. How the Devil Tortures Souls

Our human brother Jesus Christ ascended with all virtues into heaven to the heights of his Godhead. And no one can follow him in this unless he, too, has all virtues. Similarly the Holy Trinity has ascended in glory above all things to the blissful heights with all its virtuous friends, who are ever glorious, fair, and joyous in the same measure that they possess within themselves praiseworthy likenesses of his divine virtue. Indeed, all virtues that are practiced on earth with good intentions and not hypocritically, and are adorned with love and performed without sin, are the musical strings in heaven that resound without end out of the faithful soul and out of the submissive body into the Holy Trinity. The Father thanks the Son for having brought her there with virtues, and the Son honors the Father for having created her, and the Holy Spirit gently urges Father and Son that the Holy Trinity might flow out to her with such force and sing so sweetly that she view and love all things with God. Then the sinful devil Lucifer has sunk down under all things together with those who strive after and love only the vices.

Between God's heights and the devil's pit there are two kinds of purgatory. In these two purgatories there are many kinds of suffering and anguish. The first purgatory consists of profitable sufferings that afflict us in this world with various kinds of pain. The second purgatory-after this life-is so large that it begins at the mouth of hell and ends at heaven's gate. But the devils can torment souls only on earth, in the air, and in all the places where a person has sinned, and in the heights where he polluted the air with his sins. Thereby the devil convicts them, so that their shame and torment are all the greater because of all the sins that remain unatoned here. But when they have become so blessed that they have been freed from the hands of the devil, they still burn painfully within themselves because of small wrongdoings. Thereafter, through help and forbearance they pass beyond all distress. This is so close to heaven that they possess all joys but three: They do not see God. They have not yet received their honor. They have not yet been crowned. This is the purgatory on earth and the one in the air between hell and heaven. Because of her spiritual nature, however, the soul cannot suffer torments from physical things once she has left the body."

9. The Saints Honor Those Who Honor Them and They Console Them at Their Death

When one honors the saints by remembering them well, together with all the throng,¹² as one can do on the day that God honored them with a holy death, they are so grateful that they immediately come in all the glory that they received from their holy actions. I actually saw this on the feast of St. Mary Magdalene as one was glorifying God with songs of praise for the great honor that she received as a reward. She danced about in the choir to the holy song and looked each of the singers in the eyes. She came forward and said: "All those who honor my death, I shall be with them at the end and shall honor them in return. I shall stand ever at their side, giving as much help as they are capable of receiving."

Four majestic archangels led her in their midst and the number of lesser angels was beyond human reckoning. Then I asked her what the names of the four princes were. She said: "The first is called Power; the second is called Longing; the third is called Good Will; the fourth is called Constancy. With these four virtues I overcame all the sufferings of my heart. For this God gave me two things as a reward: noble servants and a crown. It is the same with other saints as well."

Our Lord says: "When one blows upon the tiniest spark, it contributes warmth and brightness in heaven's fire, where the saints are all aglow."

10. Prayer, Masses, God's Word, the Lives of Good People, Fasting, and Carenae¹³ Free Souls from Purgatory

I prayed for a soul whose body had been killed in the midst of a sinful life. Then our Lord said this: "Seven years of fasting and seven years of carenae would be like one raindrop on a huge fire. With less than thirty years of praying he cannot be helped, because he lost his life thirty years before his time through foolish pride. These he has to make good to me with suffering."

[The soul speaks:] "Alas, Lord, can I not beseech your goodness?"

[God speaks:] "Indeed, when two wrestle with each other, the weaker must lose. I shall willingly be the weaker, even though I am almighty. Three thousand masses are the price of his redemption, for he never attended a whole mass except out of human respect."¹⁵

"Lord, what was it that saved him?"

"Whenever he heard my words, he sighed. I rewarded him for that since toward the end he so lived that he sighed because of his sins."

"Lord, if his mother's brother-who from his youth till he turned gray has been considered a pious man and who is worn with toil and care-were to offer all this up for him, and for love of you were to depart and place himself in the position where he first became well known, would you perhaps let this soul go free?"

"Yes," said our Lord, "if I were so urgently importuned, I would have to grant everything that one wanted."

"Lord, if this religious man were to give his good works to this poor soul, what would happen to it then?"

Immediately, God let me see this blessed person;
This was not possible for me before
Because of the coarse nature of his punishment
Which my soul cannot bear.
He was fairer than the sun
And he soared in bright bliss
High above all earth's misery.

Full of cheer and contentment he said: "Tell my friends: even if the earth were made of gold and the bright sun shined upon it constantly both day and night with the sweet breezes of May and with delightful flowers ripening to fruit, I would not want to be there for one hour, so blissful is this life."

He had not yet entered heaven eternal.

11. How a Student Is Dead and a Dominican Was Seems

Our Lord spoke thus: "I say to you with my burning Godhead and with my living humanity that his nature is dead in a holy death, and so he can no longer commit serious sins on earth."

Then he was seen looking like a Dominican, standing on a column of red marble and preaching to the people thus: "Come, blessed of my Father," come to me, all ye blessed; and depart from me all ye cursed."

Then it was seen and understood that all preachers preach and teach us from these two sayings.

12. How You Should Conduct Yourself as to Fourteen Things

When you pray, you should be humble.
When you confess, you should be truthful.
When you do penance, you should be untiring.
When you eat, you should be frugal.
When you sleep, you should be disciplined.
When you are alone, you should be faithful.
When you are with people, you should be discreet.
When one teaches you good manners, you should be receptive.
When one castigates you for your wickedness, you should be patient.
When you do something good, you should think yourself bad.
When you do something bad, you should immediately seek forgiveness.
When you are vain, you should fear.
When you are sad, you should have great trust in God.
When you are doing manual work, you should go at a fast pace:
Then you can drive away evil thoughts.

13. How Religious out of Blindness Fend Off Inwardness from Themselves. The Sixfold Power of God's Gift

"Ah, dear Jesus, God of heaven, I have to ask you about something, Lord. I just cannot stand it any longer because of the great blindness that I recognize at the bottom of it." It is this: that religious people fend off divine inwardness in the following way. When God sees fit to let his divine heart shine forth in love toward the very blessed soul so intensely that a small spark alights on the cold soul and she receives so much that the heart of this person begins to glow, his soul to melt, and his eyes to flow, then our Lord would like to make an earthly person so heavenly that one actually wants to follow, love, and see God in him. And the person's senses say: "No, I can be of much use in external matters."" And it is especially cloistered people who say this when they are being especially clever.

Our Lord responds to this in the following way:

“My Godhead came to earth;
My humanity did the work.

My Godhead went on the cross;
My humanity suffered death.
My Godhead arose from death
And led humanity to heaven.
All those who drive me away from them
Shall be driven away from me.
What is a human being capable of doing on his own?
[Nothing but sin.]¹⁹
Never did my humanity ever do something
That my Godhead did not plan in advance.”

“People say, Lord, that it is the mark of wisdom
To spare the body.²⁰
For your divine breath wafts down
From your Holy Trinity so delightfully
And penetrates the soul so powerfully
That the body loses all its strength:
This makes a person unproductive.”

Our Lord said this:
“One should not offer gratis the king’s food
Until one has consumed the ordinary bare sustenance.
My special favor endows a person with special dignity,
In body and soul.
It provides instruction for the ignorant
And consolation for the wise.
It also gives eternal praise and boundless honor
To the fathomless spring from which it has flowed
When it swirls up again, having borne full fruit,
To where it flowed forth from me.”

Indeed, this favor that God is wont to grant a person powerfully and unexpectedly is so noble in itself and brings with it such closeness to God that it is no small sin that a person commits who rejects him for the sake of some earthly thing. Alas, ignoble soul, how can you manage to reject God before enjoying him fully, as is his will? For his most sublime pleasure lies hidden in you.

Do you want to know how you should make use of God's holy favor and enjoy it according to God's will? Well, it shall teach you this itself if you welcome it. You should receive it with external virtues and internal desire. In humble fear you should keep hold of it, submissive in all tribulations. Give it time and room in you; that is all that it asks of you. It shall melt you so deeply into God that you know what his will is concerning how long you should pursue his intense caressing of you, and when and how you should work for sinners and for those in purgatory, and should attend the needs of each and every person, alive or dead.

When you have accomplished this inwardly to God's pleasure insofar as lies in your soul's power-she will grow weary in herself as long as she is in the grips of her mortal body-then the soul says after this pleasurable experience:

“Lord, now flee from me inwardly,
And stand by me outwardly,
So that all my actions shine forth
In proportion to your favor,
And that I suffer willingly
And hardly complain about my cares.”

14. Those Who Complain in Suffering Lack Six Things; How One Should Bear Sickness and Contempt

Whoever in pain complains of his burdens
Is either blind in knowledge
Or spineless in forbearance.
His love has grown cold
And he is jaded in virtue,
Or his mind is dull
And blunt as to good words.

For this reason our Lord said: "This person does not want to be sick and does not want to be scorned. What, then, shall I use as the foundation of his glory?"

"Lord, when a person is sick and scorned, how can he then increase your glory?"

"When he is sick, he should honor, serve, and love me alone with cheerful forbearance. When he is scorned, he should love me and wait patiently. When preachers and confessors are forced from their office and cannot exercise it but still have the holy wish to do so, that is not an obstacle to their happiness. It is an enhancement of their glory."

15. The Sufferings of Enoch and Elijah, the Last Preachers, and the Wickedness of the Antichrist'

O mighty divine love, you have inflicted such sweet anguish on me that my soul languishes in wonder. When I consider that my body shall so fade away at death that I shall no longer suffer or praise my beloved Jesus, then I feel such pain that I desire, if that were possible, to live till the last day. Faithful love that is from God and does not have its source in me forces me to long for this. This is why our Lord said: "If you die, let your days fill you with sorrow, however holy you may be."

"Truly, Lord, I beg you that my longing not die when I can no longer serve you with my body."

Our Lord said: "Your longing shall live. It cannot die because it is eternal. If it keeps striving for my sake till the last day, then soul and body shall be reunited. When I put them together again, she shall praise me without end. Also, she has served me since the very beginning, for you wanted to exist from the time of Adam until now for love of me, just as you wanted to experience all human suffering and serve in all human labor for love of me. Moreover, I declare that your being shall remain until the end of humanity."

"Ah, my Dearest, who shall be the last human to whom my being might be joined? The life of religious people at the end of the world shall be precious."

Our Lord responded thus: "Enoch shall be the last human being to cultivate the spiritual life."

Thereupon God again showed me the end of this world, when the last brothers shall be martyred. Their hair, that they shall never cut, has a specific purpose in God's will: The Antichrist shall command that they be hung up by it onto trees. There they shall hang and nobly die, for their heart burns within them with the sweet fire of heaven as intensely as the body languishes in distress. And so, in the midst of the solace of the Holy Spirit and the pain of the miserable flesh, their soul shall depart from their body with no terror of these sufferings.

Elijah and Enoch shall travel from India to the sea, and a great throng shall follow each of them-all of them Christians fleeing to them from the Antichrist. They shall all be clubbed to death like rabid dogs that one chases down on the street, that have been poisoned and can live no longer. These are then followed by others who are secretly Christians. For they know well from God that they can escape heathenism no other way.

Elijah will be the first to be martyred. He shall be bound to a lofty cross, his hands nailed through.

They do this out of fierce hatred,
Because he constantly spoke of the holy cross
And what happened to Christ on it.
They do not let him die,
In the hope that in suffering so long
He might forsake Christian teaching
And thus turn to the Antichrist.
And so he hangs there, this holy intimate friend of God,

And no cry of pain escapes him.
Three days and three nights
He comforts Holy Christianity
Until his soul departs.
I saw the heavenly Father at his end,
And he received Elijah's soul
With his human hands and said:
"Come, my dear one, it is time for you."
And in a flash from heaven God led him away.

That wretched man, the Antichrist, does not allow God's intimate friend to be buried, for he wants all Christians to abjure their faith. In that he is deceived, for all who gaze upon the body are moved to Christian faith, and they desire to worship it. So filled with sweetness are they by the presence of the holy body that they forget all the agony of death and all earthly goods.

Enoch is still alive, for the Antichrist desires to hear all the wisdom that Enoch knows from God so that he can twist it publicly with his false teaching and perhaps draw Enoch to himself. The whole world would then be his in great honor.

Meanwhile so many of the wicked are drawn away from the Antichrist that he attacks Enoch with fierce words. Not till then does Enoch tell the Antichrist the truth:

“You are a scourge to the whole world
Sent by God because of the evilness of the wicked
And for the holiness of the good.
You are well versed in the writings of the Old Law
And the New Law as well.
Now see how you shall fare after all your efforts.
You have made your choice with full intent.
According to scripture you shall be lost,
As you can well read for yourself.
It wasn’t you who created earth and heaven.

You do not give the angels eternal life.
You did not make man,
Neither soul nor body.
You have never given any creatures their natural life.
How, then, could you ever be God?
You have wrought all your works in lies and evil scheming.
The eternal Truth is Jesus Christ,
Who is one eternal God with his Father.”

Sullenly the Antichrist says:

“How dare you speak the name of my enemy in my presence,
To whom you ascribe more of my honors than to me?
But I shall yet get even with you
And shall free the whole world from you.
Take him at once into my power
And pour boiling pitch into his mouth
And put a tight noose around his neck.
That will make my enemy shut up at once.
If I could hear his words,
I would gladly let him suffer more.
So hang him dead, high above all murderers,
So that all who look upon him
Desert the Christian faith.

He has insulted me in my honor.
No one needs his instruction.
I have been expected since long ago.
Everything shall be done according to my plan.”

Enoch recites his holy prayer in his pure heart thus:

“Eternal Father, Son, and Holy Spirit,
You eternal God undivided,
I thank you, Lord,
That you chose me long ago,
And I praise you, Lord,
In this anguish.
I pray to you, Lord,
For your sheep and mine,
That shall now be without a shepherd.
Keep them, Lord, each and every one,

And comfort them in secret.
Receive now, Lord, my soul.
I have no earthly love for my body.”

The response that God will give to his thanksgiving and his entreaty has been written here. I saw it and read it as written in the Holy Trinity:

“Dear son, come swiftly now to me.
I am truly in you.
Your dear ones for whom you have prayed to me
Shall baptize their children themselves.
I shall free them from the Antichrist at once.
In their hearts they shall remain Christians.
And I shall preserve them from all wavering.
Come, dear intimate friend, I await you,
And my heart skips forth to meet you.”

16. How the Soul of Our Lord Dwells in the Trinity and What Its Task Is; How It Speaks for the Sinner and Concerning the Task of Our Lady

When I wake up at night,

I wisely try my powers,
To see whether I, poor wretch, can pray at all
For this faithless Christianity
That inflicts such suffering on my Beloved.
Sometimes he draws me along a different route,
Pathless and bridgeless,
Where I must follow him barefoot
And stripped of all earthly things.
Who can so delicately conquer humanity?
Who can so swiftly transport the soul?
Who can so nobly illumine the mind
But God, who created it?
He works wonders with us.

Thus did I of a night
Call to mind the Holy Trinity
In the spontaneous sweet flowing of my soul.
There in the heights of the whole Holy Trinity
I saw without asking the soul of our Lord Jesus.
His soul dwells forever, unsurpassed in dignity,
In the Holy Trinity.
Therein it is enclosed and mysteriously entwined,
And it shines forth fair and glorious on all creatures,
Through the Holy Three Persons.

Then, with proper restraint, as is the custom at court, I asked to speak to the soul of our Lord for his glory, because it seemed to me that it worked special miracles. I hovered so close to it that I greeted it thus: "May you be blessed, dear One. What marvels do you perform in this eternal mirror,²² in which all the blessed gazed upon themselves in wonder? You have a delightful labor in blissful restlessness."

The soul of our Lord replied to the pitiful creature: "Welcome, my likeness,²³ for I, too, am a soul as you are; and I carried the burden of all souls with my guiltless body. This is my task: I constantly move the limitless Godhead, thereby recalling to the heavenly Father the infinite love he has for the human soul. I greet my divine humanity as well and thank it for my blessedness; and I call to mind its bond-for he²⁴ was himself an earthbound human-that he remember where he came from, how great and how noble is man's kinship to him,²⁵ and that he should never let man perish. For no one ever begot or gave birth to himself. Because of this you overcame all your sufferings without sin. Thus do I urge God's humanity to special mercy and that he remember how weak man is, and that he was not created free of his enemies, and that man must ever and again fight as one well-armed but whose eyes are bound. It is dark humanity that binds them. Remember, noble Son of God, how wretchedly sad I was on earth within you, and continue to help like a father all those who carry my likeness within them; for I am your soul. I must also wrest from the Holy Spirit his gift, for he shall bring to earth all blessedness to humankind from heaven."

"Heavenly Father, did you thrust the bolt of your justice so firmly across the gate of heaven that poor sinners can never enter? I shall take my complaint to Jesus, your dear Son, who holds the key to your kingdom²⁶ in his human hand with your almighty power."

This very same key was fashioned in the same land by Jewish hand. When Jesus turns the key, the outcast sinner shall come into your favor.

This is the word of the heavenly Father: "My soul cannot endure that I banish the sinner from me. And so I pursue many of them on and on till I have them in my grasp, and I save them a place so narrow that no one, no matter how clever, can follow me there."

And then the soul of our Lord speaks again:

"This is my glory,
And thus am I adorned.
The Godhead is my crown;
His humanity is my reward.
The Holy Spirit has embraced me
And so wondrously permeated me
That no creature can equal me or reach me.
Thus do I carry constantly in this Holy Trinity
All the sinners of earth, on and on,
That God not let them fall
Into the eternal abyss.

But this virgin in whose body I found shelter,
When I left the Holy Godhead for the humanity of her Son,
This virgin is a protectress of all chastity
And an advocate of all those tempted
Who show sorrow and reverence
Before the Holy Trinity.
Judgment is yet in her hands.”

17. God Considers the Sinner Good, What a Good Right Will Is, Concerning a Good Burden²⁷

This is incomprehensible: that God considers the sinner as a converted person. And that is right will in serving God, that one swiftly hurry to me and not look back; and I carry all burdens that are accepted for love of me.

18. You Should Scrutinize Your Heart at All Times

Look into your heart at all times
With the truth of the Holy Spirit.
Then you will find all lying purely detestable.
For lying drives out God’s love,
And it strengthens in one’s heart
Secret cunning, hate, and rage.

19. Good Intentions That One Cannot Turn into Deeds

I have often been much saddened
That I could never turn good intentions into good works.
Wavering and weakness rob me of them,
And that no one dares offer me sound advice.
And, alas, I dare not venture beyond my nature.
This has been the case since the time
God let me fall of my own free choice
From the bliss of the heights,
Where I was so lost in wonder
That I could not find the boundaries of things,
Where powerful love had drawn me in

With the flames of its fire.
But now it has pressed me down
Into a bottomless swamp
Where I find no footing.
And yet all that I suffer
I do not call pain,
For I would rather be yet further removed—
To the lowest place—
Cast off like a raging dog
And no one’s friend,
Unknown, in banishment,
With poor people in a foreign land.

And yet I shall not live except under obedience,
For holy, humble obedience is the seal of all virtues.
Good intention that a good person has
And cannot turn into a good deed
Is like exquisite, fair flowers,
Giving forth fragrance but no fruit.
Thus did God console me:

That all good will shall
Out of the abundance of a good life
Become blossoms of eternal bliss
From which God shall make wreaths
For his never-ending wedding feast
Which his chosen ones shall wear there
Who here go on so faithfully
With a wealth of good will
Which they are not able to turn into good works.

O generous God, hold out your fatherly hand to me,
And lead me into the land of love;
For I have, alas, lost much time,
And I would like to make up for it with you, Lord.
For comfort of the body and contentment of the senses
Must be received in humble fear
If one is to remain in whole truth.

20. This Book Came About out of a Threefold Favor; Love Flows, It Is Rich and Full of Desire, It Becomes Sick; Who Possesses Heaven; God Bestows Suffering and Consolation as Well

God bestowed upon me the favor that is written down in this book in a threefold manner. First and foremost, with great tenderness; then, with sublime intimacy; and now, with intense suffering. I much prefer to remain in this state than in the other two. This is why: although God's tenderness and intimacy are in themselves eternal and noble, they are unfortunately so foreign in this world that all who truly grasp them are not at all able to describe them. And so I have the greatest fears when enjoying pleasure, because Christ suffered much intense pain in this world. But the nature of love is such that it flows in sweetness; then it becomes rich in knowledge; thirdly, it becomes full of longing in rejection.

Oh, you are terribly inconstant. And, alas, sometimes true love of God becomes so weak from the base sweetness of empty honor, from swollen pride and from the loathsome frenzy of anger and from the unchecked desires for the things of this world that it becomes paralyzed in all its members. This is the way it works from the very beginning; this is its nature.

Further, no one possesses the whole of heaven in his heart but he alone who has removed himself from all consolation and all favors in this world. For pleasure has cut us off from God. And so we must return to him through suffering. And yet God cannot restrain himself-and we cannot do without it-from giving us his abundance and his favor for everything we do, refrain from doing, and suffer.

21. How Bad Priests Shall Be Humiliated; [How Preachers Alone Should Preach and Be Bishops;]28 Concerning the Last Brothers

Woe, Crown²⁹ of Holy Christianity, how greatly have you been sullied. The jewels have dropped from you, for you are undermining and violating the holy Christian faith. Your gold lies tarnished in the foul pool of carnality, for you have become shabby and do not have the least bit of true love. Your purity has been consumed in the lustful fire of gluttony. Your humility lies buried in the swamp of your flesh. Your truthfulness has been reduced to nothing amid the lying of this world. Your blossoms of all virtues have fallen away from you.

Woe, Crown" of the holy priesthood, how utterly have you disappeared. You have nothing left but your trappings; that is, ecclesiastical authority with which you war against God and his chosen intimates. For this God shall humiliate you before you know it, and our Lord speaks thus: "I shall touch the pope in Rome in his heart with great misery, and in this misery I shall tell him reproachfully that my shepherds of Jerusalem have become murderers and wolves. Before my very eyes they murder the white lambs, and the old sheep are all sick in the head because they cannot eat from the healthy pasture that grows in the high mountains, which is divine love and holy teaching.

"He who does not know the path to hell, let him look at the corrupt clergy, how their lives go straight to hell with women, children, and other public sins. This is why it is necessary that the last brothers come.

For when the cloak is old,
So is it also cold.

And so I must give my bride, Holy Christianity, a new cloak." These shall be the last brothers that were mentioned earlier."

"Son Pope, this is what you should bring about; then you shall be able to live a long life. The reason your predecessors did not live long is that they did not bring about the hidden intentions of my will. "32

Thus did I see the pope at prayer and heard God give him this message.

22. Seven Things, Five of Which One Finds in Heaven and Two on Earth"

23. How God Speaks with the Soul in Three Places

At the first place the devil often speaks to the soul. At the other two places he cannot do so. The first place is a person's senses. This place is equally accessible to God, the devil, and all creatures. They can speak here as they wish.

The second place where God speaks with the soul is in the soul. No one can enter this place but God alone. But when God speaks in the soul, it happens without any kind of awareness by the senses, in a great, mighty, swift union of God with the soul. Thus the senses cannot hear this delightful conversation. They become so humble that they cannot bear any creature beneath them. Should a person humble himself beneath the devil? Certainly, with this in mind: it should seem to him who has caused God such great insult with his life that he has often painted the devil's likeness onto his soul through his daily sins and sometimes inflicted large wounds on his soul with mortal sins. The soul that is in the embrace of the Holy Spirit cannot contain herself. She must ever sink away from all earthly comfort and from the pleasure of this comfort. But the soul that is in the embrace of its own selfish will inclines with much pleasure to earthly things.

The third place where God speaks to the soul is in heaven, when God raises up the soul in the pleasure of his will and suspends her there where she may take pleasure in the wonder of him.

24. How Christ Reveals His Wounds in Days of Suffering. Four Things Knock on Heaven's Gate

In my days of great suffering, God revealed himself to my soul, showed me the wounds of his heart, and said: "See how they have hurt me."

And my soul said: "Alas, Lord, why did you suffer such distress? From that time when so much of your pure blood was shed from your pure heart the whole world should rightfully have been redeemed by it.""

"No," he said, "that did not satisfy my Father. For all the poverty, all the toil, and all the suffering and humiliation are just a knocking at the gate of heaven up to the time when my heart's blood poured onto this earth. Only then was heaven opened."

The soul said: "Lord, when this happened, you were dead. I am confused. How can someone dead still bleed?"

Our Lord said: "My body was then in a human manner dead when my heart's blood flowed with a beam of the Godhead through my side. The blood issued forth by grace, just as did the milk that I drank from my virginal mother. My divinity was present in all members of my body while I was dead, just as it was before and afterward. After its long sadness, my soul rested the while in my Godhead. And a spiritual image of my humanity has always existed without a beginning suspended in my eternal Godhead."

25. Concerning Burned Love

"Ah, dear Lord, have mercy on one who has been consumed here in the fire of your love and has been absorbed in your humility and has been annihilated in all things."

God speaks:

"My Godhead burned you;
My humanity recognized you;
My Holy Spirit sanctified you in your poverty.
Those who love much like to remain silent.
Those who do not love have always been schemers against love."³⁵

26. Thinking About Death and Living Long Are Good

I am very surprising, and I am surprised in my human way of thinking that my soul is so surprising. Whenever I think of death, my soul looks forward to her leaving with such intensity that my body floats in great superhuman delight and my senses recognize ineffable wonders in the departure of the soul. Thus I would most of all like to die at the time God has foreseen. And yet, on the other hand, I say I want most of all to live until the last day. Then again my desire reaches back to the time of the martyrs, that I might shed my sinful blood in true Christian faith for the sake of Jesus whom I love. A special gift forces me to dare to state this: that I love God. For whenever vice and suffering come my way, my soul begins to burn in the fire of true love of God with such sweetness that my body floats suspended in divine pleasure. But a sadness remains in my senses, and I pray to God for all who slander me or revile me, that God preserve them from sin.

27. How You Should Thank and Ask

Lord heavenly Father, I thank you that you created me.
Lord Jesus Christ, I thank you that you redeemed me.
Lord Holy Spirit, I thank you that you have purified me.
Lord Holy Trinity, whole and undivided, I ask you to remember all faithfulness
And send me a merciful death
That will free me from all distress.
Into your hands I commend my spirit.³⁶

28. When You Are to Die, Take Leave of Ten Things

When I come to die, I shall take leave of all those things from which I am departing.

I shall take leave of Holy Christianity and I shall thank God that I bear the name of Christian and that I came to true Christian faith. And if I were to remain here longer, I would strive to be a help to Holy Christianity that is afflicted with many sins.

I shall take leave of all the poor souls who are now in purgatory. If I were to remain here longer, I would eagerly help you atone for your guilt, and I thank God that you have found grace.

I shall take leave of all those who are in hell, and I thank God that he has exercised his justice in regard to them. If I were to remain here longer, I would never wish them anything good.

I shall take leave of all those sinners who are in mortal sin. I thank God that I am not one of them. And if I were to remain here longer, I would eagerly carry their burden before God.

I shall take leave of all those penitents who are engaged in doing their penance. I thank God that I am one of them. If I were to remain here longer, I would have to hold them dear.

I shall take leave of all my enemies. I thank God that they did not get the better of me. If I were to remain here longer, I would lay myself under their feet.

I shall take leave of all earthly things. I lament to God that I never made use of them according to his holy determination.

I shall take leave of all my dear friends. I thank God and them that they were my help in need. If I were to remain here longer, I would have to feel shame for the failings that they noticed in me.

I shall take leave of all my baseness. I lament to God that I so ruined his holy gift to my soul that there was never a shortcoming so trivial that it was not noticed by heaven in my soul. No matter how penance was done for it, there was always some damage involved. Lord Jesus, I make my complaint to you, but the shame is all mine.

I shall take leave of my wretched body. I thank God that on many occasions he preserved me from many a sin. If I were to remain here longer, its baseness is of so many kinds that I would never get to like it.

29. Ten Parts of Divine Fire out of God's Nobility

An unworthy person pondered in her simplicity God's nobility. And God let her recognize in her senses and see with the eyes of her soul a fire that burned unceasingly in the heights above all things. The fire had been burning without a beginning and shall keep on burning without end. This fire is God eternal, who holds within himself eternal life and from whom all things have come forth. The sparks of the fire that have shot forth are the holy angels. The bright flickerings of the fire are all the saints of God. For their life has given Christianity many a fine sparkle. The ever-glowing coals of the fire are all the blessed here on earth who are on fire with heavenly love and shine with good example. All those who have grown cold in sin can warm themselves on the coals. The embers of the fire have been scattered and extinguished. These are the bodies of the blessed waiting in the earth for their heavenly reward. The rule of the fire is yet to come. That is Jesus Christ, to whom his heavenly Father has entrusted the first redemption and the last judgment. On the last day, out of the embers, he shall fashion for the heavenly Father the most exquisite chalices from which at his eternal wedding feast he himself shall drink all the holiness that, together with his dear Son, he has poured into our soul and into our human understanding.

Ah, I shall drink of you
And you shall drink of me
All the goodness that God has preserved in us.
Happy is he who stands firm
And does not let spill
What God has poured into him.

The smoke of the fire is all earthly things that one often makes use of with improper pleasure. How beautifully they shine in our eyes. How wantonly they play in our hearts. And yet they bear hidden within them a great amount of bitterness, for they disappear like smoke and blind the best. They make even the holiest persons bleary-eyed.

The comfort of the fire is the delightful pleasure that our soul receives inwardly from God through the warmth of the divine fire, so sacred that we, on fire, reflect back toward the heavenly fire, and we persevere in virtue so that we are not extinguished.

The bitterness of the fire is the word that God shall speak on the last day: "Go from me, you cursed, into the eternal fire!"

The radiance of the fire is the gleaming sight of the divine countenance of the Holy Trinity that shall flood our body and soul with light, so that we shall see and know there the marvelous bliss that here we cannot even name.

These things have come out of this fire and flow back into it, each according to God's disposition, in eternal praise.

Whoever wishes to speak more about this,
Let him prostrate himself in this fire
And see and taste how the Godhead flows,
How humanity pours,

How the Holy Spirit wrestles
And vanquishes many a heart,
Forcing it to love God in many different ways.

30. Pure Love Has Four Things

Pure love of God has four things about it: that one be so utterly of one mind with God that whatever might happen to us, except for sin, we thank God devoutly for it.

Secondly, that we use to good effect the gifts we have from God in body and soul.

Thirdly, that we live purely and morally, free of sin.

Fourthly, that we have all virtues in us. Alas, if only I had them and really put them to good use with regard to everything, I would exchange that for all the marvels of contemplation that I ever heard anyone mention. What good are lofty words without works of mercy? What good is love of God when joined to rage against good human beings?

You say: "If God were to give it to me, I would be happy to do it." 38

Now listen here: Virtues are half gifts from God and half our own doing. Whenever God gives us insight, we should put virtues to good use.

31. How God Made the Soul. Concerning Pleasure and Pain. How God Is Like a Sphere

I said in one passage in this book that the Godhead is my Father by nature." You do not understand this, and say: "Everything that God has done with us is completely a matter of grace and not of nature."

You are right, but I am right, too. Consider this analogy. No matter how good a person's eyes are, he can't see farther than a league. No matter how acute a person's mind is, he cannot grasp nonphysical things except with faith, and he gropes around like a blind man in the darkness. The loving soul that loves everything that God loves and hates everything that God hates has one eye that God has illumined. With it she peers into the eternal Godhead and sees how the Godhead has labored in the soul with her nature. He formed her according to himself. He planted her in himself. With her, most of all among all creatures, he united himself. He enclosed her within himself and poured so much of his divine nature into her that she can say nothing else but that with all this oneness he is more than her Father.

The body receives its value from its relationship as brother of the Son of the heavenly Father and from the reward of his toils. The Son of God, Jesus Christ, performed his work with heartfelt love, by suffering poverty, pain, toil, humiliation-even unto his holy death. The Holy Spirit also performed his works, as you say, with his grace and has produced all the gifts that we ever received. These are three different kinds of works, and yet one undivided God performed them in us.

Two things are continually at work on earth and in purgatory through the power of God. One continues to work only in heaven. The second continues to work only in hell. This first is bliss without suffering in heaven. The second is suffering without bliss in hell."

Where was God before he created anything? He was in himself and all things were as present and as manifest to him as they are today. What form did our Lord God have then? Exactly like that of a sphere, and all things were enclosed within God with no lock and no door. The lowest part of the sphere is a bottomless foundation beneath all abysses. The highest part of the sphere is a top above which there is nothing. The circumference of the sphere is an unmeasurable circle." At this point God had not yet become Creator. But when he created all things, did the sphere open? No, it has remained whole and it shall remain whole forever. When God became creator, all creatures became manifest in themselves: human beings in order to love God, to enjoy and know him, and to remain obedient; birds and animals to live according to their nature; inanimate creatures to remain firmly placed in their being. Now listen to this: Whatever we know is absolutely nothing unless we love God properly in all things, just as he himself created all things in properly measured love and offered and taught us love, as well.

32. How We Become Like God, St. Mary, the Angels, and the Saints

To the extent that we love mercy and practice constancy we are like the heavenly Father, who without ceasing performs these things in us.

To the extent that we suffer poverty, humiliation, rejection, and pain here we are like the true Son of God, who endured in complete forbearance all his adversity and suffering.

To the extent that we here flow outward with all the abundance of our heart to give our possessions to the poor and to spend our lives in the service of the sick we are like the Holy Spirit, who is an abundant outpouring of the Father and the Son.

To the extent that we are truthful, temperate, and modest in holy simplicity we are like the Holy Trinity, who is true God and has performed all his works, and still does, in the order proper to them.

To the extent that we are chaste in complete purity, humble in complete submissiveness, ready to serve in all holiness, innocent of all ill will we are like our dear Lady St. Mary, who was ennobled through these virtues, so that she, a virgin, became a mother and, though a mother, remained a virgin, and is alone empress over all creatures.

To the extent that we are kind, friendly, and peace-loving we are like the angels, who never do anything wicked.

To the extent that we lead a holy life in exile and are unconsolated in hardship we are like St. John the Baptist, who has been elevated above many saints.

To the extent that we desire that God be praised, recognize what we have been given, and properly carry out God's will we are like the prophets and the holy fathers, who through great virtue overcame themselves in God.

To the extent that we learn wisdom and through it change other people and stand true to God in all trials we resemble the holy apostles, who went out of themselves even to death.

To the extent that we are patient in all distress and in the measure that we hold fast to our Christian faith, even in the face of death, we resemble the holy martyrs, who have marked out for us through the shedding of their blood the true path to heaven.

To the extent that we resolutely bear the difficulties of Holy Christianity, both those of the living and those of the dead, we are like the holy confessors, who remained watchful in great toil and heard confessions with sympathy.

To the extent that we remain unconquered in battle⁴² and preserve our maidenly honor we are like the holy virgins, who have not lost true victory.

To the extent that we have deep sorrow and to the extent that we perform many kinds of holy penance we are like those holy widows, who, after sinning, attained such great honor.

To the extent that we have all the virtues about us we are like God and all his saints, who have followed God with complete devotion.

33. Concerning a Strict Chapter⁴³ to Which a Pilgrim Came Who Turned Out to Be a Great Lord

For a long time a certain person used to hold a strict chapter in his heart, considering how he had harmed himself, and the humiliation arising for God because of him. And then he cast out from his heart all the sinful desires of his flesh and put in their place a willingness to suffer all torments for love of God. He cast out all the pleasures he had with friends and relatives and put in their place all the humiliation that those hostile to him wished to inflict on him. He cast out as well all love of wealth and honor that give the sinful world such joy and put in their place all the poverty that one can possibly endure with good counsel.

To this chapter our Lord Jesus Christ came, looking like a poor pilgrim. The person's spirit was so enlightened that he recognized that it was our Lord, and he said: "Hello, dear Pilgrim, where are you coming from?"

He answered: "I am coming from Jerusalem. I was seriously wounded there. I suffered deep humiliation, poverty, and pain. I brought it all to you."

"I thank you for that, very dear Lord; I have certainly experienced that many a day."

Then our Lord took a simple crown, put it on the person's head and said: "This is the crown of poverty, humiliation, and suffering. This crown shall yet be adorned with my own image." Then the pilgrim went away.

The person became sad, and said: "Alas, alas for my dear Pilgrim. I really wanted to talk more with him." Then she⁴⁴ looked up in the heights and caught sight of him.

He resembled a powerful lord and was surrounded by heavenly delights, and said: "I bless you and greet you. My peace be with you always! Amen."

34. Someone Who Despises the World Should Be Honored with Nine Things

A voice was heard and these words were spoken:

“Look! Here she comes who despised the world
And who put lies to flight
And who loved truth
And who blessed me.
She shall be received with all honor.

She shall be grounded in truth.
She shall be blessed forever.
She shall be clothed with all beauty.
She shall be crowned with all dignity.
She shall be placed on the chair of eternal rest.
She shall be welcomed by every tongue.
She shall be served with all benefits.
She shall enjoy all gifts.”

35. How the Soul of One Blessed Speaks to Her Body on the Last Day

Rise up, my dearly beloved,⁴⁵ and be healed of
All your sufferings,
All your days of pain,
All your humiliation,
All your sadness,
All your loneliness,
All your wounds,
And all your toils.

The morning star has arisen: that is the birth and life of St. Mary.
The sun has sent forth its radiance: that is when God became man, labored, and ascended into heaven.
The moon shall ever remain unchanged: that is that we ever after shall remain unchanging in eternal life.
In the past my whole well-being depended on you;
Now all your consolation depends on me.
If I had not come back to you,
You would never be taken from these ashes.
Eternal day has arisen for us.
Now we shall receive our reward.

36. That John the Baptist Sang Mass for the Poor Girl Was Spiritual Knowledge in the Soul

One cannot grasp divine gifts with merely human understanding. And so they sin who do not keep their spirit open to invisible truth. What one is able to see with the eyes of the flesh, hear with the ears of the flesh, and say with one's fleshly mouth is as utterly different from the open truth of the loving soul as light from wax is from the bright sun.

That John the Baptist sang mass for the poor girl was not of the flesh; it was so spiritual that only the soul saw it, understood it, and enjoyed it. The body had nothing from it except what it could grasp in its human senses through the nobility of the soul. And this is why the words had to be expressed in human terms.

My Pharisee remarked in response to this description that John the Baptist was a layman. The Most Holy Sacrament in the mass is God's body.' John the Baptist touched this same Son of God in humble trembling fear while leading a holy life of such dignity that he heard the voice of the heavenly Father and caught his words and saw the Holy Spirit and recognized the Son in them both.⁴⁷ John the Baptist also preached the holy Christian faith openly to all the people and pointed out for the people with his finger the true Son of God who was there present: "Behold the Lamb of God." Neither pope nor bishop nor priest can ever speak so perfectly the word of God as did John the Baptist, except through our Christian faith which is above human understanding. Was this man really a layman? Prove me wrong, you who are blind! Your lies and your hate shall never be forgiven you without punishment!

37. You Should Praise God, Lament, and Ask for Twelve Things

Blessed are you, dear Lord Jesus Christ, God, Son of the living God! Through the tenets of my faith I know truly that you are here present, true God and true man. In this same name I adore you, Lord, today as my God and my Lord, as my Creator and my Redeemer, as my most dearly Beloved of all men and the most worthy of all lords, now and forever. Lord, heavenly Father, lament to your Holy Trinity that I have sinned before your eyes without fear and without shame. Alas, help me today, generous God, with all your favor, for my heart has been darkened by the habit of sinning. Cleanse my heart today, Lord, of all earthly love; and pour down, Lord, your heavenly flood into my and soul, that I might weep over indignities to you and over how deplorable my sins are.

Lord, I thank you for all the favors that you, dear Lord, have shown us, are showing us and shall show us eternally. I ask you, Lord, heavenly Father, in the name of Jesus Christ, that you purify me with your grace of all my sins and protect me from all sin, and that you make me holy for eternal life with all virtues.

I ask you, Lord Jesus Christ, by your holy death and by the pitiful suffering your holy body suffered on the holy cross, that you, Lord, with the eyes of your divine mercy, of your human faithfulness and the favor of the Holy Spirit, deign to look upon all my distress and, at the end, my death. Give me then, Lord, your very own body, that I might receive you, Lord, with true Christian faith, with genuine love, so that your holy body might be and remain the last food of my body and the eternal bread of my poor soul.

I ask you further, dearest Lord, that you might want to comfort my poor soul with your own self and might release me from all enemies. I ask you, dearest Lord Jesus Christ, that you then receive my poor soul into your fatherly hands and take me then in great joy out of this wretched banishment into the land of your blessed Father, where, Lord, I might bless you and praise you with all the saints who are now there present and shall yet come. Grant this to me, dear Lord Jesus Christ, and to all those with me who are kind and faithful to me out of love for you. And come to the aid of those with me, too, who are unkind and unfaithful to me against your wishes, together with all those who, with me, are believing Christians.

I ask you, Lord, for the sake of your own honor that you give us Christians always on the chair in Rome a leader filled with all Christian virtues through which Holy Christianity may expand in love and be freed from all sins and be made holy with all virtues, so that you, dear Lord, might see fit today to free with your almighty hand Jerusalem and all the towns and lands that are oppressed by unjust power, for the sake of your three glorious names."

Together with all the saints I ask you, dearest Jesus Christ, for Christian peace, for a sufficient harvest and for good weather for this land and for all Christian lands. I ask you, dear Lord, that you keep your friends in your service and that you convert your enemies and undermine their wickedness. I ask you, Emperor of all honors and Crown of all princes, Lord Jesus Christ, on behalf of the princes in this land and those of all Christian lands, that you deign today to unite them in your Holy Spirit, so that they never again instigate a sinful war against your will and against their own well-being.

I pray to you, dear Jesus Christ, for all Christians who are today in distress, suffering drought, are sick, in prison, in sadness, in severe poverty. I ask you in your generous kindness that you might so comfort them today that they may never lose your eternal comfort and your blessed favor.

I pray to you, holy Father of heaven, for all Christian souls that depart from their bodies today, that you, merciful God, might be their Preserver and impart to them eternal life. Ah, dear Lord, have mercy on the souls of my father and mother, and on all the souls in purgatory. Free them, Lord, at this hour through your three glorious names. May they rest in peace. Amen.⁵⁰

I pray to you, dear Lord, for all my companions," that you may give all of us the virtues that purify and sanctify our life for your praise and for the benefit of Holy Christianity. Receive today, Lord, this prayer and my lament, and hear and answer me according to your grace. Amen.

38. No one Can Destroy God's Heaven. Hell Drives God Out

"Alas, dear Lord, almighty God, how long shall I stand here on the earth of my flesh like a stick or a target that people run, hurl, and shoot at, having long ago sullied my honor with cunning and malice?"

Now listen to this reply:

"No one is so swift of foot,
No one is so strong at hurling,
No one is so cunning in shooting,
No one is so malicious in his rage
That he can destroy my heaven
Or smash to pieces or damage the place where I dwell.
What is more: Those who today offer me shelter
And tomorrow throw me out,
They are like hell.
Whose foundation I am,
I shall be his pinnacle as well."

"Alas, Lord, who shall help me that I always travel on the path that, if I slip, I not fall?"

Fear of God shall keep me upright; God's will shall guide me.

39. The Reflection of God's Radiance by Our Lady and Her Power

Oh, oh, oh, three Persons have one name undivided in one God. Gracefully they flow full force toward Mary's countenance, inseparable in one light beam, richly bestowing the bright light of heavenly honors. With an indescribable greeting⁵² it touches her heart, which shines and glows in such a way that the sublime reflection of the Holy Trinity lingers on her countenance.

It flows farther still
And fills all the humble vessels of love,
Giving them splendor and honor
Far beyond the others.

In this bright reflection our Lady can well make demands. And yet, if she wants to request something, she does so with humility; for God in his love became man in her humility. Does our Lady need humility in heaven? Only to the extent that she honors God more than herself, submissively together with all the blessed who follow her example.

Our Lady's radiance is illumined by all the pure gifts that she received from God. She is adorned as well with all the virtues perfectly. She is crowned with all dignity. Thus does she flow back into God full of all charm.

How our Lady feels bliss in the Holy Trinity and how God unites himself to her beyond how he does with all pure persons cannot be expressed in words. But to the degree they were united here on earth, our Lady feels bliss in heaven, and, in like measure, our Lord pours into her, beyond what he does with all the other saints. Our Lady has power over all the devils to keep them away from people. And that is why we like to proclaim our Ave Maria in her splendorous presence: so that she might remember us here.

40. Temptation, the World, and a Good End Test Us

No one knows how firmly he stands until he has been flung into the temptations of the body.

No one knows how strong he is until he is assailed by the wickedness of the world.

No one knows how good he is until he has achieved a good end.

41. How God's Splendor Is Reflected in a Human Being and in the Angels

You⁵³ want me to continue to write, but I cannot. Bliss, glory, brightness, intimate love, truth: these so overwhelm me that I have become dumb, unable to say more of what I know.

And yet: A mirror was seen in heaven before the breast of each soul [and body] .⁵⁴ In it shines the mirror of the Holy Trinity, giving truth and knowledge of all the virtues the body ever practiced and of all the gifts the soul had ever received on earth. From here the glorious reflection of each and every person shines forth back again into the sublime majesty from which it flowed forth. The radiance of the angels is fiery, bright with love, for they take great delight in our blessedness. They serve us effortlessly and their reward increases while the earth exists. True love of God has the same power in the angels that it does in men. That our serving requires great effort is due to our being sinful.

42. Sister Mechthild Wrote the Following in a Note to Her Brother B., of the Order of Preachers, Saying⁵⁵

"The greatest joy in heaven is the will of God. When unwillingness becomes willingness, God's joy enters into the heart of a sad person. This is the confession of a spiritual person-that one has carelessly scorned a gift that comes from God. We should accept gifts of pain with joy. We should accept gifts of comfort with fear. Thus we can put all things that come our way to good use.

Dear friend, be in harmony with God, and be happy with his will.

[43. This Writing Flowed out of God's

The writing in this book flowed out of the living Godhead into Sister Mechthild's heart and has been as faithfully set down here as it was given by God, out of her heart and written by her hand. Thanks be to God.]⁵⁷

Book VII

1. The Crown and the Dignity of Our Lord Jesus Christ, Which He Shall Receive After the Last Day

Our Lord, the heavenly Father, in his divine wisdom has stored away many ineffable gifts with which he intends to adorn his chosen children after the last day. Especially for his only begotten Son, Jesus, our Redeemer, has the heavenly Father prepared and fashioned a crown with such rich and exquisite workmanship that all the craftsmen who ever existed, are now, and ever shall be could not fully capture the splendor and rich delights of this crown. The spiritual eyes of the loving soul beheld this crown in limitless eternity and its nature was made known to her. What is this thing called eternity? It is the uncreated wisdom of the infinite Godhead that has neither beginning nor end.

The crown has three arches. The first arch is that of the patriarchs, the second that of the prophets, the third that of Holy Christianity. The crown is formed by the images and decorated with the presence of all the blessed who are destined to possess God's kingdom on the last day. They shall have honor that is portioned out to them according to their works.

The first arch of the crown is fashioned and illumined with the precious stones of the holy interior life and good works the patriarchs ever performed. The arch is also formed by human likeness, body and soul. The first likeness on the arch of the crown is that of St. Stephen, and all the martyrs who ever shed their blood in Christian faith are depicted together with him. Next to this, St. Peter and all God's apostles with him are also depicted; then come all the blessed who followed the teachings of the apostles. Those married people shall also be depicted on this arch, together with their children, who have followed God through good works.

The second arch of the crown is covered with the likenesses of the popes together with all the spiritual fathers to whom God entrusted his sheep. This arch is fashioned with all spiritual authority and decorated with the flowers of Christian teaching.

The third arch of the crown is formed most beautifully of all, with the noble human form of our Lord Jesus Christ, and with him his glorious mother Mary with all her virgins who shall follow the Lamb.' St. John the Baptist is represented there very close to the Lamb, and all those who became Christians under his hands are splendidly represented with him. This arch of the crown is adorned with the natures of all creatures in accordance with the love and affection that the creator had for them when he created all things according to his will.

The crown is garlanded with many knightly shields of mighty Christian faith. The empire shall also be represented on the crown, fashioned and decorated down to the very last peasant, their honor always depending on how well they served God.

At the time of the Antichrist the crown shall be crenelated with many a glorious image, such as that of Elias and Enoch, and many holy martyrs shall be there before them wearing the flowers of the holiness of their life and enhanced by their precious blood.

The crown shall also be dyed in the blood of the Lamb, and shall shine forth and be gilded with the powerful love that broke the sweet heart of Jesus in two. Our heavenly Father created this crown; Jesus Christ earned it; the Holy Spirit fashioned it and hammered it out in fiery love, making it so pliable with the refined skills of the Holy Trinity that it fits our Redeemer Jesus Christ so well and looks so glorious on him that the heavenly Father receives more joy still from his only begotten Son. This has to be, even though the eternal Godhead without a beginning always contained all bliss and joy within itself, does now, and ever shall. And yet it causes him special eternal joy, that he shall gaze with such happiness upon his eternal Son, together with all his followers.

When Jesus Christ has held his last judgment and has served and celebrated his last supper, he shall receive this crown from his Father in great honor and with him all those who in body and soul with great effort have come to the eternal feast. Each soul and body shall see its honor on the crown.

The crown was produced on earth at a great cost-not with gold, nor with silver, nor with jewels; rather, with human toil, with human tears, sweat, and blood, with all the virtues and, finally, with painful death. Angels will not be seen on the crown because they are not human beings. But they shall praise God for the crown with delightful song.

The first choir sings: "We praise you, Lord, because of your glorious law from which have come forth all here present whose likenesses appear on your crown."

The second choir: "We praise you, Lord, with the faith of Abraham and with the fervent longing and prophecies of all the prophets."

The third choir: "We praise you, Lord, with all the wisdom and piety of all your apostles."

The fourth choir: "We praise you, Lord, with the blood and the constancy of all your martyrs."

The fifth choir: "We praise you, Lord, for the holy prayer and Christian teaching of all the baptists and confessors."

The sixth choir: "We praise you, Lord, with the steadfastness of the penitence of your widows."

The seventh choir: "We praise you, Lord, with the chastity of all virgins."

The eighth choir: "We praise you, Lord, with the fruit of your mother and virgin."

The ninth choir: "We praise you, Lord, for your holy death and your glorious life after your death, and for your great outpouring of every gift and every goodness with which, Lord, you have raised us up and admirably ranked us. We praise you, Lord, with your fiery love in which you have made us one."

Above the crown flies the loveliest banner ever seen in this empire. This shall be the holy cross on which Christ suffered his death. The cross has four ends. The bottom end is decorated with bliss brighter than the sun. On the right side beneath the cross the pillar is suspended upright, stained with the blood of the Lamb, festooned and decorated with the nails with which our Lord was wounded. At the top of the tree of the cross hangs suspended the fairest imperial thorn-crown of the realm.

The thorns have blossoms
Lily white, rosy pink,
Delightful, bright as heaven.

That is the banner of the crown with which Jesus won the victory and returned alive to his Father.

Right after the last day, at the eternal celebration, when God has made all things new, this crown will be revealed and will sit lightly upon the humanity of our Lord to the glory and praise of the Holy Trinity and the joy of all the blessed evermore.

The humanity of our Lord is an intelligible image of his eternal Godhead,² so that we can grasp the Godhead with the humanity and, like the Holy Trinity, enjoy, hug, kiss, and embrace God in an incomprehensible manner, whom neither heaven nor hell nor purgatory can ever grasp or resist. The eternal Godhead shines forth, lighting up all the blessed who are in its presence and making them ready for love, so that they freely rejoice and live ever free of interior suffering. The humanity of our Lord greets, rejoices, and loves his flesh and his blood without ceasing. Though there is no longer flesh and blood there, still the brotherly kinship is so great that he has to love his human nature in a special way.

The Holy Spirit, too, shares its heavenly outpouring of love, enriching the blessed and so utterly satisfying them that they sing with joy, charmingly laugh and leap with measured step, flow and float along. They soar and climb from choir to choir to the heights of the realm where they gaze into the mirror of eternity' and understand the will and all the works of the Holy Trinity and how they themselves have been formed in body and soul, as they shall remain forever. The soul is formed in the body with human qualities but has a divine shimmer about it and shines through the body as radiant gold shines through pure crystal.

Thus do they⁴ become utterly free and happy,
Agile, strong, and filled with love,
Radiant and as godlike as one can be.
They travel about wherever they want
As swiftly over a thousand leagues

As one here forms a thought.
Just think what such movement is like!
And yet never can they touch or grasp an end of this kingdom.
The expanse of space and streets of gold are overly large,
And yet are the right size and not really golden.
They are infinitely better than gold and precious stones.
These things are completely of the earth and shall be annihilated.

And now comes the end of the crown: The Holy Spirit will be fashioning the crown until the last day. Then the Father and the Son shall reward him for his work. As recompense he shall give him all the souls and bodies that are assembled in the kingdom of God. There within them the Holy Spirit shall rest eternally, and he shall constantly hail them and fill them with joy. Everything that was ever done or will ever be done for the love of God, everything that was ever endured or forsaken for God's sake shall all blossom forth on the crown. Ah, what a crown! Ah, who can help me become a tiny flower on the crown like the newly baptized infants who are the tiniest flowers on the crown?

If this description is too long, it is because I take such rich delight in the crown. Actually, I have set down many a long description with few words. I say this to myself: "How much longer, helpless puppy, will you go on yapping? You have to quiet down because I have to keep silent about what is finest."

2. How a Person Prayed for All the Souls on All Souls 'Day

On All Souls' Day I prayed together with Holy Christianity for all the souls that are doing penance in purgatory. Then I saw a purgatory that was like a stove. On the outside it was black; inside it was full of fiery flames. Looking inside I saw how they stood in the flames and burned like a bundle of straw. Then someone was standing next to me who looked like a large angel. I asked him how it was that the souls squeezed themselves outside when the prayers of good people reached them. Some squeezed themselves outside and some were unable to do so. Then he whom I asked answered me: "When they were on earth, they did not want to come to the aid of those who were begging them for help in their distress."

Then my soul was moved to pity because of their power and dignity, and cried to heaven: "Lord God, could I go inside to them and suffer with them so that they might come to you sooner?" Then our Lord revealed that he was the angel standing next to me, and he said: "If you are willing to go in, I shall go in with you." Then our Lord clasped the spirit of this person to himself and brought her inside. When the soul came inside with our Lord, she felt no pain. Then she asked how many of them there were. Our Lord said: "You can't finish counting them, and these are the ones for whom you prayed while they were on earth."

Then I found a person for whom I used to pray thirty years ago. And I was saddened because I had nothing to give him and, because of my wretchedness, I did not dare ask for great things from such a great Lord. Then I said the following words: "O dear Lord, would you release them?" Then all at once they rose up in great numbers wonderfully whiter than snow, and they floated off toward paradise in pure sweet bliss. There they rested in joy. When they rose out of the fire, they all sang the following psalm: "Praise the Lord, ye children. After that they sang: "We praise you, Lord, for the greatness of your goodness, for the generousness of your gift and for the faithfulness of your help."

Our Lord was still standing next to the place of fire and held the spirit of the person in his embrace. The soul of the person said: "O Lord, you well know what I desire." This was that she might be at the feet of our Lord in order to thank him.

Our Lord then let her down,
And she thanked him again
That she was able to witness the great honor
That the poor souls had received from God.
Then she found on his feet
The rose-colored wounds
Of our true redemption.

Then she prayed: "Lord, give me your blessing."
And our Lord said: "I bless you with my wounds."

May this happen to me and to all God's friends and mine. This, alas, did not come about through my efforts, for I consider the entreaties of Holy Christianity to be worth much more than mine.

3. How Beneficial It Is for a Person to Examine His Heart Constantly with Humble Fear

I know of no one so good that it is unnecessary for him to examine his heart constantly, to recognize what dwells within it, and also to criticize with great frequency all his deeds. One should do this with humble fear. God's voice taught me this, for I have never performed any deed so well that I could not have done it better. This is what I criticize myself for.

This is how we should chide our frailty: "Well now, you most wretched of all creatures, how long do you intend to harbor useless habits in your five senses? Our childhood was foolish, our youth became troubled. How we then conquered is clear to God. Alas, in my old age there is, unfortunately, much that I must criticize, for it is unproductive in resplendent deeds and cold as to graces. It is powerless as well, since it does not have youth with which to sustain fiery love of God. It also has no tolerance for pain, so that a small twinge that youth would ignore is quite painful. But proper old age is joyfully patient and trusts in God alone.

Seven years ago a discouraged old person complained to God about this sorry state of things. God gave this reply:

"Your childhood was a playmate of my Holy Spirit.
Your youth was a bride of my humanity.
Your old age is now a housewife of my Godhead."

Alas, dear Lord, what good is it that a dog barks if the owner of the house keeps on sleeping? The thief breaks into his house anyway.

And yet the prayer of a pure heart sometimes awakens the dead sinner. Woe, sinner! How bitterly can one weep for you, for you are your own murderer and you are harmful to all goodness and yet a benefit to it. A good person receives great profit when he sees someone weaken or fall into sin. He then looks very carefully around him so that he might not get into that trouble at all. Thus does a good person better himself through evil things. Freely performed good deeds then follow. But a wicked person gets worse when he sees bad examples. He becomes so evil that he looks with contempt upon good deeds and good people. And he is most comfortable with his own perverse wisdom.

My dear Schoolmaster, who taught me this book, silly stupid person though I be, also taught me the following saying: You should not trust someone who is not sincere in what he does. I know an enemy who is a destroyer of divine truth in the human heart. If one gives him room, he writes, with the approval of the person, false wisdom into the person's heart and says: "I am quick to anger and weak by nature." This is not an honorable excuse before God. With the help of grace you should become meek and strong.

"I have no grace." Then in your lack of grace you should call out to the God of grace with humble tears and with constant prayers in holy desire. Then the worm of anger will die. You must do violence to yourself. Then there will be no need for any hurtful force from God or anyone else to come upon you. Then the worm of anger shall be annihilated. If, with God, we want to overcome and drive out our anger and all our imperfections, we simply have to ignore our sinful temptations in secret and outwardly put on a holy, cheerful demeanor.

Alas, wretched brood, as long as we storm around in anger, even if there is anything good about us, we still have to come back to our heart.' Then we must rightly be ashamed. The anger consumed our strength and dried out our flesh, and so we wasted our valuable time when we should have been serving God. Alas, this is an eternal loss! Again, alas! I regret the sinful tears that were shed in haughty anger. The soul becomes so darkened thereby that a person is incapable the whole time of rightly enjoying any good things. But tears of sorrow are so holy. If a great sinner could shed one tear of sorrow for all his sins, he would never go to everlasting hell-if he remained in this disposition.

No matter how small the sins are that a good person commits regularly, which he just won't give up the while he lives-if he dies thus without confession and penance, no matter how holy he is, he will end up in bitter purgatory. For as merciful as God is, he is also at the same time just and angered by all sins. I tell myself that love must dwell in us. Never should we be self-righteous. Then humility will dwell within.

4. Our Lord's Switch

Not long after I arrived at the convent,' I was so terribly afflicted with sickness that my Lady felt pity. So I said to our Lord: "Dear Lord, what is your purpose with this suffering?" And our Lord said this:

"All your paths have been measured out;
All your footsteps have been counted.
Your life has been sanctified.
Your end shall be happy,
And my kingdom is very close to you."

"Lord, why is my life sanctified, since I can do so little that is good?"

Then our Lord said: "Your life has become sanctified because my switch never leaves your back."

We praise you, God,' that God is so good.

5. Why the Convent Was Once Undergoing Trials

One should do good to those who one knows are in need of it. For I do not want to have from the convent the good that one withholds from them. This is the explanation: Each one according to his office should in mercy do good to those he knows to be in need.

6. The Chapter Room¹ and How a Person Should Examine His Infractions and Weep for Them; Two Golden Pennies and Good Will and Desire

Whoever has this knowledge, let him lament and weep with me. For the chosen children of God frequently take God's body, receiving it in a holy manner. But I have to go to my chapter room accompanied by my burning conscience.

Then my unworthiness comes and chides me.
Then my indolence comes and accuses me.
Then the frivolousness of my personality comes and points out my capriciousness to me.
Then the wretchedness of my useless life comes and saddens me.
Then fear of God comes and scourges me.

Then I crawl forward like a tiny worm on the ground and hide myself under the grass of my many various omissions all my days. There I sit and cry to heaven: "O merciful God, grant me that I might today share in the grace that your chosen ones have now received."

Thereupon our Lord replied: "Take two golden pennies that weigh the same and go shopping with them. If they are of equal value, they are equally good."

"Alas, dear Lord, how can my wretchedness be equal to your goodness? For I am not the person who could well offer you honor. I have nothing that is suitable for you, and for consolation my soul clings to worthless nothings in the world. And so I am rejected and, alas, corrupt. I am not at all what I have long desired to be."

Our Lord said: "With good will and with holy desire you can make good whatever you want."

7. How a Person May Always Be United with God

For a person to be constantly united with God is heavenly bliss beyond all earthly pleasure. How is this supposed to happen to us? Our longing should constantly accompany all our actions, and we should constantly examine all our actions in Christian faith and from God's point of view, and never be useless. Thus we praise God with all our works for all the works he ever performed on earth for love of us. Then we are united with him in his works on earth with celestial love. After this we shall be spiritually illumined. Then we praise our Lord God with all the gifts that he ever gave us: our body and possessions, friends and relatives, and all the earthly joy that we could desire. In so doing we thank God for all his generous gifts that he ever gave us on earth for body and soul. Then we are united with God in the love of receiving and in humble gratitude. We should thereby press all God's gifts to our heart. Then our heart becomes full of love, our senses are opened, and our soul so resplendent that we look into divine knowledge like someone who sees his own countenance in a bright mirror. Thus can we know God's will in all our actions, so that we glorify God's will and love it whether it brings suffering or comfort; and we are happy about what happens to us, except for sin. This we should weep over and hate, for it is always cursed. Thereby we on earth become united with the saints in heaven because they are the happiest of all about the will of God in heaven.

I do not know how the enemy found out when God gave me this knowledge at night and I was united in it with great joy. He came to me and spoke to me in confidence because he wanted to trick me. I heard his voice with my fleshly ears, and I saw his form with spiritual eyes-black, filthy, and like a frightening human. But I was not afraid of him. This is why: Whenever God's grace is present in the soul and occupies the senses, the body cannot be afraid in his presence. But when the body is still occupied with useless activity-if he comes then, the body suffers such pain in his presence that I have never suffered that amount of pain in my life.

Then he said to me: "I dreamed at night that I was rich and had a lot of possessions."

He wanted me to think that this holy union of God with the soul was just a dream. The housewife of the body, the soul, said inwardly: "You are not truthful."

And he said: "Yes, and I shall exist as long as God lives."

And the soul said: "You certainly are smart. Tell me, what should I do?"

The devil went too far: "You should be happy and should make a show of this great event in your demeanor."

The soul: "Unfortunately, I am not so small that I can grasp through the eye of the needle all my enemies to the heavenly gates of my everlasting land."

The devil: "You are shielded all too well."

The soul: "In your words I recognize your falseness, doubt, empty glory, and arrogance. Even if a steel wall up to the clouds were around me, my heart would still never be free and safe from my enemies."

Then he stood there and trembled before me. Oh, how full of falseness that seemed to me to be! Then he tore out his hair and sprang away angrily.

8. How a Person Seeks God

When God chooses to withdraw from someone, that person seeks our Lord God and says:

"Lord, my suffering is deeper than the abyss.
My heart's anguish extends outward wider than the world.
My fear is larger than the mountains.
My longing is higher than the stars.
Nowhere in these things can I find you."

In this distress the soul noticed her Lover near her, resembling a fair young lad, so fair that it cannot be described. And yet she would have hidden herself. Then she falls at his feet and greets his wounds. So sweet are they that she can no longer feel any of her pain or anything of her age. And she thought: "Alas, how much you would like to look upon his countenance, but then you would have to abandon his wounds. And how much you would like to hear his words and wishes." Then she arises clothed and adorned in spotless propriety.

Then he says: "Welcome, my dearest love." In the sound of the words she knew that every soul that serves God in his favor is his dearest love.

Then he said: "I must temper you as to pleasure, both yours and mine." The pleasure is beyond describing.

He said: "Receive this crown of virgins." Then the crown went from him and came onto her head. It shone as though it were of pure gold. The crown was double and was also the crown of love.

Then our Lord said: "This crown shall be displayed before the whole army of heaven."

Then she asked: "Lord, are you going to receive my soul tomorrow after I have received your holy body?"

"No," he said, "you are to become richer still in suffering."

"Lord, what should I be doing here in this convent?"

"You should illumine and teach them and should remain with them in great honor."

Then she thought: "Ah, now you are here alone with our Lord."

As she thought this, she saw two angels standing next to her. They were as worthy of respect as secular princes are in comparison to poor people. Then she said: "How can I now hide?"

They said: "We shall bring you from suffering to suffering, from virtue to virtue, from knowledge to knowledge, from love to love."

That a sinful mouth should and must say all this is difficult for me; and yet, before God and because of obedience, I dare not omit it. May I keep a human sense of shame and fear of God all my days!

9. How the Loving Soul Praises Our Lord with All Creatures

The loving soul never has enough of praising. That is why she gathers within herself in her longing everything that God ever created and then calls out to heaven: "Lord, if it were possible that all these people were as perfect and as holy as your blessed mother, Mary, that still would not be enough for wretched me for praising you fully with your only begotten Son. Lord, can one ever praise you enough? No, and that makes me happy."

To this our Lord replied: "Those virgins who have long served me shall praise me."

10. This Happened at a Time When There Was Great Turmoil

I prayed to our Lord for distress caused by war and for the many sins of the world. And our Lord answered and said: "The stink of sins nauseates me from the abyss of earth to the heavens. If it were possible, they would drive me out. Sins once did drive me out; then I came in humility and served the world until my death. Now nothing like that can ever happen again. Now because of sin I must sometimes bring my justice into play."

"Dear Lord, what then should we poor wretches do?"

Our Lord said: "You should humble yourselves under the restless hand of God almighty and fear him in all your actions. I shall yet free my people from all distress; they are my friends. Prayer in common appeases my heart. I shall show how I am disposed. I hear with pleasure the prayers of religious people who mean it from the heart": Our help is in the name of the Lord. Praise the Lord all ye nations. And the Son is glorified. The kingdom of the world. My heart leapt up. Whom I saw. Glory be to the Father and the Son."

"Lord heavenly Father, accept your service and your praise from your downcast children and free your people from this present distress and release us all from all our bonds except from the bonds of love. May they never be taken from us!"

11. How Our Lord Was Seen Looking Like a Worker

Our Lord showed me an allegory that he realized in me and still does. I saw a poor man get up from the ground. He was clothed in poor linen cloth like a worker. In his hands he had a carrying frame. On it lay a burden similar to the earth. I said: "My good man, what are you carrying?"

"I am carrying," he said, "your sufferings. Turn your will toward suffering; lift, and carry."

And the person said: "Lord, I am so poor that I do not have anything."

Our Lord said: "This is what I taught my disciples when I said: 'Blessed are the poor in spirit.'¹² This is the case when a person can do nothing but would like to—that is spiritual poverty."

The person: "Lord, if it is you, turn your face toward me so that I can recognize you."

And our Lord said: "Recognize me within."

The soul: "Lord, if I were to see you in the midst of thousands, I would easily recognize you." My heart turned me within into a guard and I did not dare dispute with him that it was he. So I said: "Dear Lord, this burden is too heavy."

And our Lord said: "I shall put it so close to me that you can carry it quite well. Follow me and see how I stood on the cross in the sight of my heavenly Father, and remain like that."

She said: "Lord, give me your blessing for it."

"I bless you without ceasing. There will be good help for your sufferings."

"Lord, help in this all those who willingly suffer torment for love of you."

12. How a Person Should Resist Vain Honor and Temptation

Whenever a person thinks well of himself, vain honor immediately leaps forth out of a corner of the human heart along with sinful desire and tries to sprawl out into the five senses. Then one should take oneself in hand and instantly beat one's breast in humble fear and bless oneself with the sign of the holy cross. Then it will immediately disappear, as if it had never existed. I in my wretchedness have often had this experience. One should do this same thing the minute evil thoughts come shooting in. They, too, disappear because of the power of the holy cross—if one is really sorry for them.

13. How Our Lord Was Seen Looking Like a Pilgrim

I, a poor unworthy person, shall disregard myself and tell what I have seen and heard in God. One night I saw our Lord standing there in the likeness of a pilgrim. He acted as if he had been trudging through all of Christendom. I fell at his feet and said: "My dear pilgrim, where are you coming from?"

He said: "I'm coming from Jerusalem." By that he meant Christianity. "And I have been driven from my shelter. The heathens do not acknowledge me, Jews do not want me, Christians attack me."

Then I prayed for Christianity. And our Lord made clear in fine detail his innocence regarding the great shame that he suffers from Christianity and explained how much good he has done for Christianity from the beginning and how he has labored for Christians and day after day still searches for ways to pour his grace into them.

Then our Lord again complained and said: "People drive me from the shelter of their heart with their selfishness, and when I find no room in them, I let them be in their selfishness. And when they die I judge them as I then find them to be."

Then I prayed for the convent: "Dear Lord, do not let them perish."

["I shall let no one perish.]" "I shall put a light in their cemetery. In it they shall know themselves."

14. God's Choosing and Blessing

Another night, while I was at prayer and filled with longing and oblivious of myself, I became aware of our Lord. He was standing in the cemetery and had the whole community before him lined up according to when they had entered the convent. And our Lord said to them: "I have chosen you. If you choose me, I shall give you something."

Then I said: "Lord, what shall you give them?"

And he said: "I shall make of them on earth shining mirrors, so that all who see them shall recognize their life in them. And in heaven I shall make them radiant mirrors, so that all who look upon them will know that I have chosen them." Then our Lord stretched forth his hand and gave them his blessing saying: "I bless you with myself. Choose me in all your thoughts."

The ones who choose our Lord in all their thoughts are those blessed who praise our Lord fittingly.

Then I said: "They are going to ask me in what form and fashion I saw you."

And he said: "There are some among them who know me."

15. How a Person Who Loves Truth Should Pray

The person who loves truth likes to pray thus: "Ah, dear Lord, grant me and help me that I always seek you in a holy manner with all my five senses in all things, for I have chosen you in preference to all lords and all sovereigns as Bridegroom of my soul. Grant me also, Lord, that I might find you with all my longing, burning or spent though it be. I desire also that I may enjoy you with the flowing love of all your gifts. Give me, Lord, abundantly of your outflowing, that it fill my heart and mind so that pain, scorn, and bitterness may ever feel pleasant to me. Grant me that it may ever turn out that way for me through your favor, generous God; now grant me this. Help me also, Lord, to keep you by giving up completely my own will according to your desire. Then I would never, ever lose that love that never ceases to burn. Amen."

16. How a Person Spoke and Prayed

For a long time a person desired more than all gifts and suffering that God release her soul with a holy end. And our Lord said: "Wait for me."

The person said: "Dear Lord, I cannot control my longing; I would so dearly like to be with you."

Our Lord said: "I longed for you before the beginning of the world. I long for you and you long for me. Where two burning desires meet, there love is perfect."

17. How Knowledge Speaks to the Conscience

Knowledge said to the conscience: "No matter how much people despise you and inflict suffering upon you, nevertheless stand pure in God."

Conscience: "Lady Knowledge, you have put it very well. To feel comfortable in all kinds of trouble a person must have a humble heart."

Knowledge: "Lady Conscience, you have such a fine mirror in which you frequently examine yourself very meticulously. This¹⁴ must indeed be the living Son of God with all his works. It cannot be that you are so wise by some other means."

Conscience: "Lady Knowledge, when I examine myself in it, I experience both pleasure and pain. Pleasure, because God comes to me as a flowing goodness; pain, because I am so feeble in good works."

Knowledge: "Lady Conscience, in all things you prefer God's will and God's glory to your own benefit for body or soul. You are hell for the devil and heaven for God. To what can one compare you?"

Conscience: "Lady Knowledge, everything I have from God was given me on loan, so that with it I might gain praise and glory for him and for my own benefit as well. For if I am to pay him back, I shall certainly need his grace."

Knowledge: "Lady Conscience, you are very much fettered by the sins of the world, and the imperfections of religious people cause you much heartache. They have freedom of choice to go to heaven or to hell or to a long stay in purgatory. That is a heavy burden for you."

Conscience: "Lady Knowledge, I do not complain because I am met with dislike or because I have days of suffering. Rather, I feel sorrow for the sins of the world just as I do for my own. Suffering cleanses the body of sin and sanctifies the soul in God. This is why we joyfully stand ready for its command."

Knowledge: "Lady Conscience, the well-intentioned high and mighty in the world offer up to God their possessions and their alms. Religious people offer their flesh and blood in his service, offering up to God, above all things, their own will in obedience. That weighs more, that has greater value."

Conscience: "Lady Knowledge, that is not enough. If we want to enjoy God in the heights, we must have the crown of humility and pure chastity, from birth or chosen later, and the pinnacle of love before all else."

This same delightful garment is worn by the Holy Trinity: the Father-the pinnacle of love; the Son-pure, humble chastity that he imparted to all his chosen ones; the Holy Spirit-on fire with love for us in all our good actions in true humility.

Knowledge: "Lady Conscience, steadfastness in good things: that is a love that toils. One cannot do without it if one wants to possess with God the highest honor, both here and in his eternal realm. Happy the person who here strives for it."

18. Suggestions for the Seven Hours¹⁵ for Honoring the Passion of Our Lord

At matins:"

O great dew of the noble Godhead,
O tender blossom of the sweet maiden,
O beneficial fruit of the beautiful flowers,
O holy sacrifice of the heavenly Father,
O faithful pledge of redemption for the whole world, Lord Jesus Christ!
Receive your holy morning service as praise and honor
For your birth in exile, your lonely distress,
Your extreme suffering, your holy death,
Your glorious resurrection, your splendid ascension,
Your almighty glory as praise and honor.

Remember, dear Lord, that I must carry out your holy will to a good end in all I do and leave undone in my whole life to honor your Holy Trinity and for all those who are with me and in your name are your friends and mine.

At prime:

O wretched shame, O dreadful pain that killed your glorious body and sweet heart. Help me, dear Lord, that I can and shall make the best of being despised and of all my interior suffering in your love, as it may please you in your eternal glory.

At terce:

O heavy burden, O wretched weight that you carried for us, Lord, under your cross! Carry us, Lord, through all our distress into eternal life.

At sext:

O bloody agony, O wounds so deep,
O pain so great.
Let me, Lord, not perish
In all my painful anguish. Amen.

At none:

O most blessed anguish, O most holy death,
O most delightful mirror of the heavenly Father,
Jesus Christ, fastened high on the cross by hand and foot!

I commend to you, Lord, my soul at my final end, that I may unceasingly and forever more be united with you just as your heavenly Father was and is. Grant this to me and to all who love you faithfully.

At vespers:

O bound flowing of love,
O faithful outpouring of the heart,
O glorious body that was killed there for my sake,
Dearest Lord Jesus Christ!

I beseech you that my five senses may and shall constantly rejoice in the bloody lance and in the wound of your heart, and that my lonely soul shall eternally rejoice therein, along with those for whom I shall and want to pray according to Christian practice. Amen.

At compline:

O holy depths of all humility,
O generous breadth of all gifts,
O glorious heights of all love,
In which you, Jesus Christ, pray to your heavenly Father!

Fulfill now, Lord, your prayers in us and sanctify us in truth, and give us the depths of all humility in which we may bow low beneath all creatures, since creatures resist someone who does not do as we do. Grant us, Lord, the breadth of all generosity, and that we, for love of you, fulfill willingly the rule of our order; and give us, Lord, the heights of your love that it may preserve us pure in you and uncorrupted by all earthly things. Amen.

19. The Greeting of Our Lady

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the everlasting joy of the Holy Trinity.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the beginning of all our happiness.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the companion of the holy angels here and in God's kingdom.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the flower of the patriarchs.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the hope of the prophets.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the white lily of humble virgins.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, remember how the greeting came to you from Gabriel's mouth and welcome my soul in my final hour, and bring me with joy unspoiled out of this land of exile into the richly joyous land of your dear Child where I may find rest.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the wisdom that taught the apostles.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the rose of the martyrs.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the protection of the confessors.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the helper of all widows.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the glory of all the saints of your dear Child. Pray for me, that I might be sanctified with them with all my works as far as it is possible for a lowly person like me, Mary, dear Empress.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the refuge of sinners.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the mighty helper of those in despair.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the consoler of all Holy Christianity.

Hail, dear Lady Mary, you are the terror of all evil spirits, for they took flight from you. Drive them from me, dear Lady, that they never, ever find joy because of me, and may I ever be constant in your service.

20. How One Should Pray the Ave Maria to Our Lady

Hail, celestial Empress, Mother of God and the dear love of my heart. Receive, lady, your Ave Maria today as praise and honor for the blissful sight of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, which is wonderfully unconcealed and opened to the virginal maternal countenance, filled with all happiness. Ali, lady, remember all my longings and all my prayers, all my torments and all my distress and all my interior suffering, my honor, my soul, and my final end, when I leave this deplorable exile. I commend all of this ever and again to your motherly faithfulness and your maidenly honor and your womanly goodness and, in addition, I commend all those with me who are my friends and yours in the name of God almighty, my dearest Lady, Mary, noble Empress!

21. How One Should Examine One's Heart Before Going to God's Tablet'

You" want to have instruction from me, but I myself am uneducated. What you are searching for you can find a thousand times better in your books.

Whenever I, in my unworthiness, am about to go up and receive the body of our Lord, I examine the countenance of my soul in the mirror of my sins. There I see myself as I lived, as I am now living, and as I shall live in the future. In this mirror of my sins I see nothing but alas and woe. Then I cast my face to the ground and weep plaintively, if I can, because eternal incomprehensible God is so kind that he wants to bow down to the filthy puddle of my heart. Then I call to mind that injustice it would be fairer if one were to drag my body to the gallows, like a thief who had stolen from his rightful lord the precious treasure of purity, which God gave me in holy baptism.

As long as we live,
We shall ruefully lament
That we have darkened ourselves.
For this, Lord, may you forgive us like a father.

If a person did not confess a sin and has no intention of confessing it, he should not receive God's body.

Now I shall approach true hope
And shall thank God
That I was ever noticed,
That it can actually happen to a wretched person like me
That I may receive the body of God.
Now I shall joyfully go to God's table
And I shall receive that same bloody Lamb
That willed to be on the cross,
Bloody, with his holy five wounds untended.
Fortunate for us that this ever happened.
In his holy passion I shall endure all my troubles.
We go joyfully, then, and with hearts filled with love
And with our souls open, and receive our Beloved,
The most Beloved of our hearts,

And lay him down in our soul
As in a cozy cradle,
And sing his praise and honor
For that first hardship that he wished to endure
When he lay in the crib.
Then we bow down with our soul and our five senses
And thank our dear One and speak thus:
“Lord, I thank you for you.
I ask you now whether you might give me your jewels,
That I might live pure,
Free from all sin.
Lord, where shall I then put you?

I shall give you what I have.
I shall put you in my little bed.
This little bed is made completely of suffering.
When I ponder your suffering,
I forget about mine.
Lord, you shall lay my cheek down for me.
The pillow for my cheek is the pain I feel within
That I am not always ready
To receive your gifts of suffering.
That, Lord, is my whole lament.
The bed's blanket is my longing

That binds me.
Now if, Lord, you wish to soothe me,
Then do my will
And give me those sinners
Who are in the state of mortal sin.
Then you will bring joy to my soul.
Lord, what then do we want to say about love
As we are lying here so close together
In the bed of my suffering?
I have received you, Lord,
As you were when you arose from the dead.
Dear One to my heart, now console me
That I might remain pure with you always.

Great happiness shall follow.
Give me, Lord, the guilty souls from purgatory,
Though I do not have enough to pay the ransom.
I have just received you, Lord,
As you were when you ascended to heaven.
Now, Dearest, you should not be too easy on me.
I would like one day to die of love.
Lord, you can satisfy me no other way.
Give me, Lord, and take from me, Lord,
Everything you want,
And leave me just this wish—
That I might die of love in love. Amen.”

22. Praise of the Heavenly Father

It is well for me that I praise you, God, all ways for your noble goodness, that you have chosen me for your holy service. Sanctify my heart and mind, that I might receive all your gifts with holy inwardness and might remain with you in joy.

23. How One Should Thank the Son

It is well for me to thank you, imperial Son of God. I shall thank you always that you took me, in the world, out of the world. Your holy pain that you suffered for my sake is mine. All that I ever suffer I want to give to you in return. Even though this is an unequal bargain, it nevertheless makes my soul free. Keep me always in your favor, so that you may be praised forever. Jesus, my dearly Beloved, loosen my bonds; let me remain with you.

24. The Flood of Love

It is well for me to thank you, Holy Spirit. It is my belief that you are one Person of the Holy Trinity. Your sweet loving spring waters erase all the suffering of my heart, for they come forth softly out of the Holy Trinity. I beg you, Lord Holy Spirit, to protect me from all malice of the evil spirits with your divine love, so that they not find in me what they are seeking.

25. The Greeting for the Holy Trinity

I, lacking all virtues; I, fragile in my being; if I dare or can, then I shall greet the sublimity, the splendor, the bliss, the wisdom, the nobility, and the wondrous oneness of the Holy Trinity. Out of it has flowed forth immaculate all that was, that is, that ever shall be. There I must one day enter again. How shall that happen? I must crawl back, for I am sinful. I must make amends with good works. I must hurry with faithful diligence. I must fly with the feathers of doves-these are virtues and goodness and a holy frame of mind. I must soar in all things above myself. When I am utterly spent, then I shall enter. How I shall then be received-never has a human eye beheld such a sight; never has a human ear heard it; never could a human tongue describe it.¹⁹ Glory to you, Trinity!²⁰

26. How One Should Entreat God in Temptation

Lord Jesus Christ, I, a poor human being, implore you and desire your help, for my enemies are hunting me down. Lord God, I appeal to you, for they want to drive me from you. Lord, almighty Son of God, drive them away from me. Do not deliver me into their power, and keep me pure in you, for you have redeemed me with your suffering. Be now my help and my consolation. Lord, let me not perish, for you willingly died for my sake. Lord Jesus Christ, I seek your help. Awaken my soul from the sleep of my lethargy and illumine my senses from the darkness of my flesh. Accompany me as I travel all my paths to you, as far as is humanly possible, without sin; for your eyes see my failings.

Mary, Mother of God, heavenly Empress!

May you be my helper in this,

For I am, alas, a sinner.

May I find favor

With your dear Child.

Mother of all chastity.

I lament all my interior suffering to you.

Hail Queen!²¹

27. How a Religious Person Should Turn His Heart Away from the World

When a person in religious life sees his relatives and dearest friends fashionably dressed and decked out, he indeed needs to be armed with the Holy Spirit so that he not entertain the thought: you could have had such a life. From such a thought his heart becomes so dark and his mind so unreceptive to God and his mouth so sluggish for holy prayer and his soul so completely alienated from God that inwardly he resembles his relatives much more than he does a person in religious life.

If he wants to stand pure with God,

He must take up the struggle.

For his conscience is then clouded,

This beacon of the Holy Spirit.

For the conscience does not shine

Without the light of the Holy Spirit.

But when the beacon has been brightly lit,

Then is its splendor well recognized.

So it is, too, with a religious person

For whose heart the baubles of the world are a terror.

He preserves well his beacon unextinguished.

But if his heart is open to the world,

His beacon shatters

And the bitter north wind of craving the life of our kinfolk comes,

And they claim they are unaffected by the swamp

In which, alas, they are indeed sinking

And drowning in sin.

Thus is our beacon extinguished,

And yet we have nothing from worldly things.

After this comes the south wind,

The fraudulent allurements of the world,

That appear so beautiful
Yet contain much bitter suffering.
If this is what pleases us,
Eternal loss is ours.
We must indeed preserve ourselves,
For there is no sin so small
That it does not leave its eternal mark on the soul.
Why is this so?
Never was a sin repented so completely
That it would not have been better left undone.
And so we should be in constant fear

If we want to stand pure with God.
What we have given to God,
We can never take back without serious harm to ourselves;
For we were given to him in a fair deal.
The fish in water sees with great appetite the dead red bait
With which one wants to catch it.
But it does not see the hook.
So it is with the poison of the world.
She²⁹ does not reveal its danger.

If you really want to reform,
Then look to your Bridegroom,
Lord of the whole world.
How fair he stood there
Richly clothed in bloody red,
Blackened, battered with scourges,
Bound to the pillar.
There he received many piercing wounds for love of you.

Take this to heart
And you will be able to escape the deceits of the world.
If you would follow further with your holy thoughts,
Then look up and behold
How he stood there on the cross
Raised up on high before the eyes of the world,
Blood running down over him.
These garments shall be the darlings of your heart,
His kingly eyes brimming over with tears,
His sweet heart flooded with love.
Now harken to the voice
That teaches you of God's love:

How the henchmen's hammers pounded
And pierced through his hands and feet on the cross.
Remember, too, the wound of the lance
That went through his side to the center of his heart,
And lament to him all your sins.
Thus shall you gain knowledge of God.
Look at the piercing crown
That he wore upon his head.
Kiss him before all else.
He gives you richly all delights.
Thank him for wishing to die out of his great love for you,
And let no one deceive you.
Then you can be a queen of his realm forever.
If this is what you choose,
You shall in joy overcome the sufferings of the whole world.

28. The Misfortunes of War

I was commanded with a holy seriousness to pray for the troubles now going on in Saxony and Thuringia." When I set about doing this with prayers of praise and petition, our dear Lord did not receive me and remained gravely silent. I had to endure this in loving patience for seventeen days. Then I said to our dear Lord: "O dear Lord, when is the fortunate hour to come that you want and that I must pray for because of this distress?"

Our Lord then revealed himself to me and said:

"The bliss-filled dawn,
Rich in hues,
Is the poor people
Who are now enduring many kinds of misfortune.
After this the eternal sun of everlasting light
Shall rise for them,
Which after this trial shall shine upon them in eternal joy.
They shall be made holy thereby and as bright as the dazzling sun
As it rises in mid-morning and reaches its zenith.

Some are in the army out of need and fear. These I shall let be taken prisoner and die, so that they can come to me. Those who are the causes of the war are more horrible in themselves and more fierce in their deeds than if they dared to attack the images in my churches."

Then I saw that eternal death followed those common foot soldiers who robbed and pillaged on the streets. If there were no war, they would be thieves and charlatans. But, as always, the bad people are making the blessed good. Thus must God show his love through suffering. He can win them no other way. Thus did God explain to me the advantages,²⁴ and I know not when or where it shall finally end.

I know this for certain: that I shall gladden the hearts of God's friends. I know this for certain: that no matter what the friends of God suffer, God never forgets them, for he is their help and their consolation in all their troubles. We should fight on accordingly, and suffer willingly in joy. Then we shall sparkle and shine in the sight of God.

29. A Teaching

If you want to turn your heart completely to God,
You should hold onto three things as a teaching:
Fearful in the face of sin,
Well-intentioned as to all virtues,
Constant in all good things.
Then shall you bring your life to a good end.
If you make yourself act thus,

You can indeed accomplish it with God's help.
Pray to God for this constantly
And you shall bear all your troubles lightly.
Confess purely and serve God diligently
And you shall be rich in joy.

30. A Prayer When Virgins Receive Their Crown

Receive, Lord, your brides, and approach them with the lilies of pure chastity all their days.

Receive, Lord, your brides, and approach them with the roses of diligent work for a good end.

Receive, Lord, your brides, and approach them with the violets of profound humility and lead them to your bridal bed and, united inseparably with them, embrace them with all love forever. Amen.

31. A Lament

This is the lament of the loving soul,
The only one she cannot bear.
She must tell it to the friends of God
So that they may find love more enjoyable:
“Lovesick and weak in body,
The trials of suffering and the harshness of force,

This is what makes the way
To my dear Lord too long for me.
Lover, how can I do without you for so long?
Indeed, I am, alas, far too distant from you!
Lord, if you will not receive my complaint,
I must again take up my sorrowing
And wait and suffer both inwardly and outwardly.
You know full well, dear Lord,
How much I want to be with you.”

Our Lord:

“When I come, I come in magnificence.
Never was there anguish so great
That I could not heal it completely.

You must continue to wait.
I want to prepare you better
Before I bring you to my Father,
So that you please us all the more.
I still hear your plaint of love with pleasure.”

Whenever our human understanding grows dark,
With the lament in our heart we awaken divine love.

32. How the Works of a Good Person Shine Forth in Relation to the Works of Our Lord

How the works of a good person shall light up and shine in heavenly honor these words make evident:

To the degree that we have been innocent here, God's holy innocence shall light up and shine into our holy innocence.

To the degree that we perform good works here, God's holy toil shall light up and shine into our holy toil.

To the degree that we possess inwardness here in intimacy with God, God's holy intimacy shall richly light up and send sparks into our holy inwardness.

To the degree that we accept our suffering with gratitude here and bear it with patience, God's holy suffering shall light up and shine into our suffering.

To the degree that we have diligently practiced all virtues here, God's holy virtue shall light up and shine into our virtue with much glory. May this last forevermore.

To the degree that we here burn in love and shine in a holy life, God's love shall burn in our soul and our body unceasingly forever, and never be extinguished.

These counter-illuminations light up and shine forth from the eternal Godhead. We receive these good works from God's holy humanity and perform them through the power of the Holy Spirit. Thus do our works and our life return to the Holy Trinity. Then it becomes manifest how we are doing here. To the degree that we lead a holy life in divine love here, we shall blissfully soar there in the heights, and to that degree shall the power of love be given us there as a reward, that we receive the power to carry out our whole will, that we are known by the saints as we have been. Thereby shall we be their companions! Amen.

33. A Spiritual Potion

I am sick: I thirst longingly for the health potion that Jesus Christ himself drank. When he, God and man, came into the crib, the potion was ready at hand. He drank so much of it that he became so drunk with the fire of love that with all virtues he endured for us all his intense sufferings. He always bestowed virtue; his goodness never faltered. I long for a health potion. This potion is suffering for love of God.

Suffering is bitter. And so we grind up a spice called "willingly suffer." A second spice is called "patience in suffering." It is also bitter. And so to counter it we grind up another spice called "holy intimacy," which turns patience sweet, as well as all our hard work. A third spice is "to persevere long in suffering," waiting for our eternal life and salvation. This is also very bitter. And so to counter this we grind up a spice called "with joy unflagging."²⁵

Ah, dear Lord, if you would give me this potion, I could live unflagging in suffering with joy. Then I would for a time forgo heaven. So intense is my longing for it. Lord, may you give this potion according to your very dear will, to me and to all those who desire it for love of you.

34. Spiritual Food

After a bitter potion one is certainly in need of tasty food. Rising desire and sinking humility and flowing love-these three maidens bring the soul up to heaven before God. And then she becomes aware of her Lover. She says: "Lord, I make my complaint to you that you are under attack by what is dearest to you on earth; namely, by Christians. Lord, I make my complaint to you that your friends are so seriously hampered by your enemies."

Our Lord: "If they have true goodness, they can transform all that they encounter, except for sin, in a marvelous manner into a valuable dissemination of the word of God." That is why suffering shouts the loudest of all ways of serving God: "Depart from me, for it is better for a person to be unconsolated in accordance with God's will than to be consoled in accordance with his own will." God's will is pure; our will is very much contaminated by the flesh. All who inwardly love intensely become outwardly calm, for all outward effort hampers the inward spirit. What the spirit then sings inwardly transcends every earthly voice.

Patience sings most sweetly of all above the angelic choirs, for angels have no patience since they experience no pain. We have this from the humanity of our Lord, but all honor as well by which we are honored by God on earth and shall also be elevated in heaven. Through the noble struggle of our Lord and through his holy suffering our Christian struggle and our suffering, accepted in good spirit, are ennobled and made holy in the same way that all waters have been made holy from the River Jordan, in which our dear Lord was baptized.

Ah, dear Lord, help us that our holy desire may never rest and our sinking humility may never rear up in arrogance. May the flowing fire of the holy love of God be here our purgatory, where all our sins shall be devoured.

35. The Seven Psalms

Dear Lord Jesus Christ, I recite these holy seven psalms²⁶ in praise and honor of all your holy suffering in which you wanted to die on the holy cross for my sake. Dearly Beloved, I ask you, when the time comes for you to carry out your command regarding me—that I am to die—may you then come to me as a trustworthy physician to his child; and give me then, Lord, a holy sickness in which I may prepare myself with the proper attitude and with true Christian faith. "Lord, rebuke me not in thy anger."²⁷

I ask, dearest Lord, that you come to me as my very dearest friend in my distress, and bring me then, Lord, such sincere sorrow that all my sins shall be blotted out, so that they shall not sadden me after this life. "Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven."²⁸

I ask, dearest Lord, that you come as a trustworthy father confessor to his dear friend, and bring me then the true light, the gift of your Holy Spirit, that I might see and know myself in it, and lament all my sins from the heart with such holy hope that my mouth not become bound by all my sins and that I be found pure. And give me then, Lord, your very own body, that I may receive you, Dearest One, with as much love as ever a human heart can. May you remain sustenance for the journey of my lonely soul, so that I, Dearest One, remain your beloved companion with you for life eternal. Amen. "Lord, rebuke me not in thy anger."²⁹

I ask you, dear Lord, to come to me as a faithful brother to his dear sister, and bring me holy armor with which my soul may prepare herself, so that my enemies cannot harm me when they shall accuse me. May they feel shame for all their efforts directed against me. "Have mercy on me, O God."³⁰

I ask you, Lord, to come to me as a trusted father to his dear child, and watch over my end. When my sinful mouth can no longer speak, then speak to my soul inwardly that you might console her and protect her forever, so that I might feel joy and not sadness. For this I beg you, Lord, through your abundant goodness. Amen. "Hear my prayer, O Lord; let my cry come to thee!"³¹

I ask you, Lord, to send me your virgin mother. I cannot do without her. May she then fulfill what I have long desired and defend my poor soul from all her enemies. "Out of the depths I cry to thee, O Lord!"³²

I ask you, dear youthful Jesus, Child of the pure maiden, to come as my dearest bridegroom and make me rich, as is the custom for noble bridegrooms when they give their brides a handsome morning gift," and receive me on the arm of your love and cover me with the mantle of your long-cherished desire. Blessed am I forevermore when I am then released! If we were to think of this hour often, all our pride would sink to the ground, as he shall then reveal his glorious countenance to us. Then my soul shall have its favorite pastime. What I now painfully long for can never happen on earth as I wish it. "Hear my prayer, O Lord, give ear to my supplications."³³

36. A Spiritual Convenf⁵

I begged God to let me know, if it were his will, that I might stop writing. Why? Because I know that I am just as weak and unworthy, and more so, than I was thirty years ago when I was required to begin. Then our Lord showed me a little sack in his hand and said: "I still have healing herbs."

And I said: "Lord, I don't know these herbs at all."

He said: "You shall well recognize them when you see them. With them one shall refresh the sick, strengthen the healthy, awaken the dead, and sanctify the good."

After this I saw a spiritual convent that was constructed of virtues.

The abbess is sincere love
Who has much holy understanding
With which she diligently preserves the community in body and soul,
All for the glory of God.
She gives them many a holy teaching—
Whatever God's will is.
Thereby she frees her own soul.

The lady chaplain of love is divine humility.
She is always subordinate to love.
Then pride must depart.

The prioress is the holy peace of God.
To her good will is given patience
To instruct the community in divine wisdom.
To whatever things she gives her attention
It is always done for God's glory.

The subprioress is amiability.
She it is who gathers up faults and disposes of them with kindness.
Whenever one does something wrong,

One should not carry it around inside for a long time.
Thus does God increase a person's goodness.

The chapter should have four things about it³⁶:
Manifestation of holiness that is rooted in God's service.
Its calming efforts hurt the enemy and honor God.
This is cause for it to rejoice much.
It should guard against empty honor
And should be a help to honor for others.
If they serve diligently,
God shall reward them accordingly.

The choir mistress is hope.
She fills one with holy humble devotion
So that the impotence of the heart rings in song so beautifully before God
That God loves the notes
That sing in the heart.
Whoever sings along with her Shall share her success
In celestial love.

The schoolmistress is wisdom
Who sedulously teaches the unlearned with even temper.
For this she shall be honored before good people.
That someone enjoys zealously teaching the helpless poor
Brings the convent holiness and honor.

The mistress of the cellar is an outflowing of helpful gifts.
Because she does this in divine joy
She gains from divine grace a holy heart and mind.
All who ask anything of her
Should be ever disciplined, frugal, and uncomplaining.
Then God's sweet gift shall flow into their hearts.
Those who are her helpers
Shall gain God's sweet gifts, just as she.

The mistress of the chamber is generosity
Who always enjoys doing good in measured amounts.
She gives what she has kindly.
For this she shall receive from God a special gift.

Those to whom she gives something thank God with holy fervor.
He finds his dwelling place in her heart,
As does a noble drink in a spotless cask.

The mistress of the sick is toiling mercy
Which ever hungers to be untiringly at the service of the sick
With help and with cleanliness,
With balsam and with good cheer,
With solace and with friendliness.
God gives her recompense,
That she might ever serve gladly.
Whoever sends her help
Shall be treated the same way by God.

The portress is watchfulness
That always accomplishes with a holy will Whatever is demanded of her.
Thus her efforts are not lost,
And she comes to God well prepared.
Whenever she wishes to pray,
God is with her in holy peace
To soothe the sufferings of her heart.
When she sometimes falls into difficulty,
Holy obedience, whom she joyfully serves,
Smooths it all over.

The mistress of discipline is holy custom.
It shall always burn like a candle
Inextinguishable in heavenly freedom.
Thus we easily endure all our interior sufferings
Until we achieve a holy end.

The provost is divine obedience, not sinful obedience.
To him all virtues are subordinate.

Thus can the convent thrive in God.
Whoever enters this convent
Shall ever live in divine joy
Here and eternally.
Blessed are they who persevere in it!

37. The Eternal Feast of the Holy Trinity

Whoever in sincere love wishes to prepare himself for the eternal feast of the Holy Trinity has to begin it here. He should obey and serve the heavenly Father constantly in all things with holy fear and humble humility. He should obey and serve his Son in suffering and in patience, with voluntary poverty in holy toil. He should obey and serve the Holy Spirit in holy hope beyond all fear with a joyful heart and an ever-gentle disposition. Then one shall taste his goodness.

Pure loving virgins shall, moreover, follow the noble Youth, Jesus Christ, Child of the pure maiden, who is utterly filled with love, as he was at age eighteen. His Person is the most beloved of the virgins, and he is the most handsome of all. They follow him with bliss-filled tenderness into the blossoming meadow of their pure conscience. There the Youth breaks for them the flower of all virtues from which they fashion garlands that they shall wear to the eternal celebration.

When the fine meal has been enjoyed, which Jesus Christ himself shall serve, one shall look on at the most sublime dance of praise. Their soul and body shall wear the garland of their virtues which they have practiced here with great holy devotion. And they shall follow the Lamb in untold bliss; from bliss to love, from love to joy, from joy to splendor, from splendor to power, from power to the highest heights before the eyes of the heavenly Father.

This is how he greets his only begotten Son and also his many pure brides who have accompanied him: "Ah, dear Son. What you are, I am. What they are fills me with joy.³⁵ My dear brides, be joyful forever, rejoice in my eternal purity; let all pain and all suffering softly disappear. My holy angels shall serve you; my saints shall honor you; the mother of my Son's humanity shall be ready with praise for you because you are like her. Rejoice, dear brides, my Son shall embrace you warmly; my Godhead shall permeate you totally; my Holy Spirit shall lead you evermore, all according to your wish, to a delightful feast for your eyes. Could your success ever be greater? I myself shall love you. Those who are not pure virgins shall share and observe and enjoy this feast as far as possible."

After hearing and seeing this with the eyes of my soul in a short time, I was human dust and ashes as I had been before.

38. How a Person in Religious Life Should Daily Lament and Confess His Sins to God

I, a sinful human being, lament and confess to God all the sins of which I am guilty in God's eyes. I confess and lament all the good works that I did not perform. I confess and lament those sins I committed when I did not know what sin was.³⁹ I confess and lament those much worse sins I committed knowingly and maliciously and actively and out of vanity.

Have mercy on me, O Lord, for I am truly sorry for them; and give me, Lord, complete certainty that you have forgiven me for all of them. Otherwise, I can find no joy in living. Jesus, dearest Lover of mine, let me approach you in true sorrow and with deep love for you in my heart, and never let me grow cold, so that I constantly feel your intense love in my heart and in my soul and in my five senses and in all my members. Then I can never grow cold.

39. How the Devil Rages and Chases About, Bites, and Gnaws When a Loving Soul That Burns with Divine Love Departs This World

Blessed is the good person that he was ever born who follows God with all the virtues he can possibly attain. His soul will be free in love. At the end of life the holy angels come and receive the pure souls with immeasurable love into the bliss of heaven and lead them off from here and bring them with great praise to God.

The enemies from hell who came there⁴⁰ will find all their efforts in vain. They had come there filled with hate and rage. When they then realized that they were not going to get their way at all, how they did rage about and chase around! How they did gnash and gnaw! How they did howl and whine! For they feared the horrible torments that they were going to receive from their masters because they had lost the soul. Thus do they curse at each other:

"You wretch, it was your fault."

"Shut up, mate. I never caught her in great impatience. When I assailed her with evil thoughts, sorrow was always her companion."

"That whispering to her confessors robs us of all our glory. There were a lot more like us to whom she was dearly entrusted. How can we now show up back at court?"

"Woe, master, what were you trying to prove by assigning this person to us? We couldn't discover any big sin in her."

"I often tempted her severely, and then she would start bawling. Me and my mates, we couldn't bring her down. With her weeping she drove me off. With her sighing she singed my hair and burned my claws. I just could never get near her."

"Her obedience was so great; never was it ever equaled. That is how she escaped us fair and square. This was our greatest disadvantage: All her good works burned inside with divine love, for she performed all her good works with good intentions."

And their master says: "Gentlemen, you have come here to court heavily incriminated. I entrusted her to you. The pain I shall impose upon you shall last forever. You shall not spend time among humans, as I would gladly do if I were granted the honor. But now you shall lie with me here in hell. That shall be your punishment. I shall send forth learned scholars to blind the understanding of good people. If we could destroy the great zeal they have for God, we would recover all our honor, the young would follow them, and our tribe would be increased. If only one soul could belong to me that so brightly burns with love of God, I would wear her as a crown and would reward myself for my tenacious efforts. Thus would I have pleasant recompense for my grief."

"Forget your presumptuous wishes." You desire something that you have never gotten and never will, come evil or torment. All the blessed Christians who love God in their interior suffering are so flooded with and immersed in love that they radiate holy virtues and are aflame with love in all their works. You well know it profits you not one whit that you tempt them so severely. They simply wait until it turns into an occasion for praising God. No matter how much you plot trickery against them, they are always ready with praise."

The growling and shrieking, the biting and gnashing he did in his bonds are beyond description."

Lord God, we thank you; give us a holy end. This is one of the greatest joys that the blessed soul has, that she sees and knows that the enemies who have caused her so much pain fight among themselves and suffer their punishments in hell. In spite of it all, she has joyfully escaped them and shall wear the eternal crown because of the torment they inflicted on her.

40. Thus Does the Loving Soul Speak to Her Dear Lord

If all the world were mine,
And if it were pure gold,
And if I were to be here eternally, as I wished,
The noblest, fairest, and richest empress,
That would ever be worthless to me,
So great is my joy in seeing Jesus Christ, my dear Lord,
In his glory in heaven!
Consider what they suffer who must wait for him so long.⁴³

41. How a Dominican Father Was Seen

Forty years agog I knew a religious man. In those days religious people were without duplicity and aflame with love. He progressed in the spiritual life and in piety and clearly performed much holy work for our Lord. He has now departed from here. I prayed to our Lord for his soul, as Christians do, that God might forgive him if he were guilty of anything. Then I saw, first of all, a radiance. God had prepared it for him. But I did not see him in it and this saddened my soul.

Some time later, when I was again praying for him, I discovered him in a fiery cloud. He was asking that he be forgiven. So I spoke with all my might to our dear Lord: "Ah, dear Lord, grant me this, that I might repay evil with good."

Then he drew himself up in the cloud and said: "O Lord, how strong is your power, how right is your truth!"

And I said: "Well then, how are you doing now?"

He said: "You can see for yourself how I am doing."

"Why are you suffering these torments?"

The soul: "Those who falsely appeared to be holy made accusations to me against innocent people. I judged them accordingly and had a sinful opinion of them. That is why I suffer these torments. Ah, if I could still sigh!"⁴⁵

I was unable to help him in this matter. He had also harmed me a bit.

A third time I again prayed for him. Then he ascended in bliss. Our dear Lord went to meet him and said to him: "That your path after your death has been so long and so difficult is the result of malicious people. You followed me in a holy manner and served me loyally. You shall wear the crown of virgins, the crown of justice, and the crown of truth."

Then he ascended in radiance above eight choirs and touched the ninth. Then I saw him no longer. Had false liars not influenced him, he would have entered into eternal joy with no suffering. That he trusted them was his undoing.

42. The Drink of Honey

Lord God, bless your precious treasure with a holy end and open it so that it might be a cause for praising you in heaven and on earth.

And a voice said:

"You shall keep your drink of honey.
It lies hidden in a safe place.
I shall open it
So that many might enjoy it."

43. Of Simple Love, How Wisdom Is Seen

Those who wish to know but have little love
Remain forever at the beginning of a good life.

And so we must ever be in constant fear
How we are pleasing God in it.
Those who simply love and know very little
Are opened to great things.
Holy simplicity is the physician of all wisdom.
It causes the wise man to see himself for the foolish person he is.
When simplicity of heart dwells in the wisdom of the mind,
Much holiness results in a person's soul.

44. Five Sins and Five Virtues

Covetousness in poverty,
Falsity in truth,
Slowness to show mercy,
Sneering ridicule in public,
Neglect of order:
These five failings seriously infect the spiritual life.

Truth free of duplicity,
Manifest mutual love,
Fear in speech,
Hidden love for God in one's heart,
Open zeal for all good things:
These five things keep the spiritual life healthy.

45. Seven Things, Five of Which One Finds in Heaven and Two on Earth"

Seven things I must say to God's honor: "Lord God, if it is possible, grant that I never forget them on earth." Five are found in heaven; two must remain here.

The first is: harm that is my fault because I have sinned and neglected to perform good works I could easily have done.

The second is: that I, Lord, wait for you with constancy, no matter when you want to come to me and in whatever manner you ordain a holy end for me.

The third: the fiery longing that I have for you.

The fourth: the burning love unextinguished in me that you cause.

The fifth: the first look of your sublime countenance upon me. Alas, that I was never able to experience this on earth as I desired. This is why my soul often sings, "Woe."

The sixth I scarcely dare to mention.
I might be struck dumb in mentioning it.
I never heard it named on earth.
This is the playful flood of love
That flows mysteriously from God into the soul
And through his power flows back again according to her ability.
What bliss there is then between them!
No one else knows
What activity goes on between them.⁴⁷
For each finds its part.
Whatever one has given out here
Will all be given back there.
This is God's heavenly love
That begins here so delicately
And goes on there boundlessly.

The seventh can hardly be touched with words.
One can sense it through Christian faith:
How great it is, how lofty, how vast, how blissful,
How glorious, how joyous,
How full of unending joys.⁴⁸
Blessed is he who shall dwell there forever.
The happy sight full of all pleasure
And the holy enjoyment of one's wishes,
They are of many kinds
And go on endlessly without number,
Glorious yet measured.
For they spring forth from the living God.
The deliciously sweet desire,
Blissful, ravenous, full of love,
Flows ever forth lavishly from God.
And yet the soul keeps her sweet hunger
And lives on without care.

46. How the Soul Presents Herself in Spiritual Poverty

Here the soul presented herself in spiritual poverty and in eternal love to God and in restless longing to go to God. Thus does she speak: "The long waiting is coming to an end. In the future God and the soul shall be united, unseparated forever. Whenever I think about it, my heart feels intense joy. Ah, dear Lord, how still you have become. I thank you evermore that you have been avoiding me for so long a time. And so may you be praised eternally that your will is done and not mine. And now today I shall find consolation in your words that I heard in Christian faith, when you say: 'I love those who love me. We want to come to them, my Father and I, and want to make a dwelling place with them. '49 Blessed am I, dear Lord, because of your generous goodness, which makes you hold back nothing."

Then our Lord said: "When the time of redemption comes, when I shall give you heavenly gifts, then I shall act very quickly because my eternity is contained therein. I shall unfold and raise it high above the bloody earth. I can think of nothing I would like more."

Eternal love of God dwells in the soul. Transitory love of earthly things dwells in the flesh. The five senses have the power to determine which way they turn.

47. One Sin That Is Evil Beyond All Sins

I heard tell of a sin. I thank God that I never had anything to do with it. It seems to me, and is, evil beyond all sins. This is total unbelief. It enrages me in my whole soul and in my whole body and in all my five senses and in my whole heart. I thank Jesus Christ, the living Son of God, that it has never entered my heart. This sin did not arise among Christians. The arrogant fiend has duped simple people with it. They claim to be so holy that they shall enter into the eternal Godhead and rest next to the eternal holy humanity of our Lord Jesus Christ. Though they think they are in a sublime state, they have really delivered themselves over to being eternally cursed; and yet they claim to be the holiest. They scoff at God's words written about the humanity of our Lord.

You, most needy of all humans, if you really had knowledge of the eternal Godhead, it would be impossible for you not to know the eternal humanity as well that hovers in the eternal Godhead. You would have to know the Holy Spirit as well, who illumines the heart of a Christian there and whose fragrance in the soul surpasses all sweetness and who instructs one's mind better than any learned professor, so that one then says in humility that one cannot be perfect in the sight of God.⁵⁰

48. How Love Was Seen with Her Maidens

In the night I spoke thus to our Lord: "Lord, I dwell in a land called exile, which is this world. For nothing in it can console me or cheer me except suffering."" In this place I have a house. It is called full of pain. This is the house where my soul lies captive: my body. This house is old, small, and dark. One should take this in a spiritual sense.

In this house I have a bed called restlessness, for everything not connected with God causes me pain. In front of the bed I have a chair called discomfort. It causes me discomfort to see the sins of others of which I was never guilty. In front of the chair I have a table called vexation, because I so seldom find a spiritual way of life among religious people. On the table is a tablecloth that is clean. It is called poverty. It contains much holy goodness. If one were to use it properly, one would cherish it in one's heart. Love of riches is a thief of poverty. On the table a dish is served up to me called bitterness of sin. It should be called well-intentioned effort as well. The beverage is called scant praise, because, alas, the good works I perform are all too few.

This house looked dark inside. Then true love of God revealed itself to me. It was like a noble empress. The outline of her body was refined, white, and rosy in the blossom of youth. She was accompanied by a great number of virtues. They all resembled maidens. She put them at my disposal if I myself wanted them. For her part she would gladly put all of them at my service. She was more splendidly crowned than with glittering gold. Her clothes were like green, light taffeta. When I gazed upon her properly, my dark house was all lit up so that I saw everything that was in it and that had ever happened there. When I looked at her, I recognized her easily, for I had also seen her when she was my dear companion. But now I shall not talk about this because this has all been put down in the book.⁵²

Then I said: "Ah, dearest of all ladies, you are more than a thousandfold above me, and yet you serve me with such great honors, as though I were more than an empress."

She replied: "When I found you with the pure intention of separating yourself from all earthly things, I didn't just want to be your lady. I also had to be your constant lady-in-waiting. Such is the pleasure I take in a pure heart that has freed itself from all earthly things through sincere love of God." By this she meant: No matter how many earthly things a person has, they must not be allowed to stick to a person's heart.

"Dear maiden," since you have served me for so long a time, it is only right that the feeble lady reward the maidservant honorably. As a reward I have given you everything I had and could achieve on earth."

She said: "I have gathered it all up; I shall return it to you with great honor."

"I don't know, lady, what else I can give you, unless you want my soul. That I shall be very happy to give you."

And she said: "That is what I have been longing to have from you for a long time. Now you have finally given her to me. Speak to my maidservants also, that they serve you diligently. Then I can remain with you in God's true love, which I myself am. God is love.""

Then the soul speaks to the first maidservant-sorrow: "Lady True Sorrow, come to me and bring me holy tears. They shall make me free of sin.

"Lady Humility, sit at my side and drive pride and vain honor away from me. When they see you near me, they are forced to flee from me.

"Dear Lady Gentleness, sit by me beneath my habit. Then friendliness will be at my disposal.

"O noble Obedience, I subordinate myself to you in all my actions. May you never leave me. Then in all my actions I shall retain divine truth free of lies, which well befits God's intimate friends.

"Dear Lady Mercy, be at my side when I minister to the sick, that I be hardworking, that I may well bear the cost, that I may serve them with my person and my resources.

"Ah, dear Lady Chastity, I commend my virginal garment to you, that it may ever be pure and clean; for my dear Bridegroom Jesus Christ is always at my side.

"Lady Patience, I have great strength in silence and suffering. You rob all my temptations of their power, so that they are not able to harm me. I want to have you toiling with me.

"Lady Sanctity, come here to me and kiss the mouth of my soul and dwell in the ground of my heart. Then I shall always remain healthy.

"Lady Hope, I ask you to bind all the wounds of my heart that love has inflicted upon me so that I may ever keep God's blessing, no matter what distress I am given.

"Ah, glorious, holy Christian Faith, you have always illumined the eye of my soul so that I well know where to turn in matters of Christian thought. I commend to you my works and my mind.

"O dear Lady Vigilance, do not sit, but rather stand always at my side. Then I shall remain free of evil.

"Lady Temperance, be with me always. Then I shall be ever ready for God's service.

"Lady Frugality, may you be my dear chambermaid. I shall love you so. You make my hard bed soft, my coarse food tasty. You give me power in poverty. This comes from God's goodness.

"Peace and Calm, I cannot do without you. May you walk with me on all my journeys. Those who talk much and whisper much seldom keep their honor. Those who boast-that can never be all to their advantage.

"Wisdom is always together with love and is the mistress of all maidens. She keeps whatever love gives. She makes useful whatever a person learns or reads.

"Chaste Modesty has special qualities about her. She is pleased to remain without praise in the presence of all people.

"Now I am well provided for as to ladies-in-waiting. But there are two more that I do not want to forget: Fear and Constancy. May the two of them be ever with me. Then all my servants shall be attentive to their duties.

"I thank you, dear Love of God, Lady Empress, that you have given them all to me as a help as I travel in exile on the road to heaven."

49. Concerning a Lay Brother

A lay brother of the Order of Preachers was struck dead by thunder. Prayers were said for his soul with the sincere wish that anything for which he had not done penance might be forgiven him. And his soul was shown to that person who was praying for him. He was fair in celestial bliss and in no way suffering. His soul gave the reasons why this was the case: "I was always humble in my heart, cautious in my thinking, and well-intentioned in my actions. That is why I experience no pain."

The soul: "Why then didn't you go immediately to heaven?"

He replied: "I had to receive divine knowledge and heavenly love here first. I didn't have these on earth."

"Why do you have that small blemish on your face?"

He said: "I used to frown at those who didn't do what I wanted. I never did penance for this."

"How can the blemish be removed?"

He said: "If I just had a sigh!"

But he could not get one from that person, for at that instant he was given it.⁵⁵

Then he was happy and said: "Now it is gone."

"Why are you wearing this crown? After all, you are not yet in heaven."

He said: "I had an unusual death. That is why God gave it to me."

50. The Visible Favor of God

O dear Lord Jesus Christ, who are one eternal God with the eternal Father, remember me! I thank you, Lord, for your visible favor with which you constantly touch me, which cuts through all my bones, all my veins, and all my flesh. Whenever I can repay you for it, Lord, with holy thankfulness, I am secure; otherwise, I am not. You can certainly consider your frail creature feeble, Lord, for your intention is good, even better than good. For many things are called good which are not as good as that which you do to me. But when you touch me with your most sublime sweetness that permeates my body and my soul utterly, then I fear that I can draw to myself all too much of your divine pleasure. For I am unworthy of it on earth. And so I pray to you at times more for other people than for myself, so that I might draw away from my pleasure out of love of God and Christian loyalty. Thereafter I fear the rearing up of pride, which cast the most exalted angel out of heaven. I also fear the serpent of vain honor that deceived Eve. I fear the betrayal that thrust Judas from God. If I am faithful to God, I shall persevere in all virtues, in all goodness, and in great vigilance with God along with our dear Lady, his virgin mother.

51. A Prayer Against Sins of Omission

I, the least, the weakest, the most unworthy among the whole human race, it is my desire and I beg you, Lord heavenly Father, Lord Jesus Christ, Lord Holy Spirit, Lord Holy Trinity, that you might forgive me today all my sins of omission which I have committed in your holy service, and not just while seeking my advantage or out of necessity, but rather because of my sinful malice, which I could easily stop if I wanted to. Accept now, Lord, this tiny improvement that I now achieve with my will to the honor of your dear mother and of all the saints who are being honored today by Holy Christianity, and to praise and honor the blessedness of all God's saints through which, dear Lord, they have drawn near to you. Now help me, dear Lord, to such a change in my life that I may so become a companion of your saints on earth through a holy life that I might share their company in your kingdom before your glorious countenance along with all those who desire me to pray for them.

52. How the Loving Soul Bows Beneath the Hand of God

I say to my five senses: "Bow beneath the almighty hand of God. Even the fiends of hell, no matter how arrogant they are in their fiery fetters, must bow and cower beneath the hard coercion of almighty God. Those in purgatory must in their guilt bow beneath their punishment until that final hour when they shall be found pure. Sinners on earth must bow under the burden of their guilt and be judged penitent by doing penance or be damned to eternal hell. Good people on earth must bow in sorrow to do penance all their days. The chosen pure who love God in utter faithfulness are much oppressed and suffer much holy distress. They bow and bend down beneath all pain and beneath all creatures with their ever-hovering love. Pride is rare among them.

"This is what I should keep in mind, and I shall and must drink from the same cup out of which my heavenly Father drank if I am to possess his kingdom." The kingdom of heaven bows with all the holy angels in delight-filled holiness. For their existence and life were given them by God as a gift. The saints bow and bend low before God in flowing love and in blissful longing with zealous devotion. Thus do they thank God for putting his gift so lovingly at their disposal in their distress on earth. This enabled them to endure all their anguish of heart. May I also experience this, for I, too, am in much distress for love of him."

53. The Prison of Religious People

I felt sorry in my heart for the distress of the community in which I live. In the night I spoke to our Lord in the solitude of my heart thus: "Lord, how do you like this prison?"

And our Lord said: "I am held captive in it."

In these words I understood the meaning of all the following words:

“I fasted in the desert with them.
I was tempted by the enemy with them.
I toiled all my days tirelessly and productively with them.
I was betrayed in hate with them.
I was sold in unbelief with them when they offered themselves to me in God’s service.
I was treacherously ambushed with them.
I was fiercely attacked with them.
I was taken captive in grasping envy with them.
I was bound in obedience with them.
I was scorned in great contempt with them.
I was beaten in great innocence with them; what they are forced to hear against their will should not sadden them.

I was dragged before the court with them like a guilty thief; they should call this to mind during chapter meetings and in confession.
I was scourged with them; when they scourge themselves, they should remember me.
I bore my cross with them; when they are downcast, they should remember me.
I was nailed to the cross with them; for this reason they should suffer willingly and complain little about their troubles.

I entrusted my spirit with them to my Father at my death; thus should they entrust themselves to me in all their trials.
I died with them a holy death; thus shall they become free of all their bonds.
I was buried with them in earthly stone; thus shall they be and remain pure of all earthly things.
I arose from the dead; thus shall they always rise out of their failings;
thus may they receive heavenly radiance into their souls.
I ascended into heaven by my divine power; there they shall follow me in all the power of these words.”

I truly hope that you⁵⁷ constantly achieve this and know; whoever has not yet done so, may the true God bring it about in him.

54. Four Qualities of Faith

That one believe in God in a Christian manner and that one love God in a holy manner and that one truly know Jesus Christ and that one faithfully follow his teaching to one's human end: I believe that in these four things one shall find eternal life. We believe as Christians, not like Jews or like unbelieving Christians. They claim to believe in God but do not believe in his most holy work that he wrought; that is, that he gave us his only begotten Son. They reject him. Lord God, this is what we complain about to you. We believe it was the divine will that he sent us his only begotten Son into this world. We believe in the works and the death of our Lord Jesus Christ by which he redeemed us. We believe in the Holy Spirit who brought our happiness to completion in the Father and in the Son, and brings it even now to completion in all our good works.

How should we love God in a holy manner? We should love everything that the Holy Trinity commands us to love. God did not create sin. This is why he hates it in us. God loves goodness in us, which is he himself.

How should we know Jesus Christ? By his works we should know him and should love him more than ourselves.

How should we follow his teaching? Just as he taught us to and as his followers still teach us. As long as we do this, our blessedness shall increase.

55. How a Friend Writes to a Friend

Because you love God beyond your human power, because you hold God dear with all the strength of your soul, because you know God with all the wisdom of your soul, and because you have received God's favor with much holy thankfulness, I am sending you this letter.

The great outflow of divine love that never ceases flows on and on unceasingly and effortlessly in such a sweet course unfaillingly that our tiny vessel becomes full and brims over. If we do not block it with self-will, our small vessel is always overflowing with God's favor.

Lord, you are full and you fill us as well with your favor. You are great and we are small. How are we to become like you? Lord, you have given us much and we should pass it on in turn. Though we are a small vessel, still you have made it full. One can pour a small full container into a larger container so often that the large container becomes full from the small container. The large container is the satisfaction that God receives from our works. We are, alas, so tiny that a single little word from God or from Holy Scripture fills us so completely that for the moment we can take in no more. Then we pour the gift back again into the large container that is God. How are we to do this? In holy longing we should pour it over sinners that they be cleansed. If it again becomes full, we should then pour it over the imperfection of religious people that they fight on and become perfect and remain so. If it again becomes full, we should pour it over the distress of poor souls who are in torment in purgatory, that God in his goodness might relieve them of their many sufferings. If it again becomes full, we should then in holy mercy pour it over the distress of Holy Christianity that is afflicted with many sins. Our Lord God loved us first of all. He also toiled for us first and foremost. And he also suffered most of all on our behalf. We should give him the same in return if we want to be like him.

Thus did our Lord speak to a person: "Give me everything that is yours, and I shall give you everything that is mine." The recompense of love that we return to God is sweet indeed. The recompense of the toil is very often, alas, burdensome, for a person must sometimes outwardly do without what love has inwardly consumed. Someone asked me how difficult that is. I could not in the least make it clear through merely human concepts. Our Lord suffered much for us, even death. But, alas, a small suffering seems to us great indeed. Because of this I have to feel contempt even for myself and complain to God that I have so little virtue. Love makes suffering sweet, more than one can say. And if we wish to become like God, we have to overcome in many a conflict. The mind of God and of the loving soul come together in the same manner as the sun and the air join together through the majestic energy of God in a sweet, vibrant mixture in which the sun overcomes the coldness and darkness of the air, so that one notices only that it is all one sun. That comes from divine bliss.

May God give us all this love and preserve it for us! Amen.

56. How God Touches His Friends with Suffering

When one experiences sadness
That one has not sought
And in no way has been the cause of,
Our Lord says this about it:
"I have set it in motion. That is,
Just as my Father had me set in motion on earth,
So, too, those whom I draw to myself on earth
Suffer much pain because of it.
They should indeed know this:

The harder I draw them toward me,
The nearer they come to me.
When a person so overcomes himself
That he considers suffering and consolation of equal value,
Then I shall raise him up into sweetness,
And thus he shall have a taste of eternal life."

57. A Bit About Paradise

This was revealed and I saw how paradise was constituted. Of its breadth and length I could find no end. I first approached it between this world and the beginning of paradise. There I saw trees, foliage, and a little grass but no weeds. Some trees bore apples but most of them had only leaves with a refined fragrance. Swift waters flow through there and the wind blows from south to north. There in the waters earthly sweetness is found mixed with heavenly bliss. The breeze was sweeter than I can say. Neither beast nor bird was there, for God had entrusted it to man alone, that he might live there in comfort.

I saw there two men, Enoch and Elijah." Enoch was sitting and Elijah was lying on the ground in great fervor. Then I spoke to Enoch. I asked him whether they were living as humans do. He said: "We eat a bit from the apples and drink a little of the water to keep the body alive. But most important is God's power."

I asked him: "How did you get here?"

"I came here in such a manner that I don't know how I got here or what I was doing before sitting down here."

I asked him what his prayer was like.

"Faith and hope are the basis of our prayer."

I asked him how he felt, whether he found it at all irksome to be there.

He replied: "I am perfectly fine and suffer no discomfort."

"Do you have fears about the conflict that is yet to take place in the world?"⁵⁹

"God shall arm me with his strength so that I can hold my own in the struggle."

"Do you pray at all for Christianity?"

"I pray that God free them from sin and bring his kingdom to them."

Elijah sat up and his countenance was fair, fiery, the color of heaven. His hair resembled white wool. They were attired like poor men who seek their bread with a staff in their hand. I asked Elijah how he prayed for Christianity.

"I pray with mercy, humility, faithfulness and obedience."

"Do you pray for souls?"

"Yes, when I entreat, their suffering is decreased. When I ask, the suffering even disappears."

"Are they ever redeemed?"

"Yes, many of them."

"Why did God bring you here?"

"That we might be helpers of Christianity and of God until the last day."

I saw a twofold paradise. I have described the earthly part. The heavenly part is up above and covers the earthly part against all storms. In the highest part are those souls who have no need of purgatory but have not yet come into God's kingdom. They hover in bliss as does the air in the sun. Power and honor, reward and crown are not yet theirs until they enter God's kingdom.

When the whole earth passes away
And the earthly paradise no longer exists;
When God has held his judgment,
The heavenly paradise shall also pass away.
All that come to God
Shall dwell in a common house.
There shall be no more hospitals for the sick.
Whoever enters God's kingdom
Is free of all infirmity.
May Jesus Christ be praised
Who has given us his kingdom.

58. St. Gabriel`

Holy Angel Gabriel, remember me.
I entrust the message of my longing to you.
Tell my dear Lord Jesus Christ
How sick with love for him I am.
If I am ever to recover,
He himself must be my physician.
Tell him in confidence
The wounds that he has inflicted upon me
I can no longer endure
Unsalved and unbandaged.
He has wounded me to death.
If he leaves me lying here untended,

I can never recover.
If all mountains were a balsam for wounds
And all waters a health potion
And all blossoming trees a bandage to heal wounds,
They could not restore me to health.
He must lay himself onto the wounds of my soul.

Holy Angel Gabriel, remember me.
I entrust this message of love to you.
Whoever wants to hold God dear,
This love letter shall awaken his senses,
If he wishes to follow God.

59. How the Message Came Before God

In my spirit I heard the truth clearly;
My message has reached God.
The reply that is to come back to me
Is so great, so powerful, so profound,
So rich, so blissful, and so overwhelmingly radiant
That I am incapable of receiving it
The while I am a creature of the earth,
Unless I depart for a short while from this poor existence
In such a manner that I remain in it not at all.
But for now I must simply keep silent about this message.
I was able to receive no more of it
That one may speak of openly.

To the extent that a poor creature like me could,
I saw St. Gabriel in blissful glory
Standing in the heights of heaven before God.
He was clad in new garments ablaze with love.
They were his reward
For so ably and honorably bearing messages.
I saw the flames of love playing brightly about his face.
He was in the embrace of the Godhead
And permeated by it.
I could neither understand nor hear his words,
For I am still the likes of an earth-bound fool.

60. How the Child Was Seen

In the night when the Son of God was born, the Child was seen wrapped in poor pieces of cloth and tied with string. The Child lay alone on the hard straw in front of two animals. Then I spoke to the mother: "O dear Lady, how long shall your dear Child lie there alone like that? When will you take it on your lap?"

Our Lady replied that she never let the Child out of her sight. She held out her hand to him and said: "It shall lie on this straw for seven hours by day and by night. Its heavenly Father wants it that way."

I then realized that the heavenly Father was especially happy with this. I prayed to the Child for those who had commended themselves to me. Then a voice spoke out of the Child, though its mouth did not move at all: "If they want to keep me in their minds, I shall keep them in my favor. I have nothing to give them but myself and eternal life."

In the crib⁶² the Child lay on the hard straw.
Its heavenly Father wanted it that way.

61. How One Should Prepare Oneself for God

If a bird remains on the ground for a long time, its wings deteriorate and its feathers become heavy. Then it raises itself aloft beating its feathers and drawing itself far upward until it catches the air. Then it takes flight yet higher. The longer it flies, the more it soars in exhilaration, scarcely returning to earth to refresh itself. Thus did the wings of love take from it earthly pleasure. In this same way we should prepare ourselves when we are to approach God. We should raise the feathers of our longing to God. We should elevate our virtue and our good works with love. If we do not give up on this, we shall become conscious of God.

Ah, Desiring Love,
You call out many a sweet word
To the ears of your dear Lord.
You rarely rest.
Now be glad and let yourself be heard.
He shall yet turn to you in joy.

Ah, Sinking Love,
You suffer much sweet anguish.
Your loneliness is great.
How shall you win Jesus?
He is running much too far ahead of you.
Indeed, you chose him instead of sin
And have lost yourself in him.
And so you must suffer many a torment.
I shall restore myself in him.

Ah, Free Love,
You so strongly lure my heart and senses

That I would soon bolt from here.
Yet I cannot win you as I would.
And so I must still love you in anguish.

Ah, Powerful Love,
You are well protected.
You have good intentions in all things.
You carry one well past all troubles.
Your hope and your faith are great.
You shall overcome all your troubles.

Ah, Wise Love,
You keep holy order
As you praise God and know him therein
And accomplish his will in all things.
If you do this faithfully,
You shall take your rest in God.
This shall be the cause of my rejoicing.

62. How the Maidens Serve Their Lady the Queen

This conversation was revealed to a person in her spirit as follows: I saw a path that went from the east where the sun rises to the west where it sets. All those who have good will toward God traveled this path. They all passed through the valley but traveled at different speeds. They journeyed as pilgrims who had left what was dear to them and wanted to seek what is best of all: God. Some turned back to the sensual pleasure they had left and did not complete the journey. Some rested in the grass of various pleasures and among the flowers of vanity. They remained a very long time on the journey. Thereafter, they shall experience the stern rod of bitter purgatory, even if they live free of mortal sin. Concerning this our Lord said: "Some people journey with good intentions in their holy works yet have about them such bad habits and are so repulsive in their vehemence that one can hardly put up with them. In the case of such people I withhold my judgment. They should seek mercy from me in humble fear. Then they would not lose their good works, and the bitterness in their hearts would disappear. Then they would be able to become themselves again. Whoever seeks my mercy cannot endure the darkness."

One person went alone along the path. This was because earthly pleasure was not able to give his soul consolation. Then the person saw two persons going along before him. One went on the left side of the path, the other on the right. He asked them who they were and what they were doing. The one on the left said: "I am God's justice. God's judgment was entrusted to me and is mine since Adam sinned in paradise. My judgment has long-lasting and serious consequences. Now this maiden has come along and stands beside me. She has become my equal. Her name is mercy. All who seek her and constantly call out to her overcome all their inner anguish. She is utterly perfect. She has taken from me what was rightfully mine. Whatever troubles a person has, if he then flees to me in penitence, she lays her soft hand on what is crooked. Then I stand there like an idiot and can do nothing about it. All of this came about through the true Son of God, who robbed me of my strictest justice with his mercy. She consoles the downcast; she heals wounds; she brings joy to all who come to her. She wrested great power from me. I am dear to her and she to me. We shall always be together until the last day. Then judgment is mine."

God's judgment and God's justice are not completely one and the same. Judgment portions out guilt for what comes before it unrepented. Justice is a holy life God has given to all his dear friends. He practiced it in his own life. For he was just in all he did. Hence he knows when we practice it. Thus can we become pure with him.

This mercy of God and the holy justice of his Son, to which he held during his life on earth, and the favor of the Holy Spirit of them both were followed on the path by a worthy throng. They all resembled virgins. When I saw them, I recognized all of them easily. And yet I made inquiries of them because I was interested in their replies. I asked who they were and what their duties were. They said: "We are noble and well-bred maidens and serve to God's praise his most beloved queen, whom God has chosen above all things; that is the human soul. We serve our lady the queen so that she might accomplish her Lord's will with all zeal and with her full attention in all things, always according to the Christian dispensation. Then she shall never be found guilty."

"Lady Wisdom, what service can you render together with your sister Discernment?"

"We teach my lady the queen to distinguish between evil and good in divine wisdom with the holy power of discernment, so that she can imagine how things are now and might be later. Thus she gains a practical advantage in all things."

"Lady Truth, what service can you render at court with your sister Sanctity?"

"I serve my Lord and my lady the queen in total devotion, that she might always be true to her Lord in all trials. Thus shall she ever remain secure and free and be ever inwardly holy, subject to her Lord in all things. This shall keep her outwardly worthy of praise."

"Lady Humility, what service can you render together with your sister Gentleness?"

"I teach my lady the queen to love from the heart the will of my Lord and all his gifts. Thus can she rest in holy gentleness, driving out with cheerfulness all her interior suffering."

"Lady Generosity, what service can you render together with your sister Obedience?"

"I teach my lady the queen, with her longing love of God, always in her prayers to be generous to the wicked and the good, to the living and the dead. The treasure is manifold and large; it all returns to her lap. If she carries out her Lord's will, she shall practice holy obedience in all her works. Thus shall she remain God's queen."

"Lady Strength, what service can you render together with your sister Constancy?"

"I teach my lady to be strong in all conflict. Thus can she remain in her kingdom being ever constant. Then she shall remain ever free before her Lord."

The number of these maidens is beyond human reckoning. For everything that a good person does in God, inwardly and outwardly, requires virtue.

Together on the path with these maidens there journeyed a great lord who resembled a very holy and mighty bishop. This was our Christian faith. He was fiery within and was completely aflame with divine love. Together with all these virtues he served this queen.

High overhead hovered a maiden resembling a golden eagle. She was surrounded by a heavenly radiance. She illumined and taught and put all these maidens in the proper order for serving their lady the queen. This love dwells in Christian faith; she rests in the palace of her lady the queen. It is her task to force love to love, God to the soul, and the soul to God. That is why she is in the first commandments'

63. God's Will Is a Sovereign Lord in All Being

Constant longing in the soul,
Constant days of pain in the body,
Constant anguish in the senses,
Constant hope in one's heart for no one but Jesus—
All who have forsaken themselves in God
Know well what I am saying.

For two days and two nights I was so seriously ill that I had hope that my end had come. I thanked God as best I could for his favors. And I urged God to take me to him if that were his dearest will. "And yet, Lord, if your praise can at all be increased thereby, I shall gladly remain in this miserable body for love of you. Lord, I have so lived for many a day that, Lord, I never offered you such a difficult sacrifice as this. Lord, thy will be done and not mine. I do not have dominion over myself. You do in all things."

Then I saw high up in the distance how the saints were making preparations as though they were about to come to my end. I could not distinguish the individual persons among them. For such a powerful light was shining in their midst that it seemed to me that I was one with them. This was high in the west where the sun sets. From the north came evil spirits who stood close by. They had to witness my judgment. They were all tangled together and tied up like whipped dogs. Choking at the collar, they tried to get at me. I was not afraid of them. I was glad. I realized that their presence would have to bring honor to God because God has relieved his friends of all harassment from them and they, in their wickedness, return to hell.

In the midst of all this a change took place in my condition, so that I had to remain in this bitter, wretched life. I had been so secure and free, without fear or suffering. Woe, woe, woe! If only I could have remained in this death! If it were not for God's goodness, I would now be utterly disheartened. If I now had normal human strength and divine love, then I would really start serving God. I would try to bring things to a good end, just as I always wanted to and still do.

64. How God Serves Man

Thus does a beggar woman speak to God in her prayer:

"Lord, I thank you because in your love you have stripped me of all earthly riches and now clothe and feed me from the resources belonging to others. For everything that clings to me in possessiveness, causing pleasure in my heart, has to become completely alien to me.

"Lord, I thank you for taking from me my eyesight and for now serving me with the eyes of others.

"Lord, I thank you for taking from me the use of my hands and for now serving me with the hands of others.

"Lord, I thank you for taking from me the strength of my heart and for now serving me with the hearts of others.

"Lord, on their behalf, I beg you to reward them on earth with your divine love, that they might entreat you and serve you with all virtues until they achieve a holy end."

All who for love of God leave all things with a pure heart-they are all archbeggars. On the last day they shall sit in judgment with Jesus our Redeemer.

"Lord, may you change in me and in all sinners everything I complain of to you.

"Lord, for your own honor may you grant me and all imperfect religious people everything I ask for.

"Lord, whatever I do, fail to do, or suffer, may praise of you never grow silent in my heart. Amen."

65. How God Adorns the Soul with Suffering

Whenever virgins in all ages are clothed according to the will of their Bridegroom, they need nothing more than their wedding dress. This means being racked with pain in sickness, in days of suffering, in temptation, and in much anguish of heart. We find much of this among sinful Christians. These are the wedding dresses of loving souls. But the everyday work clothes are fasting, keeping vigils, scourging oneself, going to confession, sighing, weeping, praying, fearing sin, severely curbing the senses and the body in God for love of God, sweet hoping and ceaseless loving desire and a constantly praying heart in all one's works. These are the work clothes of a good person. When we are sick, we wear wedding dresses; and when we are healthy, we wear work clothes.

This is how the tormented body speaks to the lonely soul: "When shall you soar with the feathers of your yearning to the blissful heights to Jesus, your eternal Love? Thank him there for me, lady, that, feeble and unworthy though I am, he nevertheless wanted to be mine when he came into this land of exile and took our humanity upon himself; and ask him to keep me innocent in his favor until I attain a holy end, when you, dearest Soul, turn away from me."

The soul: "Ah, dearest prison in which I have been bound, I thank you especially for being obedient to me. Though I was often unhappy because of you, you nevertheless came to my aid. On the last day all your troubles will be taken from you.

Then we shall no longer complain.
Then everything that God has done with us
Will suit us just fine,
If you will now only stand fast
And keep hold of sweet hope.”

Obedience is a holy bond. It binds the soul to God and the body to Jesus and the five senses to the Holy Spirit. The longer it binds, the more the soul loves. The less the body preserves itself, the fairer its works shine before God and before people of good will.

NOTES TO TEXT

Prologue to the Lux Divinitatis

1. Revelationes Gertrudianae ac Mechtildianae, ed. Solesmes Monks (Louis Paquelin), 2 vols. (Poitiers and Paris: Oudin, 1875-77); Vol. 2: Sororis Mechtildis Lux divinitatis, pp. 435-37. Hereafter referred to as Rev. I and II.
2. This Heinrich cannot be Heinrich of Halle, Mechthild's longtime spiritual advisor, who died before the translation was undertaken. Because of the consistency in style between this prologue and the text of the Lux div., Neumann concludes that this Heinrich, a lector in the Dominican house in Halle, is responsible for both (1964, 193-94).
3. Satan's "body" signifies his follower and provides a parallel to "Christ and his church."
4. Historical and mystical indicate that the book should be read on more than one level, as was the common way of reading the Bible, which was often said to have four senses or meanings: literal or historical, allegorical, anagogical, and mystical. As used here, mystical seems to comprise all those ways of interpreting that are not literal or historical.
5. Cf. Liber specialis gratiae, Mechthild of Hackeborn in Rev. II, 11 42; V 3, 3; and Legatus divinaepietatis, Gertrud the Great in Rev. I, V 7.
6. The rest of the prologue, which continues for a few pages, is comprised almost entirely of quotations taken from various parts of the Lux div.

Latin Foreword with Table of Contents and Middle High German Translation

1. This foreword precedes the text of the FL. A later hand has added in German the heading "Concerning the Revelations of a Loving Soul." About the author of the Latin foreword it can be said that he struggled to write it in Latin (the final paragraph is in Middle High German); that he wrote it about 1270 and was familiar only with Books I-V; and that his index of subjects, which he takes imperfectly from the chapter headings, shows him to be careless and superficial. See Neumann 1964, 180-83.
2. The Latin word inspiratus literally says that the book was "breathed into" its human author by the Lord through grace.
3. The Latin word conscriptus seems to refer less to writing as done by an author than to the acts of compiling or writing down something being dictated. See Neumann 1964, 183-84.
4. Neumann (1964, 182-83) believes that this final thought about reading the book nine times, etc., was added about the middle of the fourteenth century.

Book I

1. The first paragraph of this prologue, which is best understood as an introduction to FL as a whole, has been pieced together from sentences coming later in the text. Neumann credits these lines to the compiler or editor (1964, 182-83). The first part ("This book... standing") is taken from V 34, 41-43; N I 195. The second part ("and it... me alone") is taken from 11 26, 11; N I 68. The third part ("and proclaims ... intimacy") is modeled on 11 26, 15-16; N I 68. Unlike the concluding sentence ("All who... nine times"), which Neumann considers to be, both here and in the Latin prologue to FL, a mid-fourteenth-century addition, these lines are also found at the beginning of the Lux div. and hence were part of the book before Mechthild's death. Because these lines are preceded by the statement that God himself speaks the words of the book and, more importantly, because the words are spoken by our Lord (V 34), or God (11 26), in their original context, the "I," "me," and "my intimacy" must be taken to refer to God and not to Mechthild.
2. Given the context, it is most likely that "religious people" means primarily members of the clergy and religious orders.
3. That is, the pillars of the church.
4. An example of clever wordplay gets lost in the translation: gemachet and unmaht. The word gemachet (made) recalls

God's maht (might or power). Thus his unmaht (un-might) is his powerlessness to withhold the gift of making the book.

5. This chapter is a fine example of Mechthild's appropriation of the language and conventions of courtly-love poetry for her purposes. The dialogue was a popular device in courtly-love poetry. Here it is combined with allegory: in courtly fashion the soul (queen) converses with the allegorical figure Lady Love. Love is addressed as frouwe minne and the soul as frouwe kfineginne. However, though each uses frouwe (lady or mistress) in addressing the other, they are not equals, as the course of the dialogue makes clear. As to rank, the soul is superior and, when Lady Love uses frouwe in addressing her, frouwe retains much of its original meaning as the feminine equivalent of lord, or one's feudal master. Thus, I have chosen to render frouwe kfineginne with "my Mistress and Queen," which is meant to convey the deference Love shows the soul. Emotionally, however, the roles are reversed. Clearly the soul is utterly dependent on Lady Love, who is, of course, divine love in both senses—the soul's love for God and God's love for the soul, which is the soul's reward for having given up everything for God. When the soul addresses Love as frouwe, she is acknowledging the latter's nobility. Hence the more usual translation "Lady" seems appropriate. As the course of the dialogue reveals, however, the soul has surrendered everything to divine love. Hence the more radical dependence is that of the soul on Lady Love. This dependence is conveyed to the audience in part by the soul's using frouwe to address her.

6. As becomes clear through the word hundredfold and Lady Love's statement that the soul can demand God and his kingdom in return for leaving everything, the scriptural context for this dialogue is Matthew 19:27-29.

7. In this chapter Mechthild offers us a poetic description of mystical union or the experience of ecstasy, which she calls God's greeting. One is left with the impression, however, that she is not recounting one specific event in her life but rather is giving a generic description of such experiences.

8. In order not to offend against orthodoxy in describing ecstasy, one could not imply a complete separation of body and soul. For more on this, see Schmidt, note 13, p. 347.

9. The predicate of this sentence is Neumann's not completely convincing attempt to save a corrupt passage. See note to I 2, 13; N 11 5.

10. In addition to "laments" the ms seems to suggest "recognizes" as a possibility as well. See note to I 2, 23; N 11 6.

11. "Raised up" (verzogen) alludes to her having been raised up, like Paul, in ecstasy or rapture. Cf. 2 Cor 12:2-4.

12. In the Song of Songs the bride is frequently called a dove by the bridegroom. Cf. Sg 2:14; 5:2; and 6:9.

13. From what follows it seems that the "master of the house" is the body to whom the soul is unhappily married. A nasty spat ensues when the soul returns from her tryst.

14. This calls to mind a poem by Walther von der Vogelweide, "Nemt, frouwe, disen kranz," in which the speaker of the poem is dreaming of a love encounter and is so elated that he laughs, wakes himself up, and thus spoils the dream. Perhaps Mechthild is alluding to this poem.

15. That is, to me, Mechthild.

16. Mechthild's oxymoron, that she wishes to "die living" to describe ecstatic union, may be in imitation of Gottfried of Strassburg who, in his narrative Tristan, often similarly juxtaposes love, life, and death.

17. Mechthild repeats this theme of "blind saints... who love and do not know" in a varied form in I 20 below.

18. Many themes and images occurring in this chapter are similar to themes and images in the Song of Songs; examples include the beating and wounding of the beloved (5:7), the bed of love (3:1), and love sickness (2:5 and 5:8).

19. This translates Neumann's rendering of the sentence and implies that the soul wishes that love kill her. This fits well with the loved-death thoughts of the previous chapter. The punctuation in Morel's edition elicits the following translation: "Am I not going to be killed by your hand? Then it would be better if I had never known you."

20. During the offertory of the mass a drop of water is added to the wine in the chalice and loses itself in the wine.

Mechthild is no doubt alluding to this. The passage also recalls Bernard of Clairvaux's discussion of union with God in On Loving God 10.28.

21. The German title differs markedly from the Latin title in the Lux div. (De collatione anime et corporis). Neumann (note to I 5, 1; N 11 9) takes this as an indication of an early corruption.

22. Paul (Rom 9:3) expresses similar sentiments.

23. Cf. I 2 and note 7 above.

24. The most influential thinker on the doctrine of angels in the Middle Ages was Pseudo-Dionysius, who divided them into nine ranks or choirs. Beginning with the highest rank, these are Seraphim, Cherubim, Thrones, Dominions, Virtues, Powers, Principalities, Archangels, and Angels.

25. The speaker is presumably the Lord.

26. That is, free of bitterness or rancor.

27. Chapters 12-21 bear resemblances to two types of poems occurring in courtly-love poetry: the dialogue and the Wechsel (exchange). The dialogue is a conversation between lovers who talk to each other directly. Chapters 14-15 seem the clearest example of this. The Wechsel consists of two or more loosely connected strophes. The lovers do not address each other directly but speak of what they share: their love, for example, or a common experience. Though the logical connection between the strophes is weak, each speaker speaks a kind of monologue that the reader intuitively refers to the other speaker. Many of these chapters may be thought of as part of a Wechsel.

28. For an interesting study of this passage, see Paul Michel, "Dutch die bilde uber bilde: Zur Bildgestaltung bei Mechthild von Magdeburg," In Abendlandische Mystik im Mittelalter, Symposium Kloster Engelberg, ed. Kurt Ruh (Stuttgart: Metzler, 1986), 509-26.

29. Cf. the frequent similar references to fragrance in the first chapter of the Song of Songs.

30. Cf. Sg 1:13.

31. The word I have rendered "protection" (sicherheit) means, among other things, the oath of submission that a knight conquered in single combat, if he is to avoid being killed, must swear to the knight who has bested him. In view of the preceding phrase ("defeat and retreat"), the soul might well be admitting that she has been conquered by divine love, to which she then utterly submits in order to stand under its protection.

32. Schmidt (note 20, p. 349) points out the similarity of this thought to one occurring in William of St. Thierry, to the effect that one needs two eyes to know God: love and knowledge. One eye, working alone, does not suffice.

33. Jubilus is a Latin word used here and in other spiritual writings of the age to signify rapture or ecstasy in which the soul is raised up above all earthly things. It is interesting to note that Mechthild uses it here for the state or condition of the Trinity as it creates the human soul.

34. Here begins a long series containing a good number of mystical paradoxes, which caused the copyists much difficulty, as is evidenced by the number of corruptions and questionable passages. Neumann is quite aware that he has not been able to restore the original wording in every case. Cf. note to I 22, 12-34; N 11 14.

35. Despite the attempts of others to replace "experiences" (ervert) with something else, Neumann decided to retain it from ms E. One suggested substitution is erwert (= enwirdet: becomes nothing, is annihilated). Cf. note to I 22, 13; N 11 14-15.

36. All editors assume a lacuna here and in the other instances in this passage where ellipsis points occur.

37. That is, the deeper she dwells in infinite God.

38. The Middle High German word eigen, which I have translated by "own," means more than simply belonging to someone. When used with reference to a person it implies the status of an unfree serf (eigenman=serf). Thus God here becomes the unfree serf or slave of the soul.

39. That is, in the Trinity.

40. The red wine of Christ's suffering restores the health of the soul.

41. In the original, for purposes of rhyme (lust-brust), the singular (breast) occurs.

42. Schmidt (note 24, p. 351) calls attention to the long tradition, beginning with early ecclesiastical writers, according to which Mother Church (ecclesia) suckles Christians. See also Caroline Bynum's treatment of this theme in her Jesus as Mother: Studies in the Spirituality of the High Middle Ages (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982).

43. Chapters 23 and 24 offer another example of dialogue similar to that found in courtly lyric poetry.

44. Neumann finds this sentence puzzling and possibly corrupt. Though he does not emend it, he considers emendations that would make it mean: 1. His (Christ's) life died out of love for you. Or: 2. Your lover (Christ) died out of love for you. Cf. note to I 28, 5; N 11 19.

45. "Death... life": the usual order (life-death) is reversed here because of assonance rhyme (beliben-libe).

46. Neumann (note to I 29, 2; N 11 19) attributes the final phrase, "in Twenty-Three Steps of the Cross," to Heinrich of Halle's sense of order. The Lux div. introduces this chapter with the following narrative: "One day, when the sisters all hastened off to hear the word of God, Sister Mechthild remained behind alone, shut up in a small room. She began to lament sorely and to be sad, saying in her heart: 'Woe is me, Lord, that I, poor wretch, because of my infirmity am not strong enough to be present to hear your word.' Soon there appeared the Consoler of those who grieve in the habit of the Dominicans, and he said to her: 'Look at me, my bride, and see.'"

47. This phrase is in Latin in the text: Vide me, sponsa!

48. These are the hours at which the corresponding parts of the Divine Office are sung.

49. The charm of this chapter rests largely on the fact that each line has interior rhyme.

50. The Lux div. adds here: "The holy woman used to sing these seven phrases to the Lord when her body was weakened by sickness or in ardor of the spirit or in the delight of longing love."

51. Nothingness (das niht) and somethingness (das iht) are staples of the vocabulary of later mystics, especially of Meister Eckhart. Here we find a clear indication that they predate Eckhart's innovative influence on vernacular mystical vocabulary.

52. This is most likely a reference to the standard interpretation of the story of Martha and Mary (Lk 10:38-42), in which Jesus chides Martha for being too busy and worried regarding everyday matters and praises Mary's contemplative focus on what alone is truly necessary.

53. Chapters 36 and 37 present us with another example of Mechthild's employment of a device related to the dialogue form of courtly lyric poetry.

54. The deer and the eagle are traditional animal symbols of the contemplative soul based on Psalms 41:2 and 102:5, respectively.

55. These last sentences continue the allegory: the woods are the companionship of holy people; the nightingale is union with God; and the voice of the birds is holy knowledge.

56. I have chosen to follow Schmidt here and have translated "to circle higher." Cf. Schmidt, note 37, p. 354. Neumann (note to I 44, 36; N II 23-24) seems to conclude that the original phrase meant "to crawl/creep further."

57. That is: I will accompany you willingly, I depart from you in sadness.

58. Neumann (note to I 44, 62; N 11 24) is of the opinion that Mary's milk is unnatural because of its miraculous origin, which Mechthild explains in detail in V 23 below.

59. This is Neumann's proposed reading of a very problematic sentence. See note to I 44, 74 f.; N 11 25-26.

60. The original has: "ir sint so sere genattirt in mich" (I 44, 82; N 31). This translates literally as: "You are so very natured into me." This line serves as the culmination of Mechthild's play with "nature" in this chapter. For more of her thoughts on the nature of the soul, see VI 31 below.

61. This coyness is reminiscent of passages in courtly poetry: the poet of the Nibelungenlied, for example, discreetly refuses to reveal explicitly to his audience the joys of Siegfried and Kriemhild on their wedding night; and the girl in Walther von der Vogelweide's Under der linden hopes no one finds out what happened when she met with her lover.

62. Courtly poetry often plays with the paradox of lovers being inseparable, even when they must leave each other.

63. The names of these feast days may have been added to the original text by a later hand. Cf. note to I 45, 3-18; N 11 27.

64. Cf. Rv 12:1.

65. Schmidt (note 45, p. 357) points out the frequent occurrence in the Bible of images of grapes, wine, and the wine press, usually referring to a process of transformation. Cf. Lam 1:15; Is 5:2 and 63:3; Prv 3:10; Mt 21:33; and Rv 14:20.

66. Hartmann von Aue in the prologue to Gregorius (ll. 97-143) gives an allegorical interpretation of the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10:25-37). The oil and wine the Samaritan pours on the wounds of the robbers' victim are taken to be the balm (oil) of mercy or grace and the stinging antiseptic (wine) of the law or justice, which requires penitence and penance.

67. These words are in Latin in the text: "Veni, dilecta mea, veni, coronaberis!" As Neumann (note to I 46, 51 f.; N 11 28-29) points out, these words, taken from Song of Songs 4:8, were sung during the consecration of a virgin, a ritual in Mechthild's time not exclusively reserved for the ceremony of nuns' professing their vows but allowed also to women living outside the cloister, such as beguines.

68. I have used "religious" to translate geistliche here. It seems to indicate priests and members of religious orders, but perhaps it is not restricted to such in this context. Cf. Book I, note 2 above.

Book II

1. The toils Mechthild has in mind are most likely extreme acts of asceticism.

2. The phrase "with separation" possibly indicates that God and creatures retain their separateness even in special intimacy.

3. The uninterrupted bliss of the soul in heaven after death would be more than a human being on earth could endure.

4. That is, the nine choirs of angels mentioned in I 6 above.

5. The thought seems to be that it was a good idea for God to put Mary, the pinnacle of his creation, next to his throne. The archangels, surprised to see mere human beings above them in heaven, cannot quibble about someone as perfect as Mary being above them.

6. The tower should be thought of as being at the west end of the church over the entrance, at the opposite end from the altar.

7. The choir is that section of the church situated between the nave and the sanctuary, usually separated from the nave by a grill or something similar.

8. The Middle High German word ampellen (Latin: ampullae) can mean both small containers for liquid and lamps.

9. The complete lyrics can be found in 11 2 above.

10. These words are in Latin in the text: Gaudeamus omnes in domino. They are the first words of the introit for the feast of the Blessed Virgin Mary of Good Counsel, April 26.

11. Following the Lux div. Neumann (note to 11 4, 65 f.; N 11 31-32) takes this she to be the poor girl.

12. This "Book of the Genealogy" of Jesus Christ is Matthew 1:1-16 and is read on the feast of the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin Mary, September 8.

13. Since Mechthild uses the word wihen (ordain) here in alluding to the marvelous happening that occurred when the pregnant Mary visited pregnant Elizabeth, whose baby leaped in the womb and was filled with the Holy Spirit (see Lk 1:41), perhaps she is interpreting this event to mean that John thus received ordination. However, when she later defends this vision against the charge that it is not authentic because in it John the Baptist, a layman, celebrates mass, she does not bring up such an argument. See VI 36 below.

14. Neumann (note to 11 4, 89-91; N 11 32) finds this phrase confusing. He suggests emending the text to read "at the words [of consecration] and signs of his hand."

15. This is probably best taken to mean that the lamb unites itself completely with the soul of the girl, which is in the divine image. This happens "in her stable," her body.

16. The lines in brackets, which also occur in the Lux div., were obviously added after Mechthild's death. No one, however, has been able to offer convincing arguments as to exactly when, where, or by whom they were added.

17. That is, the garment worn next to the skin.

18. The reader is warned not to attach undue theological weight to the phrase "one being." The context does not warrant it. God speaks here in lyrical phrases and as a lover-not as a theologian-in saying he and the soul shall become one.

19. As Neumann (note to 11 6, 14; N 11 33) points out, Mechthild usually employs Playful or playing (spilend) to refer to ecstatic mystical union, availing herself thereby of the traditions of courtly love and bride mysticism.

20. This is the beginning of the Gloria in the ordinary of the mass. Translation: "Glory to God in the highest."

21. In the text the pronouns and possessive adjectives in the beginning of the chapter are masculine because they refer back to "A person" (Ein mensche), which is masculine. They are best taken, however, as referring to Mechthild herself because she often refers to herself this way. Therefore I have changed he, him, and his to she and her.

22. Neumann (note to 11 14, If.; N 11 33) considers this title to be at least partially corrupt.

23. Because the Lux div. translates "from humanity" with "from the weakness of humanity" (ex infirmitate humanitatis), Neumann (note to II 14, 3; N 11 33-34) weighs the possibility that the original might have been more in line with the Lux div.

24. The lyrical charm of this passage, as in many passages, is enhanced by the rhyme in the original: stunt, runt, gesunt, munt, count.

25. Chapters 17 and 18 are another example of Mechthild's employing the courtly-lyric form of the dialogue or exchange.

26. That is, regrettably I sink back to earth because our union also involves my body, which weighs me down and hastens my return to earth.

27. A more literal rendering: "in your and God's bed of love."

28. I have adopted Schmidt's (p. 54) punctuation here because I cannot discover a plausible meaning by following Neumann's (II 19, 12-13; N I 50) punctuation.

29. As Neumann (note to 11 19, 17; N 11 35) points out, notlich, which I have rendered as "overwhelmed," is used by Mechthild to refer to the soul or God's (overwhelming) love at the point of mystical ecstasy.

30. In I 1 above, Lady Love also addressed the soul as her mistress and queen.

31. Cf. 2 Cor 12:2-4.

32. I have not translated this last clause in line with the reading that Neumann, despite misgivings (note to 51 ; 11 19, N 11 36), has decided to retain. A literal translation of that reading would indicate that the soul deceives the senses. Taking the context into consideration and the translation of the clause offered in the Lux div., it seems likely that Mechthild wants to say that, in this heaven created by the devil, either the senses are themselves deceived, or they deceive the soul.

33. Cf. 2 Cor 11:14.

34. I have omitted two lines after "Three Persons" that Neumann puts in brackets because they were clearly not written by Mechthild. Translation: "which begin thus: God's true greeting, coming from the heavenly flood." This is a reference to the opening line of I 2 above.

35. Another of Mechthild's references to herself as a dog. Cf. 11 3 above.

36. See Book II, note 28 above.

37. The Lux div. introduced this chapter with "In raptu..." (In a rapture,...).

38. The Seraphim are those in the highest order of angels. The lowest order is made up of those simply called angels.

39. Concerning a sword piercing Mary's soul, cf. Lk 2:35.

40. That is, clerics and/or members of religious orders.

41. Cf. Mt 14:1-12 and Mk 6:14-29.

42. John the Evangelist, the disciple "whom Jesus loved" and who at the Last Supper "was lying close to the breast of Jesus" (Jn 13:23), was in medieval times considered the mystic among the apostles. His symbol was the eagle, which, according to medieval lore, was the only animal that could look directly at the sun and not go blind. In like manner, John was thought to be able to look into the Godhead and not go blind.

43. Cf. 2 Cor 12:2-4.

44. Cf. Acts 7:54-60.

45. The word in the text, petze, is a corruption of the Latin pax (peace) and refers to the kiss of peace in the mass or to the object (crucifix or image of Christ) that the celebrant passed around to be kissed after the recitation of the "Lamb of God."

46. Cf. Jer 30:12.

47. Cf. Mt 8:4

48. The whole exchange between Mechthild and the devil is modeled on Christ's temptation in the wilderness. Cf. Mt 4:1-10; Mk 1:12-13; and Lk 4:1-13.

49. That is, by love.

50. Schmidt (notes 85 and 87, p. 363) points out Mechthild's probable dependence on Richard of St. Victor's De quattuor gradibus violentiae caritatis (On the Four Steps of Violent Love) for her concept of "bound love."

51. Cf. Jb 7:5 and 30:30.

52. In love poetry to break off or pluck flowers is frequently an allusion to loss of virginity.

53. This is perhaps a reference to her writing the FL.

54. For the apples, cf. Sg 2:3-5. The tree in most medieval interpretations of the Song of Songs is the cross of Christ. Concerning color symbolism, see Horst Laubner, Studien zum geistlichen Sinngehalt des Adjektivs im Werk Mechthilds von Magdeburg (Göppingen: Kummerle, 1975), 41-48.

55. Because this line is missing in a good manuscript (B) and in the Lux div., and because its meaning in this context is unclear, it may not be authentic. Cf. note to 11 25, 129; N 11 45.

56. These two final lines occur only in the Lux div. In the critical edition Neumann offers a Middle High German reconstruction of them (translated here).

57. That is, because I am trying to honor you by writing this book.

58. These last three words succinctly describe the three major difficulties Mechthild faces in seeking acceptance for her book: 1. Learned: she has little education. 2. Religious: she does not belong to a religious order approved by and under the jurisdiction of the church. 3. Man: women in general found it difficult to be taken as speaking with authority. Thus arises the need to insist that God is the book's author.

59. The gospel passage providing the foundation for this entire speech by God is Matthew 11:26/Luke 10:21-22.

60. The sentence up to this point presents some textual difficulties. How many writers are indicated? What does Mechthild mean by "write after me"? Neumann has chosen to rely heavily on the Lux div. in attempting to establish the critical text. The Lux div. speaks of writers (plural) and has them writing (conscripterint; most likely a future perfect indicative) after Mechthild (post me). Conscribere can indicate either the act of writing according to a model or text, or the act of taking down dictation (note to 11 26, 34 f.; N 11 46 and Neumann 1964, 183-86).

Book III

1. That is, the empty space left by the fallen angels.

2. For an extended study of this chapter, see Petrus Tax, "Die große Himmelsschau Mechthilds von Magdeburg und ihre Hollenvision," Zeitschrift für deutsches Altertum und deutsche Literatur 108 (1979), 112-25.

3. This is a ceremonial greeting. Schmidt (note 98, p. 365) describes a picture in a ms in Einsiedeln (Cod. Eins. 710, fol. 20b) of Christ laying his right hand on the breast of the soul represented as a nun. She has her left hand resting on his right shoulder.

4. Cf. Walther von der Vogelweide's Under der linden, where the girl asks: "Did he kiss me?" (Kust er mich?); to which she immediately supplies the answer: "Yes indeed, a thousand times." Schmidt (note 100, pp. 365-66) gives examples of occurrences of the divine kiss in medieval religious writings.

5. God, a spiritual being, creates or makes by giving a command with words; e.g., "Let there be light" (Gn 1:3).

6. Tax, "Himmelsschau," p. 117, interprets this to mean that a whole tenth (and highest) choir fell together with Lucifer.

7. This short sentence probably means that some angels from the other nine choirs fell with Lucifer as well.

8. Tax, "Himmelsschau," p. 117, considers desolation (das ellende) to be a synonym for breach (bruch). But perhaps it is better to think of it as the upper reaches of the breach. Cf. also Schmidt, note 103, p. 366.

9. The song of the virgins that one would expect here is absent from all mss.

10. That is, they have not yet assumed their places on the chairs.

11. First in ascending order.

12. That is, in the choir totally vacated by Lucifer and those closest to him.

13. Christ arose from the dead in the perfect manhood of someone thirty years old. All redeemed Christians shall rise from the dead as thirty year olds. But the unbaptized children shall not rise from the dead in the same manner as the faithful elect.

14. That is, the body.

15. Exactly what Mechthild means by this allusion is not clear. The Middle High German word used here to describe the dog is edel (noble), but the Lux div. translates edel with crudelior (fiercer). Perhaps that conception is that a dog with good bloodlines is a better watchdog or hunter.

16. This concluding paragraph offers a clever defense against possible objections: first, by calling to mind the evangelical injunction to become as guileless children and not take on the legalistic attitudes of the Pharisees; and, second, by stating that God is the chapter's primary author. Perhaps already at this stage of her writing Mechthild was experiencing attacks by detractors, or perhaps she added this paragraph later.

17. Mechthild here addresses the bride in the Song of Songs.

18. Cf. Sg 2:17.

19. That is, that wisdom teach me moderation.

20. That is, the Annunciation.

21. That is, that she cannot be present at the recitation of the Divine Office.

22. That is, from celebrating mass.

23. That is, if a priest in serious sin celebrates mass, the mass is valid but the priest sins mortally.

24. The image (plucking) is that of the Trinity as a stringed instrument.

25. The word hanttrfiwe (solemn assurance) means literally hand-loyalty; i.e., faithfulness promised by some formal gesture with the hand. It is used in reference to the faithfulness promised by the groom to the bride at the wedding ceremony. Cf. note to 111 9, 52; N 11 56.

26. The prophets frequently called Israel a whore for being unfaithful to its God. Cf., for example, Is 1:21; Jer 3:6-10; and Ez 16 and 23.

27. The Lux div. reads "mystical temple of Solomon."

28. The following chapter is filled with allusions to the accounts of the passion and death of Christ given in the gospels.

29. I have rendered mit heliger itelheit by "in holy simplicity." However, as Neumann (note to 111 10, 22; N 11 57-58) points out, the phrase is troublesome for several reasons. Another possible reading is "in hellish vanity."

30. Neumann's (note to III 10, 29; N 11 58) best guess for this difficult word (minnelouffe) is to relate it to the chase or hunt imagery of the Song of Songs, imagery that appears also in 11 25 above.

31. Mechthild seems to be saying that "that," i.e., receiving communion despite her feelings of unworthiness, is no more a hindrance to her glorifying God in so doing than it is to use an oven to bake. Just as an oven fulfills its purpose through baking, she fulfills hers by accomplishing in herself God's goodness. And to do so, she must receive communion.

32. This is in Latin in the text: Puer natus est nobis (Is 9:6). It is from the introit of the third mass of the Feast of the Nativity of the Lord.

33. That is, those in purgatory.

34. That is, members of the clergy and/or religious orders.

35. A venia is a complete prostration performed while praying.

36. A discipline is a whip made of cord for penitential practices.

37. That is, female members of religious orders and beguines.

38. That is, fellow members of my order.

39. The biblical imagery most similar to that in this chapter would seem to be Paul's in Ephesians 6:11-17.

40. The final section of this sentence is hopelessly corrupt in ms E. The Lux div. preserves a vestige of the image of mutual illumination between God and creature found elsewhere. The final three words of the critical edition are "in das mine" (into mine). I have rendered them literally and think that mine means my (God's) heart, parallel to creatures' hearts mentioned earlier in the sentence.

41. That is, with God, or familiarity with divine things.

42. I have translated "gegen dem ewigen gotte" by "face to face with God eternal." Although face to face may seem at first an unnecessary addition, I think it is warranted because, in the standard medieval view of Moses, which goes back to Augustine (De genesi ad litteram 12, cap. 27, n. 55; PL 34, 477-78), this prophet's exalted position rested on his being the only Old Testament figure to have seen God face to face. The preposition gegen employed by Mechthild instead of the more usual mit (with) seems to imply this traditional thought concerning Moses.

43. That is, the Song of Songs, whose author was believed to be Solomon.

44. Cf. Sg 4:7.

45. Cf. Jer 31:22. Patristic theology considered this passage to be a prophecy of the Incarnation.

46. Cf. Dn 14:30.

47. For a detailed analysis of this chapter, see Tax, "Himmelsschau," pp. 126-36.

48. A medieval reader would most likely see this as an allusion to the city of the devil, or Babylon, as described by Augustine in his City of God.

49. "High spirit" (hoher muot) is a conventional term in courtly poetry and describes the feeling of exhilaration one should feel because one is a member of such a worthy society. Thus, Mechthild seems to be condemning courtly literature as a frivolous pursuit that distracts from serious spiritual concerns.

50. Such effects of a powerful vision have a long tradition. Cf., for example, Dn 7:28; 8:27; and 10:7-9.

51. The neo-Platonic influence and perhaps heretical implications of the soul's origin emanating from this passage need not be taken with complete theological seriousness. Content here is clearly being influenced by Mechthild's striving for rhyme and lyrical effect.

52. Mechthild seems to be saying that limbo (or Abraham's bosom), where those pre-Christian figures destined for heaven, such as Adam, Eve, Moses, the prophets, etc., had to wait until saved by Christ's redemptive act, was converted into the worst part of purgatory after Christ's ascension. Just as Mechthild condemns Christians to a worse punishment than non-Christians, so also does she consign prominent Christians who barely avoided hell to this "renovated" limbo.

53. That is, what we have not done penance for on earth has to be atoned for hereafter.

54. That is, they have repented and confessed their sins, but have never done penance for them.

55. The Lux div. translates this phrase by "sine medio" (directly). Perhaps the image is that of the soul at death escaping the body through the mouth.

56. The critical edition has a period here and joins the following clause to the next sentence. I find it much more difficult to come up with a satisfactory reading following that punctuation. Schmidt (p. 113) punctuates as I do.

57. Neumann (note to 111 23; N 11 64) remarks that this chapter has no corresponding chapter in the Lux div. and was probably moved here from Book VII.

58. The soul's final speech marks her as a courtly lover pursuing her beloved. Her love consists in desire rather than in fulfillment. She is willing to suffer anything to attain her goal, but she knows, as does, say, the poet Reinmar von Hagenau, that her basic manner of bearing herself is to be one of faithful waiting.

59. Here Mechthild expresses a thought that recalls lines of a poem by Walther von der Vogelweide (Herzeliebe frouwelin) in which he states that it is not beauty that causes love but rather love that causes one to be beautiful: "Liebe machet schoene wip" (Love makes women beautiful).

Book IV

1. Neumann (note to IV 2, 101-3; N 11 66) thinks these last two sentences might well have been added by Mechthild later, as she was editing her work.

2. Schmidt (p. 125) translates die cristanheit with "the church" (die Kirche). I have chosen the more literal "Christianity." Clearly, however, the two concepts are almost identical in Mechthild's thinking.

3. These three words are in Latin in the text: "Ego sum Jhesus."

4. Mechthild seems to be indicating here that she went into ecstasy.

5. That is, the cupidity's desire.

6. That is, the spiritual authority Christ gave to Peter and his other disciples to bind and to absolve. Cf. Mt 16:18-19; 18:18; and Jn 20:23.

7. Neumann (note to IV 3, 37; N 11 67) explains that this refers to Christ's sitting at the right hand of the Father.

8. A more literal translation would be: "and her nostrils are stuffed with sweet violets." I doubt, however, that such a rendering captures the spirit of the image.

9. I have rendered "die gruenen wissen lylien" (green white lilies) as "verdant white lilies" and "das wisse gruene morgenrot" (the white green dawn) as "the pale green dawn" because a literal translation leads to confusion about the colors. However, as Mechthild continues her allegorical description, it is important to realize that green and white have already been explicitly mentioned twice.

10. The Trinity is threefold and one, like an eye that is made up of white (Father); green, i.e., the iris (Son); and light, i.e., the pupil (Holy Spirit).

11. Neumann (note to IV 3, 60; N 11 68) explains horn as a corner of the battlements and remarks that Mechthild is here exploiting the tradition of the fortress of love allegory frequently occurring in courtly poetry, but that she adds to it by employing technical terms of military engineering. Schmidt (note 144, p. 375) notes the implied reference to the Trinity in the threefold horn and recalls the symbolic meaning of the horn among the ancient Assyrians, Babylonians, and Hebrews as well as the horns on the head of Moses in Christian art.

12. That is, members of religious orders.

13. That is, the gift of the wisdom from the natural faculties.

14. The verse form Mechthild chooses for this chapter, except for the last few lines, resembles the couplet, though the lines vary in the number of feet, and not all couplets rhyme.

15. The "it" refers to false consolation.

16. This should probably be interpreted to mean: the possibility that I might sin in the future.

17. Probably an offering connected with a successful harvest.

18. Just what the four kinds of offerings are is not self-evident. Neumann (note to IV 9, 3; N 11 70) suggests: for mass, for bringing communion to the sick, for the last anointing, and at harvest time.

19. Here Mechthild is drawing on the tradition of the dawn song, which expresses the sadness of the lovers because, after a night together, they must separate. Cf. also, Sg 3:1.

20. That is, the souls in purgatory.

21. That is, the lowest joy in heaven.

22. 1 Jn 3:2.

23. Translation: We praise you, God.

24. That is, Mechthild.

25. A very confusing sentence that puzzles the commentators. The Lux div. seems to interpret it to mean that, if the Second Person had been flesh before the Annunciation, flesh would have been a beginning or principle of the Second Person's nature or being. This is what is then denied.

26. That is, the more virtuous we are on earth, the higher is the rank of the angels we are given as vassals in heaven.

27. The Lux div. interprets this specifically to mean "take up the life of a beguine."

28. Instead of claws, this might mean "with sharp points on its horns." See Neumann, note to IV 7, 9; N 11 74-75.

29. This entire chapter is obviously modeled on the traditions of the bestiaries (German: Philologus). These were works treating real and fabled animals by listing their (often merely imputed or imagined) characteristics, which were then allegorized in a moral or theological vein.

30. The word in the text is empfangen, which can mean both "to receive" and "to conceive."

31. Schmidt (note 164, p. 379) suggests that the fish is Christ. From early Christian times the fish was a symbol for Christ.

32. Neumann (note to IV 18, 99; N 11 77) explains this clause as referring to the public ceremony during which relics of the saints were held up for veneration.

33. The name in German: Alles Nictze.

34. The Lux div. introduces this chapter with this addition: "The beginning of the order was on fire with glowing divine love and, while it shone in the faultlessness of external purity, it gave forth, as it were, the fragrance of lilies, and it knew nothing of hypocrisy. Clothed in true simplicity, it was bright with beauty."

35. This refers no doubt to the Dominicans as confessors and praises them for being theologically schooled enough to carry out their duties in the confessional knowledgeably and with good judgment.

36. The Lux div. introduces this chapter with the following addition: "I was in the habit of visiting the graves of deceased pious people and of greeting them as though they were God's household servants."

37. That is, Mechthild.

38. The clarification about the length of time is necessary because the text does not say "a week" but rather "fourteen time periods" (vierzehente stunde).

39. The Lux div. gives the name of the sister: Oda.

40. The word burial in this chapter heading either means something like "lying in state" or rests on a reading in ms E that says that John's body lies and is buried (. and begraben) which Neumann (note to IV 23, 3; N 11 79), following the Lux div., has emended to "lies unburied" (unbegraben)

41. Creation is a literal translation (schoepfnisse). Mechthild seems to be using the phrase "creation of the eternal kingdom" to denote heaven as a place or space with a clear but thin border between it and what is beneath it.

42. The orthodoxy of this statement is questionable. Usually the knowledge that their punishment will come to an end is seen as the decisive difference between those in purgatory and those in hell.

43. See above 111 21.

44. The Lux div. introduces this chapter with the following remarks, which are the basis for the claim that Mechthild had a brother who became a Dominican: "Brother Baldwin, brother by blood of Sister Mechthild, was brought up from childhood in good manners and was instructed in all virtues. In addition, he strove by his own industry to attain learning and was steeped in scholastic training. Finally, because of the merits of his sister, he was received into the Order of Preachers. Here he made such progress in virtue and knowledge that his brothers promoted him to the office of subprior, though against his will. He was so weighed down by this that, though he was young and strong, his bodily strength began to deteriorate."

45. That is, members of a new religious order.

46. That is, members of the order are not to travel alone.

47. In Mechthild's day this would be from November 1 to February 22.

48. Cf. Jn 12:3; Mt 26:7; and Mk 14:3.

49. That is, ordinary Christians should anoint the feet of the members of this new order, but only men should do this anointing because the members of this order are not God.

50. English: I believe in God.

51. The German word meister (master) means primarily a teacher or professor but, as this chapter also seems to imply, someone who wields authority, such as a religious superior.

52. These last two sentences seem to be saying that the founder of this new order, the son of the king of Rome, shall be authorized by the pope to write a rule for the new order, which then receives the pope's approval. Mechthild's prophecy of a new religious order may have been very controversial. It seems to reflect the prophetic writings of the Calabrian abbot Joachim of Fiore (c. 1135-1202), who foretold the appearance of a new and more perfect religious order in the coming new age. Joachim's views on the Trinity were condemned by the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215 and, in a perhaps not unrelated move, the founding of new religious orders was also prohibited.

53. That is, Jesus and his twelve apostles.

54. That is, by Judas. See Mt 26:15. The selling of Jesus is called "blessed," most likely in line with the felix culpa tradition. Adam's fall (culpa) was fortunate (felix) because it resulted in the elevation of the human race by causing the Word to become flesh. The selling of Christ can be seen in this same light.

55. Also in her elaborations on the last days, the Antichrist, and the return of Enoch and Elijah, Mechthild seems to have been greatly influenced by Joachim of Fiore. For more on this, see Schmidt, note 1 81, pp. 382-83; and Bernard McGinn, The Calabrian Abbot: Joachim of Fiore in the History of Western Thought (New York: Macmillan, 1985).

56. Elijah (cf. 2 Kgs 2:11-12) and Enoch (cf. Gn 5:24 and the pseudoepigraphical book of Enoch) were both taken up to heaven (or, for Mechthild, to paradise) without dying. Hence the common belief that they shall come back to earth in the last days.

57. That is, Enoch and Elijah.

Book V

1. Neumann (note to V 1, 24 f.; N 11 83) points out that the Lux div. modifies this passage concerning the angels and omits the names of the two highest ranks, probably because Mechthild's words could cause some concern as to the orthodoxy of her conception of the angels.

2. That is, the angels.

3. Concerning innate and acquired chastity in the soul: The former is no doubt that of Adam and Eve before the fall. This is the more perfect chastity and thus is put on the same level as the highest angels, the Seraphim. Acquired chastity, the best that humans can achieve since the fall, shines into the second highest choir, the Cherubim. On the sources for Mechthild's views on the angels, see note to V I, 27-33; N 11 83-84; and Schmidt, note 184, pp. 384-85.

4. That is, the Seraphim.

5. That is, souls.

6. Augustine's doctrine of original sin and its consequences for human sexuality are the most likely sources for Mechthild's statements about "marriage blood." According to the Bishop of Hippo, since the fall sexual intercourse is evil because it causes disorder in the human person. Passion overwhelms reason. Marriage, however, legitimizes sexual pleasure, which, nevertheless, remains disordering and hence evil in itself.

7. That is, the soul.

8. Kurt Ruh, "Mechthild von Magdeburg and Wichmann von Arnstein," Zeitschrift für deutsches Altertum und deutsche Literatur 120 (1991), 322-25, has discovered Mechthild's probable source for this unusual image of the soul under Lucifer's tail: the Magdeburg Dominican Wickmann of Arnstein, a contemporary of Mechthild and author of mystical writings.

9. Schmidt (note 157, p. 379) assumes the influence of Heinrich of Halle here because Mechthild so carefully distinguishes filial fear, which is still possible in heaven, from servile fear, which is not.

10. That is, I was following God's plan of redemption in coming to earth.

11. That is, though spiritually dead through mortal sin, they still live on earth and may be saved.

12. Cf. Jn 11:17-44.

13. The scriptural basis for this paragraph is probably Matthew 27:51-53. Schmidt (note 189, p. 385) lists many medieval theologians who were of the opinion that others arose from the grave and ascended into heaven when Christ did.

14. That is, the juice from the apple and the cursed blood.

15. That is, the name one receives upon entering religious life.

16. The Lux div. introduces this chapter with the following addition: "Brother Heinrich, named 'of Halle,' lector at Ruppín, having wondered at the sayings and writings of Sister Mechthild, received the following response from her."

17. Cf. Acts 2:3-7

18. Cf. Ex 3:6.

19. This is a reference to the role of young Daniel in saving Susanna from the elders, as related in the Book of Susanna. Cf. especially verses 44-63. The Lux div. concludes this chapter with the following addition: "This learned and good man, the aforementioned lector, collected all the writings of this Mechthild and put them together in one volume and divided it into six parts, as it now appears to those reading it. Sister Mechthild, who survived him, saw his soul in the sight of the Lord in heaven holding this book in his hand and rejoicing with his face radiant. For through the writing down of this book he attained for himself many rewards. Through them he appeared full of glory in the sight of the saints."

20. That is, by being truly sorry for our sins.

21. "Sinner" is feminine in the text and no doubt refers to Mechthild.

22. The words "over all humankind" appear in some manuscripts after "judgment" but are not considered authentic by Neumann (V 22, 7: N 1 172).

23. The following sentence appearing in some manuscripts "That is God's heart; alas for my guilty pain!" is not considered authentic by Neumann (V 22, 46-47; N 1 174).

24. Cf. Lk 1:38. Mechthild phrases Mary's reply to the angel in more courtly fashion than does the biblical text.

25. Cf. Lk 1:46-48.

26. That is, those gifts brought by the three wise men.

27. Lk 2:22-24. Mechthild's concern seems to be: Why did Mary give an offering of two pigeons, the traditional offering of poorer people, and not a lamb, since they were suddenly rich because of the gifts of the three wise men?

28. The Lux div. explains this by adding "not be stoned as adulteresses according to the law. Schmidt (note 207, pp. 387-88) thinks these remarks about virgins would also call to mind for the medieval audience the legend about St. Nicholas: that he gave money to the father of three young sisters and thus saved them from having to become prostitutes.

29. A hunger cloth (hungerlachen or hungertuch) was a veil or curtain that was hung in front of the altars or in front of the sanctuary during Lent as a symbol of mourning and penance. It was often covered with rich, symbolic embroideries.

30. That is, during the time of the Old Testament.

31. The vertical gold stripe down the middle of the hunger cloth and the horizontal green border encrusted with gems form a cross.

32. Cf. Jn 20:1.

33. That is on Pentecost. Cf. Acts 2:1-4.

34. The mountain is Christ. Cf. 11 21 above. The tree bearing the mountain is the cross.

35. That is, the mountain.

36. That is, by becoming man the Son reconciled humanity to God. Cf. 1 Jn 2:1-2.

37. That is, he was married and belonged to a third order, either Franciscan or, more likely, Dominican. He probably ended his days in a religious house in Magdeburg. Mechthild is surprised to see the crowns of virgins over someone who was not a virgin. Neumann (note to V 28, 7; N 11 103) remarks that the crowns are suspended over his head. He is not actually wearing them, as is Sister Hildegund in 11 20 above.

38. The two prayer titles are in Latin in the text: Miserere mei dens and Pater roster.

39. St. Elizabeth of Hungary (1207-31) was canonized in 1234.

40. St. Dominic (c. 1170-1221) was canonized in 1234.

41. St. Francis (1181/82-1226) was canonized in 1228.

42. St. Peter was a Dominican who worked among the Catharists in Lombardy and Tuscany. He was murdered in 1252 and canonized in 1253.

43. That is, Mechthild.

44. Jutta of Sangerhausen, a noblewoman, after her husband had died on a pilgrimage to Palestine and her children had entered religious life, took the veil and served the poor and lepers. In 1260 she went to Prussia as a hermitess to work for the spread of Christianity. She died in 1264 and was later venerated there as a saint.

45. This sentence stands at the beginning of the preamble to Book I and thus serves as an introduction to the entire FL. See the preamble to Book I.

46. That is, participation in Christ's suffering and death.

47. That is, preserves one in faith and redemption until one attains glory in heaven.

48. This last phrase is in Latin in the text: Per dominum nostrum, jhesum Christum filium tuum.

Book VI

1. See Book III, note 35 above.

2. The text reads "his lord apostles." But Neumann (note to VI 1, 70; N 11 110) thinks lord is not original and suggests replacing it with holy, which I have done.

3. That is, with concern that we do not waste much time on them because they are temporary.

4. The next few lines allude to the often allegorized parable of the Good Samaritan in Luke 10:30-37.

5. The Lux div. identifies this person as "Dietrich, the venerable deacon of the church of Magdeburg."

6. The final phrase is in Latin in the text: per dominum nostrum.

7. That is, the canon in the previous chapter.

8. In the original, boeke (rams) can refer to male sheep, goats, chamois, etc. Given the function of the image of goats in the gospels and in popular tradition, I am assuming that Mechthild is referring to male goats.

9. The Lux div. introduces this chapter with the words: "When she had grown old, Sister Mechthild said:..."

10. This is an indication that Mechthild served at one time as the head of a beguine community.

11. Schmidt (note 245, p. 391) considers this last sentence to be an obvious addition by Heinrich of Halle.

12. The Lux div. interprets this to mean the act of honoring the saints in conjunction with all Christians.

13. Carenae were periods of additional fasting that could be imposed by bishops or abbots for serious sins. Cf. note to VI 10, 4; N 11118.

14. Neumann (note to VI 10, 7-8; N 11 118) assumes that the bracketed words were added later to the text.

15. That is, out of fear of what people might think and say if he left mass early.

16. The chapter heading is clearly incomplete. This rendering translates Neumann's attempt to restore it. Most likely the first part of the chapter has also been lost. The Lux div. introduces the chapter with the following information: "A certain student of good morals, devoted to God, and a blood relative of mine was struck with insanity and the loss of reason with God's consent and in his inscrutable dispensation; and he remained bereft of senses and mind to the very end of his life. I had considered him to be suitable for religious life and intimacy with God. Thus I was inwardly quite disturbed by the course of events. I prayed to God for him." Since such concrete references to people or events are rare in the German text, Neumann (note to VI 11, 1; N 11 118) assumes a missing introductory sentence along the following lines: "I prayed to our Lord for a student who lost his mind and whose nature was dead while he went on living."

17. This first phrase of the quotation (Mt 25:34) is in Latin in the text: Venite, benedicti patris mei. The last part is from Matthew 25:41.

18. That is, the senses refuse to turn inward from the external distractions they are drawn to and thus hinder God's activity in the soul.

19. Neumann (note to VI 13, 18; N 1 220) does not consider this phrase authentic.

20. That is, to spare the body the exhausting intensity of contemplative experiences and raptures that render it useless for external pastoral activities.

21. Concerning Enoch, Elijah, and the last brothers/preachers, see IV 27 and Book IV, note 55 above.

22. For literature on the traditions of God as a mirror, see Schmidt, note 19, p. 349.

23. According to medieval thought, the human soul is what is created in the "image and likeness" of God. Cf. Gn 1:26.

24. The soul of Christ, in saying "he," is referring to the "human" Christ.

25. That is, by becoming human, Christ ennobled human nature.

26. The image of the cross of Christ as the key opening the gates of heaven has a long tradition. See note to VI 16, 44 f.; N 11123.

27. The Lux div. begins this chapter with: "The Lord says:..."

28. Neumann (note to VI 21, 1 f.; N II 125) does not consider the bracketed words to be authentic.

29. That is, the clergy.

30. This probably refers to the higher clergy.

31. See IV 27; VI 15; and Book IV, note 55 above. See also note to VI 21, 2; N 11 125-26.

32. The reigns of the popes around this time were Innocent IV (1243-54), Alexander IV (1254-61), Urban IV (1261-64), Clement IV (1265-68), Gregory X (1271-76), Innocent V (1276), Hadrian V (1276), John XXI (1276-77), and Nicholas III (1277-80). Hence this chapter may have been written during the reign of Nicholas III.

33. This chapter is the same as VII 45. I have followed Neumann in placing it there.

34. This sentence is confusing. The Lux div. renders it thus: "Why, Lord, did you have to suffer such huge torments since in your pure prayer [in the garden of Gethsemane] the precious drops running down to the ground would have been sufficient to make reparation for the whole world." Implication: there was really no need for Christ to suffer more after that.

35. In calling those who do not love "schemers against love" (varer der minne), Mechthild is using the vocabulary of courtly-love poetry. Varerare those at court who are jealous of the happiness the lovers enjoy in loving and who do what they can to make their love public and thus destroy it.

36. This last sentence, taken from Luke 23:46, is in Latin in the text: in manes tuas commendo spiritism meum.

37. Cf. Mt 25:41.

38. The sense seems to be: If God were to give me the necessary virtue, I would gladly perform the good work connected with it.

39. See I 44 above, in a speech of the soul toward the close of the chapter.

40. And on earth and in purgatory these two things-suffering and bliss-are both continuously present together.

41. For some secondary literature on God as a circle, see Neumann (notes on umbezil and unbegriffenlich to VI 31; N II 132-33) and Schmidt (note 267, pp. 393-94).

42. That is, in battle against the desires of the flesh.

43. Chapter, as used here, is a regularly held meeting of a religious community, during which part of the rule is usually read and, among other things, matters of religious discipline settled.

44. I have followed the text in keeping the person holding strict chapter with himself masculine to this point. With the introduction of a she, Mechthild most likely wishes to reveal that she has been speaking of herself throughout.

45. Cf. the Song of Solomon, especially 2:10 and 13.

46. This chapter is a response to criticisms against Mechthild: that the experience she describes in II 4 above is theologically untenable and, by implication, not an authentic experience because she describes John the Baptist, who was never ordained a priest, celebrating mass.

47. Cf. Jn 1:29-34.

48. The words from the gospel of John (1:29 and 36) are in Latin in the text: Ecce agnus dei.

49. This final phrase Burch dine here name dri (for the sake of your three glorious names) bears striking resemblance, especially because of the similarities in unusual word order, to a line in Walther von der Vogelweide's Palastinallied: "durch die sine namen dri" (for the sake of his three names). The purpose of Walther's song is to recruit crusaders to go and free Jerusalem from the infidel. Given the similarity of Mechthild's sentiments, she may well be trying to recall Walther's song to the minds of her audience.

50. The last words are in Latin in the text: Requiescant in pace. Amen.

51. Neumann (note to VI 37, 63; N II 139) comments that, if this chapter was written before Mechthild entered the Cistercian convent at Helfta, "companions" (gaden) refers to the beguines with whom she lived.

52. Another example of Mechthild using "greeting" (gruos) to refer to ecstatic experience. Cf., for example, I 2 above.

53. This you is in the plural (ir).

54. The bracketed words are not considered authentic by Neumann. See note to VI 41, 7: N II 141.

55. These final two chapters are not listed in the table of contents and were probably added later.

56. This chapter, which is not included in the Lux div., is generally considered to have been added by an editor.

57. The final phrase is in Latin in the text: Deo gratias.

Book VII

1. Cf. Rv 14:4. This chapter draws heavily on images from the Book of Revelation.

2. Neumann (note to VII 1, 93; N 11 143) refers to Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologica, I, q. 35, a. 1 and 2, in connection with Mechthild's calling the humanity of Christ an "intelligible image (begriffenlich bilde) of his eternal Godhead."

3. See Book VI, note 22 above.

4. That is, the blessed.

5. This "he" is confusing. One expects "they," i.e., Father and Son.

6. Ps. 112:1. In Latin in the text: Laudate pueri dominum.

7. I have followed Neumann's punctuation here. Schmidt (p. 273) changes the punctuation and the meaning of the ambiguous ih̄t and comes up with a rendering that is at least equally plausible. Her translation translated: "Alas, wretched ones, as long as we storm around in anger, there is nothing (ih̄t) good about us. We must then return again and again to our heart."

8. A reference to Mechthild's joining the Cistercian sisters at the convent in Helfta. There is general agreement that this happened in about 1270 or 1271.

9. In Latin in the text: Te deum laudamus.

10. The chapter room in a religious house (cf. Book VI, note 43 above) is here being used by Mechthild as a symbol for the activities of the conscience.

11. From here through "Glory be to the Father and the Son" the text is in Latin: Adiutorium nostrum in nomine domini. Laudate dominum omnes gentes. Gloriatur et filius. Regnum mundi. Eructavit cor. Quem vidi. Gloria patri et filio. These are all responses in the Divine Office sung on various feast days.

12. Mt 5:3. In Latin in the text: Beati pauperes spiritu.

13. This sentence is not contained in the main manuscript tradition. However, Neumann (note to VII 13, 17; N 11 148-49) does not exclude the possibility that it is authentic, especially since it serves nicely as a bridge between what immediately precedes and follows it.

14. That is, the mirror.

15. That is, the hours at which members of a religious community assembled to sing the Divine Office.

16. The first five lines, excluding "Lord Jesus Christ," also introduce V 20 above.

17. That is, before receiving holy communion.

18. This you is in the plural and is no doubt addressed to the sisters of the Cistercian community of Helfta, which Mechthild had joined. Helfta was known for the high level of learning among its members.

19. Cf. 1 Cor 2:9.

20. In Latin in the text: Gloria tibi trinitas!

21. In Latin in the text: Salve regina!

22. The antecedent of "She" is most likely the world. The noun world is feminine in German. Also, Lady World (frouwe welt) occurs frequently in medieval art and literature as a temptress poisoning the soul.

23. Schmidt (note 292, p. 397) sees King Gustav Adolf of Nassau's military campaigns in Saxony and Thuringia as being the historical events prompting this chapter. These campaigns took place in 1294. This would mean that Mechthild died after 1294. Neumann (1964, 197-99) makes a case for earlier military activities being Mechthild's point of reference and puts Mechthild's death in about 1282.

24. That is, the positive results of war.

25. Neumann (note to VII 33, 11; N II 154) is convinced that the numbering of the spices became confused in transmission. He thinks that Mechthild wished to enumerate five spices that would allude mystically to the five wounds of Christ. The five spices would be: willing suffering, patient suffering, holy intimacy, perseverance in suffering, and joy in suffering.

26. That is, the seven penitential psalms.

27. Ps 6:1. In Latin in the text: Domine ne in furore.

28. Ps 32:1. In Latin in the text: Beati quorum remissa.

29. Ps 38:1. In Latin in the text: Domine ne in furore.

30. Ps 51:1. In Latin in the text: Miserere mei deus.

31. Ps 102:1. In Latin in the text: Domine, exaudi orationem meam et clamor.

32. Ps 130:1. In Latin in the text: De profundis clamo.

33. It was often the custom in the Middle Ages for a bride to receive a gift from her new husband on the morning after the wedding night. In the Nibelungenlied, for example, Siegfried gives the Nibelungen treasure to Kriemhild as her "morning gift."

34. Ps 143:1. In Latin in the text: Domine, exaudi orationem meam auribus percipe.

35. Schmidt (note 298, p. 400) notes that allegorical use of the convent is frequent in medieval spiritual writing, but that Mechthild's is the first to occur in German and that a clear relationship to a source has not been demonstrated.

36. It is not really clear in the course of the next several lines just what these "four things" are. Also, the noun to which "it(s)" refers in the following three lines is not clear from the original text.

37. CE Rv 14:4.

38. Possible alternate rendering: "That they are here fills me with joy."

39. Schmidt (note 300, p. 400) refers to Psalm 51:5: "Behold, I was brought forth in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me" and to the problem of unknowingly becoming involved in guilt, as it is treated by Wolfram of Eschenbach in Parzival and Willehalm. Another medieval line of thought that might provide the background for Mechthild's statement is the Augustinian doctrine of original sin, which often documented its claim of human sinfulness before birth by referring to this psalm verse. For more on this and its consequences for an influential medieval view on human sexuality, see, for example, John T. Noonan, Jr., Contraception. A History of Its Treatment by the Catholic Theologians and Canonists (Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1965).

40. That is, to where a person with a pure soul lies dying.

41. The devils bested by the soul respond to their master Satan.

42. Satan's growling and gnashing are his angry response to what his minions have just reported to him.

43. Mechthild is here drawing on medieval secular love poetry, which frequently expressed similar ideas in similar form. One of the best-known such poems in German is:

If all the world were mine
From the sea to the Rhine,
I would renounce it
That the Queen of England
Might lie in my arms.

Translated from Poets of the Minnesang, ed. Olive Sayce (Oxford, 1967), p. 2.

44. Schmidt (note 303, p. 400) sees this mention of forty years as evidence for the view that Mechthild died after 1290, since it is generally agreed that Mechthild started writing in 1250 and her writings are what made her known. Those favoring the time around 1282 as the time of her death could counter that Mechthild knew this clergyman for some time before she began writing and that the harm he caused Mechthild, mentioned later in this chapter, could have come after they have been acquainted for several years. Also, a mere five chapters before this one, at the beginning of VII 36 above, Mechthild says she has been writing for thirty years.

45. That is, if I could still have productive sorrow for my failings, as one can before death but not here in purgatory.

46. This chapter appears twice in ms E, once as VI 22 and here. Cf. Book VI, note 33 above.

47. For these three lines I have adopted Schmidt's (p. 316) punctuation. Neumann (VII 45, 15-17; N 1 291) has no punctuation after the first them, which turns the lines into an anacoluthon.

48. Neumann (note to VII 45, 22; N 11 159) considers this line to be a later addition, and not by Mechthild.

49. Cf. Jn 14:23.

50. Given the problems faced by Mechthild in defending her book against charges that it contained heretical statements, it is not surprising to see her in her later years taking a very clear stand on the question of unorthodox teachings. Here she distances herself from those who claim that the soul can become so holy that it may, as it were, enter the Trinity. (It would be possible to bring such a charge against Mechthild herself, given the vision she describes in 111 9!) According to Neumann (note to VII 47, 18; N 11 160) the final sentence of this chapter takes a position against teachings such as those of the homines perfecti treated by Herbert Grundmann in Religiose Bewegungen im Mittelalter, 2 ed. (Darmstadt, 1961), pp. 402-38 and 524-38.

51. I have translated ane pine as "except suffering," taking Mechthild to be saying here something similar to what she says in VII 46 above about spiritual poverty. Schmidt (p. 318) takes Mechthild to be saying that nothing in this world can console or cheer her without, at the same time, causing her to suffer.

52. Neumann (note to VII 48, 26; N II 160) takes book to mean the already complete ms of Books I-VI. More specifically the reference is to I 3 above.

53. In calling Love of God, her dialogue partner, "dear maiden," Mechthild is responding to her partner's words spoken above-that she wanted to be Mechthild's lady-in-waiting.

54. 1 Jn 4:16. In Latin in the text: Deus caritas est.

55. A troubling sentence. Possible meaning: Mechthild was not able to provide him with the necessary sigh because it was at that very moment being given him by someone else. Cf. Schmidt p. 323, lines 12-13.

56. Cf. Mt 26:39; Mk 14:36; and Lk 22:42.

57. This you is plural.

58. Mechthild places Enoch and Elijah here to await the last days when they shall return to earth. See IV 27 and VI 15 above.

59. Cf. VI 15 above.

60. That is, the souls in purgatory.

61. Mechthild has cast this chapter in the form of a Botenlied or messenger's song, a conventional form in courtly-love poetry in which the speaker addresses a messenger concerning the object of his or her love and asks him to bear the message of love to the beloved one. Mechthild also employs several expressions and/or images of such poetry, such as "sick with love," "recover," "physician" of love, "wounds" of love, etc.

62. In Latin in the text: Inpresepio.

63. Cf. Dt 6:5 and Lk 10:25-28.

SELECTED BIBLIOGRAPHY

I. Critical Edition:

Das fließende Licht der Gottheit. Nach der Einsiedler Handschrift in kritischem Vergleich mit der gesamten Überlieferung. Ed. Hans Neumann. Volume 1: Text, arranged by Gisela Vollmann-Profe. Munich: Artemis, 1990. Volume 2: Untersuchungen, supplemented and prepared for printing by Vollmann-Profe. Munich: Artemis, 1993.

II. Translation into Modern German:

Mechthild von Magdeburg. Das fließende Licht der Gottheit. Second, revised translation with an introduction and commentary by Margot Schmidt. Stuttgart-Bad Cannstatt: Frommann-Holzboog, 1995.

III. Secondary Literature:

Ancelet-Hustache, Jeanne. Mechtilde de Madgebourg: Etude de psychologie religieuse. Paris: Champion, 1926.

Balthasar, Hans Urs von. "Mechthilds kirchlicher Auftrag." In Das fließende Licht der Gottheit. Translated, with an introduction by Margot Schmidt. Einsiedeln/Zurich/Cologne: Benzinger, 1955, pp. 19-45.

Bynum, Caroline Walker. "Women Mystics in the Thirteenth Century: The case of the Nuns of Helfta." In her Jesus as Mother: Studies in the Spirituality of the High Middle Ages. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982, pp. 170-262.

Franklin, James C. Mystical Transformations: The Imagery of Liquids in the Work of Mechthild von Magdeburg. London: Associated University Presses, 1978.

Grundmann, Herbert. Religious Movements in the Middle Ages. Notre Dame, Indiana: University of Notre Dame Press, 1995.

Hollywood, Amy. The Soul as Virgin Wife. Mechthild of Magdeburg, Marguerite Porete, and Meister Eckhart. Notre Dame, Indiana: University of Notre Dame Press, 1995.

Lifers, Grete. Die Sprache der deutschen Mystik des Mittelalters im Werke der Mechthild von Magdeburg. Munich: Ernst Reinhardt, 1926.

Mohr, Wolfgang. "Darbietungsformen der Mystik bei Mechthild von Magdeburg." Marchen, Mythos, Dichtung: Festschrift zum 90. Geburtstag Friedrich von der Leyens. Ed. Hugo Kuhn and Kurt Schier. Munich: Beck, 1963, pp. 375-99.

Neumann, Hans. "Beiträge zur Textgeschichte des 'Fließenden Lichts der Gottheit' and zur Lebensgeschichte Mechthilds von Magdeburg." Altdeutsche and altniederländische Mystik. Ed. Kurt Ruh. Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1964, pp. 175 - 239.

Newman, Barbara. From Virile Woman to WomanChrist. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995. See especially Chapter 5: "La mystique courtoise," pp. 137 - 67.

Schmidt, Margot. "Elemente der Schau bei Mechthild von Magdeburg and Mechthild von Hackeborn: Zur Bedeutung der geistlichen Sinne." Frauenmystik im Mittelalter. Ed. Peter Dinzelbacher and Dieter R. Bauer. Ostfildern bei Stuttgart, 1986, pp. 178-200.

Tax, Petrus. "Die große Himmelsschau Mechthilds von Magdeburg and ihre Hollenvision." Zeitschrift für deutsches Altertum and deutsche Literatur 109 (1979), pp. 112-37.

Tobin, Frank. "Mechthild von Magdeburg and Meister Eckhart: Points of Coincidence." Meister Eckhart and the Beguine Mystics: Explorations in Vernacular Theology. Ed. Bernard McGinn. New York: Continuum, 1994, pp. 44-61.

Mechthild von Magdeburg. A Medieval Mystic in Modern Eyes. Columbia, South Carolina: Camden House, 1995.

Wiethaus, Ulrike. Ecstatic Transformation. Transpersonal Psychology in the Work of Mechthild von Magdeburg. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, 1996.

INDEX

(References in boldface are to Introduction)

Adam, 160, 188

All Souls Day, 275–77

Angels, 45, 46, 102–04, 105–06,
214, 266; Contemplation and,
86–87; crown of Christ and,
273; death and, 235–36; soul
and, 140, 179–80

Antichrist, 173–75, 241, 242–44

Ave Maria, 292

Beghards, 3

Beguines, 1–3

Bernard of Clairvaux, 14

Book of Special Grace, The (Mechthild of Hackeborn),
5–6

Canons, 228–30; advice to,
228–29; see also Priests

Christ, 71–72, 208; birth of, 156–57, 328–29; crown of,
271–75; honoring Passion of,
289–91; as pilgrim, 286;
redemption, 180–81, 187–88;
suffering, 251–52; thanking,
294–95; as worker, 284–85

Clergy. See Priests

Contemplation, 86–87

Convent, 305–07

Council of Vienne, 1312, 3
Crown of Christ, 271–75

Daniel, 127

David, 127

Death, 252–54, 261; angels and,
235–36; love and, 15–16, 293

Demons. See Devils

Devils, 135, 140–41, 159–60, 210,
214, 215, 233–34, 235, 309–11

Discernment, 230–31

Dominic, St., 164–65, 166–67, 205

Dominicans. See Order of Preachers

Ebner, Margaret, 8

Elijah, 174–75, 326; suffering of, 242

Elizabeth, St., 215

Enoch, 174–75, 241, 326; suffering of, 242–44

Eucharist, 150–51, 292–94

Fear, 231, 277–94

Flowing Light of the Godhead, The (Mechthild), 4, 5, 267; allegory in, 11; assonance, 22–23; erotic images, 16; as expression of mysticism, 12–20; history of text, 6–9; imagery, 11; as literature, 9–11; as revelations, 9–10; rhyme, 21–22, 23; style of, 9–11, 20–24; translation of, 20–24; variety of genres in, 10–11; vocabulary, 23; writing of, 96–98; see also specific topics, e.g.: Trinity

Francis, St., 205

Gabriel, St., prayer to, 327–28

Gertrud of Hackeborn, 5

Gertrud of Helfta, 5–6

Gloriam virginalem, 2–3

God: curse of, 45; divine “greeting,” 13–14, 17, 40–42; estrangement from, 17, 18, 19, 156; mercy, 132–33; nobility of, 254–56; praise of God, 45–46, 47, 48, 107–08, 185–86, 195, 294; praise of Himself, 207–08; praise of soul, 107–08, 111–12, 186; as sphere, 257–58; see also specific topics, e.g.: Love; Trinity

Gottfried of Strassburg, 15

Gregory IX, Pope, 2

Heaven, 101–07, 168–69, 206–07, 251–52, 325–27

Heinrich of Halle, 4, 6–7

Heinrich of Nördlingen, 7–8

Hell, 127–32, 169

Herald of Divine Love, The (Gertrud of Helfta), 5–6

Holy Communion. See Eucharist

Honorius III, Pope, 2

Humility, 17–18, 183–84

Jeremiah, 127

Jesus Christ. See Christ

John the Baptist, 73, 103, 261–62
John the Evangelist, 73, 75,
167–68, 258
Joseph, 200, 202

Knowledge: conscience and,
288–89; love and, 14, 49; soul
and, 81–84

Legatus divinae pietatis (Gertrud of Helfta), 5–6

Liber specialis gratiae (Mechthild of Hacheborn), 5–6

Love, 53–54, 58–62, 69–70, 79–80, 163–64, 316–19; bound and unbound love distinguished,
14; burned love, 252; and death, 15–16, 293; dialogue between soul and, 13, 39–40, 87–89; kinds of, 120, 135;
knowing love, 14; power of,
176, 210–14

Lucifer, 128–32, 200–01 , 202–03

Lux divinitatis (Mechthild), 4, 7, 9; see also Flowing Light of the Godhead, The (Mechthild)

Man, 160–63

Martyrs, 104, 105, 259

Mary, 50–52, 73, 198–204 ,
213–14, 247, 258, 265; Ave Maria, 292; greeting of, 291; in heaven, 71, 73, 74, 103; and sin, 110–11

McGinn, Bernard, 12

Mechthild of Hacheborn, 5–6

Mechthild, of Magdeburg, 1, 4–5;
see also Flowing Light of the Godhead, The (Mechthild); and specific topics

Mercy, 132–33
Mohr, Wolfgang, 10
Morel, Gall, 9
Moses, 126–27
Mysticism, 12–19; definition, 12

Neumann, Hans, 4, 6–7, 8–9

Order of Preachers, 5, 165–66,
169–75, 205–06
Original sin, 188

Pain. See Suffering
Paradise. See Heaven
Perfection, 79
Poor, 126
Prayer: on All Souls’ Day, 275–76; benefits of, 191
Preachers, 104–05
Priests, 113, 228–30; advice to canons, 228–29; humiliation of bad priests, 249–50; offerings to, 151; preachers, 104–05;
purgatory of bad priests, 191–92; purgatory of good priests, 113; ransom from, 122–24
Prophets, 126–27
Psalms, 303–05
Purgatory, 169, 184–85, 275–77;
kinds of, 235; of bad priests, 191–92; of good priests, 192; of religious persons, 124–25; release from 77–78, 122–24, 236–37

Religious life, 296–98, 309,
321–22
Religious superiors, advice to,
223–28

Richard of St. Victor, 15

Saints, 235–36

Schmidt, Margot, 4, 23

Sermons on the Song of Songs

(Bernard of Clairvaux), 14

Sin, 181, 192–93, 215, 247, 309,
313, 315–16; kinds of, 194–95;
Mary and, 110–11; of omission, 320–21; original sin, 188; see also Purgatory

Solomon, 127

Sorrow, 179–80, 231–33

Suffering, 19, 52–53, 55, 77,
180–82, 240–41, 302, 325,
334–36; of Christ, 251–52;
kinds of, 180–81; see also
Purgatory

Suso, Henry, 8

Tauler, John, 8

Temptation, 265–66, 285,
295–96

Trinity, 40–41, 71, 114–16, 156–58, 245; eternal feast and Holy Communion, 150–51;
jubilus of, 49–51; praise of,
185–86; praise of itself, 207–08

Unbaptized children, 106

Virgins, 104, 134, 139, 144–47,
259, 300

Virtues, 42–43; false virtues, 121

Vollmann–Profe, Gisela, 9

War, 198–99

Wisdom, 144, 146–47

Julian of Norwich • SHOWINGS

Jacob Boehme • THE WAY TO CHRIST

Nahman of Bratslav • THE TALES

Gregory of Nyssa • THE LIFE OF MOSES

Bonaventure • THE SOUL'S JOURNEY INTO GOD, THE TREE OF LIFE, AND THE LIFE OF ST. FRANCIS

William Law • A SERIOUS CALL TO DEVOUT AND HOLY LIFE, AND THE SPIRIT OF LOVE

Abraham Isaac Kook • THE LIGHTS OF PENITENCE, LIGHTS OF HOLINESS, THE MORAL PRINCIPLES, ESSAYS, AND POEMS

Ibn `Ata' Illah • THE BOOK OF WISDOM AND KWAJA ABDULIAH

Ansari • INTIMATE CONVERSATIONS

Johann Arndt • TRUE CHRISTIANITY

Richard of St. Victor • THE TWELVE PATRIARCHS, THE MYSTICAL ARK, AND BOOK THREE OF THE TRINITY

Origen • AN EXHORTATION TO MARTYRDOM, PRAYER, and SELECTED WORKS

Catherine of Genoa • PURGATION AND PURGATORY, THE SPIRITUAL DIALOGUE

Native North American Spirituality of the Eastern Woodlands • SACRED MYTHS, DREAMS, VISIONS, SPEECHES, HEALING FORMULAS, RITUALS AND CEREMONIALS

Teresa of Avila • THE INTERIOR CASTLE

Apocalyptic Spirituality • TREATISES AND LETTERS OF LACTANTIUS, ADSO OF MONTIER-EN-DER, JOACHIM OF FIORE, THE FRANCISCAN SPIRITUALS, SAVONAROIA

Athanasius • THE LIFE OF ANTONY, A LETTER TO MARCELLINUS

Catherine of Siena • THE DIALOGUE

Sharafuddin Maneri • THE HUNDRED LETTERS

Martin Luther • THEOLOGIA GERMANICA

Native Mesoamerican Spirituality • ANCIENT MYTHS, DISCOURSES, STORIES, DOCTRINES, HYMNS, POEMS FROM THE AZTEC, YUCATEC, QUICHE-MAYA AND OTHER SACRED TRADITIONS

Symeon the New Theologian • THE DISCOURSES

Ibn Al'-Arabi • THE BEZELS OF WISDOM

Hadewijch • THE COMPLETE WORKS

Philo of Alexandria • THE CONTEMPLATIVE LIFE, THE GIANTS, AND SELECTIONS

George Herbert • THE COUNTRY PARSON, THE TEMPLE

Unknown • THE CLOUD OF UNKNOWING

John and Charles Wesley 9 SELECTED WRITINGS AND HYMNS

Meister Eckhart • THE ESSENTIAL SERMONS, COMMENTARIES, TREATISES AND DEFENSE

Francisco de Osuna • THE THIRD SPIRITUAL ALPHABET

Jacopone da Todi • THE IAUDS

Fakhruddin `Iraqi • DIVINE FLASHES

Menahem Nahum of Chernobyl • THE LIGHT OF THE EYES

Early Dominicans • SELECTED WRITINGS

John Climacus • THE I-ADDER OF DIVINE ASCENT

Francis and Clare • THE COMPLETE WORKS

Gregory Palamas • THE TRLYDS

Pietists • SELECTED WRITINGS

The Shakers • TWO CENTURIES OF SPIRITUAL REFLECTION

Zohar • THE BOOK OF ENLIGHTENMENT

Luis de Leon • THE NAMES OF CHRIST

Quaker Spirituality • SELECTED WRITINGS

Emanuel Swedenborg • THE UNIVERSAL HUMAN AND SOUL-BODY INTERACTION

Augustine of Hippo • SELECTED WRITINGS

John Cassian • CONFERENCES

Johannes Tauler • SERMONS

John Ruusbroec • THE SPIRITUAL ESPOUSALS AND OTHER WORKS

Ibn `Abbad of Ronda • LETTERS ON THE SUFI PATH

Angelus Silesius • THE CHERUBINIC WANDERER

The Early Kabbalah •

Meister Eckhart • TEACHER AND PREACHER

John of the Cross • SELECTED WRITINGS

Pseudo-Dionysius • THE COMPLETE WORKS

Bernard of Clairvaux • SELECTED WORKS

Devotio Moderna • BASIC WRITINGS

The Pursuit of Wisdom • AND OTHER WORKS BY THE AUTHOR OF THE CLOUD OF UNKNOWING

Richard Rolle • THE ENGLISH WRITINGS

Francis de Sales, Jane de Chantal • LETTERS OF SPIRITUAL DIRECTION

Albert and Thomas • SELECTED WRITINGS

Robert Bellarmine • SPIRITUAL WRITINGS

Nicodemos of the Holy Mountain • A HANDBOOK OF SPIRITUAL COUNSEL

Henry Suso 0 THE EXEMPLAR, WITH TWO GERMAN SERMONS

Berulle and the French School • SELECTED WRITINGS

The Talmud • SELECTED WRITINGS

Ephrem the Syrian 0 HYMNS

Hildegard of Bingen • SCIVIAS

Birgitta of Sweden • LIFE AND SELECTED REVELATIONS

John Donne • SELECTIONS FROM DIVINE POEMS, SERMONS, DEVOTIONS AND PRAYERS

Jeremy Taylor • SELECTED WORKS

Walter Hilton • SCALE OF PERFECTION

Ignatius of Loyola • SPIRITUAL EXERCISES AND SELECTED WORKS

Anchoritic Spirituality • ANCRENE WISSE AND ASSOCIATED WORKS

Nizam ad-din Awliya • MORALS FOR THE HEART

Pseudo-Macarius • THE FIFTY SPIRITUAL HOMILIES AND THE GREAT LETTER

Gertrude of Helfta • THE HERALD OF DIVINE LOVE

Angela of Foligno • COMPLETE WORKS

Margaret Ebner • MAJOR WORKS

Marguerite Porete • THE MIRROR OF SIMPLE SOULS

John Henry Newman • SELECTED SERMONS

Early Anabaptist Spirituality • SELECTED WRITINGS

Elijah Benamozegh • ISRAEL AND HUMANITY

The Classic Midrash • TANNAITIC COMMENTARIES ON THE BIBLE

Vincent de Paul and Louise de Marillac • RULES, CONFERENCES, AND WRITINGS

Isaiah Horowitz • THE GENERATIONS OF ADAM

Early Islamic Mysticism • SUFI, QUR'AN, MI'RAJ, POETIC AND THEOLOGICAL WRITINGS

Theatine Spirituality • SELECTED WRITINGS

Carthusian Spirituality • THE WRITINGS OF HUGH OF BALMA AND GUIGO DE PONTE

Nicholas of Cusa • SELECTED SPIRITUAL WRITINGS

John Comenius • THE LABYRINTH OF THE WORLD AND THE PARADISE OF THE HEART

'Cf. "Herz," in Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe, ed. Heinrich Fries (Munich, 1962) Vol. I, 668-697, by P.Hofmann and Karl Rahner.

Y See Mechthild von Magdeburg, Das fließende Licht der Gottheit, Zweite, neubearbeitete Übersetzung mit Einführung and Kommentar von Margot Schmidt (Stuttgart-Bad Cannstatt: Frommann-Holzboog, 1995), note 296, pp. 397-400, especially p. 399.

'Cf. Johannes Stohr, "Neuzeitliche Diskussionen über die Einwohnung des dreifaltigen Gottes," Von der Suche nach Gott, ed. Margot Schmidt and Fernando Dominguez (Stuttgart-Bad Cannstatt: Frommann-Holzboog, 1998), 249-82.

4 See 11 25.

'See the first few lines of VII 21.

Cf. Marianne Heinibach, "Der ungelehrte Mund" as Autorittit. Mystische Erfahrung as Quelle kirchlich-prophetischer Rede im Werk Mechthilds von Magdeburg (Stuttgart-Bad Cannstatt: Frommann-Holzboog, 1989), 74-75.

9 Cf. also Schmidt, note 149, p. 376.

'Cf. Schmidt, note 83, p. 362. Regarding the sources and occurrences of this image, cf. Rudolf von Biberach, Die sieben strassen zu got. High Alemannic Translation according to Ms Einsiedeln 278, ed. Margot Schmidt (Florence, 1969), 133* f.

THE CLASSICS
OF WESTERN
SPIRITUALITY

HILDEGARD of BINGEN

SCIVIAS

School of Theology at Claremont

1001 1391536

The Library
of the School of Theology
at Claremont

1325 North College Avenue
Claremont, CA 91711

THE CLASSICS
OF WESTERN
SPIRITUALITY

THE CLASSICS OF WESTERN SPIRITUALITY

A Library of the Great Spiritual Masters

President and Publisher
Kevin A. Lynch, C.S.P.

EDITORIAL BOARD

Editor-in-Chief

Bernard McGinn—Professor of Historical Theology and the History of Christianity, Divinity School, University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

Editorial Consultant

Ewert H. Cousins—Professor of Theology, Fordham University, Bronx, N.Y.

John E. Booty—Professor of Anglican Studies, School of Theology, University of the South, Sewanee, Tenn.

Joseph Dan—Professor of Kabbalah, Department of Jewish Thought, Hebrew University, Jerusalem, Israel.

Albert Deblaere—Professor of the History of Spirituality, Gregorian University, Rome, Italy.

Louis Dupré—T. L. Riggs Professor of Philosophy of Religion, Yale University, New Haven, Conn.

Rozanne Elder—Executive Vice-President, Cistercian Publications, Kalamazoo, Mich.

Anne Freemantle—Teacher, Editor and Writer, New York, N.Y.

Karlfried Froehlich—Professor of the History of the Early and Medieval Church, Princeton Theological Seminary, Princeton, N.J.

Arthur Green—President, Reconstructionist Rabbinical College, Wyncote, Pa.

Stanley S. Harakas—Archbishop Iakovos Professor of Orthodox Theology, Holy Cross Greek Orthodox Seminary, Brookline, Mass.

Moshe Idel—Professor of Jewish Thought, Department of Jewish Thought, Hebrew University, Jerusalem, Israel.

Bishop Kallistos of Diokleia—Fellow of Pembroke College, Oxford, Spalding Lecturer in Eastern Orthodox Studies, Oxford University, England.

Jean Leclercq—Professor of Spirituality, Institute of Spirituality and of Religious Psychology, Gregorian University, Rome, Italy.

George A. Maloney—Spiritual Writer and Lecturer, Seal Beach, Calif.

John Meyendorff—Professor of Church History, Fordham University, Bronx, N.Y., and Professor of Patristics and Church History, St. Vladimir's Seminary, Tuckahoe, N.Y.

Seyyed Hossein Nasr—Professor of Islamic Studies, George Washington University, Washington, D.C.

Heiko A. Oberman—Professor for Medieval, Renaissance and Reformation History, University of Arizona, Tucson, Ariz.

Raimundo Panikkar—Professor, Department of Religious Studies, University of California at Santa Barbara, Calif.

Jaroslav Pelikan—Sterling Professor of History and Religious Studies, Yale University, New Haven, Conn.

Annemarie B. Schimmel—Professor of Indo-Muslim Culture, Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass.

Sandra M. Schneiders—Associate Professor of New Testament Studies and Spirituality, Jesuit School of Theology, Berkeley, Calif.

Huston Smith—Thomas J. Watson Professor of Religion Emeritus, Syracuse University, Syracuse N.Y.

John R. Sommerfeldt—Professor of History, University of Dallas, Irving, Tex.

David Steindl-Rast—Spiritual Author, Benedictine Grange, West Redding, Conn.

David Tracy—Greeley Professor of Roman Catholic Studies, Divinity School, University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

Rowan D. Williams—Lady Margaret Professor of Divinity and Dean of Christ Church, Oxford, England.

HILDEGARD of BINGEN

SCIVIAS

BV

5080

HS 13

1990

TRANSLATED BY MOTHER COLUMBA HART AND JANE BISHOP

INTRODUCED BY BARBARA J. NEWMAN

PREFACE BY
CAROLINE WALKER BYNUM

PAULIST PRESS
NEW YORK • MAHWAH

Cover art: MOTHER PLACID DEMPSEY, a Benedictine nun of the Abbey of Regina Laudis in Bethlehem, Connecticut, is also a sculptor, painter, graphics designer and book illustrator. Regarding the cover and inside illustrations she says: "Doing art work for this volume became a unique personal experience in which I was struck by three things. First, I realized there has existed for centuries a body of illustrations of the Visions that are traditionally ascribed to St. Hildegard's 'direct supervision.' Despite their obvious differences in style, which suggest not merely different artists but entirely different historical periods, they have enjoyed a long history of commentaries by various spiritual writers and important scholars, including, in our time, Dr. Carl Jung. Recognizing their unique value in terms of tradition and their own intrinsic aesthetic beauty, I chose to represent them here in all their clarity and forthrightness. In so doing, I came to appreciate that, in a very real sense, they do proceed from her 'direct supervision.' Secondly, I came to understand directness and supervision as the marks of St. Hildegard, who looked upon the mystery of nature and mankind with the radical and comprehensive 'eye' of Faith, that is, through supernatural 'seeing' or, as one may say, through 'Super-Vision,' and this is what I have tried to express on the cover. Thirdly, I realized that her 'Super-Vision' includes the hidden bringing together of many persons to share and creatively carry out that Vision. In this regard I wish to express my debt to her and, through her, to the Abbess and members of my own community, to Sr. Mary Charles, R.S.M., Dr. John Farina, children's book illustrator Mercer Mayer, and to Jeanne Parr."

Copyright © 1990 by the Abbey of Regina Laudis: Benedictine Congregation Regina Laudis of the Strict Observance, Inc.

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying, recording, or by any information storage and retrieval system without permission in writing from the publisher.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Hildegard, Saint, 1098–1179.

[Scivias. English]

Scivias/Hildegard of Bingen: translated by Columba Hart and Jane Bishop; introduction by Barbara Newman; preface by Caroline Walker Bynum.

p. cm.—(The Classics of western spirituality)

Translation of: Scivias.

Includes bibliographical references.

ISBN 0-8091-0431-8 ISBN 0-8091-3130-7 (pbk.)

I. Mysticism—Early works to 1800. I. Hart, Columba, 1903– . II.

II. Bishop, Jane, 1950– . III. Title. IV. Series.

BV5080.H5413 1990

248.2'2—dc20

Theology Library

89-29315
CIP

Published by Paulist Press
997 Macarthur Boulevard
Mahwah, New Jersey 07430

SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY
AT CLAREMONT
California

Printed and bound in the United States of America

Contents

Preface	I
Introduction	9
Translator’s Note	55
Co-Translator’s Note	56
DECLARATION: THESE ARE TRUE VISIONS FLOWING FROM GOD	59
BOOK ONE: THE CREATOR AND CREATION
1. God Enthroned Shows Himself to Hildegard	67
2. Creation and the Fall	73
3. The Universe and Its Symbolism	93
4. Soul and Body	109
5. The Synagogue	133
6. The Choirs of Angels	139
BOOK TWO: THE REDEEMER AND REDEMPTION
1. The Redeemer	149
2. The Trinity	161
3. The Church, Bride of Christ and Mother of the Faithful	169
4. Confirmation	189
5. The Three Orders in the Church	201
6. Christ’s Sacrifice and the Church	237
7. The Devil	293

BOOK THREE: THE HISTORY OF SALVATION
SYMBOLIZED BY A BUILDING

1. God and Man	309
2. The Edifice of Salvation	325
3. The Tower of Anticipation of God’s Will	343
4. The Pillar of the Word of God	357
5. The Jealousy of God	371
6. The Stone Wall of the Old Law	389
7. The Pillar of the Trinity	411
8. The Pillar of the Humanity of the Savior	425
9. The Tower of the Church	451
10. The Son of Man	473
11. The Last Days and the Fall of the Antichrist	493
12. The New Heaven and the New Earth	515
13. Symphony of the Blessed	525
 Bibliography to Introduction	 537
 Indexes	 540

Translators of this Volume

MOTHER COLUMBA HART, O.S.B. was graduated from Smith College in 1924 summa cum laude, having studied under Eleanor S. Duckett and Howard R. Patch. She remained for the M.A. degree in English and continued graduate work at Radcliffe and Harvard in romance philology, Middle English, and Latin paleography under John L. Lowes, John S. Tatlock, and Charles H. Haskins. She earned a second M.A. at Radcliffe in 1926. After European travel she studied French while living in Paris for two years, and later translated Ouvrons la Bible by Roger Poelman (How to Read the Bible, New York: Kenedy, 1953, and London: Longmans, 1955). Her first original book, Mary of the Magnificat, had come out in 1942 (Sheed & Ward). The work of translating from the Latin The Exercises of Saint Gertrude (Newman, 1956) brought to her attention the dearth of information about Gertrude's life and suggested research on thirteenth-century women, especially the Flemish mystics. Thus she discovered Hadewijch, some of whose letters she presented in The American Benedictine Review (1962). Her translation from the Latin of William of Saint Thierry's Exposition on the Song of Songs was begun at this time and appeared in Cistercian Fathers Series (1970). In 1972 Mother Columba contributed to The American Benedictine Review another article on medieval women "Consecratio Virginum: Thirteenth-Century Witnesses." In 1980 she brought out a volume in The Classics of Western Spirituality Series, which may well be considered her masterpiece, the translation of The Complete Works of Hadewijch.

At 86, Mother Columba has retired from active research for publication and remains a beloved elder and resource person in her Benedictine community of the Abbey of Regina Laudis in Bethlehem, Connecticut, where she has been a member for forty years.

JANE BISHOP received her B.A. from Vassar College and her M. Phil. and Ph.D. from Columbia University. After a precarious few years as an adjunct professor at Barnard College, Pace University, Iona College, the New School for Social Research and Manhattan College, she is now Assistant Professor of Ancient and Medieval History at The Citadel, Charleston, South Carolina. Dr. Bishop has written articles for Trends in History and the Dictionary of the Middle Ages, and "Bishops as Marital Advisors in the Ninth Century" for Women of the Medieval World, ed. Julius Kirshner and Suzanne Wemple (Basil Blackwell, Oxford, 1985). She was a founding member of the Institute for Research in History, which unfortunately became defunct in 1989. Dr. Bishop's specialties are Byzantine and papal political and social history, which makes Hildegard's mysticism a holiday from her main preoccupations. She is now seeking a publisher for her book Pope Nicholas I and the First Age of Papal Independence.

Author of the Introduction

BARBARA J. NEWMAN is Associate Professor of English at the Northwestern University College of Arts and Sciences. She received her B.A. from Oberlin College, her M.A. Div. from the University of Chicago Divinity School and her Ph.D. from Yale University, Department of Medieval Studies. Dr. Newman's publications include: Sister of Wisdom: St. Hildegard's Theology of the Feminine (University of California Press, 1987) and Hildegard of Bingen: Symphonia, critical edition with translations and commentary (Cornell University Press, 1988).

Author of the Preface

CAROLINE WALKER BYNUM is Professor of History at Columbia University and a MacArthur Fellow. She is the author of a number of scholarly works on medieval spirituality including Jesus as Mother: Studies in the Spirituality of the High Middle Ages (University of California Press, 1982) and Holy Feast and Holy Fast: The Religious Significance of Food to Medieval Women (University of California Press, 1987).

Preface

Until recently the visionary women of the Western European Middle Ages were neglected by scholars. German historians tended to see the two great twelfth-century Rhineland prophets, Hildegard of Bingen and Elizabeth of Schönau, and the mystical group at the convent of Helfta in the thirteenth century as important only insofar as they foreshadowed Protestantism. The intense affective female piety of the early fourteenth century described in the collections of visions and pious biographies known as Nonnenbücher made scholars so nervous that they neglected these works altogether except as philological evidence of the development of the German language. English students of mysticism denigrated the female mystics of their own and the continental tradition as “experiential,” and judged their works, along with those of such male devotional writers as Richard Rolle, inferior to speculative, neo-Platonic mystical writing. Historians of science and psychology, as well as phenomenologists of religion, repeatedly explained women’s visionary experiences as neurosis or disease (migraine, hysteria, anorexia nervosa, and so on). Further, as Peter Dronke has pointed out, there is no major female writer from the Middle Ages whose works modern scholars have not attributed (often with very little evidence) to a man.¹ If I had written this preface in 1950, I might well have argued that the only thing the diverse female writers of the Middle Ages had in common was their neglect by modern scholarship.

All that has changed. Not only has the field of women’s history emerged as a branch of research with considerable methodological sophistication, but women’s theological writing and piety have received particular emphasis. Two anthologies of medieval women writers in translation have recently appeared, and religious texts predominate. At least two current series are devoted exclusively to women’s texts.² The plays of Hrotsvitha of Gandersheim and Hildegard of Bingen are now performed by college drama departments and church groups; several recordings of Hildegard's liturgical songs are on the market; extravagant claims about the effectiveness of women's medicine and midwifery circulate; radical feminists today appropriate from medieval texts insights they characterize as female or feminist and use them to challenge or reform or profoundly reinterpret the modern church. In the 1980s female authorship is often attributed to anonymous texts, sometimes on the shakiest of bases. A German postage stamp in 1979 honored the eight-hundredth anniversary of the death of Hildegard of Bingen; the postwar, apocalyptic German artist, Anselm Kiefer, includes the thirteenth-century beguine and visionary Mechtild of Magdeburg as the only woman in his monumental painting "Germany's Spiritual Heroes."

PREFACE

The recent enthusiasm for visionary women in general and for the immensely talented polymath Hildegard of Bingen in particular raises disturbing interpretative questions. For Hildegard is in no way typical, either as a nun or as a visionary or as a female writer. As Professor Newman notes in her introduction, Hildegard was profoundly different from such later figures as Catherine of Siena and Teresa of Avila, the only women taken seriously as theologians or as mystics by the Catholic church until recently. Nor is Hildegard, who is in any case an extremely difficult writer, made easier to understand by isolating her from her twelfth-century German, monastic context and relocating her in a tradition of female spirituality running from Perpetua (d. 203) to Therese of Lisieux (d. 1897). A Benedictine abbess, Hildegard advocated a monastic life of obedience and communal prayer—not the extravagant and individualistic asceticism of some later medieval women. A proponent of Gregorian reform, Hildegard proselytized for clerical purity and power, and argued that women should not hold priestly office, although she (virtually alone among medieval women) undertook preaching missions with ecclesiastical approval. Authorized to write by God's command (as were many other medieval women), Hildegard dominated her confessors, scribes and illustrators in a way not common with female saints, some of whom (such as Elizabeth of Hungary or Angela of Foligno) were so controlled by their confessor-scribes that it is indeed hard to know whether their piety and even their words represent truly the divine message they heard in the inner recesses of their hearts.³ Moreover, Hildegard was a prophetic seer whose visions had political content and were based in a physical experience of light and pain. She wrote in Old Testament images of precious stones and noble buildings, of agriculture and organic growth, of courts and war and beautiful garments—images radically different from the more tender, domestic, even sentimental meditations on the Holy Family and the human experience of Jesus common in Rhineland convents of the fourteenth century. A visionary who took her revelations as a text for exegesis, not an experience for re-living, Hildegard was not, technically speaking, a mystic at all. She wrote not about union but about doctrine, although her attention to bodily phenomena such as sexual desire or menstrual cramps sets her apart from other visionary theologians of the twelfth century (such as Hugh or Richard of St. Victor).

PREFACE

Readers who come to the complex and difficult text presented here equipped with a background in feminist theology or in women's history may be surprised by many things—among them Hildegard's sense of inferiority as a female and her confident self-assertion in castigating the clergy. Readers who approach the Scivias with knowledge of later medieval apocalyptic or mystical writing may be puzzled by the virtual absence of nuptial imagery—usually thought, quite incorrectly, to be characteristic of women writers—and by the lack of a spirituality of imitatio Christi and self-punishing asceticism. In presenting Hildegard's obscure yet brilliant visions to such readers, it is therefore tempting merely to underline their idiosyncrasy and leave it at that. This would, however, be unwise. The flood of questions raised by recent work on women's piety needs to be addressed, if only by spelling out clearly two issues at stake. First, is there a female spirituality in the period between 1100 and 1517? Second, did medieval women speak with their own voices and out of their own experience, or is their work merely the inscription of the misogynist and patriarchal values of the dominant religious tradition? Although related, these are not the same question.

To ask the first question is really to ask whether there are consistent and identifiable ways in which women's religious concerns, considered across decades, classes and national or linguistic lines, differ from those of men. The question does not, as some have argued, make essentialist assumptions about the "eternal feminine." To be sure, there were biological constraints affecting women's roles in the medieval period—constraints of which Hildegard, with her keen medical curiosity, was well-aware. But no modern theorist would explain women's religious options or opinions as biologically determined. There were, however, institutional and educational constraints not rooted in biology that were constant throughout the later Middle Ages. Women were prohibited from holding priestly office and increasingly from exercising roles as preachers and spiritual counselors. They were cut off from the new scholastic education of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, yet found encouragement and opportunities to write when vernacular languages and genres emerged in that much-studied shift from oral to written culture.⁴ The question of women's piety is therefore in part a question of whether social, educational and institutional limitations were so powerful an influence as to differentiate fundamentally women's insights from men's.

Recent studies of medieval saints have suggested that certain themes such as the religious significance of illness and the need for charismatic authorization do characterize women's religious experience. Analyses of the structure of women's prose and women's visions also suggest that particular fears shaped women's intellectual efforts, and indeed that the act of writing itself was often for a woman both service to others and audacious self-integration. Some recent scholarship has even argued that gender-related imagery is used differently by males and females, although the best of such work eschews any assumption that women are generally drawn to feminine or men to masculine images. Research on medieval medical texts has established that learned and folkloric traditions shared an emphasis on the threatening physicality of females; some historians would argue that such traditions underlie the extravagant physiological imagery in women's writing as well as the extraordinary bodily miracles such as stigmata, miraculous lactation, and so forth performed by women from the thirteenth century on.⁵

PREFACE

It is clear that this recent research cannot be ignored in a study of Hildegard. Different as she may be from later, more affective female mystics, her Scivias nonetheless scintillates with a concern for embodiment—as both glorious and deplorable—that puts her in the company of Mary of Oignies, Angela of Foligno and Catherine of Genoa. Atypical as we may find her moderate Benedictinism, her assumption of quasi-clerical roles and her exegetical rather than experiential stance toward her visions, the act of writing that wrenched her from depression into leadership reminds us of the stunning personal integration and religious creativity achieved by Beatrice of Nazareth, Catherine of Siena and Teresa of Avila in similar acts.

The second question asked in recent decades about women's writing is also complex. Both radical feminists and conservative students of mysticism have queried whether what we have in women's texts from the twelfth to the fifteenth century are women's voices at all. In a culture where official theology was defined by scholastic debate and papal pronouncement, where reception of the eucharist required the recipient to submit to previous scrutiny by a male confessor, where increasingly elaborate rules were devised for "testing" charismatic gifts, which could be adjudged "feigned sanctity," how can we be sure we hear women speaking freely? Can phrases such as Hildegard's repeated assertion of female inferiority really be accepted as women's own, even when penned or dictated by the woman herself?⁶

Some scholars have wished to decide this issue a priori, declaring women's writings either a vague echo of more theoretically powerful works by orthodox males or a species of "false consciousness" that reflects merely patriarchal repression. This position assumes not only that women's courage, serenity, self-sacrifice and loyalty were self-delusion but also that the power to repress is the only effective power in human history. To this a priori assumption scholarly scrutiny of texts can, of course, provide no rebuttal. But recent scholarship not committed to this ideological position has found in Hildegard, as in Catherine of Siena or Julian of Norwich or even—for all their orientation toward male advisers—Elizabeth of Schönau or Dorothy of Montau, the wellings up of profound female experience. The low-keyed irony with which Hildegard reminded corrupt clerics that God had been forced to choose an inferior mouthpiece because they had fallen so low, like the cheeky casuistry with which the fourteenth-century English woman Margery Kempe met the admonition not to preach, have hardly seemed to all recent interpreters an internalizing of misogyny.⁷ Nor have all scholars read as repression Hildegard's glorious sense of the power and independence conferred on women by virginity.

PREFACE

It would, however, be misleading to close with general methodological issues raised by the current discussion of female spirituality. Attentive readers will find that Hildegard directs her audience not to a consideration of woman but to a consideration of humankind. She meditates not on the experience of anima as sponsa, languishing with desire for Christ her bridegroom, but on the place of the human person (homo) in a divine plan that marches from creation through Christ's incarnation to last judgment and final redemption. For a lyrical evocation of soul seeking the sensual delights of ecstatic union, one must turn, in the twelfth century, to Cistercian or Carthusian monks. The homo of whom Hildegard writes is a lump of mire, although surrounded with jewels (pt III, vision 1). The body this homo wears as a garment is crucial to its self and will rise at the last day gendered and intact, but body is useful to homo not as a locus of earthly or celestial sensations but as an instrument of self-discipline.

Hildegard's Latin is less beautiful than that of her more affective and evocative Cistercian contemporaries; her concern is more ecclesiological; her vision of the divine economy more historical; her piety is tougher and less individualistic. Readers who expect to be moved or inspired as Bernard of Clairvaux moves and inspires may be initially disappointed. But if one pauses for a moment while reading and looks beyond the elaborate and often confusing details of Hildegard's revelations, one realizes one has been shown the structure of salvation. With Hildegard one does not feel; one sees. Before the eyes of the mind pass such vivid images as the first human being, formed of clay, refusing to pluck the flower of obedience (pt II, vision 1); the great maternal figure Ecclesia, with souls going in and out of her womb (pt II, vision 3); the pillar of Christ's humanity, up and down which the virtues climb as on a ladder (pt III, vision 8); the bones of the dead leaping together at the end of time into figures whose very appearance reveals their status as saved or damned (pt III, vision 12); the crystalline beauty of the heavens in eternity, filled with light and song (pt III, vision 13). Hildegard's visions are in fact one vision: a primer and a summa of Christian doctrine.

Hildegard spoke to recall the lukewarm and their faithless leaders to God. Her speaking required courage. It also required troubled times and divine inspiration. Indeed she believed God had called upon a weak woman to rage against evil only because humankind had turned away from heaven and bent its will toward the dust from which it had been created. But rage she did, with confidence and power. It is hard not to see in her parable of the apostles (pt III, vision 7) a description of her own prophetic role:

PREFACE

And so . . . the Holy Spirit came openly in tongues of fire. . . . And, because the apostles had been taught by the Son, the Holy Spirit bathed them in Its fire, so that with their souls and bodies they spoke in many tongues; and, because their souls ruled their bodies, they cried out so that the whole world was shaken by their voices.

And the Holy Spirit took their human fear from them, so that no dread was in them, and they would never fear human savagery when they spoke the word of God; all such timidity was taken from them, so ardently and so quickly that they became firm and not soft. . . . And then they remembered with perfect understanding all the things they had heard and received from Christ. . . .

And so, going forth, they made their way among the faithless peoples who did not have roots. . . . And to these they announced the words of salvation and of true faith in Christ.

NOTES

1. Peter Dronke, Women Writers of the Middle Ages: A Critical Study of Texts from Perpetua (+ 203) to Marguerite Porete (+ 1310) (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984), ix.

2. Medieval Women Writers, ed. Katharina M. Wilson (Athens, GA: The University of Georgia Press, 1984); Medieval Women's Visionary Literature, ed. Elizabeth A. Petroff (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1986). See also the Matrologia Latina series, edited by Margot King and published by Peregrina Publishing Co.; and the projected series Femina, to be edited by Jane Chance and published by Focus Publishing.

3. See Sankt Elisabeth: Fürstin, Dienerin, Heilige: Aufsätze, Dokumentation, Katalog, ed. Philipps-Universität Marburg (Sigmaringen: Thorbecke, 1981); Paul Lachance, The Spiritual Journey of the Blessed Angela of Foligno According to the Memorial of Frater A., Studia Antoniana 29 (Rome: Pontificum Athenaeum Antonianum, 1984).

4. Herbert Grundmann, "Die Frauen und die Literatur im Mittelalter: Ein Beitrag zur Frage nach der Entstehung des Schrifttums in der Volkssprache," Archiv für Kulturgeschichte 26 (1936), 129–61. On the shift from orality to scribality, see M. T. Clanchy, From Memory to Written Record: England, 1066–1307 (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1979); Per Nykrog, "The Rise of Literary Fiction," in Renaissance and Renewal in the Twelfth Century, ed. Giles Constable and Robert Benson

PREFACE

(Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1982), 593–612; Brian Stock, The Implications of Literacy: Written Language and Models of Interpretation in the Eleventh and Twelfth Centuries (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1983).

5. See Donald Weinstein and Rudolph Bell, Saints and Society: The Two Worlds of Western Christendom, 1000–1700 (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1982), 234–35; Richard Kieckhefer, Unquiet Souls: Fourteenth-Century Saints and Their Religious Milieu (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1984), 57–58; Petroff, 28–32 and 37–44; Marie-Christine Pouchelle, Corps et chirurgie à l'apogée du Moyen Age (Paris: Flammarion, 1983); Caroline Walker Bynum, “‘... And Woman His Humanity’: Female Imagery in the Religious Writing of the Later Middle Ages,” in Gender and Religion: On the Complexity of Symbols, ed. Bynum, Harrell and Richman (Boston: Beacon, 1986), 257–88; idem, “The Female Body and Religious Practice in the Later Middle Ages,” Zone 3–5 (1989), to appear.

6. See Frauenmystik im Mittelalter, ed. Peter Dinzelbacher and D. Bauer, Wissenschaftliche Studientagung der Akademie der Diözese Rottenburg-Stuttgart 22.–25. February 1984 in Weingarten (Ostfildern: Schwabenverlag, 1985); Caroline Walker Bynum, Holy Feast and Holy Fast: The Religious Significance of Food to Medieval Women (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987), 13–30 and 277–96; P. Dinzelbacher, “Zur Interpretation erlebnismystischer Texte des Mittelalters,” Zeitschrift für deutsches Altertum und deutsche Literatur 117 (1988), 1–23; Ursula Peters, “Frauenliteratur im Mittelalter? Überlegungen zur Trobairitzpoesie, zur Frauenmystik und zur feministischen Literaturbetrachtung,” Germanisch-Romanische Monatschrift, N.F. 38 (1988), 35–56.

7. Dronke, 149 and 201; Clarissa W. Atkinson, Mystic and Pilgrim: The Book and the World of Margery Kempe (Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1983), 108–9.

Introduction

St. Hildegard (1098–1179), founder and first abbess of the Benedictine community at Bingen, is one of the most fascinating spiritual figures of the twelfth century. The bearer of a unique and elusive visionary charism, she was also a prophet in the Old Testament tradition—the first in a long line of prophetically and politically active women—yet at the same time a representative of the German Benedictine aristocracy in its heyday. Proudly aware of belonging to a social and spiritual elite, she was profoundly humble before God, awed by the audacity of her own mission, and by turns diffident and strident about her gifts.

Measured in purely external terms her achievements are staggering. Although she did not begin to write until her forty-third year, Hildegard was the author of a massive trilogy that combines Christian doctrine and ethics with cosmology; a compendious encyclopedia of medicine and natural science; a correspondence comprising several hundred letters to people in every stratum of society; two saints' lives; several occasional writings; and, not least, a body of exquisite music that includes seventy liturgical songs and the first known morality play. Although other women had written before her, their works had fallen back into silence; the names of Perpetua, Egeria, Baudonivia, Dhuoda and Hrotsvitha were unknown to her. Nor was she aware of her great French contemporary, Heloise. We must not underestimate the courage she needed as the first woman, to the best of her knowledge, to take up wax tablets and stylus in the name of God. Even greater, perhaps, was the daring required to embark on her career as a public preacher of monastic and clerical reform. This mission led her to undertake four prolonged preaching tours, beginning at the age of sixty; she spoke mainly to monastic communities, but on occasion addressed clergy and laity together in the public squares. In the meantime she continued to guide and administer the two nunneries she had founded, the first despite strong opposition from her abbot. Its daughter house, located in the Rhineland village of Eibingen, is still thriving today.

INTRODUCTION

To her contemporaries Hildegard was “the Sibyl of the Rhine,” an oracle they sought out for advice on everything from marital problems and health troubles to the ultimate fate of their souls. Often she gave her advice unsought—most notably to her patron, the emperor Frederick Barbarossa, whom she rebuked fiercely for his role in the German papal schism. Her books enjoyed a modest circulation and a widespread notoriety. By later medieval generations she was remembered primarily as an apocalyptic prophet. Her fiery but enigmatic writings about the Antichrist and the last stages of world history were collected by a Cistercian monk in 1220 and continued to circulate until the Reformation, when she was perversely hailed as a proto-Protestant because she had prophesied the confiscation of ecclesiastical wealth by princes and the dissolution of monasteries.

In our own day the voice that Hildegard had called “a small sound of the trumpet from the living Light” is resounding once more. In Germany she still enjoys a wide popular cult, and the abbey at Eibingen has become a center of scholarship and pilgrimage. Herbalists have rediscovered some of her prescriptions and begun to experiment with their use in modern homeopathic practice. Musicians have performed her liturgical songs and her drama, the Ordo virtutum, to great acclaim. To students of spirituality Hildegard remains of compelling interest, not only as a rare feminine voice soaring above the patriarchal choirs, but also as a perfect embodiment of the integrated, holistic approach to God and humanity for which our fragmented era longs. While the movement for creation-centered spirituality has exaggerated certain elements of her teaching and denied its more ascetic and dualistic aspects, it remains true that Hildegard unites vision with doctrine, religion with science, charismatic jubilation with prophetic indignation, and the longing for social order with the quest for social justice in ways that continue to challenge and inspire.

Hildegard's Life and Works

Hildegard's life, which is well-known from her own writings as well as a variety of contemporary documents, presents a mixed image of oppression and privilege.¹ Born into a noble family of Bermersheim near Alzey, she enjoyed the inestimable advantages of wealth, high birth, membership in a large and well-connected family and easy access to the holders of political and ecclesiastical power.² At the time of her birth the Cistercian order was in its infancy and the first stirrings of the apostolic poverty movement had barely begun. Benedictine monasticism, especially in Germany, remained an option for the elite, and many communities had close connections with the houses of their noble founders or patrons. On the other hand, the ethic of world-renouncing asceticism held a strong appeal for these powerful families, so it was not unusual when the daughter of the Count of Sponheim, a woman named Jutta, decided in 1106 to adopt the solitary life of a recluse.

INTRODUCTION

Jutta's family was closely connected with Hildegard's, and her conversion provided an ideal opportunity for Hildegard's parents, Hildebert and Mechthild, to perform a pious deed. They offered their eight-year-old daughter, the last of ten children, to God as a tithe by placing her in Jutta's hermitage.³ As a handmaid and companion to the recluse, Hildegard was also her pupil: She learned to read the Latin Bible, particularly the Psalms, and to chant the monastic Office. In time, other women joined Jutta and Hildegard, and the hermitage became a nunnery professing the Benedictine Rule. As a teenager Hildegard made her formal profession of virginity. We hear nothing more of her until 1136 when Jutta died and Hildegard was elected abbess in her stead. Five years later she received the prophetic call that eventually led her to compose the Scivias and embark on her public mission.

Although the outward circumstances of Hildegard's life were in no way remarkable until that date, her inner life had always been mysterious. In the personal memoirs that form part of her official biography she reports not early mystical longings or a precocious sense of vocation, but rather a peculiar temperament, which doomed her to chronic ill health and, at the same time, gave her a propensity for visions from earliest childhood. She could see things that were invisible to those around her; she foretold the future; and her visual field was filled at all times with a strange luminosity that she later came to call "the reflection of the living Light." In this light she perceived a variety of figures, ranging from human forms to elaborate architectural models, which she was able to interpret with the aid of a "voice from heaven." Finally, on rare occasions she came into contact with a greater brightness, which she called "the living Light" itself; her description of this experience (written at the age of 77) suggests a direct encounter with the divine presence.⁴ Initially, however, her visions were merely baffling. Hildegard confided them only to Jutta and to the monk Volmar, her teacher and later her secretary and close friend.

The early genesis of these visions, their connection with the "aerial fires" and other illnesses that plagued Hildegard, and above all, the fact that she experienced visions for forty years before receiving her prophetic call and learning to interpret them as a gift from God, strongly suggest a physiological basis. Charles Singer and, more recently, Oliver Sacks have concluded that the abbess suffered from "scintillating scotoma," a form of migraine.⁵ But illness did not prevent her from living an extraordinarily active life and surviving to the ripe age of eighty-one. Moreover, she always stressed that she received her visions while “fully awake in mind and body” and without any impairment of her normal sense functioning—a description that would exclude any seizures, ecstasies or trance states. It is even clearer that she did not in any way seek to induce the visions. As a Benedictine she practiced and counselled only moderate fasting and avoided mortifications; nor is it reported that she spent long hours in private prayer. Her visionary experience, then, was one of the givens of her physical and psychological make-up. It took decades of painfully acquired self-knowledge—and the authority of an abbatial position—before she was able to understand the visions as a vehicle for divine revelation. Her spirituality thus stands in contrast with that of later mystics who deliberately cultivated visions and other paranormal experiences. Nevertheless, her visions set a seal on the prophetic authority she claimed: without them she would have had neither a message nor an audience. Illness, on the other hand, kept her constantly aware of her human frailty and furnished one of the abiding themes of her spirituality, that of divine power made perfect in weakness.⁶

INTRODUCTION

Hildegard’s prophetic call came to her in 1141 in the form of a fiery light that permeated her whole heart and brain and gave her an infused knowledge of all the books of Scripture. In the Scivias preface, where she describes this illumination, she is careful to give her exact age at the time as well as the names of all her superiors (the reigning emperor, the archbishop of Mainz and the abbot of St. Disibod). This scrupulous dating follows a literary convention established by the Hebrew prophets and continued by the seer John of Patmos; like them, Hildegard was keenly aware of history and her own historical moment. The illumination, with the subsequent command to “cry out and write,” had come to her not because she was any more devout or deserving than others, but because the times were desperate. Unlike modern historians Hildegard did not perceive the mid-twelfth century as a time of spiritual fervor and renewal, but as an “effeminate age” in which the Scriptures were neglected, the clergy “lukewarm and sluggish” and the Christian people ill-informed. Her mission, then, was to do with her prophetic charism what professional clerics had failed to do with their priestly charism: teach, preach, interpret the Scriptures and proclaim the justice of God.

After she overcame her initial hesitation about writing, it took Hildegard ten years to complete the Scivias with the editorial help of Volmar and the assistance and moral support of her favorite nun, Richardis von Stade.⁷ This decade was marked by numerous crises in her life. Through the agency of Volmar and of her bishop, Henry of Mainz, Hildegard’s fame eventually reached the ears of Pope Eugenius III, who happened to be presiding over a synod of bishops at Trier in the winter of 1147–48. Eugenius, a Cistercian, had been a disciple of St. Bernard before his elevation. Not long before the synod of Trier, Hildegard had written to the abbot of Clairvaux to seek confirmation of her gifts, and Bernard intervened on her behalf with the pope. The upshot was that Eugenius took advantage of his proximity to Hildegard's convent to procure a copy of her unfinished Scivias, which he read in public before the assembled bishops and then officially endorsed, sending the seer a letter of apostolic greeting and benediction to continue her work.⁸ The importance of this papal seal of approval cannot be overestimated. Not only did it increase Hildegard's confidence and security in the face of continuing self-doubt, but it also authenticated her publicly and protected her from the censure she was bound to attract for violating the deuterio-Pauline strictures on female silence and submission.

INTRODUCTION

At about the time of the synod Hildegard received a vision in which she was instructed to leave St. Disibod, the male community to which she and her nuns were attached, and found a new convent on the site of a ruined Carolingian monastery near Bingen. This plan met with vehement objections from her abbot along with many of the nuns, who were loath to leave their comfortable surroundings for a desolate wilderness. Hildegard's desire for independence from the monks—juridical and financial as well as spiritual—embroiled her in prolonged conflict with the abbot of St. Disibod.⁹ In addition, some of her daughters refused to move; her beloved Richardis left to become abbess of another monastery, much to Hildegard's chagrin; and her migration exposed her to ridicule from the local nobility, whose goodwill was essential if the new community was to prosper. Nevertheless she persevered, using her family connections to secure the land and a miraculous "charismatic illness" to persuade the abbot that her departure was the will of God. Her new monastic church of St. Rupert was formally consecrated in 1152.

During the 1150s Hildegard devoted herself to securing the welfare of her monastery, the Rupertsberg, with every means at her disposal.¹⁰ She worked to establish monastic discipline by teaching and preaching; supervised construction of the new buildings; obtained gifts and bequests to make her community financially secure; fought for a charter of independence from St. Disibod; and fostered the cult of her new patron, St. Rupert, by writing his vita. To instruct her nuns she wrote a commentary on the Athanasian creed, and she enriched their liturgical life with the repertoire of songs that she eventually gathered into her Symphonia.¹¹ To this period also, in all likelihood, belong the final version of her music drama, the Ordo virtutum (Play of Virtues), and the mysterious Lingua ignota, which she seems to have created as a kind of secret language to instil a sense of mystical solidarity among her nuns.¹²

This intense burst of activity directed toward her daughters was complemented by an ever-widening correspondence with the outside world. Hildegard's growing fame brought a constant stream of pilgrims and miracle-seekers, as well as prospective nuns, to the Rupertsberg gates. Most of her correspondents were fellow abbesses, abbots and priests, although there is an impressive sprinkling of secular rulers and prelates and a less prestigious, though perhaps more revealing, selection of letters to ordinary laymen and women. It is difficult to evaluate Hildegard's correspondence in its present state, however, since her secretaries edited freely in order to upgrade the status of her associates and enhance her image as an inspired oracle of God—possibly with a view to imminent canonization. A forthcoming critical edition of her letters will make it possible, for the first time, to assess the actual scope and influence of her correspondence.¹³

INTRODUCTION

According to an autobiographical preface, it was in the same decade of almost unbelievable energy that Hildegard composed her two scientific works. The Book of Simple Medicine, also called Nine Books on the Subtleties of Different Kinds of Creatures, summarizes the natural science of her age in a logical encyclopedic format. Four books on animals, two on herbs and trees, and three on gems, metals and “elements” combine a wealth of empirical observation with medical notes on the wholesome and poisonous properties of creatures, moral symbolism belonging to the genre of bestiary lore, and magical charms to be used in healing. A companion volume, the Book of Composite Medicine or Causes and Cures, was apparently never redacted in final form. Along with more or less systematic material on diseases and their treatment, it contains a fascinating miscellany of traditions about Adam and Eve, observations on sexuality and even astrological lore.¹⁴

It is significant that these works, unlike the Scivias and Hildegard's later visionary writings, make no claim to divine inspiration. Neither she nor her secretaries ever made any attempt to disseminate them, nor are they included in the huge manuscript of her collected works, prepared at the Rupertsberg shortly after her death. This omission suggests that Hildegard made a sharp distinction between God's work and her own, yet her creativity and curiosity knew no bounds. The medical works, especially Causes and Cures, were probably compiled for her personal use. A tradition of miraculous healings ascribed to her suggests that she practiced medicine informally, like many monastics; on the evidence of these writings, she used both natural and supernatural means.¹⁵ Only in her last written work did she attempt to combine her scientific interests with her prophetic and theological mission.

Around 1158, Hildegard was ready to turn her restless mind in new directions. The Rupertsberg, strengthened and stabilized by two charters from the new archbishop of Mainz, was now well enough established that she could risk prolonged absence for the sake of preaching. Over the next five years she undertook three major tours, despite the burden of illness. Travelling along Germany's great rivers, the Rhine and the Main, she preached at numerous monasteries and gave fiery apocalyptic sermons in the cathedral towns of Cologne and Trier. Many of these communities subsequently requested transcripts of her sermons, which can be found among her correspondence.¹⁶ This period also saw the composition of a new visionary work, the Liber vitae meritorum (Book of Life's Merits), which became the second volume of her trilogy. Based on her own experience as a spiritual director, it deals with moral psychology and penance in the context of an overarching christological vision. This little-known work represents a novel synthesis of at least three medieval genres: the psychomachia or virtue-vice debate, the penitential and the otherworld vision. It is an important early witness to the developing doctrine of purgatory and represents an interesting compromise between the older medieval concept of virtues and vices as static entities and the newer psychological dynamism favored by the Victorines and Cistercians.¹⁷

INTRODUCTION

By the time she had completed the Book of Life's Merits Hildegard was sixty-five and in constant ill health, but her old age witnessed both the most remarkable literary work and the bitterest conflicts of her long career. Although the abbess could inspire deep loyalty and devotion in her friends, she also had a talent for making enemies. Her sheer force of will, combined with a dazzling array of spiritual and intellectual gifts, a courage hardened by decades of struggle, and a prophetic persona, which she displayed in season and out, made her a formidable opponent; and she did not take defeat easily. When Richardis left her to become abbess of Bassum, Hildegard contested the election and appealed the case all the way to the pope, who ruled against her; she relented only when her young disciple took sick and died at the height of the conflict.¹⁸ The monks of St. Disibod, too, had tasted her wrath when they objected to her plans for independence. But the conflicts of her last years show Hildegard in a more disinterested light, taking considerable risks for the sake of her principles.

The most celebrated of these quarrels set the prophet against the emperor, Frederick Barbarossa.¹⁹ The two had earlier been on excellent terms. Sometime in the mid-1150s Frederick had summoned Hildegard to his palace at Ingelheim to give a prophetic oracle, the contents of which neither party ever disclosed in writing. In 1163 he gave her an imperial charter of protection for the Rupertsberg, guaranteeing valuable liberties. But from an ecclesiastical point of view, Frederick was already schismatic at this time, for in 1159 he had supported an antipope, Victor IV, in opposition to Alexander III. Most of the German bishops had been willing to support Victor, but when he died in 1164 and Frederick appointed a successor instead of seeking reconciliation with the legitimate pope, the prelates were outraged and Hildegard added her prophetic voice to the chorus, calling her imperial patron a madman. She continued to oppose the emperor when he named a third antipope in 1168, thus refusing to let her loyalties be dictated by political self-interest.²⁰ Her staunchly orthodox stance is also demonstrated by a polemic she wrote against the Cathars in 1163 at the request of the canons of Mainz.²¹

INTRODUCTION

In the meantime Hildegard had begun work on her final visionary opus, the Liber divinorum operum or Book of Divine Works (also called De operatione Dei or On the Activity of God).²² This work, inspired by an overpowering vision of Caritas or Divine Love, sets forth Hildegard's cosmology and her most mature views of history and eschatology. Like the Scivias, it ends with an apocalyptic scenario, which was eagerly scrutinized for centuries to come. The heart of the book, however, lies in a pair of carefully balanced commentaries on the Johannine prologue and the first chapter of Genesis. This construction holds the key to Hildegard's whole theological vision, which revolves around the identity of the Creator with the incarnate Word. Reverent meditation on the cosmos and its proportions, which all have their analogues in the microcosm of the human body, leads to the same eternal center as meditation on history in its divinely ordained stages. Just as the human form is inscribed in the center of the universe in a celebrated illustration of this text, so Christ or incarnate Love is inscribed in the center of time.²³ The consequences of this vision are worked out in detail by means of the ingenious allegories and intricate numerological correlations so dear to Hildegard's age.

Before completing the Book of Divine Works the abbess lost her secretary, Volmar, who died in 1173. He was replaced first by Gottfried of St. Disibod, who began to compose her vita, and then by the extraordinary Guibert of Gembloux, a Belgian monk.²⁴ Through hearsay Guibert had become fascinated by Hildegard's visions, and it is to his insatiable curiosity that we owe most of what she recorded about her inner experience. In return for this spiritual favor he rendered her invaluable aid by coming to serve as secretary and provost of the Rupertsberg during her final years. Despite the impatience of his own community, Guibert did not leave Hildegard even in 1178, when her feisty and unyielding temper led to the unexpected consequence of an interdict.²⁵ The occasion was the burial of a nobleman, at one time excommunicated, in her monastic churchyard. Learning of the incident, the prelates of Mainz demanded that the corpse be exhumed, but Hildegard maintained that the deceased had died in a state of grace and refused to obey even at the price of being excommunicated herself. For six months she and her nuns endured deprivation of Mass, sacraments and their unique liturgical chant. The abbess continued to fight until the interdict was lifted only a few months before her death. At this date the underlying cause of the prelates' antagonism is no longer clear, but Hildegard's resistance stands as a final testament to her courage and the loyalty of her disciples. The controversy also occasioned one of her most profound and poignant letters, an apologia for music and its role in the spiritual life.²⁶

INTRODUCTION

Hildegard's Spirituality

Although Hildegard is frequently classified as a mystic, she may be more precisely identified as a visionary and prophet. Classical definitions of mysticism stress the union of the soul with God and the whole system of ascetic and contemplative disciplines that aim to facilitate that union. But Hildegard, while she certainly had a powerful sense of the divine presence, did not follow the unitive way. "Prayer" to her meant primarily petition and liturgical praise, while "the love of God" meant reverence, loyalty and obedience to his commands. In the rare texts where she portrays herself as a partner in dialogue with God, she is not the enamored bride longing for divine union, as in St. Bernard's Sermons on the Song of Songs, but the fragile and woefully inadequate mortal—"ashes of ashes, and filth of filth"—trembling before the great commission she has received. Like Moses "stuttering and slow of speech," and like Isaiah "of unclean lips," she offers the prophet's classic response to a calling she has not chosen, yet cannot do other than obey.

The essentially prophetic character of Hildegard's spirituality explains the startling lack of interest in her own subjectivity. In spite of her unusual inner experiences, she recorded only as much as she had to reveal in order to authenticate her works. Thus only at the beginning and end of each book does she describe its genesis in visions; elsewhere the emphasis rests firmly on the content, and still more on the meaning, of the things seen. Moreover, her autobiographical prefaces and endings tend to focus as much on the seer's disabilities (her femaleness, poor health and lack of education) as they do on her revelations. These disclaimers, far from representing a simple "modesty topos," also serve the aim of authentication; they are meant to persuade readers that, because the author is not "wise according to worldly standards," her weakness and foolishness have been empowered by God alone.²⁷

Hildegard's prophetic self-awareness pervades all her writings except for her scientific works, and accounts for many of their stylistic features as well as their characteristically objective or outer-directed teaching. Because she saw herself as the voice of another, not as a speaker in her own right, she often seems disturbingly unaware of the human element in her writings. Not only does she lapse easily from speaking about God in the third person, as preacher, to speaking for him in the first person, as prophet; she also claims direct verbal inspiration for her entire opus and threatens terrible divine vengeance on anyone who dares to add, delete or alter a word. This instrumental view of her activity also required her to deny any education beyond “simple reading,” although she was already well-acquainted with the Church Fathers and standard biblical commentaries when she wrote the Scivias, and by the end of her life was a woman of remarkably wide culture. Her posture as a simple, unlearned person was not intended to deceive; aside from reinforcing her prophetic persona, it constitutes an implicit critique of the learned clerics whose negligence, she believed, had necessitated her mission.

INTRODUCTION

Hildegard never went beyond her limited and stylized self-disclosures to reveal more of her inner life until she was in her seventies, and even then she did so only at the request of hagiographically inclined admirers. For her first biographer, Gottfried, she wrote or dictated a valuable autobiographical memoir; and for the adoring Guibert she supplied this celebrated and oft-quoted account of her “mode of seeing”:

In this vision my soul, as God would have it, rises up high into the vault of heaven and into the changing sky and spreads itself out among different peoples, although they are far away from me in distant lands and places. And because I see them this way in my soul, I observe them in accord with the shifting of clouds and other created things. I do not hear them with my outward ears, nor do I perceive them by the thoughts of my own heart or by any combination of my five senses, but in my soul alone, while my outward eyes are open. So I have never fallen prey to ecstasy in the visions, but I see them wide awake, day and night. . . . The light that I see thus is not spatial, but it is far, far brighter than a cloud that carries the sun. I can measure neither height, nor length, nor breadth in it; and I call it “the reflection of the living Light.” And as the sun, the moon, and the stars appear in water, so writings, sermons, virtues, and certain human actions take form for me and gleam within it.

Now whatever I have seen or learned in this vision remains in my memory for a long time, so that, when I have seen and heard it, I remember; and I see, hear, and know all at once, and as if in an instant I learn what I know. But what I do not see, I do not know, for I am not educated. . . . And the words in this vision are not like words uttered by a human mouth, but like a shimmering flame, or a cloud floating in a clear sky.

Moreover, I can no more recognize the form of this light than I can gaze directly on the sphere of the sun. Sometimes—but not often—I see within this light another light, which I call “the living

INTRODUCTION

Light.” And I cannot describe when and how I see it, but while I see it all sorrow and anguish leave me, so that then I feel like a simple girl instead of an old woman.²⁸

This is not the kind of experience that could be taught or learned. Readers might be reminded of Augustine’s theory of illumination, which was probably familiar to Hildegard, or of the variant form of Neoplatonic light-mysticism that reached medieval Europe through Pseudo-Dionysius. A still closer parallel can be found in the experiences of Simeon the New Theologian and the Byzantine hesychasts, who sought by means of spiritual exercises to attain purity of heart and thus behold the uncreated light of Mount Tabor. Hildegard could not possibly have known this latter tradition, however; and as we have seen, she made no effort to cultivate or promulgate her special mode of seeing. Nor did she theologize about her visionary experience per se.

Aside from the dynamics of prophetic inspiration, Hildegard’s spirituality is best understood through the ecclesiastical roles she played: Benedictine abbess, Gregorian reformer and apocalyptic preacher. As mistress of the Rupertsberg, she was indeed a Benedictine to the core. The Scivias opens with a vision of two thoroughly monastic virtues, Fear of the Lord and Poverty of Spirit; one has eyes on every side, and the other is inundated with the glory of God, indicating that only the humble possess true vision. Throughout Hildegard’s works, but especially in the Scivias, the foundational virtues are humility, obedience and discretion, which, like Benedict, she called “the mother of virtues.” In governing her community and advising her fellow superiors, she advocated a middle way between laxity and self-indulgence on the one hand and excessive abstinence on the other. She placed a premium on unity, and her teaching is pervaded with classical monastic themes: spiritual warfare, knowledge of good and evil, the conflict between soul and body, the acquisition of virtues, the special merit of chastity. Monks and virgins, in her view, were “new planets” which first appeared in the heavens at Christ’s nativity;²⁹ she never doubted that they formed an elite corps among Christians and, if they persevered in their vows, would receive a special reward.

Although she herself was raised by a recluse, Hildegard was not particularly sympathetic to the eremitic life. A number of abbots and abbesses sought her counsel because they longed to lay down the burden of governing and work out their salvation in a hermit’s cell; she always replied that this was a temptation to be resisted.³⁰ In fact, Hildegard’s originality in so many fields should not obscure the fact that she represented a rather old-fashioned type of monasticism. Her reaction to the newer currents is neatly epitomized in her quarrel with the abbess Tengswich of Andernach, sister of the canonical reformer Richard of Springiersbach.³¹ Richard and Tengswich were pioneers in the movement for apostolic poverty, and Tengswich had criticized Hildegard sharply (under the veil of ironic praise) because the abbess of Bingen accepted only noble girls in her convent. What is more, she allowed them to wear jewelry when they received communion. In a spirited reply Hildegard defended the principle of class discrimination: One would not put beasts of different species in the same stall, and even angels had their hierarchy. As for wearing jewels, it was perfectly acceptable for the brides of Christ to dress like noble ladies because, as virgins, they were exempt from the rule of female subordination that required matrons to wear veils and lay aside their elegant attire. This blend of renunciation with privilege continues the long tradition of high-born abbesses, who gave up the titles and secular powers of nobility while retaining its influence, prestige and corporate wealth.

INTRODUCTION

As a reformer Hildegard belongs squarely within the Gregorian camp. In fact, as Jeffrey Russell wrote of Gregory VII himself, her life "is proof that a burning spirit can dwell within a breast committed to order."³² Ordo is indeed a key word in the Scivias. Hildegard did not call for radical change of social or ecclesiastical structures; it was the abuse of authority, not the nature of it, that she opposed. Her ideal was a Christendom wherein the secular power would be firmly subordinate to the spiritual, princes and prelates would rule with vigilance and justice, and subjects and layfolk would offer prompt obedience. Yet because her message was largely directed to those in power, and particularly to the ecclesiastical hierarchy, she concerned herself far more with the negligence of clerics and the arrogance of rulers than with the sins of subjects. Three issues that particularly concerned her were clerical celibacy, simony and the subservience of prelates to the secular power—a burning question in Barbarossa's Germany where the bishops were virtually ministers of state. All of these issues, of course, continued the eleventh-century struggle of the reformed papacy against what it perceived as lay encroachments on the dignity of the church.

In addition, Hildegard was zealous for orthodoxy and thus deeply troubled by the hierarchy's failure to offer any effective resistance to the Cathars, who were making numerous converts even as she composed the Scivias and had infiltrated the Rhineland by the 1160s. Their alarming success may account for the space she devoted to the sacraments of marriage and the eucharist, which were particularly reviled by these dualistic sectarians. In her most vehement and memorable preaching the abbess highlighted purity of doctrine along with sexual purity, both of which could be symbolized by the powerful image of the virgin Ecclesia. Hildegard not only personified Mother Church in this ancient symbol; in a sense, she impersonated her, making herself a mouthpiece for the pure but continuously imperilled bride of Christ.³³ In short, she placed her zeal for reform at the service of an essentially clerical vision of the church and a hierarchical vision of society. For her there could be no conflict between the spirit of prophecy and the spirit of order.

INTRODUCTION

Hildegard's apocalyptic preaching must be understood in its proper context.³⁴ As she was not a radical reformer, neither was she a millenarian; she did not envisage an imminent Second Coming or look forward to a golden age of the Spirit. Rather, her apocalyptic message is closely akin to that of the Old Testament prophets. She shared their perception that divine judgment inevitably follows on human sin, and especially on the sins of rulers. If the princes of the church did not renounce their greed, fornication, oppression and negligence, they would be punished by the loss not only of their wealth and power, but even of the dignity they had signally abused. The perpetrators of this vengeance would be princes and people, not because Hildegard believed that kings were superior to prelates or that laypeople had a right to choose their own priests, but because she saw that the secular power could serve as God's scourge to punish his faithless people, just as the Assyrians of old had been allowed to punish Israel. Apocalyptic imagery coupled with the preaching of reform carries the same message that Jonah brought to the Ninevites: If the preaching is obeyed, it is just possible that the prophesied disasters will be averted.

But there is another dimension to Hildegard's apocalyptic. Like all prophets she was deeply concerned with history, and in both the Scivias and the Liber divinorum operum she surveyed the course of salvation history from beginning to end, from the creation to the final judgment.³⁵ In order to understand the present it was necessary to consider the past—the successive dispensations of grace before the birth of Christ—as well as the future, in which his work of salvation would at last be fulfilled. Hildegard's vision of the end, as set forth in Scivias III.11–12, entails a grim succession of evils that must come to pass before the judgment. As elaborated in the Liber divinorum operum, however, her scenario for the last times represents neither a gradual improvement nor a progressive deterioration in the state of the world. On the contrary, history is now seen as “one thing after another”: ages of justice and injustice, each with its own deformations or reforms, would alternate until the coming of Antichrist. Hildegard did not presume to say when he would arrive, but she did frequently speak of her own era as an “effeminate age,” which had succeeded the virginal epoch of paradise and the masculine epoch of the apostles and would in turn cede to still worse times. In one passage she even suggested that this effeminate age, signalled by the advent of feminine prophets, began around the time of her own birth.³⁶ But as a rule, the succession of periods is not dated even in the flexible and teasing manner that is typical of apocalyptic. Later generations could and did interpret the prophecies as they pleased, inserting themselves into the sequence wherever they chose.³⁷

INTRODUCTION

The Scivias

The title Scivias is short for Scito vias Domini, or Know the Ways of the Lord. The firstfruits of Hildegard's prophetic labor, this book was ten years in the making (1141–51), and during her lifetime it remained the best-known of all her works. Pope Eugenius III's approval granted it an instant celebrity, which it has retained among modern cognoscenti in large part because of the splendid illuminations that adorn an early manuscript. The Scivias resulted directly from Hildegard's prophetic call and was addressed to a largely clerical and monastic audience, more specifically to indolent male theologians: "Unlock for them the enclosure of mysteries which they, timid as they are, conceal in a hidden and fruitless field. Burst forth into a fountain of abundance, and overflow with mystical knowledge, until they who now think you contemptible because of Eve's transgression are stirred up by the flood of your irrigation."³⁸ The visionary's gender is defiantly flaunted as a challenge to idle and "effeminate" clerics.

For modern readers the initial challenge of the Scivias lies in its distinctive style and structure. The text is divided into three books of unequal length, dealing respectively with the orders of creation, redemption and sanctification. The third book contains as many visions as the first two combined. Within each vision, or major structural unit, the organization is complex but uniform. Hildegard always begins with a simple and usually brief description of what she has seen; her visionary experience itself is taken for granted. Occasionally she is addressed by a divine voice or a figure within the vision. At the end of each vision proper, its interpretation is introduced by a formula: "And I heard a voice from heaven, saying . . ." From this point onward the initial vision becomes a "text" to be interpreted phrase by phrase, just as a traditional monastic commentator would gloss a text from Scripture. First the visual phenomena are interpreted allegorically; then more or less elaborate teaching follows, clarifying points of doctrine and morality that have been suggested by the vision.³⁹ Within each of these doctrinal units, scriptural passages are introduced as proof texts, and these in turn receive allegorical readings. The didactic and exegetical nature of the whole is signalled by the recurrent pedagogical questions, Quid est hoc? and Quomodo?—"What does this mean?" Finally each unit closes with an admonitory formula that remains constant for all the visions in a particular book, thus lending further structural unity.

The order of visions is carefully arranged to afford multiple perspectives on the system of Christian doctrine. In the division into three books focusing on creation, redemption and sanctification, there is an allusion to the works of the Trinity. The first book explores connections between macrocosm and microcosm, things above and things below, the created world and the fallen world. In the second book, which is dominated by the figure of Ecclesia or Mother Church, Hildegard presents her teaching on the sacraments of redemption: baptism, confirmation, priesthood, penance and the eucharist. She apparently regarded monastic vows as a sacrament too, for they are treated at length. (Marriage, as a sacrament of the original creation, is discussed in Book I.)⁴⁰ Book III has a double structure, at once historical and moral. Most of the visions in this part develop the image of a complex allegorical building, the “edifice of salvation,” which is upheld by divinity and inhabited by the Virtues. Hildegard’s depiction of its walls, pillars and towers traces the successive ages of salvation history from creation through the last judgment, while her visions of the personified Virtues allow her to present a theology of the moral life. The two themes coalesce in the last vision, a symphony of praise for the inhabitants of heaven. Both history and moral struggle are here transcended and consummated.

INTRODUCTION

Read as a visionary text the Scivias is unique; read as a compendium of Christian doctrine, it takes its place alongside many similar works of the period. The closest parallel is provided by Hugh of St. Victor’s summa, On the Sacraments of the Christian Faith, written only a decade before (c. 1134; Hugh died in the year Hildegard began to write).⁴¹ As an early scholastic who was also a noted teacher of contemplation, Hugh bridged the gap between the older monastic theology represented by Hildegard and the newer, more systematic mentality of the schools. In his summa the Victorine theologian used the method of scholastic argument rather than inspired visions, and he claimed only human authority. But a comparison of his table of contents with Hildegard’s will show the essential similarity of matter (see below), if not of manner, between the two contemporary works. The twenty-six Scivias visions treat subjects closely akin to Hugh’s thirty sections. Of the topics covered by Hugh, Hildegard omits only philosophical subjects like causality, predestination and natural law, along with certain “priestly” matters like vestments, masses for the dead and ceremonies for the dedication of a church. On the other hand, she includes an extensive treatment of the virtues, which Hugh omits. If Hildegard had been a male theologian, her Scivias would undoubtedly have been considered one of the most important early medieval summas.

The fact of visionary inspiration, of course, gives her work a tone and style quite unlike Hugh’s. Where he argues, she asserts; where he speaks in his own person, she speaks in persona Dei. Her untutored Latin is often difficult and idiosyncratic, despite the fact that she had Volmar as a copy

INTRODUCTION

On the Sacraments of the Christian Faith by Hugh of St. Victor

Book I [On the Creator and the Dispensation of the Law]

1. On the six days of creation
2. On the primordial causes
3. On the Trinity
4. On the will of God and its signs
5. On the creation of the angels, and on free will
6. On the creation of man
7. On the fall of the first man
8. On the restoration of man
9. On the institution of the sacraments
10. On faith
11. On the natural law
12. On the written law (the Ten Commandments)

Book II [On the Redeemer and the Dispensation of Grace]

1. On the incarnation of the Word
2. On the church and its orders, and on the secular power
3. On the spiritual power, or the ranks of clergy
4. On sacred garments
5. On the dedication of a church
6. On the sacrament of baptism
7. On confirmation
8. On the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ
9. On sacramentals
10. On simony
11. On the sacrament of marriage
12. On vows
13. On vices and evil works
14. On confession
15. On the anointing of the sick
16. On death, hell, and prayers for the dead
17. On the end of the world
18. On the renewing of the world

INTRODUCTION

editor to correct her mistakes in grammar. Occasionally she uses picturesque technical terms of her own devising; for instance, one of her standard phrases for monk is vivens odor vovens iter secretae regenerationis ("a living fragrance vowing the way of secret regeneration"). A priest is a pigmentarius, or "perfumer," perhaps with reference to the aromatic chrism of his anointing, and viriditas (literally, "the color green") means not only verdure or foliage, but all natural and spiritual life as quickened by the Holy Spirit.

The Scivias, then, can be approached from many angles: It is a prophetic proclamation, a book of allegorical visions, an exegetical study, a theological summa. Finally, it may be considered as a multimedia work in which the arts of illumination, music and drama contribute their several beauties to enhance the text and heighten the visionary message.⁴² The earliest manuscript to survive until modern times was prepared around 1165 in the Rupertsberg scriptorium and illuminated with thirty-five remarkable miniatures. These paintings were produced at great expense, using costly gold and silver leaf as well as colors, and they are iconographically unique.⁴³ In style, too, they diverge from contemporary manuscript illumination as strikingly as Hildegard's Latin differs from that of a rhetorically trained twelfth-century humanist. Recent literature has presented the abbess herself as painter, but there is no medieval evidence to support this hypothesis, and if it were true both Hildegard and her biographers would surely have mentioned such a notable achievement. Given the peculiarities of the work, however, it seems likely that the artist (or artists) lacked formal training and worked under the visionary's personal supervision. The painter may have been a gifted Rupertsberg nun, or perhaps a monk from St. Disibod or another monastery closely associated with Hildegard.

Whoever the artist, he or she stayed close to the text of the visions and apparently eschewed the use of models, recombining iconographic motifs in new forms as creatively as Hildegard re-envisioned the familiar themes of Christian doctrine. The paintings are thus far more than illustrations; insofar as possible, they draw the viewer into the numinous world of the visionary's own experience. In this respect they resemble the didactic and meditative diagrams sprinkled through the works of Hugh of St. Victor.⁴⁴ The originality of these miniatures becomes even clearer when they are compared with illustrated Hildegard manuscripts prepared outside the Rupertsberg, such as the Heidelberg Scivias and the Lucca manuscript of the Liber divinorum operum.⁴⁵

Unfortunately the famed Rupertsberg Scivias vanished in the bombing of Dresden and has not been seen since 1945. But a photocopy had been providentially made in 1927, and the twentieth-century nuns of Eibingen devoted seven years to the preparation of a hand-copied and hand-painted facsimile on parchment. This manuscript (1927–33), with miniatures painted by Dame Josepha Knips, is today our only surviving source for the original colors. Although the black-and-white copies reproduced in this volume do not convey the beauty of the originals, they may serve the reader as points of orientation when details of the text are difficult to visualize. Readers must be wary, however; although the correspondence between text and miniature is close, it is not exact, and discrepancies should be noted.

INTRODUCTION

In the last Scivias vision Hildegard introduced music to end her work in a triumphant chorus of praise. We know from epistolary evidence that she was already celebrated for her lyrics as early as 1148 and as far away as Paris.⁴⁶ The fourteen pieces included in Scivias III.13, which were later incorporated in her Symphonia, comprise seven antiphons and seven responsories in honor of the Virgin Mary, the angels and the hierarchy of heaven. Although the Scivias manuscripts do not supply musical notation, Hildegard's melodies have come down to us in the two extant Symphonia manuscripts, and several of these pieces are now available on record.⁴⁷ In Hildegard's lifetime they were undoubtedly sung by the Rupertsberg nuns as part of the Divine Office.

Following the songs is a short play, which brings the reader from heaven back to earth, from the Church Triumphant to the Church Militant. It presents the struggle of a soul tempted by the enemy but rescued and strengthened by a choir of Virtues, until it finally attains salvation and sees the devil bound. In this short form the play admirably summarizes the themes of Book III. It was probably not long afterward that Hildegard expanded it into the longer version known as the Ordo virtutum and composed its melodies, if indeed she had not already done so.⁴⁸ This liturgical drama (also available on record) antedates other known morality plays by about a century and a half.⁴⁹ Unlike other moralities, it is set entirely to music, with the exception of the devil's speeches; as the spirit opposed to all harmony, he is incapable of song. While later morality plays, composed in the vernacular, aimed at wide popular appeal and often included humor, Hildegard's Latin drama is thoroughly monastic and aristocratic in character.⁵⁰ Its performance at the Rupertsberg may have coincided with the dedication of the nuns' new church in 1152, a year after the Scivias was completed.

Synopsis of the Visions

Because of the length of this volume it has unfortunately been impossible to provide detailed annotation. Hence the reader may find it helpful to use these capsule summaries as a vade mecum alongside the translation. The synopsis provided below highlights the salient features of symbolism, iconography and doctrine presented by each vision and its accompanying minatures. It may be read either as an overview of the Scivias or as an introduction to the individual sections.

INTRODUCTION

Book One: The Creator and Creation

1. The mountain of God. Hildegard sees the Lord of the universe enthroned as “angel of great counsel” on an iron-colored mountain, which represents the eternity of his kingdom. The commentary highlights divine majesty vis-à-vis mortal humility, for the two Virtues irradiated by the glory of God are Fear of the Lord and Poverty of Spirit—both images of the seer’s own state of mind as she confronts this awesome vision. One Virtue represents the beginning of wisdom, and the other, the first beatitude. Like Isaiah in his vision of the Temple (Is 6:1–8), Hildegard is called and sent by the Lord to proclaim his justice. She is then granted insight into the mystery of human intentions as God sees and judges them.

2. Creation and the fall. In highly compressed and allegorical form this vision depicts the fall of Lucifer and his angels (represented as “living lamps” or stars) and the subsequent fall of Adam and Eve. The iconography is unusual and full of arcane significance. Eve, for instance, appears as a shining cloud full of stars because she is the “mother of all living,” and her unborn children are meant to replace the fallen angels. Hildegard’s commentary on the Genesis narrative largely exonerates Eve and lays the greatest burden of blame on Satan, breaking with the usual tendency to interpret this text in a misogynist vein.⁵¹

Representation of the first human couple serves as a vehicle for teachings on sexuality and marriage. Hildegard’s message here is in complete conformity with mainstream Catholic doctrine. She teaches that marriage is good, but virginity is better; divorce, adultery and fornication are wrong; consanguinity is a bar to marriage; procreation is a natural process designed by God but tainted by original sin; and sexual relations are permissible only when both partners are fertile. In the relations between man and woman she affirms male supremacy yet stresses mutuality, even to the point of misquoting 1 Corinthians 11:9. Where Paul said “Man was not created for woman, but woman for man,” Hildegard states that “woman was created for the sake of man, and man for the sake of woman.” She adds that there is no reason why a menstruating woman should not attend church, although a bride who has just lost her virginity and a man who has been wounded in battle should abstain.

The vision ends on a note of reassurance. Although Adam and Eve were cast out of paradise, the sinless Redeemer delivered them by means of chastity, humility, charity and other virtues. Likewise, human disobedience caused the whole creation to rebel, destroying its original harmony, yet God preserved paradise inviolate as a sign of great mercy to come.

INTRODUCTION

3. The cosmos. This vision of the cosmic egg, depicted in loving detail by the miniaturist, represents the universe as a symbolic, layered structure in which God sustains powerfully contesting forces in a delicate balance. Moving from the outermost layer inward, Hildegard sees zones of luminous and shadowy fire, representing divine purification and judgment; pure ether, which signifies faith; a watery layer for baptism; and finally the globe made up of four elements. Each of the heavenly bodies also has its allegorical meaning: the solar disk is Christ, sun of justice; the moon is the church, which reflects his light; stars are the works of piety; and so forth. Surprisingly, Hildegard does not develop the creation and birth mythology that the egg shape may suggest to readers; rather, she represents this form—"small at the top, large in the middle and narrowed at the bottom"—as symbolizing the stages of human history. The rest of the allegory also focuses on the mysteries of the incarnation and the church, in keeping with the overall theme of the Scivias.

In the Liber divinorum operum I.2 Hildegard presents an alternative vision of the universe in the form of a sphere. Her interpretation there correlates its proportions with those of the human body, since a major theme of that book is the correspondence of macrocosm and microcosm. To explain the discrepancies between her two visions she remarks that the egg shape better demonstrates the distinction between the various elements, while the sphere more accurately represents the measurements of the cosmos.⁵²

The vision concludes with a long polemic against astrology, magic and divination. The seer argues that heavenly bodies are the servants of God and have no power in themselves for good or evil; people who scrutinize the stars to learn their fate are guilty of pride and fall prey to the devil's seductions. It is difficult to reconcile this polemic with the deterministic lunar astrology set forth in Causes and Cures.⁵³

4. Soul and body. In this three-part vision Hildegard begins with a powerful myth, continues with teaching on human nature and psychology, and closes with a series of moral exhortations. The vision must have been a favorite with the artist, who illustrated it with three separate paintings.

The structure is unusual in that a lengthy myth precedes interpretation of the vision proper. Hildegard introduces a lonely pilgrim soul wandering in the "tabernacle" of her body and lamenting because she has lost her mother, the heavenly Zion. The soul's poignant lament recalls the lamentations of Israel in the wilderness, seeking the promised land and the new tabernacle in which God dwelt. Attentive readers will hear echoes of Job, Jeremiah and other biblical sufferers. There is also a strong Platonic coloring, for the soul grieves that it is oppressed by the sinful and burdensome flesh; the mother-daughter dynamics may even suggest Demeter and Kore, with the devil cast in the role of Pluto. The myth is illustrated in the right-hand column of the first miniature, reading from bottom to top; here the artist has depicted the soul led captive by demons, tortured on the rack, assaulted by savage beasts, hiding in a cave, scaling a mountain and, at last, given wings to soar up to its heavenly tabernacle, where the devil continues to attack it in vain. This vividly realized psychomachia is akin to the Ordo virtutum.

INTRODUCTION

The heavenly voice next explains the vision itself, which represents the infusion of the soul into the embryo in its mother's womb. Conception and pregnancy are described by means of the ancient folk analogy of milk curdling into cheese; the quality of the milk or semen determines the strong, weak or bitter character of the product. This vision is illustrated in the left side of the miniature, which shows men and women—the ancestors of the unborn child—carrying bowls of cheese, into which a devil insinuates corruption. There follows a discussion of the natural powers of soul and body: the intellect or moral judgment, the will, the reason and the senses. Soul and body are meant to cooperate harmoniously; the body is not inherently evil, but through the devil's temptations it is a continual source of tribulation to the soul.⁵⁴ The second miniature portrays a Christian kneeling in prayer to receive strength against demonic attack.

In a third painting angels and demons struggle for possession of the soul as it passes from the dying person's mouth. This image of the four last things (death and judgment, heaven and hell) corresponds to Hildegard's classic teaching on the Two Ways. Every soul must choose between the sacred East, where the sun of justice rises, and the bitter North, where Satan rules his realm of darkness and cold (Is 14:12–15).

5. The synagogue. This brief vision personifies the people of the covenant in the form of a woman, Synagoga, who is the “mother of the incarnation” and thus the mother-in-law of the church. Hildegard is adapting a traditional iconography, which depicted the two women as rivals—Synagoga rejected and blinded because of her unbelief and supplanted in God's favor by Ecclesia, or the Gentile church.⁵⁵ The stereotype of the Jews as a literal, carnal people is present in force. But the “true believers” in Israel—Abraham, Moses and the prophets—enjoy a privileged status and are allowed to admire the new bride's beauty from afar. Like many of the figures in Hildegard's visions, Synagoga can be “read” vertically from head to feet as an allegory of successive historical periods. In the end, the seer teaches, the Jews will be converted and “run back with great haste to the way of salvation.” This commonplace view, derived from Romans 11, was shared by Bernard of Clairvaux, Honorius and many other contemporaries.

INTRODUCTION

6. The choirs of angels. The nine choirs of angels were conventionally ranked, in ascending order, as angels, archangels, virtues, powers, principalities, dominations, thrones, cherubim and seraphim, and arrayed in three clusters of three. Hildegard’s text supplies an alternative division into two, five and two so that her nine choirs can provide analogues for human nature. Angels and archangels signify body and soul, the cherubim and seraphim, as always, symbolize the knowledge and love of God, and the five middle orders represent the five senses. Further allegorical details pertain to the incarnation and the life of virtue. From Pseudo-Dionysius Hildegard takes the notion that the celestial hierarchy above mirrors the ecclesiastical hierarchy below. Her vision of the choirs as “armies arrayed like a crown” inspires the artist’s brilliant mandala-like image of nine concentric circles ranged about a void to signify the ineffable Presence.⁵⁶

The reason for placing the synagogue and the angels in this section of the Scivias is not immediately apparent. But Hildegard may have meant to show that while the synagogue prefigures the work of salvation and the angels assist in it, true redemption could not be accomplished until the advent of Christ and the church—the subject of Book II.

Book Two: The Redeemer and Redemption

1. The Redeemer. This initial vision recapitulates important themes of Book I—Hildegard’s prophetic call, the creation and the fall of man—but the emphasis has now shifted to the Second Person of the Trinity. Vision I.2 focused on Satan and Eve; this vision concentrates on Christ and Adam. Hildegard first sees an unquenchable fire that is “wholly living and wholly Life,” with a sky-blue flame to represent the eternity of the Word. After creating the first human being, the triune God offers him “the sweet precept of obedience” in the shape of a fragrant flower, but Adam fails to pluck it and thereby falls into thick darkness. The forbidden fruit of Genesis is here transmogrified into a blossom that the man is supposed to pluck, so that his sin becomes one of omission; thus obedience is seen as a positive good and evil as a privation. This revisionist view expresses Hildegard’s idea that the “knowledge of good and evil” is God’s gift to humanity rather than the devil’s temptation.

Redemption proceeds in gradual stages. First the night of sin is illumined by the shining stars of the patriarchs, then by the prophets, culminating in John the Baptist; finally Christ appears as the radiance of dawn. By his passion and resurrection he delivers Adam, whose fate is contrasted with that of the unrepentant Satan. In the miniature Adam is represented three times: as the creature fashioned from mud (adamah = “red earth”); as the young man who withholds his hand from the flower; and as the old man who has fallen into darkness and “returned to his earth.” The artist’s vision diverges significantly from the text. He or she has added a central medallion to represent the six days of creation, and the unity of Creator and Redeemer is brilliantly figured in symmetrical spheres of light at the top and bottom of the miniature. A “finger of God” stretches downward from the light to awaken the newly created Adam, while the radiance of the risen Christ flames upward to redeem the fallen Adam.⁵⁷

INTRODUCTION

2. The Trinity. Somewhat illogically, this vision of the triune God follows that of the Redeemer, perhaps because the Trinity was first revealed to humankind through the incarnation. Father, Son and Holy Spirit are signified by a radiant light, a sapphire-hued figure and a glowing fire; the exposition stresses the unity and inseparability of the Persons. Hildegard then introduces three similitudes from created things: a stone with its dampness, solidity and kindling power; a flame with its light, heat and color; and a word with its sound, breath and meaning. The analogies of the flame and the word are ancient, but they are developed here in original fashion. It is noteworthy that none of these analogues is gender-specific, and the naming of Father and Son is balanced by a reference to “the embrace of God’s maternal love,” which is charity.

From the rather abstract language of Hildegard’s text the artist has conceived another mandala-image. “Light” and “fire” become concentric circles glimmering with gold and silver leaf, and quivering lines suggest the vitality and energy of the living God.⁵⁸

3. The church, bride of Christ and mother of the faithful. This is the first of four visions that center around the figure of Ecclesia and the sacraments. Baptism, the sacrament of her maternity, is represented in striking imagery faithfully reproduced by the artist. Reading the miniature from top to bottom and from right to left, the four panels illustrate successive moments of Hildegard’s vision. (a) Ecclesia, the bride of Christ, lovingly embraces his altar. (b) She prepares to give birth to God’s children; festive angels prepare their places in heaven. (c) Baptism. Two ancient images, the womb of Mother Church and the net of Peter, are conflated here. Converts or catechumens, represented as “black children,” race to enter their mother’s womb to be reborn; she gives birth “through her mouth,” that is, through the words of blessing and the breath of the Spirit. The luminous disk, familiar from the previous visions, represents invocation of the Trinity. As the newly baptized Christians emerge, they shed their dark skins and are clothed in the “pure white garments” of initiation. (d) Christ instructs the newly baptized in the Two Ways of sin and justice.

INTRODUCTION

The teaching in this vision emphasizes the majestic and mysterious powers granted to the church as well as the grace of baptism. The church will never be conquered by hell; her secrets transcend comprehension; her crown is the teaching of the apostles, and her heart, the virginity of Mary. Following patristic doctrine Hildegard uses the symbol of Ecclesia’s virginity to accentuate her pure faith, inviolate in the face of heresy and schism. But in her capacity as mother, Ecclesia grieves over the sins and rebellions of her children.

Baptism, Hildegard teaches, is analogous to circumcision under the old covenant, but is accessible to people of both sexes and all ages. It opens the kingdom of heaven to believers and remits the sin of Adam. Several brands of Donatism are rejected in passing; for example, baptism does not depend on the holiness of the priest, but on the invocation of the Trinity; infant baptism is acceptable to God; a layman may baptize in case of emergency. The symbolism of rebirth inspires an interesting digression on literal birth, which includes a surprising analogy between a man’s motives in procreation and God’s motives in creation. But the superior excellence of virginity is reiterated.

4. Confirmation. After the faithful are cleansed in baptism, they must receive the Holy Spirit through the sacrament of anointing with holy oil, which is reserved to the bishop. The vision depicts the power of the Spirit as a lofty tower that upholds and strengthens the woman Ecclesia. Her children appear in varying guises to indicate their spiritual and ecclesiastical status; thus, contemplatives are distinguished from lay Christians by the more glorious light on which they fix their gaze. But in each category some are more zealous in devotion, others more vigorous in justice. Hildegard teaches that while the sacraments are necessary for salvation, they are not sufficient; they must be accompanied by repentance and good works.

5. Three orders in the church. Ecclesia appears in her glory, clothed in radiant light of many colors: crystal clarity to signify the priesthood, the rosy glow of dawn for virginity, purple for monastic imitation of Christ’s passion, and cloudy brightness for the secular life. This vision strongly affirms the principle of hierarchy in the church: spiritual people are to secular as day is to night, and monks rank as high above clergy as archangels do above angels. It is permissible to move from a lower order into a higher, but not to descend from a higher to a lower.

Hildegard treats the priesthood briefly, stressing clerical celibacy and commending the life of regular canons. Her vision of virginity is more lyrical, characterized by imagery of music, flowers and feminine beauty. Virgins, she says, imitate the example of Christ and John the Baptist; they alone are entitled to sing the new song in paradise [Rv 14:3-4]; they go beyond the letter of the Law to fulfill the counsels of perfection. On the subject of monasticism Hildegard addresses several points of contemporary controversy. Although monks rank higher than priests, they may be ordained and preach if the church has need of them. Since God considers the intention rather than the outward habit of the monk, children should not be offered as oblates without their consent. Renegade monks, on the other hand, must be brought back to the monasteries they have fled. Married couples cannot separate to take monastic vows unless both partners consent.

INTRODUCTION

Although Hildegard's position on oblates and her emphasis on intention are in keeping with the spirit of twelfth-century monastic reform, she expresses a highly critical view of new orders. Praising St. Benedict as a "second Moses," she inveighs against diversity, novelty and singularity and proclaims that God will judge innovators. The faithful monk ought to be "humble and content with what his predecessors instituted for him." This kind of humility is equivalent to conservatism; in her view innovation can spring only from pride.

The last part of the vision elaborates on the unforgivable sin of "blasphemy against the Holy Spirit," which Hildegard defines as despair of God's mercy in the form of either final impenitence or suicide.

6. Christ's sacrifice and the church. This vision, by far the longest in the Scivias, deals with subjects of burning interest to twelfth-century theologians: the nature of the eucharist and of the priesthood. In the vision proper Hildegard draws on a patristic typology that enjoyed wide diffusion in medieval art. The crucifixion is represented as the wedding of Christ and the church: As Christ hangs on the cross his predestined bride, Ecclesia, descends from heaven and is united with him, receiving his body and blood as her dowry. Whenever Mass is celebrated, Ecclesia, as heavenly archetype of the celebrant, devoutly offers this dowry to the Father and renews her marriage union with the Son.

The numerous doctrinal points in this section can be grouped under six headings: eucharistic theology, liturgical practice, communion, requirements for the priesthood, sexual ethics and penance. Under the first heading Hildegard offers a commentary on the Mass, focusing particularly on the consecration of the gifts. Although she does not use the word transubstantiation and its related Aristotelian vocabulary, her teaching is in essence identical with the doctrine later defined by Fourth Lateran and elaborated by Thomas Aquinas. A surprising emphasis falls on the role of the Virgin Birth. The Virgin Annunciate becomes a model for priests, who bring Christ's body into the world by uttering the words of consecration just as Mary did by uttering her fiat; and the wheat of the eucharistic bread is made to symbolize the purity of Christ's virginal flesh. Since original sin is transmitted through the taint of lust, the Redeemer's body and blood must be free from every hint of sexuality in order to cleanse the sinful flesh of mortals.

INTRODUCTION

After treating various points of ritual—fasting before communion, reception in both kinds, the use of traditional words and vestments—Hildegard presents a typology of communicants. The second miniature for this vision illustrates the five types: faithful believers, doubters, the unchaste and lustful, the malicious and envious, the warlike and oppressive. According to the quality of their faith and repentance, Christians may communicate either unto salvation or unto judgment.

In the section on priesthood Hildegard condemns simony (the purchase and sale of ecclesiastical office) and pluralism (the holding of multiple benefices by a single cleric). She also reiterates traditional criteria for the priesthood: a candidate must be adult, male and sound in body. (Women, she says, are “an infirm and weak habitation appointed to bear children,” but as virgins they can possess the priesthood vicariously through their bridegroom, Christ.) The bulk of this section is devoted to clerical celibacy. Priests must have no wife except for the church and the justice of God; a married priest is an adulterer and serves the devil. Hildegard answers the objection that priests were married in apostolic times by arguing that God formerly permitted this aberration “because there were so few priests,” just as he permitted the patriarchs to marry their female kin because there were so few people. “But now the church is adult and strong, and her ministers are many,” so a higher standard of celibacy can be enforced.

The polemic against clerical marriage leads into a long catalogue of sexual sins: cross-dressing, fornication, homosexuality, “unnatural” intercourse, masturbation, bestiality and “nocturnal pollution.” This list of prohibitions in turn raises the subject of confession and penance, which is treated more briefly. Confession resurrects sinners from death; it may be heard by a layman in case of emergency; and it is strengthened by almsgiving—especially if the recipients are among the “deserving poor.” Hildegard urges priests to use their power of binding and loosing effectively and condemns those who abuse this authority through anger or negligence.

7. The devil. Hildegard's placement of this vision is pivotal. The threat of satanic temptation ends this book as the promise of angelic assistance ended Book I, but the vision of the devil bound anticipates the dramatic victory that closes Book III.

The hideous multicolored “worm” or dragon symbolizes the many kinds of vice and temptation with which the Evil One assaults people. As in Hildegard's previous visions of the church, Christians are divided into categories according to their degrees of faith and justice. Satan assails the "spiritual people" (priests and monastics) in one manner, the secular people in another, while heretics are represented as wholly in his power. Some features of the heresy Hildegard attacks suggest the Cathars; for example, they revile the sacraments and the clergy, feign Catholicism out of fear and lay claim to a pretended sanctity. Other accusations, for instance of devil-worship and obscene sacrifices of human seed, are ancient slanders earlier hurled at Christians and gnostics of the subapostolic age. Satan's power appears to be formidable, even though he is bound firmly by a chain and in the end the saints trample on him.

INTRODUCTION

An interesting feature of the vision is the image of Vanity Fair, possibly inspired by Revelation 13:17 and 18:11-17. This scene is illustrated in the lower panel of the second miniature, where the artist has depicted the sinister merchants in the hats worn by medieval Jews.

Book Three: The Virtues and the History of Salvation

1. God, Lucifer and humanity. This vision at first recapitulates I.1: Hildegard sees a figure of God enthroned in majesty and her calling is reaffirmed. The poignant novelty here is an image of newly created humanity: God "held to his breast what looked like black and filthy mire, as big as a human heart, surrounded with precious stones and pearls." The operative theological idea is an old, half-mythical opinion that humanity was created to replace a "tenth choir" of angels who fell with Lucifer. An eloquent miniature represents Hildegard's vision of these angels as shooting stars that are gradually extinguished as they fall, until only cinders remain. But their departing light is not quenched; it returns to the bosom of God, and since Satan fell "without an heir," God treasures his inheritance of light for a new creation. Unlike the angels, human beings are then fashioned with a "vile earthly nature" to preserve them from pride and consequent ruin.

The vision thus supplies one possible answer to a question that must arise among all theists who denigrate the body, namely, why a good God should have created such a "miserable form" in the first place. Despite the wretchedness of human nature, however, the Son of God has assumed it in the incarnation, so that no angel dares to despise it. Moreover, the filthy mire is held firmly to God's heart and adorned with the gems and pearls of sanctity. The vision is meant to inspire humility and gratitude as well as fear of God's justice; the commentary stresses that unlike the fallen angels, human beings can and therefore must repent of their misdeeds.

INTRODUCTION

2. The edifice of salvation. This vision sets forth a blueprint of the symbolic building that will be expounded in detail through the remainder of the book. The miniature provides an indispensable diagram, although it depicts a square building where Hildegard describes a rectangular one. Built on the mountain of God, grounded in faith and fear of the Lord, the city or edifice of salvation has a double symbolism representing, on the one hand, the course of salvation history, and on the other, the doctrines and virtues every Christian must believe and acquire to be saved.

The most important wall links the East (represented on top, as is usual in medieval maps) with the North (shown to the left). In the East lies the figurative realm of Christ, in the North that of Satan, and the luminous wall between the two therefore signifies speculativa scientia, or the knowledge of good and evil. This is not “speculative knowledge” in the sense of abstract thought, but “reflective knowledge” in the sense of moral judgment (the adjective is from speculum, a mirror); this faculty is the cognitive aspect of free will.⁵⁹ The remaining three walls are of masonry, which has several meanings: the joined stones denote human flesh and its labors, the Law and the works of justice. Thus moral knowledge must be conjoined with right action for the upbuilding of salvation.

Hildegard gives two interpretations for the points of the compass. In one reading, East and West signify the dawn of salvation and the sunset of the Law, while North and South represent the fall and restoration of Adam. Alternatively, the diagram may be read counterclockwise beginning at the right. The four cornerstones are successive covenants between God and humanity: At the South stands Adam, at the East Noah (the dawn of justice), at the North Abraham and Moses as representatives of the Law (the beginning of war against Satan), and at the West Christ (the revelation of the Trinity).⁶⁰ The proportions of the building also receive numerological meanings.

This vision assigns further theological value to the despised body. Again human beings are contrasted with angels: The latter are purer and more luminous, but humans are more valiant and meritorious soldiers of God because they have to do battle against their own nature. In ascetic struggle “they conquer themselves, chastising their bodies, and so know themselves to be in [God’s] army.”

3. The tower of anticipation of God’s will. From now on the exploration of the building proceeds counterclockwise, beginning with the northeast wall. Hildegard first examines the “tower of anticipation” of God’s perfect will, which was manifested in the incarnation and first prefigured in the Abrahamic covenant of circumcision.⁶¹ Aside from foreshadowing baptism, this covenant is taken primarily as a sign of sexual discipline: The initial

INTRODUCTION

“cutting off” of unchastity leads by stages to the perfect virginity of Christ and Mary.

Within each portion of the building Hildegard sees a group of feminine Virtues appropriate to that particular moment of salvation history. The Virtues occupy an important place in her theology; they are not exclusively human qualities but “brilliant stars given by God, which shine forth in human deeds.” The Latin virtus means “energy” or “power” as well as “virtue,” and Hildegard plays on both senses. In effect, a virtue is a divine quality that becomes an operative force in willing souls and fully incarnates itself in right action; it is a synthesis of grace and moral effort. As Hildegard puts it, the Virtues do not work of their own accord, but with the cooperation of the person who has received them from God. They appear in feminine form in keeping with a long tradition of virtue-vice allegory that goes back to Prudentius, but also because in Hildegard’s symbolic theology the feminine represents the sphere of synergy in which divinity and humanity work together for salvation.

The first three Virtues in this tower represent the initial manifestations of the ascetic life: Celestial Love, Discipline and Modesty. There follow two christological Virtues: Mercy (associated with the Virgin Mary and Christ’s birth) and Victory (connected with his conquest of Satan). Standing somewhat to the side are Patience, who imitates Christ’s passion, and Longing, who clings to a crucifix. Hildegard’s allegorical technique further characterizes the Virtues by assigning intricate symbolism to their iconography—colors, garments and attributes.⁶² In addition, each Virtue utters a self-defining motto; similar formulas recur in the Ordo virtutum where they are set to music.

4. The pillar of the Word of God. Near the northern corner stands the pillar of the Word, signifying both the incarnate Word and the written word of Scripture. The latter has not two parts as one would expect, but three: Old Testament, New Testament and commentary, or “the profound and rich wisdom of the principal doctors.” Such is the authority that Hildegard, in accord with monastic tradition, assigned to patristic exegesis. The first two sides of this triangular pillar display the saints of the old and new covenants: first, patriarchs and prophets, seen as precursors of Christ, and then apostles, martyrs and other Christian heroes. The third side, representing the exegetes, shows by its shape that wisdom arose from a small beginning, increased in the course of time, but will dwindle again in the last days. At the top of the pillar perches the dove of the Holy Spirit.

The Virtue in this vision is the Knowledge of God, more a divine than a human figure. More awesome in appearance than the other Virtues, she embodies the mystery of God’s mercy and judgment in bringing sinners to grace through the scourge of calamity. Illness and other chastisements may redeem sinners by making them physically incapable of their former vices, which otherwise they would never voluntarily leave. These reluctant Christians are the wedding guests whom Christ has “compelled to come in” (Lk 14:23).

INTRODUCTION

5. The jealousy of God. “The Lord is a jealous God and avenging, the Lord is avenging and wrathful; . . . The Lord is slow to anger and of great might, and will by no means clear the guilty” (Na 1:2–3). This grim vision presents the vengeance of God against evil, symbolized by a wrathful crimson face and three silently beating wings. Naturally the head faces north, directing its vigilance against Satan and his kingdom.

In the face of God’s jealousy no sin goes unpunished. If it is not avenged by voluntary penance it will exact its price either in earthly suffering or in the torments of purgatory or hell. Though vengeance may appear to strike without warning, God is always just, for human beings have been granted judgment to discern good from evil; ignorance of the Law is no excuse. Hildegard’s ethical stance is one of uncompromising self-denial; the choice of good is associated with struggle and anxiety, and that of evil with self-will, desire and pleasure. Certain sins, such as desecration or robbery of a church, simony and withholding of tithes, are singled out as special objects of God’s vengeance because they defile the honor of his house.

6. The stone wall of the old Law. The northwest wall of the building signifies the Old Testament Law, the period of history between Abraham and Christ, and the political order. Most of the commentary in this vision asserts and defends the principles on which Christian feudal society was based.

The human race, Hildegard maintains, is divided into two unequal orders, the spiritual and the secular, and each of these classes has its proper hierarchy. Among the secular people there are the higher and lower nobility, free men and women and serfs; among the spiritual there are “the excellent and the superior, the obeyers and the enforcers.” Hildegard has no doubt that these distinctions were ordained by providence; they “were and are and always will be.” Two ideological justifications for hierarchy are set forth: (a) it prevents anarchy, because without rulers people would “kill each other off and perish”; and (b) it teaches by the example of earthly authority how divine authority should be loved and feared. Though the spiritual power is more exalted than the secular, princes as well as prelates represent God’s justice and mercy. The “greater” deserve to rule the “lesser” because God has chosen them for their superior abilities—intelligence, integrity, eloquence—just as he chose Jacob to rule over Esau. But usurpation of power, whether through bribery or simony, violence or black magic, is harshly condemned—despite the same Jacob's example! Subjects ought of course to be obedient; if they suffer persecution from rulers, they can imitate Christ's passion.

INTRODUCTION

Eight Virtues inhabit this section of the building. The first group consists of Abstinence, Liberality and Piety: self-denial is the prerequisite for generosity toward God and neighbor. In the second group Truth, Peace and Beatitude appear, representing three stages in the victory over evil. Slightly apart stand two Virtues embodying God's temporal and eternal gifts: Discretion, associated with secular justice, and Salvation of Souls. The latter manifests herself in two phases: In her "Jewish" period she has a swarthy complexion, dark curls and a multicolored tunic, but after Christ's birth she takes on a luminous white aspect, stripping off all "diversity."

7. The pillar of the Trinity. In Scivias II.2 Hildegard presented the Trinity as an eternal living reality. Her focus in this vision is on the Trinity as a saving doctrine revealed by Christ at a particular moment of history. Hence the pillar appears at the west corner of the building, symbolizing the prophetic "end of the ages." It is triangular, like the pillar of the Word (III.4), and its three edges are sharp swords cutting off all infidels: heretics, Jews and pagans, symbolized respectively by chaff, broken wings and rotten wood. Hildegard adds a lengthy parable, which she then interprets as an allegory of the apostles' preaching, and supplies some rather cloudy similitudes for the Trinity. As if to defend their obscurity, she stresses that this divine mystery must be humbly accepted and not presumptuously scrutinized.

8. The pillar of the Savior's humanity. This important vision depicts the incarnation as the primary locus of the Virtues, that is, the context in which humanity is enabled to collaborate with God. The pillar closely resembles Jacob's ladder, but in place of the angels seen by the patriarch, Hildegard perceives "all the virtues of God ascending and descending." Her imagery is indebted to that of an earlier visionary, Hermas (third century), who in The Shepherd had described a host of celestial maidens in the guise of stonemasons working to build up the church.⁶³ Hildegard's maidens also carry stones, representing "the winged and shining deeds people do . . . to win salvation." These Virtues descend to human beings through the humanity of Christ and return to heaven through his divinity.

The miniature shows the influence of a traditional pictorial motif, the ladder of salvation, whereby Christians climb up from earth to heaven on the rungs of virtue. Based on classic texts like the Benedictine Rule and John Climacus's Ladder of Perfection, the image was particularly favored by monks and nuns. Many representations of it show demons on either side of the ladder, picking off unwary souls with their arrows;⁶⁴ Hildegard's image is more positive and depicts supportive Virtues in their place. At the top of the ladder stands the Grace of God, clothed as a bishop to admonish and exhort the faithful.

INTRODUCTION

The seven principal Virtues (proceeding from top to bottom) are Humility, Charity, Fear of God and Obedience on the right, and Faith, Hope and Chastity on the left. Humility is the queen of Virtues, as in the Ordo virtutum, but Charity is the most important and has the longest speech. She wears the sapphire blue associated with the Word of God and is assimilated to him as Chastity is to the Virgin Mary. The latter is overshadowed by the dove of the Holy Spirit and appears pregnant with a child named Innocence. In several places the text echoes earlier visions: for example, Fear of the Lord first appeared in I.1, and Hope with her crucifix is very similar to Longing in III.3.

A more perplexing cross-reference points back to I.4, for Hildegard observes that the pillar of the Savior's humanity stands "in the same place" as the radiant diamond-shaped figure she had earlier seen. But that figure was independent of the allegorical building, so Hildegard must be implying that a consistent "inner geometry" persists through all her visions. In both contexts the figure in question signifies the incarnation, but in I.4 Hildegard was discussing the means by which every soul enters its body when it is formed in the womb, while here she stresses the uniqueness of Christ's birth from the Virgin.

The central teaching of the vision concerns synergy, or cooperation with God. Hildegard teaches that God's grace will not forsake even the most hardened sinner, but it is not irresistible; the human will always retains the freedom to choose or reject salvation. To the sinner grace brings first self-knowledge, then repentance, finally hope and amendment of life. The discourse of this Virtue should be compared with earlier teaching on the Knowledge and the Jealousy of God. In a lengthy digression Hildegard draws an analogy between the seven Virtues and the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit resting on Christ [Is 11:2], thus reinforcing the centrality of the God-man.

9. The tower of the church. This tower stands at the southern corner of the building and represents the whole history of the church; it is therefore unfinished. But somewhat inconsistently, the seven turrets at its summit, standing for the gifts of the Holy Spirit, are already built. This detail clearly indicates how allegorical significance prevails over the logical coherence of the image. The motifs of the heavenly ladder and the cooperation of Virtues are continued from the previous vision.

Wisdom, God's feminine co-worker in creation, stands atop the "house of seven pillars" described in Proverbs 9:1. As the first of the cardinal virtues, she precedes Justice, Fortitude and temperance. The last of the four, however, is given not her classical name but the more impressive title of Sanctity—an index of the importance Hildegard ascribed to sobriety and self-denial. Unique among the Virtues, Sanctity has three heads. Two are sexless, but the left one, labelled Self-Sacrifice, is significantly female.

INTRODUCTION

Hildegard's doctrine of the church stresses the role of the apostles and doctors. The faithful, as always, are divided into various categories: some cherish and preserve their baptismal garment, others feel constrained by it but keep on struggling, while still others throw off the garment and return from the church into the world. Worst of all are the simoniacs with their filthy lucre. Continuing her polemic, Hildegard claims that they purchase offices "by means of [their] spiritual father, money—for in that transaction money becomes [their] bishop." But the attack on unjust authority is balanced once again by a call for obedience to the powers that be; they will perish horribly in God's judgment, but the time is not yet.

10. The Son of Man. This vision completes the circuit of the building, returning to the eastern corner where the Son of Man is seated on a throne beneath that of the Shining One (God the Father). He exhorts the people of God on self-knowledge, obedience and sexual discipline, reminding the married that coupling is only permissible out of desire for children, and the celibate that mere outer virginity does not suffice for their salvation. True continence is the gift of God and should not be promised hastily or presumptuously. A consecrated virgin should rely on divine strength alone and prepare for a lifetime of ascetic struggle.

Five more Virtues fill up the complement of the city. They are Constancy, Celestial Desire (symbolized by the thirsty hart of Psalm 41), Compunction, Contempt of the World (safely ensconced within the wheel of God's mercy) and Concord (winged like an angel because she prefigures the life of heaven). Christ appears in his human aspect in a rather understated form. Like Ecclesia, he is visible only from the navel upward because his lower parts represent ages of history yet to unfold. Some of these mysteries will be disclosed in the apocalyptic visions that follow.

11. The last days and the fall of Antichrist. This is the vision that won Hildegard her greatest celebrity as a prophet. Although she draws on earlier apocalyptic scenarios, notably that of the tenth-century monk Adso,⁶⁵ the seer adds powerful imagery of her own. Her three principal themes are (a) the "five ferocious epochs" to come; (b) the career of Antichrist; and (c) the rape and recovery of the church.

The upper left panel of the miniature depicts five beasts that symbolize future epochs of world history: a fiery dog, a yellow lion, a pale horse, a black pig and a gray wolf. Each of these animals suggests the temperament of villainous rulers to come. In the Liber divinorum operum, vision III.10, the description of these eras is considerably expanded, and ages of justice and reformation are posited in between the ages of misrule. All the beasts appear in the North, since they belong to Satan's kingdom; but no term is set to their rule. Hildegard says only that the world is now in its seventh age, "approaching the end of time." This is a conventional view, however, which has nothing to do with her symbolism of the beasts. In the sixth age of the world Christ was incarnate, just as on the sixth day Adam was created. The seventh age is a "sabbath," which may be indefinitely prolonged. One apocalyptic sign, however, is the fact that Hildegard herself prophesies. God has called her because his duly appointed authorities now languish in idleness, and the world order is showing signs of decrepitude.

INTRODUCTION

The approaching Antichrist is represented as a parodic inversion of Christ.⁶⁶ Born of a harlot who feigns that she is a virgin, he will be wholly possessed by the devil from his mother's womb and trained by her in the magical arts. Through preaching and false miracles, even the feigned resurrection of the dead, he will make many converts; finally he himself will simulate death and resurrection and promulgate his own scriptures. As Hildegard emphasizes Christ's virginity throughout the Scivias, she also stresses the Antichrist's lawless sexuality. Not only is he a child of fornication, but he himself will reject continence and all other forms of self-denial. For a time he will be opposed by the "two witnesses," Enoch and Elijah, whom God is reserving in heaven for the last times, but eventually they will suffer martyrdom for the faith.

The most daring part of the vision concerns the Antichrist's rape and bloody violation of the church, depicted in the lower panel of the miniature. Her private parts now become visible, with the monstrous head of the Antichrist appearing in place of her genitals, for he is both her son and her seducer. As Satan corrupted Eve, so will the son of perdition attempt to corrupt the virgin Ecclesia. But Christ's bride will emerge triumphant, though bruised, bloodied and in large part deceived by his wiles. After enduring persecution and martyrdom, she will be vindicated by her heavenly Bridegroom (upper right panel) and united to him in marriage. Scatology and eschatology merge as the Antichrist, self-exalted on a mountain of excrement, is struck down by a thunderbolt from on high.

12. The last judgment, the new heaven and the new earth. At an unspecified time after the fall of Antichrist, the last judgment with its terrors will come to pass and history will have ended. In Hildegard's vision there are no surprises in the judgment: Good and evil are plainly manifest in the forms of the newly awakened dead. Sentence is passed on the reprobate without appeal, and unbelievers are not even allowed to stand trial, for they are damned in advance. The saints, on the other hand, receive bliss and glory from Christ, who comes in majesty on the clouds of heaven, yet with his wounds still open from the cross.

INTRODUCTION

As the Son of Man sits in judgment, all creation is “shaken by dire convulsions” in which the elements are purged of mortality. Hildegard sees a “black skin” peeled away from them, recalling her image of the newly baptized in II.3. There follows a chillingly Platonic vision of permanence: In the new heaven sun, moon and stars will stand motionless, and on the new earth shall be fire without heat, air without density, a sea without waves. The vision ends on a note of everlasting stasis: “And so there was no night, but day. And it was finished.”

13. Symphony of praise. This magnificent coda is not really a vision but a concert. The songs Hildegard records in this section do indeed, as she claims, marvelously summarize all the meanings she has presented before. In the first fourteen pieces she offers praise to the Virgin Mary, the choirs of angels and five categories of saints: prophets, apostles, martyrs, confessors and virgins. Each rank of the celestial hierarchy is honored with an antiphon and a responsory, although the liturgical genres of these pieces are not specified here as they are in the Symphonia manuscripts.

Heaven is not populated only with saints, but also with repentant sinners. The second part of this section is a lament and prayer of intercession for the fallen. In the final portion a penitent soul’s pilgrimage to heaven (earlier presented mythically in I.4) is set forth in dramatic form. The soul slips from well-meaning innocence to impatience when she asks the Virtues for a “kiss of the heart,” and they warn instead that she must do battle by their side. At this point the devil intervenes and easily leads her into sin. In contrast to later morality plays, Hildegard is not interested in dramatizing the soul’s adventures in evil; instead she presents a verbal contest between the devil and the Virtues to fill the time until the soul’s repentance. In the end the Virtues receive the weeping penitent, and led by their queen Humility and celestial Victory, they conquer and bind the devil.⁶⁷

The play is followed by a brief commentary and a tribute to the power of music, anticipating the apologia Hildegard was to write at the end of her life. In liturgical song “words symbolize the body” and the humanity of Christ, she writes, “and the jubilant music indicates the spirit” and the Godhead. An allegorical reading of Psalm 150, in which the different instruments are made to symbolize the varieties of saints, leads into a final affirmation of the prophet’s mission and brings the Scivias to a close.

INTRODUCTION

Hildegard's Place in the Tradition

Although Hildegard occupies a central place at the crossroads of twelfth-century culture, the question of "sources and influences" has always posed difficulties for students of her work. One reason for the problem has already been addressed: Hildegard's prophetic persona demanded that she present herself as a "simple and unlearned little woman," and her claim to direct visionary inspiration barred appeal to merely human authorities. Thus, although she was undoubtedly well-versed in theological and spiritual writers, she virtually never cited her sources in even the most conventional or formulaic way. In addition, her distinctive literary style makes it difficult to recognize quotations, except for the scriptural texts that she chose to gloss. Since the exegetical tradition in which she worked was both conservative and cumulative, any one of a dozen writers might be cited with equal plausibility as the source for a given doctrine or interpretation. Only in rare cases, such as the seer's debt to the Shepherd of Hermas in Scivias III.8, or to Adso's treatise On the Antichrist in III.11, can we point with confidence to an individual writer.

In general, the most pervasive influences in the Scivias are the Bible and its commentaries, the liturgy, the Benedictine Rule and the works of such widely read Church Fathers as Augustine, Jerome, Gregory the Great and Bede.⁶⁸ In all of these Hildegard's monastic heritage is evident. She was steeped in the Divine Office with its spirit of formal, communal praise; her idea of heaven (Scivias III.13) is a thoroughly Benedictine one, which emphasizes not the vision of God or the mystical union, but the unending liturgy of the saints. She was familiar with the moral as well as the exegetical works of the Fathers, particularly with their teachings on virginity. And if her knowledge of early Christian writings included a moderately obscure author like Hermas, it probably embraced a fair amount of apocryphal literature as well. Attempts to trace her reading in classical authors, including scientific writers, have remained highly conjectural.⁶⁹ Unfortunately we have no library catalogue for either the Rupertsberg or the monastery of St. Disibod; even if we had, a list of manuscripts would not take account of the rich oral tradition, so important even in the literate world of the monastery. Some of Hildegard's arcane lore about Adam and Eve, for instance, seems to come from Jewish tradition and may have been acquired firsthand,⁷⁰ and much of her medical knowledge was surely gained through oral transmission and experience.

Hildegard probably acquired her knowledge of the Church Fathers from florilegia and earlier medieval adaptations as well as original texts. Among late antique and Carolingian authors she would surely have known Isidore of Seville, Rabanus Maurus, Paschasius Radbertus and the hymnodist

INTRODUCTION

Notker of St. Gall. The Neoplatonic tradition, which strongly colored her cosmology—accounting for affinities with more “avant-garde” authors like Bernard Silvestris and Alan of Lille—may have reached her through John Scotus Eriugena.⁷¹ On the other hand, she might have known this author only indirectly through his twelfth-century popularizer, Honorius Augustodunensis. Among her contemporaries Hildegard stands closest to Honorius himself, a prolific author who apparently spent the latter part of his life in Regensburg,⁷² and to Rupert of Deutz, a Benedictine who wrote numerous works of theology and exegesis.⁷³ We have already noted similarities between the Scivias and the work of Hugh of St. Victor. Other reformers, such as Gerhoch of Reichersberg and Godfrey of Admont, furnish useful points of comparison and contrast for Hildegard’s ecclesiastical program.⁷⁴ And she was undoubtedly familiar with certain writings of Bernard of Clairvaux, the recipient of her first letter, although Cistercian spirituality had only a limited influence on her outlook. While she admired Bernard’s personal holiness and shared the order’s preoccupation with Caritas, or divine love, the physical and aesthetic austerities of the white monks were foreign to her. Her version of “bridal spirituality” is more indebted to traditional literature on virginity, such as the Speculum virginum,⁷⁵ than to Cistercian currents.

In sum, Hildegard’s opus presents us with a synthesis of classical Benedictine theology, exegetics and spirituality as they stood in the mid-twelfth century, touched but not yet deeply permeated by the new modes of piety that were already changing the face of the church.⁷⁶ Yet conservative as she was, nothing she ever wrote can be mistaken for the work of another author. All is charged with the urgency of her prophetic mission, shaped by her powerfully original visionary and poetic gifts, and not least, colored subtly but pervasively by her feminine self-awareness. Hildegard’s place in the tradition of women’s spirituality is a complex question.⁷⁷ While that tradition may be theoretically helpful in understanding her life and work, we must remember that it was a hidden tradition that Hildegard herself did not know; any similarities between her spirituality and that of earlier female writers must result from common solutions to common problems, not conscious or even unconscious influence. With regard to later female writers the case is very different; there we must reckon with Hildegard herself as a significant role model.

Her community at Bingen, unlike the famous convent at Helfta a century later, never became a vital center of feminine spiritual culture. It may be that Hildegard’s own presence was too overbearing, or her visionary gift too intimately bound up with her unique psychology and temperament, to inspire imitation. In any case, there was never a “school of Hildegard” as there was, so to speak, a “school of St. Bernard,” of St.-Victor, or of Eckhart. Nevertheless the seer did have one unsought “disciple,” her younger contemporary

INTRODUCTION

Elisabeth of Schönau.⁷⁸ Excited by Hildegard's growing fame, this young Benedictine began to have visions a year after the Scivias was published. She visited Hildegard, corresponded with her, honored her as a spiritual mother, named one of her books after the Scivias and even adopted the older nun's conception of an "effeminate age" to justify feminine prophecy. Like Hildegard, too, Elisabeth felt herself called to preach reform, write epistles of spiritual counsel and utter apocalyptic warnings. One contemporary chronicler saw the two visionary nuns as partners in a single divine visitation.⁷⁹

Yet a comparison between Hildegard and Elisabeth reveals precisely which elements of the older woman's spirituality belonged to the future and which to the past. As Elisha to Hildegard's Elijah, Elisabeth "inherited" her prophetic spirit along with her gift of visions, her fiery reformist zeal, her role as moral adviser to all who sought (or were subjected willy-nilly to) her advice, and her willingness to intervene in politics—though the two women were not always on the same side.⁸⁰ Like Hildegard, Elisabeth was spiritually sensitive and physically frail, prone to continual illness which often accompanied her visions. These shared traits continued to dominate the profile of women's spirituality in the later Middle Ages; we meet them again in Catherine of Siena, Birgitta of Sweden and a host of lesser-known women.

Yet there was much in Hildegard that Elisabeth found less congenial, or at any rate less imitable. The abbess of Bingen's systematic review of Christian doctrine, her Platonism, her scientific and cosmological interests, her deep learning, her idiosyncratic style and brilliant, esoteric symbology, her artistic gifts (expressed not only in her musical and dramatic creations but also in the careful, architectonic structure of her books)—all these remained foreign to the seer of Schönau. In short, it is the complexity, variety and sheer intellectual difficulty of Hildegard's opus that marks her and not Elisabeth as a woman of the twelfth-century Renaissance. Although the two nuns were contemporaries, one senses that Elisabeth would have been equally at home in a community of consecrated women a century later, while Hildegard would have been an anachronism.

What Elisabeth may have found lacking in her spiritual mother, and what she in turn supplied and passed on to later religious women, was precisely her mysticism. In her one finds ecstasies, deliberate cultivation of mystical experience, a highly developed subjectivity and deeply personal (as opposed to communal) relationships with the saints; one also finds a characteristically intimate and mutually dependent relationship with her confessor, so different from Hildegard's clearly dominant position vis-à-vis her secretary Volmar.⁸¹ Even in their approach to their common Benedictine heritage the two nuns differed remarkably. Hildegard translated her private visions into the public medium of liturgical praise, which her whole community

INTRODUCTION

